

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

32101 063611451

Library of Princeton University.

Presented by

ARTHUR WELLMAN BUTLER
CLASS OF 1892

A
COMMENTARY ON THE
HOLY SCRIPTURES:

CRITICAL, DOCTRINAL AND HOMILETICAL,

WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO MINISTERS AND STUDENTS.

BY JOHN PETER LANGE, D.D.,
IN CONNECTION WITH A NUMBER OF EMINENT EUROPEAN DIVINES.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN, AND EDITED, WITH ADDITIONS, ORIGINAL AND SELECTED,

BY PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D.,
IN CONNECTION WITH AMERICAN SCHOLARS OF VARIOUS EVANGELICAL DENOMINATIONS.

VOL. V. OF THE OLD TESTAMENT:
CONTAINING THE FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF SAMUEL.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, SUCCESSORS TO
SCRIBNER, ARMSTRONG & CO.

Lange's Commentary.

OLD TESTAMENT VOLUMES:

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. GENESIS. | VIII. JOB. |
| II. EXODUS and LEVITICUS. | IX. PSALMS. |
| III. NUMBERS and DEUTERONOMY. | X. PROVERBS, SONG OF SOLOMON, and ECCLESIASTES. |
| IV. JOSHUA, JUDGES and RUTH. | XI. ISALAH. In Preparation. |
| V. FIRST and SECOND SAMUEL,
(1 vol.) | XII. JEREMIAH and LAMENTATIONS. |
| VI. FIRST and SECOND KINGS. | XIII. EZEKIEL and DANIEL. |
| VII. FIRST and SECOND CHRONI-CLES, EZRA, NEHEMIAH and ESTHER, (1 vol.) | XIV. THE MINOR PROPHETS. |

NEW TESTAMENT VOLUMES:

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. MATTHEW. | VIII. THESSALONIANS, TIMOTHY, TITUS, PHILEMON and
HEBREWS. |
| II. MARK and LUKE. | IX. JAMES, PETER, JOHN, and JUDE. |
| III. JOHN. | X. REVELATION. With an Index to the New Testament portion. |
| IV. ACTS. | |
| V. ROMANS. | |
| VI. CORINTHIANS. | |
| VII. GALATIANS, EPHESIANS, PHIL-
IPPIANS and COLOSSIANS. | |

. The New Testament portion, it will be observed, is complete.

Each one vol. 8vo. Price per vol., in halfcalf, $7.50; in sheep, $8.50; in cloth, $5.00.

Any or all of the volumes of LANGE'S COMMENTARY sent, post or express charges paid, on receipt of the price by the publishers.

THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL.

BY
REV. DR. CHR. FR. DAVID ERDMANN, GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF THE PROVINCE OF SILESIA, AND PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF BRESLAU.

TRANSLATED, ENLARGED AND EDITED

BY
REV. C. H. TOY, D. D., LL. D., AND
REV. JOHN A. BROADUS, D. D., LL. D., PROFESSORS IN THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

NEW YORK:
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, SUCCESSORS TO
SCRIBNER, ARMSTRONG & CO.

Entered, according to Act of Congress, in the year 1877, by SCRIBNER, ARMSTRONG & CO.,
In the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

GRANT, FAIRBANKS & RODGERS, ELECTROTYPERS AND PRINTERS, PHILADELPHIA.

PREFACE TO VOL. V. OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

THE Commentary on the two Books of Samuel was prepared in German by the Rev. Dr. ERDMANN, General Superintendent of Silesia and Honor. Professor of Theology in the University of Breslau, and in English by the Rev. C. H. TOY, D.D., LL.D., and the Rev. JOHN A. BROADUS, D.D., LL.D., Professors in the Theological Seminary at Greenville, South Carolina.

Dr. ERDMANN, in his Preface, dated Breslau, March 8, 1873, says:

'In regard to the execution of the work in its several parts, I add the following remarks. In the translation, while I have tried to follow the ground-text closely, I have preserved as far as possible the tone and impress of Luther's translation. On account of the admitted defectiveness of the Masoretic text of these books, it seemed to me better not to place the textual remarks and discussions, together with the various readings and emendations, under the text of the translation, but to insert them in the exegetical explanations. In the exegesis I have departed in one point from the form usual in this Bible-Work, namely, instead of explanations under each verse, I have given an exegesis that reproduces the content of the text in connected development, following the received division of verses. "Exegesis," therefore, or "Scientific Exposition," would have been a fitter heading for the section in question than "Exegetical Explanations."* In the next division, instead of the usual heading, "Dogmatic and Ethical Fundamental Thoughts," I have chosen as a more appropriate designation for these prophetic-historical books: "Theocratic-historical and Biblical-Theological Comments,"† for we have here to do with a new step in the historical development of the Theocracy in Israel, and with the wider unfolding of the religious-ethical truth which has its root in the advancing revelation of God. From this point of view of the history of revelation and the theocracy, the comments and remarks of this section are intended to serve as contributions to the hitherto too little cultivated science of the Biblical Theology of the Old Testament. In the homiletical section, while I have given my own words, I have rather cited the diverse witnesses of ancient and modern times, from whom I could derive any valuable material for fruitful application and parennetic use of the text on the basis of the preceding scientific exposition.

'In every part of my work on this portion of the Old Testament history of the Kingdom of God, with its fund of religious-ethical revelation, I have been constantly reminded of and deeply impressed by a profound saying of HAMANN, with which I here close: "Every biblical history is a prophecy, which is fulfilled through all the centuries and in the soul of every human being. Every history bears the image of man, a body, which is earth and ashes and nothing, the sensible letter; but also a soul, the breath of God, the life and the light, which shines in the dark, and cannot be comprehended by the darkness. The Spirit of God in His word reveals itself as the Self-sufficient in the form of a servant, in flesh, and dwells among us full of grace and truth."

As regards the English edition, the work has been so divided that Dr. TOY prepared the Exegetical and Historical sections, and paid careful and minute attention to the Hebrew text; Dr. BROADUS has reproduced the Homiletical and Practical portions, partly condensing and partly enlarging the original from English sources, especially from Bishop HALL's Contemplations and Sermons, MATTHEW HENRY's Commentary, and Dr. W. TAYLOR's Life of David.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

NEW YORK, 42 BIBLE HOUSE, March 1, 1877.

* ['Exegetical and Critical' is the heading adopted for the section in this translation.]

† ['Historical and Theological' in the translation.]

5201
561
O.T.V.5
(RECAP)

THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE NAME.

THE title of these books is an indication not of their origin, but of their chief contents. Although it is only in the first book that the work of the Judge and Prophet Samuel is expressly related, and himself, with the divine mission which he had to fulfil for Saul and David, everywhere made to take precedence of them, yet the naming of both books after Samuel is justified by the fact that Samuel, by his conspicuous position, as it is set forth only in the first book in his judicial and prophetic office in the light of special divine call and guidance (he being not merely the close of the troubled period of the Judges, but also the foundational beginning of the divinely ordained kingly rule in Israel), thus towers far above the first two kings, so far as they were chosen and called through him, and points out and maintains for the Israelitish kingdom, which owes its origination and stability to him, its true theocratic basis and significance. ABARBANEL remarks rightly (Præf. in Libr. Sam. f. 74, in CARPZOV, Introd. p. 212): "All the contents of both books may in a certain sense be referred to Samuel, even the deeds of Saul and David, because both, having been anointed by Samuel, were, so to speak, the work of his hands." KEIL also well says: "The naming of both these books, which in form and content are an inseparable whole, after Samuel is explained by the fact that Samuel not only by the anointing of Saul and David inaugurates the kingdom in Israel, but at the same time by his prophetic activity exerts so determining an influence on the spirit of Saul's government as well as David's, that this government also may be regarded as in a sort the continuation and completion of the reformation of the Israelitish theocracy begun by the prophet." (Introduction to Prophetical Historical Books of O. T. [CLARK'S Foreign Theol. Library], prefixed to Vol. IV. (Josh., Judg., Ruth), p. 4).

§ 2. DIVISION.

In the Hebrew manuscripts and in the Jewish list of Old Testament books only one book of Samuel, שמואל, is given. Its division into two books under this name, as we find it in our printed texts of the Old Testament, was first introduced in the sixteenth century, by DANIEL BOMBERG, after the example of the Septuagint and the Vulgate, and may be regarded as thus far appropriate, that the death of Saul, that epoch-making occurrence in the early history of the Israelitish kingdom, forms the close of the first book. Our Hebrew editions of the Bible follow the Seventy in dividing the Hebrew book of Samuel into two parts; they (the LXX.) did not, however, name these two books after Samuel, but included them with the two books of Kings, into which they in like manner divided the original one Hebrew book of Kings, ספר מלכים, under the common name "Books of the Kingdoms," βιβλοι βασιλειων. After the example of the Septuagint we find in the Greek Church-fathers and also in the Vulgate and the Latin Church-fathers, this division of the books of Samuel and Kings as one historical work into four books cited as the four βιβλίοι βασιλειῶν, libri regum or regnorum. This way of combining, dividing, and naming, in which our "Books of Samuel" are numbered as βασιλειῶν πρώτη, δευτέρα "First, Second Kings" (comp. ORIGEN in EUSEB. H. E. VI. 25, and Jerome, Prolog. Gal.) corresponds certainly to the general contents of these four, or more precisely two, books, so far as it consists chiefly of the history of the kingdom in the Old Testament covenant-people, and appears as a connected whole in the continuous narrative from Samuel's birth to the time of the Babylonian Exile.

§ 8. CONTENT.

The content of the books of Samuel is in general the historical development of the Theocracy in the people of Israel from the end of the period of the Judges to near the end of the government of King David, and therefore embraces a space of nearly one hundred and twenty-five years, about 1140—1015 B. C. (KEIL, Comm. on Sam., Introd. p. 2). The beginning of the first book introduces us into the end of the period of the Judges under the High-priest Eli, narrating the history of the announcement, birth, childhood, and calling of Samuel (chs. i.—iii.), and the troubled history of the people in the latter part of the misgovernment of Eli amid constant unfortunate conflicts with the Philistines (ch. iv. sq.). Then follows the history of Israel under Samuel as the last Judge and Saul as the first king up to the death of Samuel (ch. xxv.), and Saul (ch. xxxi.)—In the second book—whose original connection with the first is indicated not only formally by the fact that the masoretic appended remarks are placed only at the end of the second book, but also by the close connection between the historical contents of the two—the history of the government of David almost to its end, up to the punishment inflicted by God for the numbering of the people, forms the chief content, though its proper conclusion is found in the beginning of the first book of Kings, where David's last sickness and death, and Solomon's accession, are related. As on the one side the content of the books of Samuel goes over into the beginning of the books of Kings, so in the other direction it connects itself immediately with the history of the people of Israel in the book of Judges. The Old Testament history in its two factors—on the one hand the revelation of the living God to His chosen people, and on the other hand the thereby conditioned demeanor of the people towards its God in its general religious-ethical life—can be regarded only from the theocratic point of view, as the history of the kingdom of God in the people of Israel, and this history shows us in the course, and especially at the end of the period of the Judges, a deep decline of the Theocracy. The revelations of God's saving power in the time of the Judges, always sporadic, became less and less frequent towards its end. The people were a long time in bondage under the dominion of the Philistines, and Samson's twenty-years-judgeship could be described (Judg. xiii. 5) only as the beginning of the deliverance of Israel out of their hand. The internal political life was completely disintegrated, the sanctuary-service had perished, the priesthood was corrupted, idolatry widespread, godlessness and immorality had the upper hand. This deep decline is pictured in the beginning of the first book of Samuel, in immediate connection with the description given in the book of Judges, in the condition of the religious ethical life under the high-priesthood of Eli, and in the desecration of the priesthood wrought by the godlessness and wicked deeds of his two sons; and from it the theocracy was extricated by Samuel's labors as Shophet (Judge) and Prophet, and under the guidance of God was led by this great Reformer into a new path of development. Without, under Samuel and the royal rule introduced by him, political freedom and independence of heathen powers (of the Philistines in the first place) was gradually achieved, and within, the internal theocratic covenant-relation between the people of Israel and their God was renewed and extended on the basis of the restored unity and order of political and national life by the union of the prophetic and royal offices. Looked at from this theocratic point of view, the books of Samuel have an epoch-making content.

From the three principal persons to whom this foundational historical development of the theocracy on its new course attaches itself, the contents of the books of Samuel divide themselves into three principal groups: 1) 1 Sam. chs. i.—vii.: The history of Samuel as restorer of the deep-sunken theocracy, and founder of the Israelitish kingdom. 2) Chs. viii.—xxi.: The history of Saul and his kingdom from the beginning of his government to his death. 3) 2 Sam. chs. i.—xxiv.: The history of the government of David.

According to these three principal points of view, the contents divide themselves as follows:

FIRST PART.

SAMUEL.—1 Sam. Chs. i.—vii.

Samuel's Life and Work as Judge and Prophet, his aim being a reformation of the theocracy and the founding of the theocratical kingdom.

FIRST DIVISION.

Early life of Samuel, 1 Sam. chs. i.—iii.

- Sec. I. Samuel's birth, in answer to prayer, ch. i. 1-20.
- Sec. II. Samuel's dedication,—restoration to the Lord, ch. i. 21-28.
- Sec. III. His mother's prayer over him, ch. ii. 1-10.
- Sec. IV. Samuel's service before the Lord contrasted with the abominations of the degenerate priesthood in the house of Eli, ch. ii. 11-26.
- Sec. V. The prophecy of God's punishment of Eli's house, and of the calling of a faithful priest, ch. ii. 27-36.
- Sec. VI. Samuel's call to be prophet alongside of the lack of prophecy in Israel, ch. iii. 1-18.
- Sec. VII. The beginning of his prophetic work, ch. iii. 19—iv. 1.

SECOND DIVISION.

Samuel's prophetic-judicial work, 1 Sam. chs. iv. 1—vii. 17.

First Section.—Infliction of the punishment prophesied by Samuel on the house of Eli and on all Israel in the unfortunate battle with the Philistines, ch. iv. 1—vii. 1.

- I. Israel's double defeat and loss of the Ark, ch. iv. 1-11.
- II. The judgment on the house of Eli, ch. iv. 12-22.
- III. The Ark in the hands of the Philistines as a judgment on Israel (comp. ch. iv. 22), chs. v. 1—vii. 1.
 - 1) Chastisement of the Philistines because they held the Ark, ch. v. 1-12.
 - 2) Restoration of the Ark, ch. vi. 1-11.
 - 3) Reception and Settling of the Ark in Israel, chs. vi. 12—vii. 1.

Second Section.—Samuel's Reformation of Israel, ch. vii. 2-17.

- I. Israel's repentance and conversion through Samuel's prophetic labors, vers. 2-6.
- II. Israel's victory over the Philistines under Samuel's lead, vers. 7-14.
- III. Summary view of Samuel's work as Judge, vers. 15-17.

(Close of the period of the Judges).

SECOND PART.

SAUL.—1 Sam. Chs. viii.—xxi.

FIRST DIVISION.

Founding of the Israelitish kingdom under Saul's rule, 1 Sam. chs. viii.—xii.

First Section.—The preparations, chs. viii., ix.

- I. The occasion in the desire of the people for a king. Interview of the Elders with Samuel, ch. viii.
- II. Samuel meets with Saul, and learns of his divine appointment to be king, ch. ix.

Second Section.—Saul's induction into the royal office, ch. x.

- I. Saul anointed by Samuel, ch. x. 1.
- II. The signs of divine confirmation, ch. x. 2-16.
- III. The choice by lot, ch. x. 17-21.
- IV. The installation and homage (but not of the whole people), ch. x. 22-27.

Third Section.—Establishment and general recognition of the kingdom under Saul, chs. xi., xii.

- I. Saul's first victory over the Ammonites, ch. xi.
- II. Samuel's last address, ch. xii.

SECOND DIVISION.

King Saul's government up to his rejection, 1 Sam. chs. xiii.—xv.

First Section.—The unfolding of his royal power in victorious battles for the salvation of Israel, chs. xiii., xiv.

- I. Against the Philistines, chs. xiii.—xiv. 46.
- II. Against the other enemies around about, especially Amalek, ch. xiv. 47-52.

Second Section.—The rejection of Saul for his disobedience in the war against Amalek, ch. xv.

THIRD DIVISION.

The decline of Saul's kingdom, and choice of David to be king. The history of Saul from his rejection to his death, 1 Sam. chs. xvi.—xxxi.

First Section.—Early history of David, the Anointed of the Lord, ch. xvi.

- I. David chosen and anointed as king by Samuel, ch. xvi. 1-13.
- II. Darkening of Saul's soul by an evil spirit, and David's first appearance at the court of Saul as harper, ch. xvi. 14-23.

Second Section.—Saul's new war with the Philistines, and David's deed of deliverance, with its diverse consequences for him and for his relation to Saul, chs. xvii.—xviii. 30.

- I. The Philistine host, and Goliath's haughty challenge, ch. xvii. 1-11.
- II. David and Goliath, ch. xvii. 12-54.
- III. David at Saul's court, his friendship with Jonathan; Saul's hostile disposition towards him, and murderous attacks on his life, ch. xvii. 55—xviii. 30.

Third Section.—David fleeing before Saul, and his persecution by Saul, chs. xix. 1—xxvii. 12.

- I. David's flight from Saul's attacks to Samuel to Rama and Naioth, ch. xix.
- II. Jonathan's faithful friendship, attested by repeated unsuccessful attempts to reconcile Saul with David, ch. xx.
- III. David's flight from Saul to the priest Ahimelech in Nob, and to the Philistine king Achish in Gath, ch. xxi.
- IV. David's wandering as fugitive in Judah and Moab, and the murder of priests in Nob perpetrated by Saul, ch. xxii.
- V. David's experience of God's help and preservation in the battle against the Philistines, in his betrayal by the Ziphites, and when he was waylaid by Saul in the wilderness of Maon, ch. xxiii.
- VI. David encounters Saul while the latter is laying snares for him, and nobly spares his life in a cave of the mountains of Engedi, ch. xxiv.
- VII. Samuel's death, and David's march into the wilderness of Paran, with the history of Nabal and Abigail, ch. xxv.
- VIII. Narration of a second betrayal by the Ziphites, and second magnanimous sparing of Saul by David, ch. xxvi.
- IX. David takes refuge from Saul at Ziklag in Philistia, ch. xxvii.

Fourth Section.—Saul perishes in the war against the Philistines, chs. xxviii.—xxx.

- I. Saul's fear of the war with the Philistines, and his recourse to the witch, ch. xxviii. (Confirmation of his rejection, and announcement of his approaching end).
- II. David's march from the theatre of the Philistine war against Israel back to Philistia, ch. xxix.
- III. David's victory over the Amalekites, who had plundered and burned Ziklag, ch. xxx.
- IV. Death of Saul and his sons in the battle with the Philistines, ch. xxxi.

THIRD PART.

DAVID.—Second Book of Samuel.

FIRST DIVISION.

David king over Judah only, up to his acquisition of the general rule over all Israel, 2 Sam. chs. i.—v. 5.

First Section.—David after the death of Saul, (ch. i. 1)—ch. i.

- I. The tidings of death, ch. i. 1-16.
- II. The lament, ch. i. 17-27.

Second Section.—David, king of the tribe of Judah, is opposed by the house of Saul, chs. ii.—iii. 39.

- I. David anointed king over Judah, and his abode at Hebron, ch. ii. 1-7.
- II. Ishbosheth, contrary to the divine arrangement, made king over all Israel by Abner, and continued struggle of the House of Saul and the adherents of Ishbosheth under Abner's lead against David and his house, and his adherents, chs. ii. 8—iii. 6.
- III. Abner breaks with Ishbosheth, leaves the house of Saul, and goes over to David, ch. iii. 7-21.
- IV. Murder of Abner by Joab, David's General, ch. iii. 22-39.

Third Section.—David gains sole authority over all Israel, chs. iv.—v. 5.

- I. Murder of Ishbosheth, ch. iv. 1-8.
- II. Punishment of the regicide by David, ch. iv. 9-12.
- III. David anointed king over all Israel, ch. v. 1-5.

SECOND DIVISION.

David's royal rule over all Israel, 2 Sam. chs. v. 5—xxiv. 5.

First Section.—David's rule in its greatest splendor, chs. v. 5—x. 19.

- I. Its glorious and firm establishment, chs. v. 5—vi. 23.
 - 1) The victory over the Jebusites—the citadel of Zion made the centre of the kingdom, ch. v. 6-16.
 - 2) The victory over the Philistines, ch. v. 17-25.
 - 3) Solemn transference of the Ark to Mount Zion, and establishment of a regular religious service, ch. vi.
- II. Its divine consecration by the promise of the perpetual kingly rule of the Davidic House, ch. vii.
 - 1) To David's purpose, to build a house for the Lord, answers the divine promise, of which he becomes partaker by Nathan's prophecy, that the Lord would build him a house, and after him (and not till then) his seed should build the Lord a house, ch. vii. 1-16.

- 2) David's answer to this divine declaration in a prayer, ch. vii. 17-29.
- III. The splendid development of David's rule without and within, chs. viii.-x.
- 1) Without by victories and conquests in battle against Israel's foreign foes, ch. viii. 1-14.
 - 2) Within by the organization of the government of the kingdom (ch. viii. 15-18), and a noble display of royal grace towards Saul's fallen House—Mephibosheth, ch. ix.
- IV. Further victorious confirmation and elevation of the royal power to its zenith in the Ammonite-Syrian war, ch. x.
- 1) The insult offered David by the king of the Ammonites, ch. x. 1-5.
 - 2) Joab's victory over the combined Ammonites and Syrians, ch. x. 6-14.
 - 3) David's victory over the Syrians, ch. x. 14-19.

Second Section. Its obscuration, chs. xi.-xviii.

- I. Internal shock to David's royal authority by the grievous sins of himself and his House, chs. xi.-xiv.
- 1) David's deep fall during the war against Rabbath-Ammon, ch. xi.
 - 2) Nathan's reproof and David's repentance, ch. xii.
 - 3) Shattering of the House and family of David by the wickedness of his sons Amnon and Absalom, ch. xiii.
 - a. Amnon's incest with Tamar, ch. xiii. 1-21.
 - b. Murder of Amnon by Absalom, ch. xiii. 22-33.
 - c. Absalom's flight, xiii. 34-39.
 - 4) David's weakness towards Joab and Absalom, xiv.
 - a. Joab's cunning, and the woman of Tekoa, xiv. 1-20.
 - b. Absalom's return to Jerusalem brought about by Joab's influence with David, xiv. 21-23.
 - c. Absalom forces Joab by an injury to effect his reconciliation with David, xiv. 29-33.
- II. External disintegration of the royal authority up to its loss, xv.-xviii.
- 1) Absalom stirs up the people, and usurps the royal power, xv. 1-13.
 - 2) David's flight from Absalom, xv. 14-37.
 - 3) David's two encounters with disloyal persons, xvi. 1-14.
 - a. With the lying Ziba, xvi. 1-4.
 - b. With the reviling Shimei, xvi. 5-14.
 - 4) Absalom's entry into Jerusalem and incestuous act after Ahithophel's counsel, xvi. 15-23.
 - 5) Ahithophel's evil counsel against David set aside by Hushai's good counsel—his horrible end, xvii. 1-23.
 - 6) The civil war, xvii. 24—xviii. 33.
 - a. David at Mahanaim, xvii. 24-29.
 - b. The battle in the wilderness of Ephraim, xviii. 1-8.
 - c. Murder of Absalom by Joab, xviii. 9-18.
 - d. Tidings of joy and of sorrow—David's lament over Absalom, xviii. 19-33.

Third Section. The recovery of the royal authority, which is soon, however, again assailed by insurrection, xix., xx.

- I. The way paved for the restoration of David's authority by Joab's reproof of his unworthy grief over Absalom, xix. 1-8.
- II. David arranges for his return by negotiations with the men of Judah, xix. 9-14.
- III. David's passage over the Jordan under the escort of the men of Judah, with three incidents, xix. 15-40.

- 1) Pardon of Shimei, vers. 16-23.
- 2) Mephibosheth's excuse, vers. 24-30.
- 3) Barzillai's greeting and blessing, vers. 31-40.
- IV. Strife between Judah and Israel about bringing David back (xix. 41-44), and occasioned by this,
- V. Sheba's insurrection and Israel's defection—both subdued by Joab after Amasa was killed, xx. 1-22.
- VI. Officers of David's government after the restoration of his royal authority, xx. 23-26.

THIRD DIVISION.

Eclectic appendix to the conclusion of the history of David's government, cha. xxi.-xxiv.

- Sec. I. Three years' famine on account of Saul's crime against the Gibeonites, and expiation of this crime, xxi. 1-14.
- Sec. II. Victorious battles against the Philistines, xxi. 15-22.
- Sec. III. David's song of thanksgiving, xxii.
- Sec. IV. David's last prophetic word, xxiii. 1-7.
- Sec. V. David's heroes, xxiii. 8-39.
- Sec. VI. The divine visitation by pestilence on account of the numbering of the people, xxiv.
- I. David's sin in the numbering of the people, xxiv. 1-10.
 - II. The pestilence as punishment on the king and all the people, xxiv. 11-17.
 - III. David builds an altar to the Lord on the threshing-floor of Araunah, afterwards the site of the Temple, xxiv. 18-25.

[The following references to the Books of Samuel occur in the New Testament:

Matt. i. 6	to 1 Sam. xvi. and 2 Sam. xii. 24.
Matt. xii. 3, 4; Mark ii. 25, 26; Luke vi. 3, 4	to 1 Sam. xxi. 1-6.
Luke i. 32, 33; Acts ii. 30	to 2 Sam. vii. 12-16.
Acts iii. 24	to the general history.
Acts vii. 46	to 2 Sam. vii. 1, 2.
Acts xiii. 20-22	to 1 Sam. ix.-xv.
Heb. i. 5	to 2 Sam. vii. 14.
Mary's song, Luke i. 46-55, founded on Hannah's song, 1 Sam. ii. 1-10.

These are sufficient to show that the writers of the New Testament and our Lord recognized the canonical authority of these Books, which, however, has never been questioned.—Tr.]

§ 4. CHARACTER AND COMPOSITION.

In investigating the origin of the Books of Samuel, it will be necessary, first, to fix on their characteristic quality of form and content in its fundamental features, because it is only in this way that we can get firm ground for considering the sources, the time of composition, and the author of the books. As to their linguistic character, in the first place, it is agreed by all competent critics that the language is throughout the pure classic, and in general free from Aramaizing elements, the mark of a later, not classically pure style. While in the Books of Kings there is often an inclination to the Aramaic, in the books of Samuel there is as good as none of it (BLEEK, Einkl. i. A. T. [Intro. to O. T.], 1860, p. 358), "except those isolated cases which occur in all the books" (NAEGELSBACH, Bücher Samuelis, in HERZOG's Real-Encycl., Bd. XIII., p. 412, and KEIL, Einkl. in das A. T., 2. Aufl. p. 176 f [Intro. I. 247]). On the linguistic peculiarities of the Books of Samuel, compare what is said on the subject in EWALD's Hist. of the People of Israel, 8d ed., I. 193 seq., and on the alleged Aramaisms, HAVERNICK, Einkl. in das A. T. [Intro. to O. T.], I. i. p. 218 seq.

In the composition and style of the historical content of the books, the first thing that strikes us is that bits of poetry occur in them more frequently than in any other historical book. At the very beginning stands Hannah's lofty song of praise, which exhibits not only the history of Samuel's birth, with which it is connected, but the whole history of his life and work in the clear light of divine ordination and guidance (1 Sam. ii. 1-10). The words taken from the people's chant of victory about David (1 Sam. xvii. 6 sq.) show us why Saul's heart is embittered against David into envy and jealousy. David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 17-27) exhibits the noble feeling which David constantly maintained for Saul under all the experiences of his hatred and enmity, but at the same time indicates the judgment to be passed on Saul from a theocratic point of view, in so far as bravery is its only subject, and it celebrates him as hero only. Reference is there made to an authority called "The Book of the Upright." Other poetical pieces are David's Lamentation over Abner (2 Sam. iii. 33, 34), his Psalm of Thanksgiving (2 Sam. xxii.), his Prayer after the reception of the great promise concerning the rule of his House (2 Sam. vii. 18-29), and his last Psalm (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7).

According to HÆVERNICK, these songs form, as they are interwoven into the historical work, the points of support, as it were, to which the history is attached (Einkl. [Intro.] II. 1, p. 121). But a mere glance at the quantitative relation of these poetical elements of the content to the historical material shows us how unsatisfactory this view is. If we bear in mind the position that these songs occupy in reference to the history to which they relate, rather the reverse seems to be true—it forms the point of support for them. The songs are introduced into the place in the history where they, being themselves historical elements, fit, without being intended precisely to serve as vouchers for the history, as HÆVERNICK supposes (ubi supra). Standing as lyrical accompaniment in organic connection with the historical narration, they affect the coloring of the whole by heightening the liveliness, freshness and vividness of the historical narrative.

And this is throughout the character of the narration, effort at completeness in the accounts of deeds and persons which are often finished out to the smallest minutiae, an elaborateness and vividness in the presentation of the historical material, not found in other historical books (especially in the Books of Kings which only here and there make brief extracts from their extensive authorities), and such freshness and directness in the coloring of the narrative that we cannot resist the impression that we have here an immediate copy of the incidents related, and that the editor did not draw from any intermediate working up of the original authorities. The narrative has an easy, simple, attractive flow, without interruption by stereotyped phrases and references to authorities, while in the Books of Kings there is a tedious, ever-recurring apparatus of standing formulæ. THENIUS says (Einkl. zum Comment über die Bücher Sam. S. 16, 2 Aufh.): "For the rest, the older parts especially of the work belong to the finest historical productions of the Old Testament; they excel all others in copiousness; they enable us to form a distinct idea of the actors introduced; they commend themselves by a charming simplicity of style, and give us a high conception of the many-sided influence of the prophetic work."

HÆVERNICK rightly says, that from this characteristic of the book, it is itself almost the same as an original authority and chronicle (Intro. II. 1, p. 142). It therefore bears throughout the stamp of historical truth. By the simple and exact setting forth of the personages and their doings, by the characteristic sketches of their dispositions and characters, by the thorough description of historical antecedents and vivid and lively references to local relations and accidental circumstances, we are pointed to rich original authorities, that in an original and immediate way brought persons and events before the editor of the books, who was certainly too far removed from them in time to be able to give so living and detailed a portraiture from his own personal observation and experience. KEIL's remark, therefore—that, on account of the qualities above described, the historical narrative of the Books of Samuel may lay rightful claim to historical truth and fidelity not only in general, but also in special and particular—is quite correct, at least in respect to the first point [the general correctness]. We make this restriction here only in reference to those particulars of the narrative whose historical trustworthiness has been denied on the ground of incongruences, inconcinnities and contradictions supposed to be observed in them. To solve the questions thus arising we must look more closely at the literary character and the composition of the books, for these are inseparable from the question of their historical value.

In the first place, it is certain that our Books of Samuel in form and content have the marks of a production that sprang from a redaction of a manifold historical material, which stretched over a space of more than a hundred years, and existed in various parts and groups, having already somehow taken shape by written tradition, and that this redaction is to be referred to the literary hand, traces of which we see in the passages, 1 Sam. ix. 9; xxvii. 6 and xvii. 12, 14, 15. Further, a glance at the content shows that the redactor of these books took pains to give them unity, to produce as well-arranged a historical narrative as possible. The narrative sets out with a sharply marked beginning in the latter part of the period of the Judges, shows in the relation of the history of Samuel, Saul and David everywhere a generally steady connection and advance, and also is not without a firm and strong conclusion, as we maintain, and shall endeavor to prove below, against the view that on account of the non-mention of the death of David, it has no proper conclusion. The author of our books has so combined and worked up the historical material that he had at command as to give them an internal unity of composition, and it is, as BLEEK rightly says (ubi supra, p. 367), decidedly incorrect to restrict the author's work (as has been done in part) to a mere stringing together and combination of earlier writings, that is, to regard it as an external compilation. Against this view comp. also DE WETTE, Einl. [Intro.] § 178. We shall see hereafter what points of view control the arrangement of the historical material, and condition the internal connection of its often seemingly loosely arranged parts. At present we only establish the fact, which is plain to an unprejudiced consideration of the external composition of the historical content, that the latter makes in the main the impression of a well-arranged unitary whole (see also NÆGELSBACH, ubi sup., p. 400), and from this generally incontestable ground we shall proceed to consider a number of special passages which have been adduced against and seem to oppose the unity and concinnity of the historical narration in respect to its form and content.

In this examination we shall find that a not inconsiderable number of contradictions and incongruences supposed to be found in our books and referred to the union of various traditions and authorities, do not exist, or at least that there is no necessity for accepting them so long as unforced, satisfactory explanations of seeming discrepancies or repetitions may be given. At the same time unprejudiced regard for truth requires us to recognize the fact that there are certainly some passages in which there is no strict congruence and concinnity, and that there are certain peculiarities of the narration, in consequence of which there is in minutiae an entire failure to maintain the historical connection according to the chronological order. Nevertheless, the general unity of the narrative, grounded in controlling fundamental thoughts, and in the sequence of events, is not only not impaired by these individual instances, but becomes clearer the more plainly we see from what chief point of view the redactor arranges and groups the material. The contradictions which it has been attempted to discover in the Books of Samuel as signs of various mutually exclusive parts out of which they have been put together, are all collected and examined, or rather solved, by a thorough explanation of the passages, in DE WETTE, Einleit. [Intro.], § 179; BLEEK, Einleit. [Intro.] p. 363; THENIUS, ubi sup., Einl., pp. 9-11; KEIL, Einl. [Intro.], § 52; HAEVERNICK, Einl. § 166; NÆGELSBACH, HERZOG, R.-E., ubi sup., p. 403.

In the first book the statement in ch. vii. 15-17 that Samuel was Judge over Israel as long as he lived, is said to conflict with viii. 1 sq. and xii. 2 sq., according to which he gave up his office to his sons. But when it is said in viii. 1 that Samuel made his sons judges over Israel, this is not saying that he himself gave up his office; rather this step of his is expressly referred to the fact that he was growing old. The application of the Elders of the people to him for a King (viii. 4), and their reference to the evil conduct of his sons, shows that, while the latter held the judicial office, he was the highest judicial authority in the administration of the affairs of the whole nation. The passage xii. 2 sq. shows plainly that Samuel, while his sons were judges, filled his old office "unto this day." His authority did not cease even under Saul; rather, knowing that he exercised his function in the name of the Lord, he asserted it with all the more emphasis against Saul, and Saul yielded to it without making against him the charge of unauthorized conduct.

There is no contradiction between viii. 5 and xii. 12, when in the first passage Samuel's age and the evil conduct of his sons, and in the second the imminent danger of a crushing war with the Ammonites, is given as the occasion of the demand for a kingdom; for these two are inseparably connected. The people needed energetic and single guidance in its wars, and this it looked for not in the aging Samuel and his wicked sons, but in a man clothed with royal authority, under whose lead it might victoriously meet the kings of the heathen nations (comp. viii. 20). Besides, we must remember that Saul, though he was consecrated king over Israel by Samuel's anointing, yet at first returned to his original calling (xi. 5), and it was the attack of Nahash, the Ammonite king, that first aroused the people anew to a lively sense of their need of a royal leader, as is stated in xii. 12. And with this agrees the fact that, after the victory gained by Saul over the Ammonites by the power of the Spirit of God (xi. 6), the whole people recognized him as their now freshly authenticated king, and in consequence of this victory regarded as a divine declaration of the kingdom, the latter was renewed by the three parties to it, the people, Saul, and Samuel (xi. 12-15).

In chap. vii. 13 we read: "So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel, and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel." A discrepancy has been discovered between these words, according to which Samuel completely estopped the Philistines from returning, and ix. 16, where a king is promised the people as deliverer out of the hand of the Philistines, and x. 5 and xiii. 5 sq., especially vers. 19 sq. and xvii. 1 sq., where there are express accounts of wars of the Philistines with Israel and of the oppression of the latter by the Philistine rule (THENIUS and DE WETTE). But in fact no such discrepancy exists. It is by no means said in the first half of chap. vii. 13 that the return of the Philistines was estopped fully, that is, for all time; it is said only that in this battle of Ebenezer they were "subdued or humbled." When then it is added "they came no more into the coast of Israel," that is, they did not repeat their incursions, we need not suppose that the narrator intended to say that the Philistines never again entered the territory of Israel so long as Samuel lived. On the contrary, the historical content is defined by the second half of ver. 13, "and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel." If "the hand of the Lord," that is, His power and might, was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel, this involves the fact that, as long as Samuel lived, the Philistines were hostile to Israel and sought to subdue them, but God defended His people and gave them the victory over their enemies. "The hand of the Lord against the Philistines" supposes strife between Israel and the Philistines, occasioned by the incursions of the latter. What immediately precedes can therefore be understood only in a relative, not in an absolute sense of the Philistines' not coming again into the border of Israel. Otherwise the supposed contradiction would exist in the two parts of ver. 13 itself. The decisive fact, however, in this question is that the words "all the days of Samuel" are to be connected not, as the alleged contradiction supposes, with the first half of ver. 13, but only with the second. It is not said "all the days of Samuel the Philistines did not return," but "all the days of Samuel the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines." The first statement declares, over against the reference to God's power warding off the hostility of the Philistines, and in connection with Samuel's victory over them at Ebenezer, that in consequence of this victory they had not repeated their incursions into the territory of Israel, and this is to be understood of the space of time after the lapse of which they resumed their old wars against Israel. In Saul's victories over them, who, "as long as he lived," had to struggle hard with them (xiv. 52), and whose term of life nearly coincided with that of Samuel, since the latter died only a few years before him, the hand of Jehovah was mighty against them, and the promise of ix. 16 was fulfilled. Israel's condition of shameful subjection portrayed in xiii. 19 sq. was the result of the occupation of the land by the Philistines mentioned in vers. 5 and 6, and does not contradict the statement that Jehovah's hand was against the Philistines "all the days of Samuel," since in chap. xiv. is related how the Lord at that time helped Israel (comp. ver. 23). The solution of the alleged contradiction that restricts the expression "all the days of Samuel" to the duration of his judicial term, is unsatisfactory from the arbitrariness of this restriction, and conflicts with ver. 15: "Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life."

It is also maintained that there is a contradiction between the section ix. 1-10, 16 and the sections viii., x. 17-27, because in the former Samuel anoints Saul in consequence of a divine revelation, and in the latter has him chosen king by lot in consequence of the demand of the people (DE WETTE). But in truth there is nothing here that compels us to suppose an absolute contradiction; "for in ix. 1-x. 16 is related the secret anointing of Saul by Samuel, with its immediate consequences, and in x. 17-27 the choice by lot in the presence of the whole people" (NÄGELSBACH, ubi sup. p. 401). THENIUS (Komm. 2 Aufl. p. 48) seeks to establish the unhistorical character of both narrations by stating the alternative: "the Prophet would then either have tempted God, or have been guilty of an unworthy trick before the people;" but against this we remark that according to x. 17-27 also every thing was done by Samuel at the divine instance and under divine influence (vers. 18, 24), as in the narrative in ix. 1-x. 16, that therefore both tempting God and unworthy trickery on Samuel's part are excluded, since in the narration the choice by lot also is conceived of in a theocratic point of view. In the presence of the assembled people God declares the man who had been chosen and anointed by His will, to be king, and His representative. Comp. Winer, Bibl. Realwörterbuch, II. p. 389: "In chap. viii. Samuel declares himself against the wish of the people by command of Jehovah Himself, and by His command makes an attempt to divert the Israelites from their desire. This failing, he receives from Jehovah the command to yield (viii. 21 sq.), and anoints Saul, chaps. ix., x. . . And then the scene, x. 17 sq., was not superfluous: the first revelation, ix. 15 sq., was for the Prophet; the second, x. 20 sq., for the people." To this we add EWALD's remark (Geschichte des V. Isr. [Hist. of Israel], III. p. 33, 3 Aufl.): "If we bear in mind the ordinary use of the sacred lot in those times, we shall find that in the connection of this narrative (EWALD ascribes vers. 17-27 to the author of the preceding section) nothing but the truth is described in this incident; the mysterious meeting with the Seer did not suffice for the full and benedictive recognition of Saul the king, but publicly also in solemn national assembly it was necessary that the Spirit of Jahveh should choose him before all others and mark him as the man of Jahveh." And so there is no contradiction between ix. 1-x. 16 and x. 17-27, but the two sections stand in concise relation to one another.

Another discrepancy has been found between xi. 14 sq. and xiii. 8 compared with x. 8, it being held that the words of Samuel (x. 8) contain a command to Saul to go immediately to Gilgal and wait for him there seven days. On this supposition certainly chaps. viii. and xi. 14 sq. cannot be reconciled, since, according to the latter passage, Saul went to Gilgal not before but with Samuel, and indeed at his special suggestion, and there was therefore no waiting on Samuel; and moreover, before Saul and Samuel came together in Gilgal, their first meeting after that solemn prophetic consecration of Saul (x. 1-8) took place in Mizpeh. Equally impossible, on this supposition, is a reconciliation of x. 8 and xiii. 8, which last passage contains an undeniable reference to an order given to Saul by Samuel, such as is expressed in x. 8; for between the two there is an interval, according to xiii. 1, of two years. [But the text here (xiii. 1) is corrupt—see note on the verse in question.—TR.] NÄGELSBACH therefore supposes that x. 8 is not in its proper place, but stood originally somewhere just before xiii. 8 (ubi sup. p. 401). THENIUS joins xiii. 2 sq. immediately on to x. 16, regarding x. 17-xiii. 25 as a section interpolated into the original document between x. 16 and xiii. 2, and xiii. 1 as an interpolation by the Redactor, or perhaps by a later hand, by which the succeeding matter was brought into plausible connection with the inserted section, and the necessary time gained for the occurrence narrated in this section (ubi sup. p. 49). There are grave objections to both expedients; to the first because of the impossibility of fixing the supposed right place before xiii. 8 where x. 8 is to be put; to the second—apart from the fact that no other reason is given for the supposition that this section is interpolated—because of the chronological difficulty mentioned by KEIL (Introd. I. 236), which undoubtedly presents itself when we look at all which, on this supposition, must have been done (according to xiii. 2-7) within these seven days, and because of the very bold hypothesis that is advanced by this assumption of an interpolated tradition, and by the explanation of the words of xiii. 1. We have seen what significance the section x. 17-27, in historical connection with what goes before, has for the commencement of Saul's kingdom. KEIL therefore properly asks the question: "How could Saul, secretly anointed by Samuel, and concealing this anointing even from his uncle (x. 1, 16), come to such consideration, that at his call all Israel flocked about him, as about their king, when he had neither been proclaimed king by Samuel, nor by any act had won the confidence of the people for himself as king?" (ubi supra). Keil, it is true, from the proposition (which is correct) that the narration in xiii. 1-7 requires for its explanation the content of the section x. 17-xii. 25, draws the conclusion that Samuel's order to Saul in x. 8 refers to the solemn proclamation of Saul as king in Gilgal (xi. 14^{seq.}); but this conclusion is unsatisfactory on grounds already adduced. And moreover the view which KEIL connects with this conclusion (and which is found as far back as CLERICUS) is untenable—namely, that the statement in xiii. 8 (which has consequently nothing at all to do with x. 8) refers to a command not expressly mentioned, but here casually alluded to in the words "according to the set time that Samuel had appointed," by which Samuel, with reference to the Philistine war, had at a later time ordered Saul to Gilgal; for these very words (as KEIL himself now admits, Comm. in loco, 101, 128) plainly point to the injunction given to Saul in x. 8. However, proceeding from this supposition, we are no way bound to explain the words in x. 8 as a command of Samuel which was to be immediately carried out by Saul. The proper explanation of the connection in which the "thou goest down" (יֵרָד) in ver. 8 stands partly with the preceding, partly with the following circumstantial clause introduced by "and behold" (וְהִנֵּה) leads to the conditional rendering "and when thou goest down before me to Gilgal, behold . . . ;" and a similar translation is found in SEB. SCHMIDT, only with improper temporal extension, and is proposed by EWALD (Gesch. 3 Aufl. III. 41) and KEIL (Comm. p. 101). The king chosen to deliver Israel from the yoke of the Philistines must recognize it as his first duty to prove his kingly might in battle against the Philistines, in accordance with his consecration received from Samuel. The exhortation to this duty Samuel couples with the command that he should not in the exercise of his royal calling trespass on the field that was to remain closed to him, namely, the offering of sacrifice for the people when they were mustered for war. EWALD says: "Gilgal, on the south-western bank of the Jordan, was then, from all indications, one of the most holy places in Israel, and the true centre of the whole people; it had a like importance before, and much more then, because the Philistine control reached so far eastward* that the middle point of the kingdom must have been pressed back to the bank of the Jordan. There the people must have assembled for all general political questions, and thence after offering and consecration have marched forth armed to war" (ubi sup. p. 42). The significance of Gilgal for the whole people at this period of the Israelitish history is presupposed in Samuel's command to Saul, which consequently contains for him the following rule of government: When thou goest down to Gilgal—that is, to gather the people there, that they may be led forth to battle against the Philistines, and to this end receive consecration by solemn offering—thou shalt await my coming for the preparation, and neither in thy own power make the offering, nor of thy own will begin the war against the Philistines. In this prophetic command Saul ought to have recognized the voice of God (see KEIL, ubi sup., pp. 101-108, and EWALD, ubi sup., p. 41-46). This explanation is found as early as BRENZ. He says: "But we are not to understand that Samuel commands Saul to go straightway down to Gilgal and there wait seven days, but that he is to do this after he has been publicly elected king and confirmed in the kingdom by victory over the Ammonites, and shall then begin to prepare for war against the Philistines, on whose account especially Saul was called to the kingdom. The following, therefore, is the meaning of Samuel's command: Thou art called to the kingdom especially to free Israel from the tyranny of the Philistines. When, therefore, thou art about to undertake this work, go down to Gilgal and wait there seven days till I come to thee; then thou shalt offer a sacrifice, but not before I come, and I will show thee what is to be done, that our enemies the Philistines may be conquered; this thing is related afterwards in chap. xiii., where we read that Saul violated this command."

* [EWALD has west, but the sense seems to require east.—Tr.]

Thenius finds a discrepancy between xiv. 47 and x. 17 sq. and xi. 14 sq. (p. 65), maintaining that here several mutually exclusive relations are put together—that the author of the sections xiv. 47 sq. relates that Saul by this victory over the Philistines proved himself to be the king anointed by Samuel and secured royal authority, and that this cannot be reconciled with x. 17 sq., xi. 14 sq., and xv. But if we recollect that the Philistines had possession of the greater part of the land, the expression לָקַח ["took"] in xiv. 47 is best understood as meaning that Saul by this victory got the real control of the land, not as referring to the public assumption of the kingdom to which he was first designated by the anointing. There is therefore no discrepancy between this statement of the result of the victory over the Philistines and the accounts of Saul's choice by lot (x. 17 sq.), and of his confirmation as king before the whole people in Gilgal (xi. 14 sq.).

An apparent anachronism exists in xvii. 54, where it is said that David carried Goliath's head to Jerusalem, while it was some time later that he conquered Jerusalem (2 Sam. v.); but this is explained by the remark of KURZ (HERZOG, Real-Encycl., Art. "David") and others, that, if not the citadel, yet the city of Jerusalem had then been a long time in the possession of the Israelites (Josh. xv. 63; Judg. i. 21), and it is not at all necessary for the establishment of this fact, which makes the deposition (of Goliath's head) possible, to suppose with NÄGELSBACH that David had a prophetic anticipation of the importance of this city, although this supposition is unjustly set aside by THENIUS without further consideration. There is just as little difficulty in the statement that David, after the victory, deposited the armor of Goliath in his tent, while the giant's sword is afterwards found in the Sanctuary at Nob.

Between xviii. 5 and xviii. 13–16 a discrepancy has been found, in that in the first passage David received his appointment as military commander on account of his bravery; in the second on account of Saul's envy and fear of him. The apparent contradiction is set aside, however, by a glance at the intermediate narration, according to which the jealousy aroused in Saul by the women's song of victory produced such a change in his disposition towards David that he assigned the latter a higher post only to remove him from his person and expose him to death in battle against the Philistines.

Between the statements of Jonathan in xix. 2 and xx. 2—the first of which informs David of his father's murderous thoughts against him, while the second assures him of the contrary—there lies an interval, in which Saul's hatred against David might have softened; or at least Jonathan, thinking the best of his father, might believe that he had perceived a change in his disposition towards David. Perhaps Jonathan, as NÄGELSBACH (p. 403) supposes, intends only to deny that another attack against David's life is purposed. Why, in the face of this assurance of his friend, should it be so inconceivable that David should speak of again appearing at the royal table at the appointed time when Saul expected him? Had David not already had experience of similar paroxysms of rage in the king, and yet been always reconciled with him by Jonathan's intervention?

The apparent contradiction between 1 Sam. xviii. 27, where David brings 200 foreskins of the Philistines for Michal, and 2 Sam. iii. 14, which speaks of 100 only, is resolved by referring to 1 Sam. xviii. 25, according to which Saul had demanded the latter number of foreskins; only these, not the two hundred actually brought, are mentioned by David in the later passage.

We turn now to those sections in which there are supposed to exist double accounts of the same thing, in part mutually exclusive and contradictory; that is, signs of the use of various documents, which in respect to the same facts and events, present differences that the Redactor could not reconcile.

First among these is the narrative of the two Goliaths, 1 Sam. xvii. 4, and 2 Sam. xxi. 19. In the one passage David slays the giant Goliath, and in the other it is related of Elhanan, son of Jaare-oregim, that he slew Goliath of Gath, whose spear was like a weaver's beam. It is altogether arbitrary in BOETTCHER (Neue exegetisch-kritische Elfenbein zum A. T. on 2 Sam. xxi. 19) to try to prove the identity of this Elhanan with David (see THENIUS, p. 259), in order to make this account agree with 1 Sam. xvii. 4 f. Nothing obliges us to regard the two passages as referring to the same incident, since two different actors are mentioned, David and Elhanan, the last with circumstantial reference to his person and descent, and there may well have been at different times two giants of equal strength and the same name, the later perhaps purposely honored with the name of the earlier. But in the parallel passage, 1 Chron. xx. 5, which evidently gives the same event as 2 Sam. xxi. 19, it is said: "Elhanan, the son of Jair, slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath of Gath, whose spear, etc.;" and if the correct reading is not in 2 Sam. xxi. 19 (of which I cannot convince myself), but rather in 1 Chr. xx. 5, then the distinctness of the combats related in the two accounts is so much the more beyond doubt (see THENIUS' view, p. 258 sq., which is opposed to his earlier view).

In xix. 9 sq. the same incident seems to be related as in xviii. 9 sq., and therefore the one passage or the other seems to be not in the right place. Yet the double narrative, agreeing literally in single expressions, may be referred without difficulty to two explosions of rage on Saul's part, since according to xviii. sq. this rage showed itself several times against David.

The rejection of Saul is narrated in the two sections, 1 Sam. xiii. 8-14, and xv. 10-26. But nothing requires us to regard these as mutually exclusive narrations of one and the same fact. Rather, the circumstances under which Saul manifests his disobedience are so different in the two cases, that we must recognize two different courses of events in which his disobedience is shown. But, as in the second act of disobedience there lay a heightening of the guilt, so on the first act of the punishment (xiii., xiv.) followed the second sharper act, consisting in the definitive rejection (xv. 23, 24).

There is just as little necessity for referring the parallel narrations in x. 10-12 and xix. 22-24 to the same event. Rather, there is so much in each that is peculiar, that we are justified in assuming two different occurrences in which the proverb "Is Saul also among the prophets?" found its application. The first incident explains its origin, for it is said, x. 12: "Therefore it became a proverb." The second similar incident, which is described as occurring under totally different circumstances, fixed it and gave it a wider application, xix. 24.

THENIUS' grounds (p. 120) for referring to one event the two narratives of the repeated treachery of the Ziphites towards David and David's magnanimous conduct towards Saul (xxiii. 19-24, xxiv. and xxvi.), of which the tradition is supposed to have given a double account, seem not sufficient to establish the identity of the two. Their points of agreement do not exclude the distinctness of the events. "For," says NÄGELSBACH (p. 402) justly, "that David twice came to the hill Hachilah near Ziph is probable by reason of the hiding-places in this wooded mountain-range; that the Ziphites twice discovered and betrayed his abode is very natural from their friendship for Saul; and that Saul made a second expedition against David is psychologically only too easily explained, even though he was no moral monster; his hatred against David was so deeply rooted that it could only be repressed for the moment, not destroyed, by that magnanimous deed." David's twice sparing the life of his enemy has its ground in the horror of laying hand on the Lord's anointed, and Saul's consequent double expression of repentance is explained by the change of feeling which is psychologically not hard to understand when we consider his disposition, as it is everywhere represented to us. But, on the other hand, along with these resemblances there are such important differences in the two narratives that the assumption of two events can by no means be regarded as arbitrary. On the particulars comp. HAEVERNICK (p. 188 sq.) and KEIL (Introd. I. 243, 244).

The narrative of David's two flights to the Philistines (xxi. 10-15, and xxvii. 1 sq.) is regarded as a double relation of the same event, and is referred to different sources. Thenius (p. 101 sq.) finds historical truth only in the second relation of David's flight to Gath (xxvii.), on the ground that David would have fled to the Philistines only in the extremest need, and not at the outset; but certainly according to the account of Saul's pursuit of David, that precedes xxi., the latter's need was great enough to impel him under those circumstances to flee to the Philistines. While the two narratives agree in the fact that David flees to Achish, the differences in everything else are so great that we must suppose not one abode of David with the Philistines (held by THENIUS to be given with historical trustworthiness only in xxvii.) but two distinct occurrences. In xxi. he comes alone to Achish, in xxvii. with wives and children and a numerous retinue; in the first case, being soon recognized, he had to act the madman in order to save himself, and his stay was short; in the second he settles himself for a long abode in Ziklag, and undertakes several expeditions against the hostile tribes on the southern border of Canaan, whereby he secures the favor and protection of Achish. With such great differences we cannot suppose that the narration in xxi. is a legendary embellishment of that in xxvii.

There are two mentions of the death of Samuel, xxv. 1 and xxviii. 8. We need not, however, suppose that the Redactor took these from two sources. Rather the repetition in xxviii. 8 (which moreover from its language and style does not seem to be an independent account) serves to introduce and illustrate the following narrative as much as the remark that Saul had driven the necromancers and wizards out of the land. "The repetition of the words 'they had lamented him and buried him,' seems designed to put the impiety against Samuel in a still stronger light" (NÆGELSB. p. 404).

At the first glance there seem to be two contradictory accounts of Saul's death in 1 Sam. xxxi. 4 and 2 Sam. i. 9, 10, according to the first of which he killed himself, but according to the second was at his own request slain by an Amalekite, who himself brings the report. EWALD (p. 137, 138) supposes here two different and evidently ancient accounts, of which one makes the faithful and conscientious armor-bearer, the other a frivolous and rude Gentile present at the last moment of the sinking hero; the first the account of those who spoke well, the second that of those who spoke ill of Saul; but this supposition of two sources and two accounts is untenable because of the fact which comes out from the narrative in 2 Sam. i. that the Amalekite falsely ascribed the deed to himself in order to receive thanks and recognition therefor from David, but especially to get a large reward for Saul's jewels, of which he had possessed himself (Then. p. 141).

There is just as little ground for holding that the narratives of the conquest of the Syrians, 2 Sam. viii. and x.—xii. are two relations of the same expedition of David against the Syrians, as GRAMBERG (Religionsid. II. 108) has maintained. He would allow only one conquest, because after such a defeat they could not have so soon recovered themselves, and in ch. x. also there is no mention of a revolt of the Syrians, while yet according to ch. viii. they had been really subdued. But the resources of the Syrians, even after that defeat, may have been ample (comp. viii. 4, 7, 8, 10); for the rich booty that the Israelites got, and the large number of warriors that the Syrians had put into the field, point to considerable power and wealth. But there was no need to mention their revolt, since it was understood as a matter of course that they sought to shake off the yoke at the first opportunity, though otherwise the yoke was so firmly fixed that one could speak of a real and permanent subjection; this opportunity offered itself when the Ammonites went into a war with David. And so they appear in ch. x. not as independent enemies of David, but as allies of the Ammonites (comp. THEOD. quæst. 24 ad. 2 Reg.; WINER, Realwörterb. I. 260; THEN. p. 188). Ewald in like manner maintains (III. 204, 205) the identity of the Syrian war, viii. 8, with the Syrian-Ammonitish in x. sq. In support of this view he urges that the war with the Syrian King Hadad-Ezer of Zobah cannot be explained except by supposing that it was excited by a contemporaneous war with a nearer kingdom, since the kingdom of Zobah is not described as bordering immediately on the kingdom of Israel. But, it is said, according to x.—xii., a great Syrian war with Israel was excited by the Ammonites; this war with Ammon is narrated there at greater length on account of the history of Uriah, and for this reason is only mentioned quite incidentally, viii. 12, in the general account of all the great wars. But it is sufficiently clear from viii. 8 how David came immediately into conflict with the Syrians without occasion thereto having been given by war with another enemy. Thenius (in loco) well says: "David's aim was to rest his kingdom at one point at least on the Euphrates, because this was the nearest stream that traversed broad tracts of country; on the way thither Hadad-Ezer, whose territory he touched on in the march, opposed him." It is true that the Ammonite war, briefly mentioned in ch. viii. is, on account of the pragmatism which controls the whole narrative in x.—xii., given at length for the reason assigned; but if the Syrian war mentioned in viii. 8 occurred along with this Ammonite war, as is maintained, it is surprising that this connection is not indicated in ch. viii. in the list of wars, but the two are introduced as wholly distinct. We therefore have in chs. viii. and x. sq. accounts of altogether different wars.

With the sections xvi. 14-23, xvii. 12-51, and xvii. 55-58, the case is different from that of the passages hitherto discussed, in which contradictions or mutually exclusive accounts of the same fact, and therefore indications of various documents, have been supposed to exist; here indeed incongruities and discrepancies do exist, and signs of different documents, which the author has put together, must be recognized. In xvi. 18 is related how David comes to Saul, and his extraction and his father's name are exactly and fully given. On the other hand, in xvii. 12, after the dangerous and disgraceful situation has been pictured, in which Israel stood in reference to the Philistines, and as the object of their giant Goliath's scorn, in a new section, which begins here, David is spoken of as if he had not been named at all before, and the names of his father and native city are given. This second mention of his family-relations, particularly in this shape, cannot be explained without forcing and far-fetched conceits, as in HAEVERNICK's attempt (p. 135). The author, says he, purposely repeats the notices of David's race and extraction, partly because this fits in with the historical narration, to which the explanation of David's coming into the camp, etc., can thus be attached, partly because the importance that he attaches to his hero thus comes out more strongly, and his person again comes clearly before the reader. The appeal to similar peculiarities in Hebrew historiography (as in other places in the Books of Samuel) is of no force in this passage, because such genealogical statistical-historical summary notices are given usually only as conclusion in important historical turning-points, and chiefly as proleptical statements (comp. 1 Sam. vii. 15-17; xiv. 47-52). The strange הִנֵּה ["this"] in xvii. 12, shows clearly that it is added to the already superfluous genealogical notice of David in order to connect the section vers. 12-31 with xvi. 14-23, to which (especially ver. 18) regard must have been had in ver. 12. That it is added with this view is clearly seen from its incongruity with the following וְשֵׁמוֹ [and his name was Jesse]. NÆGELSBACH's remark (p. 402) is perfectly correct: "If הִנֵּה ['this'] is meant to point to the earlier mention of the name in ch. xvi., then the וְשֵׁמוֹ ['and his name'] is superfluous; and if the latter remains, the former is superfluous."—So also the statement in v. 15, that David went back and forth from Saul to keep his father's sheep in Bethlehem, makes the impression that it was appended to the account before us in order to bring this narrative into agreement with xvi. 21-23, according to which David was constantly with Saul as his armor-bearer, and to explain the fact that he came from his father's folds to the scene of war. Long ago exception was taken to the disagreement between xvii. 12-31 and xvi. The proof is that the former is altogether lacking in the Vatican recension of the Septuagint, and that ORIGEN found it in no Greek translation. Similar difficulty was felt with xvii. 55 sq., which is also omitted in the Vatican Septuagint.

Between the section (xvii. 55 sq.) and xiv. 16-23 there is the discrepancy that in the former Saul does not know David, while according to the latter he must have known not only him personally, but also his lineage. According to xiv. 16 sq. David was described to Saul at the outset as the son of Jesse of Bethlehem, and Saul had put himself in communication with David's father by repeated messages, in order to take David permanently into his service. Contrariwise in xvii. 55 sq. he repeatedly asks: Whose son is the youth? Various attempts have been made to resolve this discrepancy. Stress has been laid on the fact that he asks not after David's person, but after his lineage. Then, according to one view, this question expresses the contempt and scorn which Saul would assign as reason why he could not keep his splendid promise (xvii. 25) to such a man of mean descent (HÆV. p. 136); but in neither case does the form of the question justify such a construction. According to another explanation the question expresses astonishment and admiration (KEIL, Introd. I. 238); but then it could not be "whose son is the youth?" We should expect, "is this the son of Jesse?" By others it is regarded as more probable that Saul had forgotten David's family-relations, either in the rush and press of court-life (SAURIN), or from hypochondria (BERTH.), or from ingratitude (Calvin) or from forgetfulness (KEIL in loco), and KEIL con-jectures that Saul, on account of the promised release of the victor from taxes, wished to know more of David's connections than simply his father's name and his birth-place; but all this does not suffice to set aside the difference, least of all the last-mentioned expedient, because David's answer to Saul's question contains likewise nothing more than the name of his father; and so recourse is had arbitrarily to a new hypothesis, namely, that David's answer has not been fully reported, though even this, strictly taken, would not suffice for that view, but would render necessary still another supposition, namely, that Saul's question is not fully reported. Since all these attempts at solution are untenable, we cannot, in the present state of the investigation of this question, avoid supposing, with many expositors, that the author of our Books has in these sections interpolated a second written tradition which he met with of David's battle with Goliath, and, although he connected them with ch. xvi. by a slight revision, the traces of which are indicated above, yet did not undertake a more thorough alteration for the purpose of reconciling the differences (WINEB. II. 260; BLEEK, p. 364; NAEGELSB. u. s. p. 402). The supposition of an interpolation of the section xvii. 12sq. (MICH., EICH., BERTHOLDT), which is also the ground of its omission in the Septuagint and other Greek translations, is untenable in proportion to the difficulty of understanding why an interpolation that offered great difficulties should be made.

On a closer examination of the question as to the extent of the second account that the author had before him, and the manner in which he combined it with his narrative, it appears in the first place that the incongruence and discrepancy (in relation to the preceding, xvi. 14-23) does not pertain to the whole of ch. xvii. This chapter (xvii.) is really connected closely with the preceding narration in xiv., since, after Saul's rejection and David's selection have been related, it resumes the account of Saul's wars with the Philistines, which remained his life-task (xiv. 62) even after his rejection (comp. EWALD, Gesch. III. 95, 3d ed.). The contents of vers. 32-54 connect themselves well without incongruence or discrepancy with the account (xvi. 14) of the calling of the already anointed David to the royal court, which stands in pragmatic connection with the rejection of Saul, since the gloomy spirit which governs Saul comes over him in consequence of his rejection by God—with the narrative of his establishment in Saul's service as armor-bearer (ver. 21), which on the one hand is brought about by David's military capacity (ver. 18), and on the other hand sufficiently explains his presence with Saul in the camp—and especially with xvii. 11; and that the section vers. 12-31 was added by the author from another narration to complete the account of David, is the more evident from the לֹא יִפְּזֵז of ver. 32 ("let no man's heart fail because of him"), which is closely connected with ver. 11, where the Philistine Goliath is spoken of, while he is not mentioned in the immediately preceding verses, and especially from the content of David's speech to Saul in ver. 32 ("let no man's heart fail") which naturally belongs to ver. 11 ("they were dismayed and greatly afraid").—We must also regard the section vers. 55-58 as a piece interpolated by the author, which is taken from another account, and the point of which lies in the twice-put question of Saul. From its first words it ought to have stood after ver. 40; but as Saul's question could be answered by Abner only after David's return from the combat, it was put here after ver. 54, its first half, vers. 55, 56, forming an appendix to ver. 40, since according to the sense the verbs are to be regarded as in the pluperfect, and the second half, vers. 57, 58, serving as continuation of the history after ver. 54. By the statement that David after this discourse before Saul had formed a friendship with Jonathan, the author has so connected this section with the following (xviii. 1sq.) that he relates in ver. 2 (in reference to the remark in ver. 15) how David in consequence of his heroic exploit was taken permanently into Saul's service and received from him a military command. WINEB. says rightly (I. 260): "Ch. xviii. 1-5 may very well belong to the proper substance of the Book, only the collector has attached this section to the interpolated ch. xvii." though, as we have seen, not all of ch. xvii. is to be regarded as interpolation of the author, but only vers. 12-31. On the whole passage we may compare EWALD's remark: "We hold that the older narrator also mentioned the single combat of David with Goliath; the passages xviii. 6, xix. 5, xxi. 10, leave no doubt of this; and the words that describe the last issue of the deed (xviii. 1, 3-5) are, according to their coloring, from the older narrator" (ubi sup. p. 96, 97).*

As characteristic of the fact that the content of the Books of Samuel has been "put together in compilatory fashion" from various sources by a Redactor of historical accounts, it has been declared (THENIUS, p. IX.), that some parts of the work by their curt chronicle-like tone stand in striking contrast with the elsewhere elaborate, in one part (2 Sam. xi.-xx.) quite biographical narration, for ex. 2 Sam. v. 1-16; viii.; xxi. 15-22; xxiii. 8-39. This is true only in part of the first-named passage; for it is elaborately and distinctly enough told how David at Hebron receives homage as king over all Israel, and then makes Jerusalem his capital by driving out the Jebusites. The rest of the section and the others adduced have certainly, if not exactly a chronicle-like, yet a statistical-historical, form. But what is their content? Statistical statements concerning the life and government of David with reference to his previous and subsequent rule, and concerning the children born to him at Jerusalem (v. 4, 5, 13-16), summary mention of the wars carried on with foreign enemies (viii.), survey of the wars carried on with the Philistines (xxi. 15-22), a list of David's heroes (xxiii. 8-39). How is this fact, the presence of such chronicle-like statistical passages (the number of which might be increased), to be used? Shall the charge of external mechanical compilation be brought against the Redactor? NÆGELSB. admirably says: "No author is under obligation to treat all parts of his work with equal elaborateness" (401). This holds as a general remark. As to particulars, a fuller account of David's wives and children (v. 13-16) was, for the author's aim, quite useless, if not impossible. In ch. v., where David becomes king over all Israel, the mention of his age and the length of his reign, on which the writer could not pertinently enlarge much, and of his family connections formed in Jerusalem, was quite appropriate, but an elaborate historical account was excluded by the nature of the case. In ch. viii. it did not accord with the author's plan to give a minute and particular account of all the wars against foreign peoples; he contented himself with a nervous, brief and summary description somewhat variously colored. A similar sketch is xxi. 15-22. And the list of heroes in xxiii. cannot in itself make at all against the literary character of the author, especially as xxi.-xxiv. is an unconnected appendix to the Second Book. In fact, however, such diversities cannot detract from the general unity. Or, is weight laid on them in order to prove that the author drew from various sources? Of this certainly these differences furnish sufficient proof. Of course in these sections the author had to take his chronological, genealogical and statistical-historical statements from various sources. We must indeed recognize here the traces either of various documents corresponding to the several sections, or of a written collection of notes on which the composition is based.

It is further maintained that "in several places there is clearly a conclusion of separate component parts, as 1 Sam. vii. 15-17; xiv. 47-52; 2 Sam. viii. 15-18; xx. 23-26; where the various authors briefly stated what further they knew of the persons whose history they were sketching." It is quite certain that these passages have the form of a conclusion in reference to what precedes. Up to 1 Sam. vii. 14 has been related how Samuel exercised his judicial office, and Israel under his lead gained a brilliant victory over the Philistines. At this point in the history he has reached the apex of his judicial activity; here the period proper of the Judges ends, and the history turns to the new-beginning period of the Kings, in which indeed Samuel with his judicial authority is still a power; not, however, as before, sole ruler, but God's instrument to carry out the idea of the theocratic kingdom, about which the whole following history turns. This was then the place, in the description of Samuel as judicial ruler, in which was summarily and in conclusion (and at the same time proleptically) condensed all that was to be said about his judicial rule, in order that the history, abandoning the point of view heretofore maintained, might turn to the beginning of the royal rule and to Samuel's work, so far as it centred in this rule.

* [It is true, as Dr. ERDMANN shows, that xvii. 12-31 and xvii. 55-58 are probably sections added by the redactor to the old narrative, which embraced xvii. 1-11, 32-54, but it is not necessary to suppose a contradiction between the several sections and xvi. 14-23. The explanations criticised in the text are unsatisfactory, but there is another which diminishes the difficulty as far as we can expect, considering the antiquity of the accounts. It is this: the section, xvi. 14-23, gives a general anticipatory account (which is quite in the Heb. style) of David's relation to Saul, extending as far as the occurrences narrated in ch. xviii.; ch. xvii. then describes the particular incident that led to David's promotion, the immediate results of which are given (also by anticipation) in xviii. 1-5; then the narrative goes back in xviii. 6 to mention an incident which gives the key to the following history. Thus ch. xvii. belongs in time within xvi. 14-23, as xviii. 6 belongs in time within xviii. 1-5; the combat with Goliath was the means of procuring Saul's special favor for David, and so Saul, having seen him only a few times, might easily fail to recognize him. So, too, David's "going and returning," xvii. 15, is to be put in the early part of the period embraced in xvi. 14-23, and is not inconsistent with the permanent service which appears at the close of the period, the explanation of which is given in ch. xvii. For fuller explanation see the exposition loc. loc.—The obscurity of the narrative in the connection of the different sections is due no doubt to its brevity and to our ignorance of certain circumstances, which, if known, would enable us clearly to see harmony in these different accounts. The supposition of contradictory accounts is in itself very improbable, considering the fact that the events were well known and carefully recorded by competent persons. It is therefore wiser to suppose an omission of connecting facts than a contradiction in the recorded accounts.—Ta.]

In the section 1 Sam. xiv. 47-52 we have a similar critical point in the connection of the theocratical development of history. This section contains in like manner general comprehensive and closing remarks on Saul, partly on his wars, partly on his family and household connections, partly on his constant activity in war against the Philistines (vers. 47, 48, 49-51, 52). Reference is made proleptically to the wars against the Amalekites and Philistines, which are afterwards narrated; this forms the connection with what follows; but in the way of conclusion, looking back to viii.-xiv., everything that remains to be said in general of Saul is brought together here, because by the before-mentioned victory over the Philistines, he stands on the summit of his royal power, which God committed to him against this enemy; but at this moment also, in consequence of the judgment already pronounced against him by Samuel in xiii. (on which follows in xv. the definitive announcement of rejection), begins to decline from that elevation on which as chosen of the Lord he is by his own fault unable to remain. Returning to Samuel's prophetic and theocratic position, there begins (after that closing section) in xv. and xvi. with the narration of the rejection of Saul and the choice of David a new period in the history of the theocratic kingdom, in which David is the central figure, and first in the large section, xv.-xxxi., is described his gradual ascent through conflict and suffering to the throne, along with the gradual, truly heart-rending descent of Saul till his shameful downfall in battle with the Philistines.

Again in the section 2 Sam. viii. there is a critical point [abschluss] in the hitherto splendidly advancing history of David's kingship. In a theocratical sense David here finds himself on the summit of the royal majesty bestowed on him by God, after he has established the Ark permanently in the secure capital, received the promise of permanent lordship for his House, and poured out his soul in thanksgiving to the Lord (vi. and vii.). On the other hand, there here begins by his own fault his gradual decline from this height (x., xi.). At this turning point, as in Saul's history, a summary view of all David's wars is given (vers. 1-14), in ver. 15 his work as king is stated generally, and in vers. 16-18 a general statement of the government and its officers is made, in order that the history may now turn to the new phase of retrogressive development, and from the Ammonite-Syrian war on, which is proleptical, mentioned in this closing section, and during which occurred the grave sin of David that determined all that followed, the sad consequences of this sin in the royal family and in the kingdom may be traced uninterruptedly up to the restoration of the shattered royal power.

At the close of this connected history there follows again a summary and closing statement respecting the government of the thoroughly shaken and broken kingdom, 2 Sam. xx. 23-26. The disagreement between this list of officers and viii. 16-18 is explained very simply by the changes that had occurred in the interval. It is worthy of remark, that in both Joab, the highest officer in the army, stands first, and so both lists in the offices here named really attach themselves closely to the preceding relations of the wars by which internal peace, as condition of an orderly administration of internal affairs, was secured for the kingdom.

A similar character and aim belong to the section 2 Sam. v. 13-16. Here are given David's family connections in Jerusalem at the important point in the advancing development of his kingly authority, when he obtains the rule over all Israel, fixes his royal residence in Jerusalem, and enters on a new phase of historical development, which is indicated by the three following facts: Vanquishing the Philistines by the hand of the Lord (v. 17-25), Transference of the Ark to Jerusalem (vi.), and Nathan's prophecy of the building of the temple and of the everlasting rule (vii.).

We see in these sections the same peculiarity of Hebrew historical writing that shows itself, for example, also in the composition of Genesis, namely, that general remarks on household and family affairs and other things not decisive for the principal design of the history form a summary and often anticipatory close to the preceding narrative and the preparation for the transition to a new phase of historical development. Comp. EWALD, Gesch. [Hist. of Israel], 3d ed., I: 212, 213. Although, then, a certain conclusional character must be recognized in the above-cited sections of our books, it does not thence follow that the connected narrations to which they belong pertain to just as many different documents, as if the indication were therein given of different authors of the individual parts. In accordance with this view Ewald remarks (ubi sup., p. 212, 3d ed.) that in his explanation of 1 Sam. vii. it is not of consequence "whether the words there are to be referred to our narrator or the following one." The author of our books could himself select these closing sections, and from the character of the content, it is evident that he drew from appropriate historical sources which were at his command. KEIL excellently remarks (Comm. on Sam. Introd. 6); "These concise statements are anything but proofs of a compilation from various sources, for which they have been taken from ignorance of the peculiarities of Shemitic historical writing; they serve to round off the different periods into which the history is divided, and furnish points of rest which neither destroy the real connection of the separate groups, nor render the authorial unity of the Books doubtful."

If now we examine our Books more closely in their purely historical character or according to the purely historical point of view, they lack, in the first place, a strictly chronological statement and arrangement of the facts. In general, precise chronological statements are wanting here, such, for example, as are very carefully given in the Books of Kings; and so it is not the principle of chronological order that controls the connection of the narrative, but the principle of the real connection of things in the grouping of facts, in favor of which the chronological order is infringed. Saul's victory over the Amalekites is mentioned in 1 Sam. xiv. 47, 48, and it is not till xv. that the history of the war against them is narrated, because, as we have seen, it is the design of the author here to group and bring together proleptically everything relating to Saul's foreign wars and family connections, in order afterwards to relate at length Saul's grave sin, which occurred during the Amalekite war, and which, as the cause of his rejection by God, forms the crisis of his history.—In the same way the chronological-historical order is interrupted in 2 Sam. viii., where the author, in giving a general view of all David's foreign wars, mentions proleptically the Ammonite-Syrian war [which he afterwards (chapter x.) relates at length] because it stands at an important turning-point in David's history, when, in consequence of his great sin, a series of divine judgments is prepared for him. The absence of chronological order is especially marked in 2 Sam. xxi.-xxiv.; neither is the beginning, ch. xxi., attached chronologically to ch. xx., nor do the separate parts stand in chronological connection. The section xxiii. 8-39 belongs, according to time and content, to 2 Sam. v. 1-10, which position, answering to the historical connection, it actually has in 1 Chron. xi. The passage xxi. 15-22, in spite of the וַיִּשָּׁב ["yet again"], which points to the just preceding narrative, cannot be connected in time with ver. 14, but belongs chronologically probably to the passage indicated in 1 Chron. xx. 4sq. (where are mentioned three of the four deeds of heroes here related), namely, 2 Sam. xii. 30, 31 (comp. with 1 Chron. xx. 2, 3). The thanksgiving song of David, ch. xxii., is evidently not in its right place, but belongs, according to the clue which the content gives to the occasion, to a time when David was saved by a great war from grievous distress and danger. That ch. xxiv. is not in its proper chronological position is evident.

Similar inequalities and interruptions show themselves, as in the chronological, so also in the factual treatment of the historical material.—To look at the last portion, chs. xxi.-xxiv., one would have expected that the two narratives, xxi. 1-14 and xxiv., on account of the similarity of their points of view and the theocratical tendency which they both show in reference to God's anger, which is to be appeased, would have been put together as they in content belong together. So, the sections xxi. 15-22 and xxiii. 8-39 belong together according to historical content, but are separated by the lyrical-prophetical pieces, xxii. and xxiii. 1-7, which in content belong together. Apart from the chronological point of view, xxiii. 8-39 seems to be detached from the section, 2 Sam. v. 1-10, to which, according to content, it belongs. It is thus in some cases true, that the historical material, even apart from chronological order, is not grouped in relation to its facts, as we should have expected from the similarity of the contents and the points of view.—Further, we several times find references to facts which are assumed to be known, but are not mentioned either in these books or in any others that have been handed down. For example, in 1 Sam. xiii. 2, in the narrative of Saul's military undertakings against the Philistines, Jonathan suddenly appears as leader of part of the army, and defeats the Philistines in their camp at Gibeah, though he had not before been mentioned as Saul's son (this is not done till ver. 16 and xiv. 1), or as taking part in the campaign against the Philistines. So in 1 Sam. xxi. 1 the removal of the tabernacle to Nob is pre-supposed, though we are not told when and how it had been carried thither from Shiloh, where it still stood under Eli (i. 8, 9). The history of the expiation, 2 Sam. xxi., whose omission David had to supply, supposes the occasioning event, the slaying of the Gibeonites by Saul, though it has nowhere been mentioned. So reference is made to the expulsion of necromancers by Saul (1 Sam. xxviii. 3), and to the flight of the Beerothites to Gittaim (2 Sam. iv. 3), which incidents are not narrated. Thus historical facts are here and there in the narration merely taken for granted, the relation of which we should have expected for the sake of completeness and pragmatismal connection.

In regard to the fulness of the narrative, it must be particularly remarked, that the Books do not propose to give a properly biographical account of Samuel, Saul and David. The historical material of Samuel's life, regarded from a biographical point of view, is very sporadically and atomically given; there are wanting large parts of the life-development of the prophet. In regard to Saul we find important facts either wholly unmentioned or only briefly touched on or intimated. From a comparison of our Books with the parallel passages in the Books of Chronicles on David, it appears that our author has used less freely than the author of Chronicles the historical material which lay equally before both. The account that our Book gives of the wars of David with the Ammonites and Syrians (2 Sam. viii., x.) leaves out many things that the Chronicler inserts (1 Chron. xviii., xix.). It is not supposable that the history of the preparations for the building of the Temple, the organization of the priestly service and of the army was unknown to our author; but he says nothing about what is contained in 1 Chron. xxii.—xxviii. Even the account of David's end, for which we cannot suppose a lack of material, is wanting, an unexpected omission in a history of David that elsewhere goes so minutely into particulars. We see, therefore, that the author purposed neither to insist on strict chronological arrangement of facts, nor to work up his known or accessible historical material with all possible completeness in all parts of his narration. This eclectic treatment of the historical material has its ground in the desire to give special prominence to those things only which were important for the development of the Kingdom of God from a theocratic-prophetical point of view. Thus, for example, in 1 Sam. iii. a fact in the history of Samuel's childhood is made prominent and related at length, that was decisive for his divine call to the prophetic office in contrast with the corrupt priesthood. So the Amalekite war and the Ammonite war (1 Sam. xv. and 2 Sam. x., xi.) are given in full, because in the first we have the ground of Saul's rejection, and in the second the sin of David, on account of which a heavy judgment afterwards falls on his house and kingdom (of which a full relation is given), has its historical background and its factual occasion.

We come once more to the close of the Books, 2 Sam. xxi.—xxiv. In the examination of this conclusion in reference to the arrangement and combination of the historical material, two things strike us: first, that these four chapters are not connected with what precedes by a continuity of historical development, but form a supplement or appendix composed of bits without historical connection among themselves, and second, that with such a conclusion the history of David is not rounded off by a continuation to the end of his life or even of his reign.

If we compare the six sections in this closing supplement (1, the famine and the atonement, xxi. 1-14; 2, summary account of deeds of heroes in the Philistine wars, xxi. 15-22; 3, David's song of praise, xxii.; 4, David's last words, xxiii. 1-7; 5, David's heroes in conflict with the Philistines, xxiii. 8-39; 6, the plague in consequence of the numbering of the people, and the atonement, xxiv.), 1 and 6, 2 and 5, 3 and 4, correspond in content. The sections 1 and 6 have an objective-theocratical tone, and are therefore to be referred to sources that owed their origin to the theocratic stand-point of the historical narration. Two sins against the Lord: one king Saul's, whose consequences reach to the time of David's reign, the other king David's, which falls in the last period of his reign (EWALD and THEN.), have for their results judgments which affect the whole people; in both cases an atonement has to be made in order to appease the wrath of God. The sections 2 and 5, which correspond in their military character, and especially in their reference to the Philistine wars, have an annalistic or chronicle-like tone, and point to corresponding sources. The two-fold utterance of David (3 and 4), forming the centre of this supplement, has the same theocratic-religious tone with its two border-pieces (1 and 6), only with the subjective modification proper to the lyric-prophetic content, and points perhaps to the same source from which the author has woven in the other lyrical pieces of his history. (On this point see further below.) Along with this correspondence in the pairs of sections in the characteristic peculiarities of their content, we may discover, perhaps, in spite of the lack of pragmatic connection between them, a partially ideal combination of them in the conception of the author. The summary account of the Philistine wars (xxi. 15-22)—for which in the reverse direction we might find a point of attachment, though a loose one, in the reference in ver. 12 to the earlier Philistine wars under Saul—has an ideal pragmatic connection with the following thanksgiving-song; for in xxii. 1 the author, thinking, no doubt, of the principal enemies of Israel, who at the same time represented all the rest, marks this song as addressed to Jehovah at a time "when Jehovah had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies." In this combination, therefore, chap. xxii. has in that section (xxi. 15-22) its historical basis and illustration. The song composed by David on a definite historical occasion is placed here by the author as a song of triumph, that it may form the cap-stone of the war-tossed life of David. The reflection on the glorious conclusion of all military undertakings against foes, which filled up the greater part of David's reign, led the author on to David's last prophetic word, which is the culmination of his inner life, where, as prophet, on the ground of the everlasting covenant which God had made with him, he foretells salvation under the righteous ruler, who was to proceed from his house. THENIUS rightly sees in this song "the last poetical flight that David ever took, to be put perhaps shortly before his death," and says that it can hardly be doubted that we have here David's swan-song (p. 271, 275). It is appropriate to our aim in making a close examination of this song here—namely, to fix the characteristics of the arrangement of this supplementary section—to quote EWALD's admirable words: "In the song which an old tradition rightly calls 'the last (poetical) words of David,' the poetical and ethical spirit of the aged king is at last completely transfigured into the prophetic; once more before his death rising to a poetic flight he feels himself in truth Jehovah's prophet, and looking back on his now closing life, he announces, as with a free outlook into the future the divine presentiment he felt that the rule of his house, firmly fixed in God, would outlast his death" (Gesch. III. 268). In regard to the prophetic element, KEIL says still better (Comm. p. 484sq.): "These 'last words' are the divine attestation of all that he has sung and prophesied in several Psalms of the everlasting rule of his seed, founded on the divine promise announced to him by the prophet Nathan, chap. vii. For these words are no mere lyric expansion of that divine promise, but a prophetic declaration which David made in the evening of his life by divine inspiration concerning the true King of the Kingdom of God." The author has taken the list of heroes, xxiii. 8-39, out of its (according to 1 Chr. xi. 10) original connection, where, according to its superscription, it illustrated the establishment of David's kingdom over all Israel in victorious battle against enemies by the help of his he-rees, and put it into this place, perhaps in order to give a historical framework to David's last word concerning the glory of his kingdom in its exhibition of power against its ungodly opposers, inasmuch as it had a historical foundation. The two statistical-historical sections, xxi. 15 sq. and xxiii. 8 sq., would therefore form an appropriate frame for the two pictures (xxii. and xxiii. 1-7) which in their contents are so important for the history of David's kingdom.

There is a similar ideal connection between chaps. xxiv. and xxiii. 8-39; for the narrative of the census, made in a spirit of haughty self-elevation to ascertain David's military strength, connects itself factually with the list of his heroes, and also with chap. xxi., to which it points by the opening words "and again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel," and by the closing words in ver. 25 (comp. chap. xxi. 14), since it relates a similar case of royal sin and the consequently necessary appeasing of God's anger.

Further, there is an ideal connection between the close of this passage (ver. 25 and Septuagint comp. with 1 Chr. xxi. 27—xxii. 1), where Araunah's threshing-floor is represented as the place on which, after the building of an altar by David, the Temple was built, and the passage xxiii. 1-7. In the latter the author presents David gazing in prophetic perspective on the glory of the House which God will build for him in righteousness in the future of his kingdom; in the former he shows us how, under divine guidance, the place where David builds an altar to the Lord, brings the expiatory offering, and receives the answer to his prayer for the staying of the pestilence, is selected for the building of the Temple, which is to become the permanent place of God's abode and His gracious presence with His people, yet, by the Lord's express command, is to be built for the Lord as His house, not by David, but by his son.

Finally it is generally agreed that the chief part at least of this section, chaps. xxi.—xxiv. belongs to the later period of David's life. Thus EWALD characterizes the two plagues (xxi. 1-14 and xxiv.) and the great song of triumph (xxii.) as evidently pertaining to David's last years. "The last words of David" (xxiii. 1-7) put it beyond doubt that the author was here looking at the close of David's reign.

From this examination it appears that it is at least inexact to say that "chaps. xxi.—xxiv. are very loosely and externally connected, and are put at the end only that the author might here add the sections that seemed to him important for David's life, and for which he had before found no fitting place" (so HAEVERNICK, p. 180). It is true the connected narrative of David's life closed with the description of the complete quelling of Absalom's revolt, with which is connected the insurrection of Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 1-32). But the author did not intend this to be the real conclusion of his whole history, so that we should have to regard chaps. xxi.—xxiv. merely as an appended collection which he had at first intended to omit (EWALD, Gesch. III. 239); rather he purposed giving in these sections the proper conclusion of his history of David's reign; not, however, by presenting a connected and full narrative of the occurrences in the last period of his reign, but by gathering up these events of David's later life under the loftiest points of view, which control the whole history from the first, and appending them as its conclusion. We have here, not an appendix that is brought in at the conclusion (NÄGELSBACH, 409), but an appendix that is itself conclusion, as the principal facts in the content show.

Before, however, we establish the sense in which the author intended to close his history with this section, we must consider an objection urged by many—namely, that as there is no account of David's death, the Books of Samuel have no proper conclusion; thus we shall discover the point of view under which the continuation of a connected narrative of David's life up to his death is omitted at the end of our Books. From the stand-point of ordinary biographical-historical narration, this fact—that at the close of a so elaborate and in part biographical narrative of David's life, his death is not mentioned—is certainly strange. It cannot be explained by the supposition that the author's materials did not reach to the death of David; for the Redactor of our Books certainly wrote after David's death, and needed no special authority to conclude with a reference to that event. Nor is it an explanation to say that the author wrote shortly after David's death, and from his proximity to this generally known event, did not care to impart it to his contemporaries (HAEVERNICK, p. 145); for, aside from the incorrect presupposition in this view, it is inconceivable that the author should have been silent about the decease of this great king after having so elaborately described his life-course in its several stadia. So also we must reject the hypothesis that the author of the Books of Samuel has in this work of his at least in part treated the history of Solomon, of which much is retained in the beginning (chaps. i. and ii.) of the Books of Kings (BLEEK, Einkl. [Introduct.], pp. 359, 360)—that in these two chapters the thread of the narrative in the Books of Samuel is continued without break by the account of the death of David and the accession of Solomon, as EWALD maintains (Gesch. I. p. 207 sq., 239 sq.), assuming that the first half of his supposed great work on the Kings reached up to 1 Kings ii. If the similarity of the style of the narration be insisted on in support of this view, this is sufficiently explained by the common source from which both drew (1 Chr. xxix. 29). If appeal is made to the similarity of particular narratives, for example, 1 Sam. ii. 27-36 compared with 1 Kings ii. 26 sq., it being maintained that the same writer who in the first passage recounts the threatening prophecy of the fall of the House of Ithamar, has in the second recounted its fulfilment in the removal from the priesthood of Abiathar (great-great-grandson of Eli) by Solomon immediately after his accession, and in confirmation of this view reference being made to the repetition of the threat against Eli in 1 Sam. iii. 11-14—all that we can thence safely conclude is that the author of 1 Kings was acquainted with the Books of Samuel which were written long before his time. The same remark holds of the comparison of 1 Kings ii. 11 with 2 Sam. v. 4, 5 in respect to the similar accounts of David's reign, which were taken from the same source, and also of the reference of 1 Kings viii. 18, 25 to the author of 2 Sam. vii. 12-16. Moreover it is an objection to this view that, if the first chapters of the Books of Kings form the continuation of 2 Sam. xx. 26 by the same author, the section 2 Sam. xxi.—xxiv. intervenes in a strange and unaccountable way, while, on the other hand, these two chapters (1 Kings i. 1) stand in pragmatic connection with chap. iii., since they form the introduction to the narrative of Solomon's accession (comp. BAEHR [in LANGE's Bible-work], Komm. zu den BB. der Könige, Einkl. p. 14 [American transl., p. 10]). Nägelsbach says well (p. 408 sq.), against EWALD's assumption of 1 Kings ii. 46 as the end of the first half of the Book of Kings, that if the original limit of the narrative of the Books of Samuel is to be sought outside of 2 Sam. xxiv. 25, it should rather be in 1 Kings ii. 12, where, after the statement of the length of David's reign, it is said: "then sat Solomon on the throne of David his father, and his kingdom was established greatly," for this passage with the immediately preceding verses has all the marks of a great epoch-making conclusion,—but if, on account of the undeniable relationship of the preceding and succeeding context, the line cannot be drawn here (EWALD for this reason does not put it here), still less can it be drawn at chap. ii. 46.

The present conclusion of the Books of Samuel (wanting the narrative of the death of David) is satisfactorily explained only by the point of view in which they, as well as the Books of Kings, are composed. If it had been the author's object from a biographical-historical point of view to write an elaborate and complete life of David, he would necessarily have narrated its end. But the point of view which controls his whole account, and according to which he groups his historical material, is the theocratic-prophetic, and through the whole history the characteristic features not only of its theocratical kernel, but also of its conception and narration, are seen from the theocratic-prophetic point of view.

A specific Israelitish-religious and theocratic character is throughout more prominent in our Books than in the other historical books. RUETCHI rightly remarks (Stud. u. Krit. 1866, p. 218): "Careful recurrence to religious fundamental ideas is particularly important in the Books of Samuel, because they suppose in the reader a deep religious sense, and in this respect take, we may say, the highest rank among the historical books of the Old Testament." This character presupposes that view of the history of Israel as God's chosen people and possession (Ex. xix. 3-6), according to which this history is throughout determined by the specific-supernatural factor of divine control, and strives towards a highest divine goal, the realization of the rule and kingdom of God in the chosen people, and therefore is conditioned in its development not merely by human factors, but by supernatural divine guidance. The aim of the history is to set before the people how the divine conception and purpose of a kingdom was fulfilled at the close of the period of the Judges in the establishment of the theocratic kingdom by its two first heads; or, how the controlling working of the God of Israel showed itself in the restoration of the Theocracy through Samuel's judicial-prophetic labors, and in the setting up of the theocratic kingdom under the contrast of its forever typical representatives, the rejected Anointed of the Lord and the true king after God's own heart. To this aim corresponds the tone of the content of the Books, which is essentially a history of the theocratic development of the kingdom of God in Israel during the period of the Judges, which closed with Samuel, and during that of the kingdom, which began with Saul and David. The composition and mode of presentation of the content is determined by this aim and by the turning-point of the whole history of Israel which lies in this development.

As in general the authors of the biblical-historical books do not fully and uniformly recount everything in the sacred history worthy of mention, but only give prominence to the most important elements of the history of the Kingdom of God in the facts and persons that exhibit them, grouping them according to their bearing on the history of the kingdom, so also the author of our Books does not design to give connected elaborate biographies of Samuel, Saul and David, but in the arrangement of the historical material makes a selection which is determined by the point of view of God's Kingdom in Israel, which develops itself by means of the divinely founded earthly-human kingdom into glorious power even over the heathen nations. Thus the chief moments of the theocratic development of the history of Israel that lie in the time of transition from the Judges to the Kingdom, are grouped around Samuel, as the instrument of the divine working within and without, up to the end of 1 Sam. vii. Though Samuel continues to act a long time still as God's instrument, yet from ch. viii. the kingdom and the man chosen as its first head, Saul, appear in the foreground, till principally his theocratic mission as King of Israel ceases (end of ch. xiv.). True, from ch. xv. on to the close of 1 Sam. xxxi. the history of Saul and Israel is carried on; but the content and the form show plainly how the immediate divine interposition in Saul's inner and outer life is an advancing judgment, and essentially nothing but the divinely arranged consequence of the sentence of condemnation, xiii. 18, 14. The man whom the Lord had sought out "after his own heart, that he should at the Lord's command be captain over his people," appears in the very beginning of this retrogressive development of the history of Saul's kingdom as the theocratic centre of the whole following history, so that 1 Sam. xv.—2 Sam. xxiv. is from this point of view the history of David's kingdom. Appointed by immediate divine call and selection king of Israel, because in his relation to the Lord as the man after His heart he possesses the proper qualification for the position, he is saved by divine protection from Saul's persecutions and snares, under divine guidance and direction (2 Sam. ii. 1) assumes a partial royal authority at Hebron, and before the Lord makes a covenant with the elders of all Israel (ch. v.), in order then in Jerusalem to be confirmed by the Lord king over all the people (ver. 12). Since David recognizes and fulfils his theocratic calling to develop the victorious power of God's people against foes without, and to establish God's dominion and sanctify him within the people, as he shows by establishing the Ark on Mount Zion as the visible sign of both these aims, so the Lord acknowledges him in the great promise in 2 Sam. vii., that the Lord would establish the throne of his kingdom forever, and that the dominion of his house should last forever. David's deep fall does not invalidate this divine promise. The Lord indeed sends the punishment by word and deed (2 Sam. xii. 9-11) as necessary consequence of the grave sin of His Anointed. But David humbles himself in honest penitence under the mighty hand of God; the hand of the Lord leads him through all suffering in house and kingdom; the royal authority, shaken and sunken by his fault, is restored by God's controlling dealing with His servant; the divine promise preserves the historical supposition on which it is based, and remains in force. From the history of the last periods of his government the author brings out one other fundamental fact, namely, that human sin infallibly draws down divine punishment; but anger disappears before the divine mercy. By his thanksgiving song (ch. xxii.) and by his last prophetic utterance concerning the righteous ruler over men, the ruler in the fear of God, the author presents David to us at the highest point of his theocratical kingship before the presence of the Lord. Here, therefore, is a real conclusion, which answers not to the biographical-historical, but to the theocratical-historical aim and content of the history. David is presented to us in this closing composite section as the servant of God, who has fulfilled his mission, whose house the Lord has built, and whose seed will build a house for the Lord as His dwelling-place in the midst of His royal people. The preliminary historical fulfillment of 2 Sam. vii., so far as it pertains to the time of David's government, has here in these last words of his found its conclusion. The narration of the weakness of his old age, of the historical occurrences occasioned by it, and of his death, all looking to Solomon's accession to the throne, could have no farther essential theocratic significance. The Book of Kings, however, makes these historical facts the introduction to the beginning of Solomon's reign, with which they stand in pragmatic connection, taking them from the sources common to him with the author of the Books of Samuel, and connects his narrative in 1 Kings i. 1 by the ! ["and"] with the historical work, the existence of which he assumes, and to which he refers in the very beginning (ii. 4sq.) in connection with the promise in 2 Sam. vii. The omission of David's death therefore in the conclusion of this work is satisfactorily explained from the theocratic character and aim of the composition, since in this conclusion the fulfillment of the theocratical mission of David is completed.

But with this theocratical complexion of the history its prophetic character is inseparably connected. From the beginning of our Books on we see the great theocratic significance of the Prophetic Order in the history of the Kingdom of Israel, in the first place, as the organ of the divine Spirit and the medium of the divine guidance and control. Samuel appears here as the true founder of the Old Testament Prophetic Order as a permanent public power alongside of the priesthood and the kingly office. We see how, by the hand of God, the priesthood, which showed so badly in its representatives, together with the Ark, was removed from the centre of the theocratic development of history, and the Prophetic Order comes forward as mediating agency between God and His people, and, as Organ of the immediate application of the word and Spirit of God to the chosen people, calls forth a mighty movement of spiritual and religious-moral life. Over against the kingly office it is in part the theocratic mediating office, which, with controlling guidance, reveals to it God's counsel and will, and is thus a firm support of its power, in part the divine watch-office, which, in the name of the Lord, directs the fulfilling of the royal calling, punishes the king's sins, and is set to offer to royal tyranny a powerful opposition founded on the divine word. The stamp of the prophetic style appears not merely in particular prophecies (1 Sam. ii. 12; 2 Sam. vii. 12), but in the tone of the whole; a theocratic pragmatism everywhere ruling, by which is determined the selection of the material and the unfolding of the chief historical moments.

Looked at in its particulars, the prophetic element in our Books appears in very varied form and relation. To the song with prophetic content at the beginning answers the prophetic discourse of the man of God, ii. 27-36, who announces to Eli and his family the approaching divine punishment. The first revelation which Samuel as "servant of the Lord" receives concerning the House of Eli, iii. 11-14, is the beginning of his prophetic office, and in vers. 19-21 it is briefly set forth in its significance and importance for the people as the accompaniment of his judicial office; and the words: "I will perform what I have spoken to Eli from beginning to end" (ver. 12) show "how this prophecy as the controlling divine working in the Theocracy forms for our historian the true kernel and centre of the whole history" (HAEVERN. Einl. II. 1, 125). The following history is the fulfillment of what God had announced by him as prophet, of the "words of God" by his mouth. As prophet he completes the reformation which is described in ch. vii.; by virtue of his prophetic calling he accomplishes the change of the theocratic constitution (viii., ix.), everywhere speaking and acting as immediate mouth-piece of God (x., xi.). His address to all Israel (ch. xii.) breathes the prophetic spirit with which he was filled. In his office of prophetic watchman he chides Saul's disobedience, and foretells to him the downfall of his kingdom, xiii. (comp. xii. 25). The narrative of the battle and victory over the Philistines, xiii. 6—xiv. 46, represents the brilliant success of Israel under Jonathan as an exhibition of the Lord's power for his people (xiv. 10, 12, 15, 23, 45): "So the Lord saved Israel that day, the Lord wrought it through Jonathan." In chs. xv., xvi., Samuel displays all the power which he had over against Saul by virtue of his prophetic office, announcing to him by divine direction the sentence of rejection on account of his disobedience, and anointing David to be king in his stead. The Lord speaks to Samuel, and Samuel speaks in the name of the Lord as his prophet to Saul; xv. 1, 10sq., 16sq., 22sq., 26sq.; xvi. 1sq., 7sq. Saul had been made a partaker of the prophetic spirit. Now the Spirit of Jehovah leaves him. "And the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward" (xvi. 13, 14). "The Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul" (xviii. 12). This is the consequence of God's immediate interference by the word and deed of the prophet. This is, as it were, the prophetic superscription to all that is related from ch. xvii. to the end of the First Book concerning Saul's demeanor towards David and the relation between them, and concerning the ever-deepening condemnation into which Saul was falling, and the repeated indication and certification of David as the Anointed of the Lord. The whole varied content of this large section is not a portraiture of David's private life from a biographical point of view, as HAEVERNICK maintains (p. 127); but a description, from a prophetic point of view, and going into biographical details, of the history of David as the king chosen and anointed in Saul's stead, who is persecuted by Saul because he is the Anointed of the Lord, and whom God protects against Saul because he has received the mission and promise of the kingdom. All this is clearly understood only when it is looked at from the theocratic-prophetic point of view which controls the whole account; it is all, as HAEVERNICK (ubi sup.) rightly says, the development of ch. xvi., the consequence of the desertion of Saul by the Spirit of Jehovah, but at the same time for that very reason to be regarded as narrated from a purely prophetic stand-point, which is clearly indicated in xiii. 25 and xvi. 13, 14. This, however, HAEVERNICK fails to see; he establishes the prophetic element simply from the presence of prophetic utterances, and so thinks it has as good as disappeared here, because he without ground assumes that the preceding narration (up to ch. xvi.) was taken from a document which was a collection of prophetic words of Samuel.

But we have to recognize the prophetic element in this second larger half of the First Book not merely on account of those all-controlling prophetic points of view under which lie these histories with their divine factor, which has a double operation in respect to Saul and David; it manifests itself also in individual passages immediately in the appearance and actions of prophetic persons and in occurrences which put in the clearest light the importance of the prophetic office in the connection of these narratives. In the first place, the section xix. 18-24 has more importance than HAEVERNICK (p. 127) accords to it. David's flight to Samuel to Ramah, the statements which he makes to him of Saul's conduct towards himself, his long stay with Samuel and in the school of the Prophets there, whither Saul comes to seek him out—all this supposes that he had already before been intimately associated with Samuel, especially (it is probable) since the anointing (xvi. 13), and had had the advantage of his counsel and direction for his future calling. There with Samuel David seeks safety; there in the circle of prophet-pupils he finds repose, collectedness, strengthening for his inner life. We here get a view of the associated life and the holy usages of the prophet-school at Ramah, in which the prophetic inspiration is so mighty that Saul's messengers and he himself are seized by it. Samuel appears at the head of this community of prophets, whence came the watchmen of the Theocracy; "this is a clear sign that his labors in the latter part of his life were directed especially to this department of effort," as NAEGLERACH rightly remarks (ubi sup., p. 898). Again, we see the prophetic influence on the history of David in the person of the prophet Gad (xxii. 5), from which we may infer the close union in which David constantly stood during his persecution with the prophetic circle and with Samuel, whether it be that Gad, ever since his abode in Ramah, was more intimately connected with him, and shared his wandering life, or that he was sent to him by Samuel as deputy to tell him of the danger attending his stay in Ramah (which was well known there), and counsel him to pass over into the territory of the Tribe of Judah. The brief notice (xxv. 1) of Samuel's death has by no means the mere significance of an external passing mention, but is a weighty testimony to the great authority which Samuel had wielded in the whole nation till his death, and to the permanent mighty influence which he had exerted as Reformer of the Theocracy, and so even after he had laid down his official judicial position, as Chief Leader of God's people and as Prophet.

The Second Book shows us in the history of David, besides the universally controlling theocratic point of view—as, for example, in the account of his entrance on the rule over Judah (ii. 1 sq.), his growth in power and recognition (iii. 1 sq.), and his covenant with all the Tribes of Israel (v. 1 sq.)—in important crises the mighty and decisive influence of the Prophetic Order, over against which here, as in the First Book, the Priesthood retires into the background. From ch. vii., which has a specifically marked prophetic coloring, a clear light is thrown back on the history in chs. i.–vi. by the words in ver. 1; because David under divine guidance had obtained the whole royal authority and sat in a strong royal seat, and by God's might had cast down his enemies round about, he receives through the prophet Nathan this divine promise of the imperishableness of the rule of his House and of the building of the Lord's house. From this prophetic passage clear light falls also on all that follows: the wars with external enemies end, in accordance with this promise and prophecy, with splendid victories, and must conduce to the highest development of the royal power and the establishment of the royal Theocracy (chs. viii.–x.). The internal shocks given to the royal authority by David's sin and the crimes of individual members of his House cannot defeat the fulfilment of the promise given to this house; the prophetic watch-office fulfils through Nathan its duty towards the deep-sunken king as preacher of repentance, but announces also to the penitent king the pardon of his sin, without keeping back the judgments, announced by God, which would fall on his house; they are completed according to the prophetic announcement, till the Lord restores the kingdom in its power, while the scion of the House, with whom David's House proper was to begin, to whom the royal authority is promised forever, stands under the protection and guidance of the same prophet (xi.–xx.). The prophetic content of the closing section (xxi.–xxiv.) has already been set forth; David himself here appears as prophet in the latter part of his reign, and the prophetic office again fulfils through the prophet Gad a divine mission for king and people. And if we look at the significance of the description of the prophet Gad as "David's Seer," and at the intimate and lasting personal relations in which we have found David to stand with Samuel and Nathan, it is not to be doubted that God's immediate guidance of his life through word and deed connected itself with these three conspicuous prophetic personages, whom we here encounter in his history.

The significance of the prophetic element, inseparably connected with the theocratic, is therefore great enough in the content of our Books to establish two things: 1) that the composition of these Books is throughout controlled by the theocratic prophetic point of view, and that the content has a corresponding coloring, and 2) that this content, a great part of it at least, was taken from a tradition whose centre and starting-point was in the mighty and influential Prophetic Order.

Our investigation has thus led us to the question concerning the origin and genesis of the Books of Samuel, for the answer to which, so far as it is possible, we have gained the necessary foundation in the examination of the content and character of the Books. We must here come to a decision respecting the sources, the author, and the time of composition, in order to explain approximately the historical origin of the work.

[The Messianic character of "Samuel" is one of its most marked features. The central figure of the book, David, is also the central figure of Messianic prophecy, the man who, most of all Old Testament-personages, in his life, experiences, and character, sums up the life of the servants of God, and thus represents the great Head of them all. It is in this Book that the three elements of the Jewish state, the prophetic, priestly, and kingly offices are first fully established, and not only fix the development of the typical Israel, but set forth the functions of the Anointed Leader of the true Israel. This feature of the Book is connected immediately with its theocratic-prophetic character, and gives to the latter its full significance. It is because the kingdom of Israel is preparatory to another, and David the forerunner of his greater Son that this history is of transcendent importance. And, as the general principles of God's dealings with His servants are the same from age to age, we may see in this history of the fortunes of Israel and its leaders an anticipation of the history of the later Dispensation, distinctly marked in proportion to the theocratic prominence of the persons and events. The proclamation of David as king has its counterpart in the announcement of the setting up of the Divine Son (Acts xiii. 33); David's conviction of the preserving love of God towards His servants is fulfilled in the resurrection of Christ (Acts xiii. 34-37); and David's purpose to build a house for the Lord is the occasion of the promise of an everlasting seed (2 Sam. vii. 13), and this covenant points him to the Righteous Ruler (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7) as the consummation of his hopes. Thus the whole Book is an anticipation on a lower platform, and with imperfect material, of the true spiritual kingdom of Christ. Bible Commentary, Introd. to "Samuel": "the very title, 'the Christ,' given to the Lord Jesus (in Matt. i. 16 and elsewhere) is first found in 1 Sam. ii. 10; and the other designation of the Saviour as the 'Son of David' is also derived from 2 Sam. vii. 12-16." WORDSWORTH, Introd. to "Samuel": "The book of Samuel occupies an unique place, and has a special value and interest, as revealing the kingdom of Christ. It is the first book in Holy Scripture which declares the Incarnation of Christ as King—in a particular family—the family of David. It is the first book in Scripture which announced that the Kingdom founded in Him, raised up from the seed of David, would be universal and everlasting. Here also the prophetic song of Hannah gives the clue to the interpretation of this history." "An uninspired Annalist could hardly have treated the history of Samuel, Saul and David, in such a manner as to display preparatory and prophetic foreshadowings of the office and Work of Christ as Prophet, Priest and King, and of the history of Judaism in relation to Him."—But while this history of God's kingdom in its early earthly investiture is thus truly a foreshadowing, a historical typical prophecy of the antitypical spiritual kingdom of Christ, we must guard against an arbitrary typical interpretation of individual facts (in which WORDSWORTH in his Commentary often offends). A historical fact that sustains a clearly defined and important relation to the theocratic kingdom, expressing in itself a fundamental spiritual truth, may be the type of some other historical fact in the New Dispensation that expresses the same spiritual truth. Otherwise the distinction between type and illustration must be carefully maintained. On this general subject FAIRBAIRN'S "Typology," and his "Prophecy," and R. P. SMITH'S "Prophecy a Preparation for Christ" may be advantageously consulted.—TR.]

§ 5. THE SOURCES.

As to the sources of our Books, in the first place, it is generally admitted that their content has been taken from various sources; but in the determination of these sources opinions differ widely. We shall first develop our view on the basis of the results reached in the preceding section, adopting, however, at the outset, the excellent canon for this investigation which BLEEK has laid down. He says (Einkl. p. 366): "We may assume with tolerable certainty that the author of these books, besides the poetical passages which he has introduced, in some parts found and used written memorials of the times and events of which he treats; but it is impossible to determine throughout with any certainty or with particular probability (as several modern scholars had attempted to do, see DE WETTE, § 179) how many earlier writings the author uses, or precisely what he has taken from one or the other."

The position and importance of the prophetical element of the Books makes it beforehand very probable that the author took a corresponding portion of his matter from written traditions of prophetical origin. The development and influence of the Prophetic Order through and under Samuel, especially in the community of the "sons of the prophets," which was under his direction, coincides with the beginning of the extensive literary activity, the object of which was the history of Israel in the light of the Theocracy. In the hands of Prophecy lay the theocratic writing of history, in which this history was described, in its outward progress and according to its internal connection of cause and effect, not as a mere result of human factors, but rather according to the all-controlling divine factor, and in the light of God's guidance by His holy will and His retributive righteousness, that is, according to theocratic pragmatism, in order that in this mirror the revelations of the living and holy God and their experiences and fortunes, which had their root in the divine righteousness, might be set before the people for warning, for threatening, and for consolation. This was clearly the case in the most flourishing period of the Prophetic Order, which coincides with the time of the kings, for almost all the books which "Chronicles" cites for the history of Israel from David to Hezekiah are called prophetic histories. Though it may be doubtful in particular instances, considered apart from the rest, whether the name of the prophet indicates the author or the chief personage of the history, for example "the words" of Nathan the prophet, yet in general the first is by far the more probable, as appears especially from the titles Nebuath Ahijah [Prophecy of A.], Chazoth Jedai [vision of J.], Chazon Isaiah, and from 2 Chron. xxvi. 22, where Isaiah is expressly said to be the author of a history of Uzziah (BLEEK, p. 158 sq.). According to the testimony of the Chronicler the three authorities on which the author of the Books of Kings bases his history, "the Book of the Acts of Solomon, the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, and the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah" (1 Kings xi. 41; xiv. 19, 29), were collections from prophetic historical books, whose authors lived at the same time with or after the events which they related. The author of the Books of Kings, in the history of Solomon (in which several sections are identical with the account in "Chronicles," so that the two are taken from the same source) refers to "the Book of the Acts of Solomon," while "Chronicles" instead of this refers to the "words" (דְּבָרֵי) of the prophet Nathan, the "prophecy" (נְבִיאָה) of the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, and the "vision" (חֲזוֹן) of the seer Iddo (2 Chr. ix. 29). Where the first for the history of the Kings, from Rehoboam on, cites the Book of the Kings of Judah, the other cites "the words" (דְּבָרֵי) of the prophet Shemaiah and of the seer Iddo" (Rehoboam, 2 Chr. xii. 15), the "מִדְּרָשׁ" (midrash or commentary) of the prophet Iddo" (Abijah, xiii. 22), "the writing" (כְּתָב) of the prophet Isaiah" (Uzziah, xxvi. 22), "the words" (דְּבָרֵי) of the seers" (Manasseh, xxiii. 18, 19), "the words" (דְּבָרֵי) of Jehu, the son of Hanani," "which are recorded in the Book of the Kings of Israel" (Jehoshaphat, xx. 34), the vision (חֲזוֹן) of Isaiah (Hezekiah, xxxii. 82).

Now in the Books of Samuel we do not find any such references to earlier historical writings as basis of the history, as in the Books of Kings and Chronicles; but it does not thence follow that the Redactor did not use such authorities, inasmuch as there was no need to cite them. If the prophetic historiography occupies so important a place in the history of Solomon and the succeeding kings, we may thence, looking back, surmise that there were similar sources for the history of David, who, as has been shown, was so intimately connected with the communities of prophets. In respect to the non-mention of such sources it is to be remarked that the farther the authors of the Books of Kings and Chronicles stood from the times of which they wrote, the more requisite they would feel it to make express mention of their authorities, which, like the events, were on account of the distance not well known to their readers, while it would not seem necessary to an author who lived comparatively near to the events which he described, (as was the case with the author of our Books, on which see below), to name to his readers authorities known to them, and thus to commend the credibility of his history (see HAEVERN., p. 148; THEN., p. XIV.). But on the other hand, as our author was not near enough to the time embraced in his history to describe the events of this period as one who had taken part in them, he was not in position to give so distinct and detailed an account as we have, unless he had access to very full written authorities besides the oral tradition to which, in oriental histories, so much value is to be attached.

We have already seen that large parts of the history of David, and precisely those which go most into particulars about persons and facts, point to the school of the Prophets in Ramah; 1 Sam. xix., xx., xxii., xxv., xxviii. In 1 Sam. xix. 18, in the statement that David "at Ramah told all that Saul had done to him," we have good ground for the assumption that in this community of prophets was noted down immediately, from David's statements and the accounts of his companions, what could not be written from their own observation and experience. Compare THEOTIS' remarks on chap. xx., p. 90, and chap. xv., p. 114,—especially on chap. xix., p. 89: "David's stay in the Seminary of the prophets guarantees the historical character especially of what our Book so particularly recounts, in this chapter and some of the following, of David's relation to Jonathan and Saul, it being very probable that there David's own accounts were noted down, and that the reports here given are based, in part at least, on those notes." It is evident also from 1 Sam. x. 5 sq., that there was a school of the prophets at Gibeah, Saul's dwelling-place, not far from Samuel's abode, and we may therefore suppose that here too, as in Ramah and other prophetic communities, theocratic historiography was cultivated, and that here we may look for a principal authority in Saul's history. We shall not err if we suppose that, apart from the sections in which accounts are given of prophetic agency in the time of Saul and David (Samuel's, Nathan's, Gad's), all the narrations also in which mention is made of the direct influence of the word of the Lord on the history (for example, in Saul's history, 1 Sam. xiv. 18 sq., and in David's history, 1 Sam. xxiii. 1 sq.; xxx. 7 sq.; 2 Sam. ii. 1 sq.; v. 1 sq.; v. 18-25) are to be referred to prophetic-historical records as the primary source.

If, now, we ask for express mention of such historical writings of prophetic origin and character as, according to the preceding discussion, we are warranted in assuming or presupposing as the basis of our Books, we shall not find it in 1 Sam. x. 25, where it is said of Samuel "that he told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord." The content of this book is not stated; for it cannot have been the "manner (law) of the king," viii. 11-17; but it no doubt contained the conditions fixed by Samuel, by which a barrier was set up against undue extension of the royal power, and the duties and rights of the king were fixed after the norm of God's will. From the existence of this writing of Samuel, which did not come into general circulation, but, with the fundamental law of the Theocracy, the Torah [Law], was deposited in the Sanctuary of God, we may infer that he himself, like the prophetic communities, of which he was the founder and leader, occupied himself with literary pursuits, and particularly it seems certain that he wrote down his prophetic declarations and discourses, as we have them in the first book, and the same thing may be assumed of Nathan in reference to 2 Sam. vii., xii., and of Gad in reference to 1 Sam. xxii. 5, and 2 Sam. xxiv. 11-14. Recollecting, then, the flourishing condition of prophetic historical writing, according to the citations of the Chronicles, even in the beginning of the regal period, it is to these three prophets that we must look to find the foundation of this history.

The prophetic authorities, not mentioned in our Books, from which the history is taken, are found in fact in 1 Chr. xxix. 29, 30: "And the history (הִיסְטוֹרְיָה) of king David, the first and the last, behold, it is written in the history (הִיסְטוֹרְיָה) of Samuel the seer, and in the history of Nathan the prophet, and in the history of Gad the Seer, with all his reign and his might, and the times that went over him and over Israel, and over all the kingdoms of the countries." With these words the Chronicler closes his narrative of the history of David (chs. x.—xxix.), which agrees with the history in "Samuel" not only in general but also in particulars often literally. He refers for the history of David to three productions: the הִיסְטוֹרְיָה שְׁמוּאֵל הַנָּבִיא [Words of Samuel the seer], the הִיסְטוֹרְיָה נָתָן הַנָּבִיא [Words of Nathan the Prophet] and the הִיסְטוֹרְיָה גָּד הַנָּבִיא [Words of Gad the Seer], and characterizes them at the same time as works valuable for their fulness, and furnishing material complete as to the time embraced, and elaborate and exact in content. Evidently the Chronicler purposes giving the sources from whence he takes his history, and establishing its credibility and trustworthiness. It is plain, from this purpose of his, which relates to the facts recounted by him, and from the content of the list of authorities, that the הִיסְטוֹרְיָה [words] means not merely declarations, discourses of the prophets (HÆVERN., KEIL.), but also history or narrations; it remains undecided at the outset whether the names of the prophets indicate the authors or the chief personages. In any case these titles point to independent writings, and by no means to mere extracts from a great work entitled

"the chronicles of the kings of Judah and Israel," as BERTHEAU supposes (Bücher der Chronik, 1854, Einl. § 3). Nor is the view tenable that our Books of Samuel themselves in their corresponding divisions are meant by that citation under three names (CABPZOV, Introd. II.; J. D. MICHAELIS on 1 Chr. xxix. 29; EICHORN II., p. 487 sq.; MOVERS on Chr., p. 178, and DE WETTE, Einl. [Introd.] § 192 b); for that the three names in the citation are to be understood as the titles of three different independent productions follows, not only from the form of the citation, but also from the fact that "the Dibre of Nathan the prophet" is again specially adduced for the history of Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 29); and we cannot suppose this to be a different work (as DE WETTE does, ubi sup.), and therefore it is not an extract from our Books of Samuel, which extend only to the latter part of David's government (comp. BLEEK, Einl. p. 151; HAEVERNICK, p. 122 sq.; THEN. XVI.; KEIL, Apolog. Vers. über die Chron., 249 sq.).

If now we further compare the content of the Books of Chronicles in reference to David's life with our Books, we find first, that the Chronicler, who adduces those three works as a complete authority for David's life, narrates much that is not found in our Books, especially many things referring to worship, priests, and Levites; he alone gives the list of heroes who came to David to Ziklag, and of warriors who made him king in Hebron (1 Chr. xii.), the detail of David's preparations for the building of the Temple (xxii.), the numbering and organization of the Levites and priests (xxiii.—xxvi.), the organization of the army and the civil service (xxvii.), the report of his last arrangements in the assembly of the people shortly before his death. Secondly, our Books contain much that is lacking in the Books of the Chronicles, for example, the history of Michal and David (2 Sam. vi. 20-23), the account of David's kindness towards Mephibosheth (2 Sam. ix.), of his adultery with Bathsheba (xi.), of Nathan's exhortation to repentance and its results (xii.), the section narrating the incest, the distraction of David's house and Absalom's revolt (xiv.—xix.), the insurrection of Sheba (xx.), the atonement in the case of the Gibeonites (xxi.), the war with the Philistines (xxi. 15-17), the Thanksgiving-Psalm and the last words of David (xxii., xxiii. 1-7).—On the other hand, thirdly, the following is a summary statement of the parallel sections:

1 Chron. x. 1-12.	:	1 Sam. xxxi.
" xi. 1-9.	:	2 Sam. v. 1-3, 6-10.
" xi. 10-47.	:	" xxiii. 8-39.
" xiii. 1-14.	:	" vi. 1-11.
" xiv. 1-7, 8-17.	:	" v. 11-16, 17-25.
" xv., xvi.	:	" vi. 12-23.
" xvii.	:	" vii.
" xviii.	:	" viii.
" xix.	:	" x.
" xx. 1-3.	:	" xi. 1; xii. 26-31.
" xx. 4-8.	:	" xxi. 18-22.
" xxi.	:	" xxiv.

In these parallel sections, as KEIL exhaustively remarks, "not only are the short summary accounts of the Books of Samuel largely filled out and extended, but the narration of Chronicles differs from the older narration of those Books in many ways, partly by a different orthography and various linguistic changes mostly according to the style and usage of later times, sometimes merely to make an expression clearer, partly by the omission of accessory circumstances, and by other abridgements, partly by the addition of explanatory remarks, and parenetic and pragmatic reflections and concluding observations" (Introd. II. 55).—Such being the relation between the Books of Chronicles and Samuel, it is an untenable view that the latter are identical with the authorities cited by the former on the government of David, and that, as GRAF maintains (Die geschichtlichen Bücher des Alten Testaments, Leipz. 1866) "sections of our Books of Samuel are meant by the words of Samuel the Seer, and of Nathan the Prophet, and of Gad the Seer."

For the same reason we cannot accept what BLEEK (Einl., p. 151 [Eng. Tr., p. 406]) thinks very probable, "that the Chronicler intended our Books of Samuel by the first-named work, the Dibre Samuel."

The peculiar relation of the generally literal agreement of Chronicles and our Books in the parallel sections, and the differences which exist in the history of David, both within and without these sections, is incompatible with the view that the Books of Samuel were used as an authority by the Chronicler in these sections; rather it follows from this co-existing agreement and diversity in the history of David that the authors of both works draw from a common source, namely, from that which the Chronicler expressly names as his authority, in order to establish the trustworthiness of his narrative from the acknowledged high antiquity and authenticity of its basis. If in fact, as is generally acknowledged, the Chronicler used our Books no more than the Book of Kings for the history of David, but, to judge from the relation of the two Books, used a common source with our author, and expressly names those writings as his authority, then there can be no doubt that the latter were used by our author as his authority; and this in no wise detracts from the credibility of his history, for there could be no more trustworthy accounts of the life of David than those contained in these writings, which bear the name of the three prophets so intimately connected with him, and are based finally on their own experiences, and on what might be learned from him with exactness of his life in those prophetic communities with which he stood in such intimate union. Certainly the "foundation of the work" was taken from this source (DELITZSCH, Zeitschr. f. luth. Theol. u. Kri., 1870, 1, p. 29 sq.). From these prophetic writings comes the theocratic-prophetic element of our Books; and we shall have to refer to them also the predominatingly biographical and political matter, which, as we have seen, is treated from the theocratic-prophetic point of view; for the events of David's life, from his own communications and from their connection with him, must have been best known to the prophetic circles, and especially to Samuel (1 Sam. xix. 18), Gad (1 Sam. xxii. 5), and Nathan (2 Sam. vii.). Whether, now, we suppose that those three prophetic works were composed by the prophets whose names they bear—in favor of which is Samuel's known addiction to literary pursuits, 1 Sam. x. 25, (NAEGELSBACH suggests (ubi sup., p. 398) that he perhaps wrote down these records during his quiet prophetic life at Ramah), and the fact that the history of Solomon, 2 Chr. ix. 29, is referred to the account of Nathan himself—or whether we regard them as works of which the sayings and doings of those prophets formed the chief part, in either case they must be regarded as the triple source of prophetic historiography for our Books, in either case, considering the great importance of those three prophets in the development of this history, and the permanent personal relation in which they, especially Samuel and Nathan, stood to David, these sources were so abundant, that, with the exception of a few portions, the content of our Books may be referred to them. How they individually correspond to sections, or how far they extend in the different divisions of our work, cannot (according to the above-cited canon of BLEEK) be determined with certainty. Yet the following may be stated as probable. We may take the "Dibre" of Samuel as chief authority not merely for the narrative of David's life, but also for Saul's life and the life and work of Samuel; for, says KEIL rightly (Introd. I., 249), if they "contained such full accounts of David's public life that the Chronicler could cite them as authority for it, it is self-evident that the same work was the chief source for the life and labors of Samuel and Saul also." If Samuel himself was the author of them, we can refer to them only the First Book to about ch. xxv. If they are a prophetic history, with him as principal subject, and extended beyond his death to the results of his labors in the accession and early government of David, then they form the basis of part of the Second Book also. In any case to this source belongs all that relates to Samuel's labors, and what in the life of David as well as Saul is pragmatically connected therewith. To the Dibre of Nathan belongs of course all that is related of Nathan and his work in the history of David in the Second Book as far as ch. xii., and, very probably, in part at least what stands in theocratic connection with it (xiii.—xx. comp. with xii. 11). Probably xxiv. 11-25 belonged to the Dibre of Gad, of which we also find a trace perhaps in 1 Sam. xxii. 5. If each of these three prophets is the author of the work called after him, his own experiences formed the chief part of his book. THEODORET: ὁῦλον τοῖνυν, ὅς τῶν προφητῶν ἕκαστος συνέγραψε τὰ ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις πεπραγμένα καιροῖς ["it is evident that every prophet recorded the events of his own times"].

Proceeding now further in the investigation of the historical sources of our Books, we find not improbably a trace of a written basis for them besides those already named, in the דִּבְרֵי יְהוֹיָדָה לְמֶלֶךְ דָּוִד, "the chronicles [history of the times] of King David." We know nothing more of this than what is said in 1 Chr. xxvii. 24 in connection with the account of the numbering of the people by David. "Joab," we read, "had begun to number, but did not finish; and there fell wrath for it upon Israel, and the number was not put into the 'account' (DE WETTE) or 'census' of the chronicles (annals) of King David." According to this, it was a historical work relating to the government of David, and, as it seems, chiefly of statistical-historical content and character, since, in the midst of statistical-historical lists relating to the divisions of the army, the tribe-princes and civil officials, it is cited as a work into whose מִסְפָּר [number or census] the מִקְצָר [number] of the arms-bearing men of the tribes of Israel was not put, whence we may infer that the preceding enumeration is taken from it. While the history of this census (comp. 1 Chr. xxi.), narrated from a theocratic-prophetic stand-point, was doubtless contained in the corresponding prophetic work (Gad's according to 2 Sam. xxiv. 11), the number of arms-bearing men is here declared to be something that would have been inserted in the enumeration or register of the chronicles of David, if the census had not been interrupted by the wrath of God. Thus is intimated the point of view which prevented the recording of the number, as far as it was already determined; it is the theocratic-prophetic. This might suggest the supposition that such chiefly annalistic-statistical historical works, giving information concerning the army and the civil government, heroes and officials, household and family, were prepared by prophetic writers or under the guidance of prophets; and we might therefore here also in the "chronicles of David" recognize a prophetic work. But even supposing that the prophetic historiography never occupied itself either indirectly or directly with such annalistic-statistical records, it could nevertheless use them as trustworthy sources. It is highly probable that the officer termed סֹפֵר Sopher (Chancellor or Secretary of State) had the care of these annalistic-statistical records whence came the דִּבְרֵי יְהוֹיָדָה [chronicles] of David. The widespread opinion that the officer at David's court who was called מַזְכִּיר, Mazkir or Recorder (2 Sam. viii. 16, and xx. 24; 1 Chr. xviii. 15) was the official state-annalist, and had to perform the duty of a historiographer has been conclusively shown to be untenable by BLEEK (Einl. p. 158, 370) and BAEHR (Komm. z. d. Büchern d. Könige, Einl. X. sq.). The elaborate pragmatic writing of history was in the hands of the prophets. The Mazkir (according to THENIUS on 1 Kings iv. 8) was so called "because as μνηστὴρ he had to bring to the king's recollection affairs of state which were to be attended to, and offer counsel," and "if it was his duty, as BLEEK says (ubi sup. p. 370), always to write down immediately whatever of special importance happened, this was merely to remind the king his master, and not to write history."—"The supposition by most critics of state-annals, besides the prophetic records, as a second authority is based on an arbitrary confounding of the records of the Chancellor for the state-archives with public state-annals." (KEIL, Introd. § 54, Rem. 3; comp. § 59). The work mentioned in 1 Chr. xxviii. 24, the דִּבְרֵי יְהוֹיָדָה [chronicles of David] was, however, very probably a collection of such official annalistic-statistic-historical records of the Sopherim. It is a natural supposition that the lists of officials in 2 Sam. viii. 15-18 and xx. 23-26 belongs to this work, although on the other hand we may presume that their names were known to the prophetic historiographers also. Yet it is true that the latter could have had little to do with the statistics of the specifically military affairs and the deeds of war, which they described only so far as seemed to them necessary from the theocratic point of view. So it is probable that the statistical-historical account of the wars of David in 2 Sam. viii. belonged to this work, while the therein-mentioned Ammonite-Syrian war is afterwards narrated at length, in connection with the sin of David and the intervention of Nathan, according to the prophetic work. So also the summary statement of the Philistine wars in 2 Sam. xxi. 15-22 and the register of heroes in xxiii. 8-39.

Perhaps the author of our Books had access to other historical records, to which might be referred such sections as 1 Sam. xvii. 12-31, 55 sq., which do not seem to agree with the context. Yet this can no more be determined with certainty than the question whether and how far oral tradition was used by the author, from which the incongruences in the passages in question might be explained. It is however possible, as NAEGELSBACH supposes (ubi sup. p. 140), that the prophetic books discussed above contained many different accounts (from which that incongruity in 1 Sam. xvii. 12, 55 sq., may be explained), or no longer existed in proper arrangement and clearness.

Besides the historical authorities the Redactor of our Books was acquainted with poetical productions which he has inserted in his history: as, the Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 1-10; David's lament over Abner, 2 Sam. iii. 33, 34; David's song of praise, 2 Sam. xxii.; and his last words, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7. We leave it undecided whether these songs were known to him separately, or belonged in part to a collection of songs—as BLEEK says of the last words of David, supposing that they with their superscription (xxiii. 1) belonged to a maschal-collection (ubi sup. p. 362, 363)—or were all found in one poetical collection. The only authority to which he expressly refers is the Sepher Hajjashar, Book of Jashar (2 Sam. i. 18; comp. Josh. x. 18). From this he took the beautiful lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan, which is inserted in the narrative under the title "Bow" קֶשֶׁת, vers. 19-27. This "Book of the Just" (i. e., "of that which is just") (in this collective sense it is now usually explained, Vulgate: liber justorum) must have contained a collection of songs on especially memorable events of Israelitish history, and must have been in existence at the time of the composition of the present Book of Joshua and of the Books of Samuel. We cannot determine whether it contained also a continuous history of the events to which the songs refer, and was therefore an authority for the author of our Books (see BLEEK, p. 150). According to KNOBEL (Komm. zum Pent., Schlussabhandlung, Exeget. Handbuch 13, p. 546 sq., and on Josh. x. 15) it was a "law-book," a view which falls to the ground with the untenable view that the title means law-book.

The sources, therefore, from which the author drew, were partly prophetic histories, which described the lives of Samuel, Saul and David, from the theocratic-prophetic standpoint in pragmatic connection (comp. 1 Chr. xxix. 28-30), partly official statistical-historical records of the history of David's government (comp. 1 Chr. xxvii. 24), partly poetical literature. To this threefold element of the sources of the Books the content of the concluding section, 2 Sam. xxi. —xxiv., clearly points. The production of these authorities is to be put partly in the time, partly soon after the time of the events to which they refer. On the ground of these contemporaneous original accounts our Books bear throughout the stamp of historical credibility; so THENIUS (Eintl. XV.), who, it is true, grants this of a part of the work only, otherwise admirably remarks: "1) the places and very often the time also of the events are given in part with great exactness; 2) the narrative answers fully to the character of the times; and 3) the personages act in a life-like way."

In this section on the original authorities we must mention the principal of the very various and often contradictory hypotheses concerning the basis and construction of our Books, all of which are founded on their supposed contradictions, incongruences and repetitions, and therefore fall with this untenable presupposition.

The first hypothesis worthy of mention is that of EICHHORN (Eintl. III., §§ 469, 471, 475). According to it the foundation of the Second Book of Samuel is an "old short life of David with later insertions," which, however, are also to be referred to written sources, while the First Book was taken from an "old chronicle of Samuel and Saul," but contained also elements of oral tradition, especially in Samuel's history. The Books received their present form from insertions and additions which were made from oral tradition and writings.—This hypothesis is so far modified by BERTHOLDT (Eintl., p. 894 sq., 920 sq.) that he assumes four principal authorities: 1) for 1 Sam. xxxi. and 2 Sam. v., with EICHHORN the summary history of David's government with later insertions and additions; 2) for 1 Sam. i.—vii. a history of Samuel, for viii.—xvi. a history of Saul, for xvii.—xxx. a history of David before his accession to the throne.—Further by an anonymous writer (in PAULUS Memor. VIII. 61 sq. Probe eines Krit. Vers. über das zweite Buch Sam.) many smaller component parts were assumed for the Second Book on the ground of supposed stylistic differences (thus 1 Sam. xxxi. ;

2 Sam. i. 1-16, 17-28; iv., v. 1-10; xi.—xvi.).—STAEHELIN (Krit. Unters. üb. d. Pent., p. 112 sq., 129 sq.) assumes as basis of the First Book an old work which he ascribes to the Jehovist, to which important additions were made by the Redactor, from whom also the whole of the Second Book comes.—GRAMBERG (Gesch. d. Religionstheorie d. Alt. Test. II., p. 71 sq.) finds two narrations, going over nearly the same ground, but contradictory, which went side by side through a great part of the First Book and into the Second, and were worked up together by the collector.—GRAF (De librorum Sam. et Reg. compositione, scriptoribus, etc., Argent. 1842) assumes as old constituent parts 1 Sam. xiii. 16—xiv. 52; xvii.; xviii.; xix. 1-17; xx.—xxii.; xxiii.—xxvi.; xxvii.; xxviii. 1 f.; xxix.; xxx. All the rest he holds to be marvelous-loving hierarchical addition—that Samuel is presented as an ideal of theocratic prophetic rule—that the judgeship of Samuel and Eli is an invention, and Saul's election a product of his name "he who is demanded"—and that in the same way older portions and later additions in the Second Book were distinguished. On all these hypotheses see DE WETTE, § 179, who points out what is more or less unfounded in them, and says of the last: "This criticism is based almost entirely on what seemed to the author historically credible or not."—On GRAMBERG's hypothesis see HAEVERNICK (p. 141) and THENIUS (p. XI.). The latter properly characterizes it in the remark that "sections of wholly different character are arbitrarily thrown together, and precisely those sections in which the presence of tradition cannot be mistaken, are declared to be the older."

What THENIUS says of the above-cited attempts to fix the component parts of the Books of Samuel—that they are all open to unanswerable objections—applies to his own hypothesis also. He distinguishes on internal grounds five principal parts: 1) a history of Samuel, 1 Sam. i.—vii., based on information gotten from the schools of the Prophets and on trustworthy tradition; 2) a history of Saul according to tradition, probably introduced from a popular work, viii.; x. 17-27; xi.; xii.; xv.; xvi.; xviii. 6-14; xxvi.; xxviii. 3-25; xxxi.; 3) an older condensed history of Saul from old written accounts, and not altered in its historical foundation by tradition, ix.; x. 1-26; xiii.; xiv.; 4) a history of David, into which the condensed history of Saul has been enlarged by a not much later continuer, xiv. 52; xvii.; part of xviii.; xix.; xx.; part of xxi.; xxii.; part of xxiii.; xxiv.; xxv.; xxvii.; xxviii. 1, 2; xxix.; xxx.; 2 Sam., part of chaps. i.—v.; vii.; viii.; 5) a special history of David, almost a biography, describing the second half of his life, and especially his domestic life, 2 Sam. xi. 2-27; xii. 1-25; xiii.—xx. The objections to this attempt to fix the original component parts of our Books are directed against the presupposition of contradictions, incongruences, repetitions, conclusions, and chronicle-like passages, from which the assumption of so many original sources is supposed necessarily to flow (see above).

The kernel of EWALD's hypothesis is the assumption of a great comprehensive Book of Kings, of which our Books formed a component part (Gesch. I., 8 ed., p. 193-244). There was first, according to this view, an old historical work, composed soon after Solomon, perhaps in the happy times of Asa, full of very simple narrations of detached events with interspersed remarks, a work distinguished by a beautiful copiousness, lively and abounding in pictures, especially in the narration of wars; of this we have remains in 1 Sam. xiii., xiv., xxx. 26-31; 2 Sam. viii., and also in Judg. xvii. sq., xix.—xxx. Besides this there existed in the troublous times after Jehu's elevation a work composed by a prophetic writer who was at the same time a Levite, attractive from its high prophetic view of events, and which, commencing with Samuel's birth and labors, as an entirely new beginning in Israelitish history, described, from a prophetic stand-point, principally the establishment of the kingdom with the origin of which Samuel's labors were necessarily connected; of this work large connected remains, in many places in the original fullness and in almost unchanged form, are to be found in the section 1 Sam. i.—1 Kings i., ii. (both which last chapters betray the same hand as the principal parts of First and Second Samuel), and may be followed in scattered traces even to 2 Kings ix. 1—x. 27. According to EWALD, the arrangement of the historical material in this prophetic book may still be clearly seen in First Samuel according to three chief points of view: 1) the basis of the history of the establishment of the kingdom, 1 Sam. i.—vii., Samuel's life, concluded with the summary vii. 15-17. 2) The history of Saul's rule, 1 Sam. viii.—xiv., with the concluding summary xiv. 47-52. 8) The narration concerning David and Saul, the decline of the latter, the rise of the former, in 1 Sam. xv.—xxxi. In Second Samuel, on the contrary, the original account of David's reign, on account of the revision which it afterwards underwent, cannot be so clearly recognized. Yet its principal features may be seen in the three sections in which David's life is described: 1) The remains of the history of David from Saul's death to his elevation to the throne of all Israel are to be found in 2 Sam. i.—vii. 2) The history of the middle period of David's reign in Jerusalem, whose richer material was most condensed in the work, is found in 2 Sam. viii. 1-14 (the foreign wars and victories, probably an abridgment of the before-mentioned military history), viii. 15-18 (internal organization), ix. (David's ethical attitude towards Saul's house), x.—xx. 22 (David's relation to his own house), xxi. 1-14; xxiv. (the plagues). 3) Out of the latter part of David's life belonged to the work 2 Sam. xx. 25, 26; xxii. xxiii. 1-7, with which the whole section fitly closed. This work, says EWALD, "the best basis for all the widely read histories of the kingdom," was afterwards much revised, and thus on the one hand enlarged, but on the other greatly abridged, as may be seen from passages in which there are allusions and presuppositions in respect to facts and persons that were never before mentioned; so 1 Sam. xiii. 2; xxx. 26-31. In 1 Sam. between chaps. xxiii. and xxx. much of the original work is lost; chaps. xxiv. and xxvi. are by later hands. The sections xxiii. 8-39 and xxi. 15-22 are taken from "Journals of the kings or state-annals." With the fragments of this prophetic work, Ewald holds, and of the first-mentioned more military history are combined in our Books those of another work going over about the same period, and certainly written not much later, which, according to its traces in 1 Sam. v.—viii. and xxxi., did not have the sharply defined character of the other, though similar to it, but was drier and more colorless in style. From its author came probably the narrative of the Period of the Judges from which Judg. iii. 7—xvi. is taken.—A broader, freer form was given to this History of the Kings by a later revision, as appears plainly in our present history of Saul and David in ch. xii.; xv.—xvii.; xxiv.; xxvi.; xxviii.; for these are fragments of from two to three later works. Afterwards the histories of the Kings received their present form in two revisions; first, by the Deuteronomistic redactor soon after the reformation under Josiah, who, adopting the method of the Deuteronomist, sifted, worked up and abridged the material which had been greatly increased by preceding recensions, and for the first time gathered up and skilfully combined what seemed to him the most important parts of the older works, as we see in our present history, 1 Sam. i.—1 Kings ii. The basis of his book was that work of the prophetic narrator, with which, besides the material from other books, he worked in his own additions which were not numerous (1 Sam. vii. 8, 4, a good deal in xii.; 1 Kings ii. 2-4.) The work, thus greatly enlarged by the Deuteronomistic redactor, received its last revision by an author who lived in the second half of the Babylonian Exile, who edited the history of the origin of the kingdom to Solomon's accession (1 Sam. i.—1 Kings ii.), "as good as quite unaltered," according to the preceding redactor, appended some detached pieces from David's biography which he had at first designed to omit, but, for the rest, issued the present Books of Judges, Ruth, Samuel and Kings as a connected whole, inserting the Book of Ruth (written in the midst of the Exile, and the only one retained of a number of similar fragments by the same author), with reference to the absence of genealogical statements about David's descent in the Books of Samuel, just before those Books as a preparation for David's history, while he put the Book of Judges, in its present form, at the head as an introduction to the whole Book of Kings. He did this for the sake of unity in the connection of the whole history after Joshua with the history of the kings; for the internal connection between the Book of Judges and the Books of Samuel is shown in the statement concerning Samson, that he began to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, in which reference is made to the continuation of this history in Eli, Samuel, David. This redactor, properly speaking, merely edited anew the first half of the older large work on the Kings, which goes to 1 Kings ii.; only the second, from 1 Kings iii. on, can rightly be called his own work.

In this assumption of EWALD's of several redactors, too much play is given to con-
Digitized by Google

ture without firm supports in historical data. We have, however, in those three prophetic authorities (1 Chron. xxix. 28-30) and in the chronicles of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 24) ground sufficient to conjecture that our assumed author of the present Books of Samuel followed those authorities, writing from a prophetic stand-point, and according to prophetic points of view. That a special historical work must be assumed, from which to derive 1 Sam. xiii., xiv., in the history of Saul, and 1 Sam. xxx. 26 sq. and 2 Sam. viii. in the military history of David, seems less probable than that the first is to be referred to the written records in the schools of the Prophets, which took careful note of the deeds of Saul and Jonathan, and the two last to the "words" (דְּבָרִים) of the days of David," 1 Chron. xxvii. 24.—The hypothesis of a final shaping of the Book of Kings partly by a Deuteronomistic redactor, partly by a final remodeller and collector in the second half of the Babylonian Exile, has, in relation to the history under discussion (1 Sam. i.—1 Kings ii.), little foundation; and it is simpler and more natural to refer the views in the discourses of Samuel which are termed Deuteronomistic (e.g. "return to God with all your hearts and serve him," 1 Sam. vii. 8 and xii. 20, 24) to this prophetic work, the "Words of Samuel," and the collection and addition of the section, 2 Sam. xxi.—xxiv., to the redactor who arranged and prepared the history up to ch. xx. 26. The similarity in language and style between 1 Kings i., ii., and the preceding narrative in 2 Sam. may be explained by the fact that the authors of the two books used the same authority, namely, the prophetic Book of Nathan.—For the rest, EWALD'S hypothesis differs from the others mentioned, in that it represents the Book of Kings, as far as it here comes into consideration (from 1 Sam. i. to 1 Kings ii.), leaving out the parts supposed to have been later introduced by various redactors, as having unity and as the finished work of one prophetic historian, and avoids the dissection of the historical material which we find in the other hypotheses. NAEGLERBACH rightly remarks, that the additions which this hypothesis ascribes to a Deuteronomistic redactor do not make the eighth part of the whole, and that therefore the general unity of the work is confirmed by them (ubi sup., p. 407). It must also be noted that both the division of the content of the First Book (chs. i.—vii. Samuel, viii.—xiv. Saul, xv.—xxxi. David and Saul), and the division of the Second Book, the history of David's government according to the theocratic chief points of view which control the entire narrative, cannot be more admirably presented than has been done by EWALD. But from the fact that the content of the books is evidently divided in accordance with such a theocratic-prophetic view of the history of the preparation, genesis and establishment of the theocratic kingdom under Samuel, Saul and David, we are authorized to conclude that the redactor of this history, apart from the prophetic authorities to which he had access, was himself a prophet.

§ 6. THE AUTHOR AND THE TIME OF COMPOSITION.

Having discussed the original sources of our Books, we have now to consider, and in connection with one another, the two questions concerning the author and the time of composition.

What EWALD says (ubi sup., p. 211) of the author of the foundation of the Book of Kings, that he was himself a prophet, we claim for the redactor of our Books on the grounds already discussed at length; but we cannot apply to him what EWALD maintains of the former, namely, that he was also a Levite, which EWALD holds to be clear from the careful account which he takes, in the midst of so many more important events, of the fortunes of the sacred Ark and of the Priests and Levites, and from the considerable acquaintance which he clearly shows with everything pertaining to them. For a prophetic writer as such would have had that lively interest and exact knowledge; he need not have been a Levite. It is, however, further against this view, that in our Books the priesthood recedes in a striking manner into the background over against the prophetic element, and therefore "no historical work is more instructive and important than this for the understanding of the older prophetic order in Israel," as EWALD (ubi sup.) well says.

Nothing is known to us of the person and surroundings of the redactor of our Books; on the opinions of the older writers, see CARPZOV, p. 213sq. THENIUS supposes, not without reason, that, since he had access to so many good authorities, he could not have been in mean circumstances. "The Talmudical statement, that Samuel wrote the Books called after him is shown to be unhistorical by the simple fact that the history goes beyond Samuel's death" (KEIL, Introd. II. 48).—The view in some Introductions, as EICHHORN'S (Eintl. § 468, p. 529 sq.), JAHN'S (Eintl., p. 232 sq.), HERBST'S (Eintl. II. 1, p. 139 sq.), DE WETTE'S (in the Beiträge I, p. 43 sq., but retracted by him in Eintl. § 186), and others, that our Books had the same author with the Books of Kings, and that therefore their composition is to be put not before the latter part of the Babylonian Exile, or immediately after the Exile, is untenable; for the differences between them in form and content are too great to admit of identity of authorship. In the first place, it is a striking difference that "Kings" quotes its authority in every section, while "Samuel" never does, whence it follows that the author of the latter lived nearer to the events described, the author of the former much farther off. Again, the language is different; numerous traces of the Aramæan dialect occur in "Kings," and almost none at all in "Samuel." In the Books of Kings we see traces from beginning to end of their composition during the Exile, while in the Books of Samuel there is not the slightest reference to the time of the Exile. In the latter there are no direct distinct references to the Law of Moses, while in the former, even before the discovery of the Book of the Law under Josiah, the law is several times spoken of as written (1 Kings ii. 3; 2 Kings xiv. 6; xvii. 37). In our Books mention is made of the various places of worship and sacrifice which existed besides the Ark without blame or hint that this was displeasing to God, while in "Kings" the worship in high places is condemned as illegal. The form of the narrative is quite different also in the two works. In "Kings" the chronological statements are carefully repeated with every king, while the chronological element is almost entirely neglected in "Samuel." The epic breadth and copiousness which the latter shows in many parts is almost wholly lacking in the former, which gives only extracts, usually short, from its authorities to which it refers for wider information. There is no trace here of the standing character-formula which is peculiar to the Books of Kings: "He did that which was right, or evil, in the eyes of the Lord." For all these reasons the author of the Books of Kings cannot be the same with the redactor of the Books of Samuel.—The Rabbinical view, which has had a good many advocates, that Jeremiah is to be regarded as the author of "Samuel" as well as "Kings," because his prophecy has much similarity to them, and here and there corresponds with them in content (a view to which GROTIUS also, on 1 Sam. i. 1, inclines), is similarly untenable; for this proves nothing more than that the author of "Kings" was acquainted with the Book of Jeremiah (see KUEPER, Jerem. libror. sacr. interpr. atque vindex, p. 55), and Jeremiah with the Books of Samuel. STAHELIN (Krit. Unters., p. 137 sq.) infers from our author's friendly attitude towards royalty, from the promises made to the House of David, and from Jeremiah's allusions to these Books, that they were composed under Hezekiah; to which NÄGELSBACH excellently replies, that this is referring to a subjective motive what has a good, objective, historical ground, and Jeremiah might certainly refer to our Books, though they did not originate in his time (p. 411).

If we inquire for positive indications of the time of composition in the content and form of our Books, we can find in the formula "even unto this day" (1 Sam. v. 5; vi. 18; xxx. 25; 2 Sam. iv. 8; vi. 8; xviii. 18), and in the explanation of obsolete expressions (1 Sam. ix. 9) and old customs (2 Sam. xiii. 18) nothing more than the indication of a time of authorship somewhat distant from the events narrated. Nor can anything more definite, least of all the composition after the division of the kingdom, be determined from the mere distinguishing between Judah and Israel in 1 Sam. xi. 8; xvii. 52; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. ii. 9, 10; iii. 10; v. 1-5; xix. 41 sq.; xx. 2; for this distinction was already usual in the time of Saul and David, being based on the fact (pre-supposed in the passages cited) of such a division, which conditioned the development of the history of David's kingdom. At first only the tribe of Judah adhered to David as its king, the other eleven tribes under the common name Israel forming a separate kingdom for seven and a half years under Ishbosheth,* and afterwards for a short time under Absalom.

* [More precisely stated, under the representatives of Saul's House; Ishbosheth was probably not king the whole time.—TA.]

From 2 Sam. v. 5 it appears that the redactor certainly wrote after the death of David, since the whole number of years of his reign is given. But the non-mention of David's death cannot show that he wrote shortly thereafter, as HAEVERNICK (p. 145) maintains; for even if his death had occurred only a short while before, the author could not have maintained silence about it simply because it was generally known, and "not a matter of interest," since he certainly did not write merely for his own contemporaries.—Further, it undoubtedly appears from 1 Sam. xxvii. 6 ("Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah to this day") that our author made his recension after the division of the kingdom into the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. HAEVERNICK's explanation (p. 144) that the "kings of Judah" are not here opposed to those of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, but are the kings who sprang from and ruled Judah, is untenable. The "kings of Judah" can be understood only of the kingdom of Judah which arose after Solomon's time in consequence of the division, in distinction from the kingdom of Israel. It is, however, uncertain at what time after the division the book was composed; probably it was before the destruction of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, since there is no indication that the author knew of the dispersion of an important part of the people (BLEEK, p. 362). "In general," rightly remarks KEIL (Comm. Introd., p. 11), "the content and language of our Books point to the time immediately succeeding the division of the kingdom, since there are no references to the subsequent downfall of the kingdoms, much less to the Exile; and the diction and language is throughout classic and free from Chaldaisms and later forms." That the recension took place not long after the division of the kingdom may be inferred from the fact that worshipping the Lord and offering sacrifices in various places is, as already remarked, regarded not at all as blameworthy, but rather as well-pleasing to God (1 Sam. vii. 5 sq., 17; ix. 13; x. 8; xiv. 35; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18–25). We therefore adopt the hypothesis of THENIUS, who refers (p. xiv.) to 2 Sam. viii. 7; xiv. 27, in which, according to the correct Hebrew text suggested by the Septuagint, there is allusion to Rehoboam, and says of the author, that the notices, in all probability inserted by him, do not reach farther than the time of Rehoboam.—The result of our investigation is, therefore, that the Books of Samuel in their present form were composed by a prophetic writer soon after the division of the kingdom.

[On the sources, date and authorship of "Samuel," see Art. "Books of Samuel" in SMITH'S Bib. Dict. and Introd. to Samuel in the Bible Comm. The latter refers to David's Psalms as one of the sources, points out that twenty or thirty years of the first part of Saul's reign is omitted, and puts the book (as it stands) towards the time of Jeremiah. The difficulty of coming to a satisfactory decision on this point is well brought out by ERDMANN.—TR.]

§ 7. LITERATURE.

THEODORET, Quæst. in libr. I., II., Reg. Op. ed., Vaessel, Hal., 1769, Tom. I.; NIK. LYRA, Postill. in univ., S. S. Lugd., 1545; J. BUGENHAGEN, Annotationes in Deuteron. et Samuel, Basil., 1524, 8; Annot. in libros Sam., Argentor., 1525, 8; J. MENIUS, Enarratio in Sam. libr. priorem, 1532, Viteberg; J. BRENTIUS, Homil. in libr. I., Sam., Francof. ad M., 1554, fol.; J. CALVIN, Homil. in lib. I. Sam., Amstelod., 1667, fol.; H. WELLER, Sam. lib. I. annotationibus explicatus, Francof., 1555, 56, fol.; P. MARTYR, Comment. in II. libr. Sam., Tig., 1567, 1575, fol.; C. PELLICANUS, Comment. in libr. Sam., Tigur., 1582; V. STRIGEL, Comment. in libr. Sam., etc., Lips., 1591, fol.; PAUL LAURENTIUS, Gründl. Auslegung über die zwei Bücher Sam., Leipz., 1616, fol.; DEUSIUS, Annot. in loc. diffio. Jos., Judg., Sam., Arnh., 1618, 4; C. SANCTIUS, In 4 libr. Reg., etc., Comm., Antwerp, 1624, fol.; Critici sacri, T. II., London, 1660; BONFRERE, Comm. in libr. (4) Reg., etc., Thor., 1643, 2 Th. fol.; H. GROTIUS, Annot. in vet. test., Paris, 1664, III. Tom.; ed. Vogel, Hal., 1775, T. I.; A. CALOVIVUS, Bibl. illustrata, T. I., Francof., 1672; S. SCHMID, In libr. Sam. Comment., Argent., 1687, ff. II. Tom. 4; JOH. AD. OSIANDER, Comm. in I. et II. lib. Sam., Tubing., 1687, fol.; JOH. OLEARIVS, Bibl. Erklärung der ganzen Heiligen Schrift, Leipz., 1678, fol. V. Theil; POLUS, Synopsis criticor., Francof. ad M., 1694; J. CLERICUS, Vet. test. libri historici, Amstelod., 1708, fol.; DATHE, Lib. histor. vet. test. Jos., Jud., Ruth, Sam., etc., Hal., 1784; J. D.

MICHAELIS, Deutsche Uebersetzung des Alt. Test., Göttingen, 1772, Th. 4; J. H. MICHAELIS, Bibl. hebraica, Magdeb., 1720; J. CHR. FR. SCHULZE, Comm. Norimb., 1784; NIEMEYER, Charakteristik der Bibel, 4, 5, Th. Halle, 1795; HENSLER, Erläut. des ersten Buchs Sam., etc., Hamb., 1795; HOEPFNER u. AUGUSTI, Exeget. Handb. d. A. T., Leipz., 1798; MAURER, Comm., Leipz., 1835; CHR. H. KALKAR, Quaest. biblic. Specim. II. (de nonnullis prior. Sam. libr. locis, etc.), Othin., 1835; O. THENIUS, Die Bücher Sam. erklärt, 2 Aufl., Leipzig, 1864 (comp. RUETSCHLI in the Stud. und Krit., 1866, p. 207 f.); C. FR. KEIL, Bibl. Komm. über die prophet. Geschichtsbücher des Alt. Test. II. Die Bücher Sam., Leipz., 1864 [Eng. Tr. KEIL on Samuel]; BUNSEN, Die Bibel, etc., II., Die Propheten.

V. DIETRICH, Summarien, 1578, Nürnberg. fol.; L. OSIANDER, Deutsche Bibel Luthers mit Erklärung, von D. FOERSTER, Stuttg., 1600, fol.; PFLEICKER, Predigten über das erste Buch Sam., Tüb., 1605, fol.; DAN. WUELFER, Saul Exrez, Predigten über die Historien des Königs Saul, Nürnberg., 1670, 4; CRAMER, Summarien und bibl. Auslegung, 1627, 2 Aufl., Wolfenbüttel, 1681, fol.; VIETOR, David's, Leben und Regierung in Predigten, Nürnberg., 1690, 4; WUERTEMBERG, Summarien und Auslegungen der Heil. Schrift; Das A. T., von J. K. ZELLER, Stuttg., 1677; vermehrt herausgegeben durch die theol. Fakult. in Tübingen, Leipz., 1709, 4; GOTTF. KOHLREIF, Betrachtungen über 80 auserlesene Oerter aus d. Büch. Sam., Ratzeburg, 1717, 8; Berleb. Bib., 2 Th., 1728, fol.; JOACHIM LANGE, Biblich-historisches Licht und Recht, Halle u. Leipz., 1734, fol.; CHR. M. PFAFF, Biblia d. i. die ganze Heil. Schrift. mit Summarien und Anmerk., Tübing., fol. 8 Aufl. Speier, 1767; STARKE, Synopsis II.; RICHTER, erklärte Hausbibel A. T. II., Barmen., 1835; LISKO, Das A. T. mit Erklärungen I. Die histor. Bücher, Berlin, 1844; O. V. GERLACH, Das A. T. mit Einl. und erklärend. Anmerk., 2 B., Berl. 1846 (5 Aufl., 1867); CALWER, Handbuch d. Bibelerklärung I., Calw. und Stuttg., 1849; DAECHSEL, Die Bibel, mit in den Text eingeschalteter Auslegung, mit einem Vorwort von DR. A. HAHN, General-Superintendent, etc., I. 1, Die Geschichtsbücher, Heft 11-14, Bresl. 1865 sqq., bei DUELLER; Bethibel, 2 B. Eisleben, 1863.

M. FR. ROOS, Einl. in die bibl. Geschichten.—neuer Abdruck, Stuttg., 1857, Th. 2; EISENLOHR, Das Volk Israel unter d. Herrschaft d. Könige, 2 Th., Leipz., 1856; J. SCHLIER, Die Könige in Israel, ein Handbüchlein zur heil. Geschich., 1859; HASSE, Gesch. d. Alt. Bundes, 1863; STAHELIN, Das Leben David's eine histor. Untersuchung, Basel, 1866.

J. SCHLIER, König Saul, Bibelstunden, Nördl., 1867; J. DISSELHOFF, Die Gesch. König Saul's—elf Predigten, 4 Aufl. Kaiserswerth a. Rh., 1867; FR. ARNDT, Der Mann nach dem Herzen Gottes, 19 Predigten über d. Leben David's, Berl., 1836; F. W. KRUMMACHER, David, der König v. Israel, ein biblisches Lebensbild, Berlin, 1867; J. DISSELHOFF, Die Gesch. König David's, des Mannes nach dem Herzen Gottes, 14 Predigten, 8 Aufl. Kaiserswerth a. Rh., 1867; J. SCHLIER, König David, Bibelstunden, Nördling., 1870; J. RUPERTI, Licht und Schatten aus d. Gesch. des Alt. Bundes, I. Samuel der Prophet, Hermannsburg, 1870.

[Besides Dictionaries of the Bible (ERSCH u. GRUBER, WINER, HERZOG, KITTO, FAIRBAIRN, SMITH), Introductions (DE WETTE, KEFL, BLEEK, DAVIDSON), and Geographical Works (RELAND, LIGHTFOOT, BOCHART, RITTER, ROBINSON, STANLEY's Sinai and Palestine, THOMSON's The Land and the Book, PORTER in MURRAY's Handbook), the following additional aids may be mentioned:

1. Jewish Commentaries.—R. SOLOMON ISAAKI (Rashi), eleventh cent., in BUXTORF's Biblia Rabbinica, and Lat. translation by J. F. BREITHAUP, Gothæ, 1714; R. DAVID KIMCHI (Radak), 13th cent., in BUXTORF; R. LEVI BEN GERSHOM (Ralbag), thirteenth cent., in BUXTORF; ABARBANEL, fifteenth century. Good suggestions may be gotten from these.

2. Patristic.—JEROME, Quaest. in Sam.; AUGUSTINE, Quaest. and De Civ. Dei Lib. 17; GREGORY THE GREAT, Comm.; CRYSTOSTOM, Homilies on Hannah and on David.

3. Continental.—LUDOVICUS DE DIEU, Critica Sacra, Amstelaedami, 1693, full of valuable grammatical observations; Die Israelitische Bibel (L. PHILIPPSON), Leipzig, 1858, represents modern liberal Jewish opinions.

4. English Commentaries.—Of the older (generally unscientific and unsatisfactory), PATRICK, LOWTH and WHITEY has much good exposition; WALL's Critical Notes are nearly useless; GILL has references to Jewish authorities; HENRY is devout; CLARKE is learned, but sometimes erratic and untrustworthy; the Comprehensive Commentary is a compilation not without value. Of the later, Bishop WORDSWORTH'S Holy Bible with Notes is devout and conservative, and has some useful quotations from patristic writers, but is marred by excessive literalness and allegorizing; the Critical and Experimental Commentary by JAMIESON, FAUSSET and BROWN is condensed and clear, useful for those who have not time for wide reading; the Bible Commentary, "by Bishops and other Clergy of the Anglican Church," is intended to give the results of modern scientific investigation as held by orthodox Anglicans, and is a valuable and generally trustworthy work.

5. Biographies, Histories, etc.—CHANDLER'S Critical History of David and DELANEY'S History of David are useful; HUNTER'S Sacred Biography (Hannah) and ROBINSON'S Scripture Characters, of not much profit; the quaint sagacity and earnest piety of Bp. HALL'S Contemplations is well known; KITTO'S Daily Bible Illustrations are especially useful in giving vividness to Scripture scenes and persons; STACKHOUSE'S Hist. of the Bible, MILMAN'S Hist. of the Jews, STANLEY'S Lectures on the Jewish Church, EWALD'S Gesch. d. Volkes Israel (Eng. transl. History of Israel, CLARK'S Foreign Theolog. Library), HENGSTENBERG, Gesch. d. Reiches Gottes u. d. A. B. (Eng. transl. Hist. of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant), are valuable; C. KINGSLEY, Four Sermons on David, delivered at the University of Cambridge, sprightly and suggestive; W. M. TAYLOR, David the King of Israel, New York, 1875, a series of interesting and wholesome discourses; F. D. MAURICE'S Prophets and Kings of the O. T. is thoughtful and candid.

6. On the criticism of the text.—Besides general works on text criticism and the Biblia Hebraica of J. H. MICHAELIS, mentioned above by DR. ERDMANN, we have KENNICOTT'S Ed. of Heb. Bib., Oxford, 1776-80; DE ROSSI, Variae Lectiones Vet. Test., Parmæ, 1784; THENIUS and KEIL (Eng. tr., CLARK'S Foreign Theolog. Lib.), in their commentaries; WELLHAUSEN, Der Text d. Bücher Sam., Göttingen, 1871; foot-notes in EWALD'S Hist. of Israel; STRACK'S Proleg. Crit. in Vet. Test.; FRANKEL'S Vorstudien zur LXX.; DAVIDSON'S Biblical Criticism.—[Tr.]

THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL.

FIRST PART. SAMUEL.

1 SAM. I.—VII.

SAMUEL'S LIFE AND WORK AS JUDGE, PRIEST AND PROPHET, DIRECTED TOWARDS A THOROUGH REFORMATION OF THE THEOCRACY AND LAYING THE FOUNDATION OF THE THEOCRATIC KINGDOM.

FIRST DIVISION: SAMUEL'S EARLY LIFE.

1 SAM. I.—III.

FIRST SECTION.

Samuel's Birth in Answer to Prayer to the Lord

CHAP. I. 1-20.

I. Samuel's parents, the Ephrathite Elkanah and the childless Hannah. Vers. 1-8.

1 Now [om. Now¹] there was a certain [om. certain] man of Ramathaim-zophim,² of Mount Ephraim, and his name was Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the Son of Zuph, an Ephrathite. And he had two wives; the name of the one was Hannah, and the name of the other Peninnah; and Peninnah had children, but [and] Hannah had no children. And this man went up yearly out of [from] his city to worship and to sacrifice unto the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts [Hosts] in Shiloh. And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of the Lord, were there [And there the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were priests of Jehovah³]. And when the time was that Elkanah offered, he gave to Peninnah his wife, and to all her sons and her daughters, portions; but unto Hannah he gave a worthy [double⁴] portion, for he loved Hannah, but [and] the Lord [Jehovah] had shut up her womb. And her adversary also [om. also] provoked her sore [ins. also], for [om. for] to make her fret because⁵ the Lord [Jehovah] had shut up her womb. And as he did so [And so it happened⁶] year by year; when she went up to the house of the Lord [Jehovah], so she [she thus] pro-

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. The 1, being a part of the introductory narrative-formula, and not a connective with some other narrative, is better rendered by the presentative "now" than by the connective "and;" and is best omitted entirely.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 1. Vat. has זופים, which points to זופים "a Zuphite;" Targ. renders "of the disciples of the prophets," Pesh. "from the hill of the watchers," both of which point to the present text, but are not probable translations.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 3. It is not said that these were the only priests.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 5. See Notes, in loco.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 6. It was over this that the adversary designed to make Hannah fret.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 7. The verb is probably to be pointed וַיְהִי.—Ta.]

8 voked her, therefore [and] she wept and did not eat. Then said Elkanah her husband [And Elkanah her husband said] to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?

II. Hannah's Prayer for a Son. Vers. 9-18 a.

9 So [And] Hannah rose up after they [she⁷] had eaten in Shiloh, and after they [she⁷] had drunk. Now [And] Eli the priest sat upon a [the] seat by a [the] post of the temple [Sanctuary⁸] of the Lord [Jehovah]. And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord [Jehovah], and wept sore. And she vowed a vow, and said, O Lord of hosts [Jehovah of Hosts], if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thy handmaid, but [and] wilt give unto thine handmaid a male-child, then I will give him unto the Lord [Jehovah] all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head. And it came to pass, as she continued praying before the Lord [Jehovah], that Eli marked her mouth. Now [And] Hannah, she [om. she⁹] spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard; therefore [and] Eli thought she had been [was] drunken. And Eli said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? put away thy wine from thee. And Hannah answered and said, No, my lord, I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit; I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but have poured out my soul before the Lord [Jehovah]. Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial [dissolute woman¹⁰]; for out of the abundance of my complaint and [ins. my] grief have I spoken hitherto. Then [And] Eli answered and said, Go in peace; and the God of Israel grant thee [om. thee] thy petition that thou hast asked of him. And she said, Let thine handmaid find grace in thy sight [thine eyes].

III. Samuel's Birth. Vers. 18 b-20.

18 b So [And] the woman went her way and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.¹¹ And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the Lord [Jehovah], and returned and came to their house to Ramah. And Elkanah knew Hannah his wife; and the Lord [Jehovah] remembered her. Wherefore [And] it came to pass, when the time was come about, after Hannah had [that Hannah] conceived, that she [and] bare a son, and called his name Samuel, saying, Because [For, said she,] I have [om. have] asked him of the Lord [Jehovah].

⁷ Ver. 9. The Infin. refers here rather to Hannah.—Ta.

⁸ [Ver. 9. מִקְדָּשׁ is not necessarily "temple," but any large structure.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 13. The Heb. inserts the pron. הִיא "she," but our Eng. does not well permit it.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 16. בְּלִיָּה "worthlessness" should not be rendered as a proper name in O. T.; Eng. A. V. frequently renders "sons of B." by "ungodly" or "wicked."—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 18. See Notes.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.*

I. Samuel's Parents. Vers. 1-8.

Vers. 1, 2. And there was a man of Ramathaim-zophim.—Here an account is given of Samuel's genealogy and birth-place.

There is no sufficient ground for adopting (as Thénius does) the reading of the Sept. MS. R. (Vat.) הָיָה שָׂם [there was a man] instead of שָׂם הָיָה [and there was a man], since this latter does not affect the independence of the Books of Samuel; for the הָיָה [and] does not indicate attachment to something preceding, the continuation of the Book of Judges, but הָיָה [and there was] stands here, as it often does at the beginning of a narrative, as historical introductory formula,

* [In the German "exegetische oder literarische," "exegetical explanations."—Ta.]

Jos. i. 1; Judg. i. 1; Ruth i. 1; 2 Sam. i. 1; 1 Kings i. 1; Esth. i. 1; Ezra i. 1; Ezek. i. 1; Jonah i. 1.

The father of Samuel was a man of Ramathaim-zophim in the hill-country of Ephraim, named Elkanah. The place Ramathaim (רַמַּתַּיִם) is doubtless the same that is called in ver. 3 "his city," and afterwards in ver. 19 and ii. 11 by the shorter name Ramah (רַמָּה), whence it appears that it was not merely the family-residence, but also Elkanah's abode, where he had "his house." The full name Ramathaim-zophim is found here only. The dual "Two-hills" points to the site of the place as on the sides or summits of two hills. It is the birth-place of Samuel (ver. 19), the same Ramah in which he had his house (vii. 17), the central point of his labors (viii. 4; xv. 34; xvi. 13; xix. 18-22) and his abode as long as he lived, and where he was buried (xxvi. 1; xxviii. 3). But this Ramah of Samuel, according to Pressel's clear statement in Herzog (R.-E. s. v. Rama), is most probably identical with the Ramah in the tribe of Benjamin (Jos. xviii. 25); for the statement of Josephus (Ant. 8, 12, 3) that Ramathon,* which = רַמַּתוֹן [Ramathaim] and is therefore doubtless the Ramah of Samuel, was forty Stadia from Jerusalem, and that of Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Ῥαμαθὴν) that it was somewhat farther north in a line from Jerusalem towards Bethel, carry us into the territory of Benjamin. If it be urged against this view that, according to Judg. iv. 5 and this passage, Ramah of Samuel was in the mountains of Ephraim, and therefore in the Tribe-territory of Ephraim, it is to be observed on the other hand that the mountains of Ephraim stretch into the Tribe of Benjamin, and not only include its northern mountains, but extend towards Jerusalem and unite with the mountains of Judah. The Ramah of Samuel lay in Benjamin near Gibeah, Saul's home, and Mizpah. The addition zophim (צֹפִים) distinguishes it from the other places of the same name, and indicates the district (the land of Zuph ix. 5) in which it lay, whose name is to be derived from the family of Zuph or Zophim from whom Elkanah descended (comp. 1 Chr. vi. 11, 20). Since, according to this, Zophim indicates a region, which took its name from the descendants of Zuph, the place Sôba, which has lately been discovered west of Jerusalem, cannot be the Ramah of Samuel, as Robinson and Ritter suppose (see Then. sêcha. exeget. Studien, II. 134 sq., and Ewald, Gesch. II. 595). It is rather to be sought in the site of the present Er-Ram between four and five (Eng.) miles, as Josephus states, from Jerusalem on the summit or side of a conical mountain on the road from Jerusalem to Bethel. When Saul (in ch. ix. 5) comes into the "land of Zuph," he straightway finds Samuel in "this city." That "this city," Samuel's abode, is identical with Ramathaim-zophim here is beyond doubt. But against the view that it, together with the region "Zuph," belonged to Benjamin, and in support of the view that it is different from Ramah of Benjamin, and lay in the territory of Ephraim, the principal consideration adduced is Saul's route (ix. 4—x. 2): on the return from Ramah to Gibeah, Saul, it is said, certainly took the directest road; but, according to x. 2-5, he first crossed the border of Benjamin (x. 2), and then came into the neighborhood of Bethel (x. 3), which lay close to the border of Benjamin and Ephraim; according to this, Ramah of Samuel was situated north of Bethel in Ephraim not far from Gibeah (ver. 20) but near Shiloh (ch. i. 24), for if it had been far from Shiloh, the animals for offering would not have been carried from home. So Then. on ix. 5, p. 34. But the assumption that Saul went the directest way to Gibeah is not certain. In ver. 3, remarks Winer correctly (W.-B. s. v.), nothing is said really of the neighborhood of Bethel, but only that Saul should meet men who were going to Bethel, from what direction we know not. And Ramah of Benjamin was so near Shiloh, that there was no need† to drive thither the animals which could not easily be purchased on the spot.* The other geographical term עֲפְרַיִם "Ephraimite" (which must not be connected with צִיִּן (Luth.) in which case it would have been עֲפְרַיִתִּי) certainly describes Elkanah as an Ephraimite, who belonged not only to the mountains, but also to the Tribe of Ephraim—and not as a Bethlehémite, as Hoffmann (Weissag. u. Erfüll. II. 61) and Robinson (Pal. II., 583 [Am. ed. ii. 7 sq.]) suppose; for in xvii. 12 and Ruth i. 2, to which appeal is made, the word is further expressly defined by the phrase "of Bethlehem." "It by no means follows, however, from this description of Elkanah (comp. Then. p. 2) that Ramathaim-zophim pertained to the territory of Ephraim, but only that Elkanah's family had settled in this Ramah, and had afterwards moved to Ramah in Benjamin" (Keil, p. 18). As Elkanah came from the Levitical family of Kohath, son of Levi, whose land lay in Ephraim, Dan and Manasseh (Josh. xxi. 5, 21 sq.), and as the Levites generally were counted as citizens of the tribes in which their residence was, it is not strange that Elkanah is here designated as an Ephraimite according to his descent, while he lived in Benjamin, whither his forefathers had immigrated.

The family of Elkanah is here traced back only through four generations to צִיִּן "Zuph," no doubt with reference to the preceding designation Zophim, because Zuph had settled in this district with his family, and it had taken its name from him. It would therefore properly be written צִיִּפִּים "Zuphim." This explanation of the name is certainly more natural than that which supposes that the district in which it lay, the "land of Zuph" (ix. 5) was so called from its abundant supply of water, and than the explanation of some Rabbis, "Ramathaim of the watchers or prophets." [The first question with regard to this word, whether we read Zophim or, with Erdmann, Zuphim, is a grammatical one: is the combination Ramathaim-zophim in accordance with Heb. usage? In proper names the rule is that the first word of a compound is in the construct state, but the two exceptions, compounds with מִדְּבָר "meadow," Gen. i. 11, etc., and שָׁוִי "plain," Gen. xiv. 5, seem to prove the possibility of an appositional construction, so that we must admit (against Wellhausen "Der Text. d. Bücher Sam." in loco) Ramathaim-zophim to be a possible form. But, as "Zophim" never appears again as an appendage to Ramathaim, and the old vss. Chald. and Syr. render it as an appellative, it would perhaps be better, with Wellhausen, to suppose that the final im comes by error of transcription

* [The difficulties in the way of identifying Ramathaim (-Zophim) on the supposition that it is the same with "this city" (ix. 5) are almost insuperable. The conditions to be met are 1) the place is in Mt. Ephraim; 2) it is apparently south of Rachel's tomb (1 Sam. x. 2); 3) it was Samuel's residence Ramah. They decide the question against Er-Ram, which is north of Rachel's tomb. The only solution is that which rejects the above supposition. If the city in which Saul was anointed was some other place, or Saul's residence at that time was not Gibeah, then Er-Ram may be Ramah, and in other respects this answers better than any other place to the circumstances. But the question must be regarded as undecided. See Stanley's "Sinai and Palestine." Note to ch. 4, and Mr. Grove's Articles ("Ramah," "Ramathaim") in Smith's Dictionary, with Dr. Wolcott's additional remarks.—Ta.]

* [So Josephus; but the text of Erdmann has Ramathaim.—Ta.]

† [That is, it was not necessary to drive the animals thither beforehand, since, the distance being so small, they could be sent for when needed.—Ta.]

from the following word, and to read 'פִּיז "a Zuphite," which would then correspond to the "Zuph" at the end as "an Ephraimite" does to "Mount Ephraim."—Tr.]. From a comparison of the two genealogies in 1 Chr. vi. 26, 27 (Heb. 11, 12) 34, 35 (Heb. 19, 20) with this genealogy of Samuel it appears that they agree except in the last three names, which in the first list in Chr. are Eliab, Nahath and Zophai, and in the second, Eliel, Toah and Ziph. They are plainly the same names with various changes of form. These changes are probably to be ascribed to differences of pronunciation or to the mis-writing of the original forms which are preserved in this passage (comp. Then. 2).

The Levitical descent of Elkanah and Samuel is put beyond doubt by a comparison of the genealogy here with those in Chronicles. In the first of these, 1 Chr. vi. 22 sq. (Heb. 7 sq.) the genealogical list descends from the second son of Levi, Kohath, to Samuel and his sons; in the second, ver. 33 sq. (Heb. 18 sq.), it ascends from the singer Heman, Samuel's grandson, to Kohath, Levi and Israel. These Levites of the Family of Kohath had their dwellings appointed them in the tribes of Ephraim, Dan, and Manasseh. As the Levites were usually designated by the tribes in which their dwellings were fixed (Hengstenb. Beitr. [Contributions] sur Einl. ins. A. T. III. 61), the name "Ephraimite" here cannot be adduced against the Levitical descent of Samuel, as is done by Knobel (II. 29, Anm. 2), Nägelsbach (Herzog, R.-E. s. v. Samuel) and others. The latter himself refers to Judg. xvii. 7 and xix. 1 as cases where a Levite is described as belonging to another tribe, but thinks it strange that, while in those passages the Levitical descent of the men is also expressly mentioned, Elkanah's descent from Levi is here not hinted at, and this is all the more surprising, if he was really a Levite, when his ancestor came from Ephraim to Ramah and gave his name to the region. But the author of the Book of Judges had a special motive for mentioning the Levitical character of those persons, while our author had little or none, since in his narrative of Samuel he lays all the stress on his prophetic office, and writes, as we have seen, from a prophetic stand-point. There was the less need to emphasize Samuel's Levitical character because, as Ewald (II. 594) remarks, the Levites that were not of Aaron's family, seem in early times to have been more blended with the people. And the statement in "Chronicles" of Samuel's Levitical descent was not occasioned by the fact that the prophet performed priestly functions (Knobel ubi sup.), nor is it to be explained by saying that perhaps quite early the conviction that Samuel must have been a Levite grew out of the difficulty which every Levite must have felt at the discharge of priestly duties by Samuel, if he were not of the stem of Levi (Nägelsbach, ubi sup.).—nor to be referred, with Thenius (p. 2), to the fact that, perhaps in later times the genealogy given in our Book was attached to that of Levi in order thus to justify Samuel's offering sacrifices. "Chronicles" throughout makes its statistical-historical statements from the Levitical point of view, and thus supplements the history of David and Samuel in our Book. Hengstenberg well says (ubi sup.): "We cannot suppose these genealogies to be an arbitrary invention, simply because, if the author had been disposed to this, he would doubtless have put Samuel among the descendants of Aaron." Ewald remarks, "Any one who looks narrowly at the testimony in 'Chronicles' cannot possibly doubt that Samuel was of a Levitical family," while our author attached no importance to this fact (ubi sup. Anm. 2). So Bunsen (in loco), referring to Josh. xxi. 21, where the dwellings of the Kohathites are fixed in Mount Ephraim also, says: "The Levitical descent of Samuel is certain; only it is not made specially prominent here." Nägelsbach himself is obliged to admit that the proofs of Samuel's Levitical descent are convincing; for 1) looking at "Chronicles" (1 Chr. xxv. 4; comp. vi. 18 sq.), he is obliged to concede that Samuel's posterity is very decidedly considered as belonging to the Levites, since Heman, the renowned singer, grandson of Samuel and father of a numerous posterity, has an eminent place in the lists of Levites of David's day; and 2) he urges further as a not unimportant consideration the name of Samuel's father, "Elkanah, that is, he whom God acquired or purchased," for this name is both in signification and use exclusively a Levite name, and all the Elkanahs mentioned in the Old Test. (leaving out the one in 2 Chr. xxviii. 7, whose tribe is not stated) were demonstrably Levites, and belonged mostly to the family of Korah from whom Samuel also was descended. See Simonis Onomast., p. 493; Hengstenb., ubi supra 61; Keil in loco.—The further objection is made that Samuel was really dedicated to the Sanctuary-service by his mother's vow, which would not have been necessary if Elkanah had been a Levite. To this the answer is not that Hannah's vow referred to the Nazariteship of her son—for though all Nazarites were specially consecrated to the Lord, they did not thereby come under obligation to serve in the Sanctuary like the Levites—but rather that in Hannah's vow the words "all the days of his life" (vera. 11 and 22) are to be emphasized. While she consecrates him to the Lord as Nazarite, she at the same time by her vow devotes him for his whole life to the service of the Lord in the Sanctuary; while the Levites did not enter the service till the age of twenty-five or thirty (Numb. viii. 23 sq.; iv. 23, 30, 47), and then needed not to remain constantly at the Sanctuary, Samuel as soon as he is weaned is destined by his mother to continual service there (ver. 22), and while yet a boy wears there the priestly dress.—It is again urged against the Levitical descent of Elkanah that, according to the Septuagint rendering of ver. 21 (which adds πάσας τὰς δεκάρας τῆς γῆς αὐτοῦ "all the tithes of his land"), he brought tithes (Then.); but the genuineness of this addition is very doubtful, and, even if it be received, the bringing of tithes is no evidence of Elkanah's non-Levitical character (Josephus, who relates the Levitical descent, makes no difficulty in speaking of the tithe-bringing), for, according to the Law, the Levites had to bestow on the priests, as gift of Jehovah, one-tenth of the tenth which they themselves received from the other tribes, Numb. xviii. 28 sq.; comp. Neh. x. 38 (Keil 26, Note). Ewald (II. 594) says: "The tithe which Elkanah (according to i. 21, Sept.) brought proves nothing against his Levitical chaacter." See his Alterthümer (Archæology), p. 346. Thenius refers the fulfilment of the prophecy in 1 Sam. ii. 35 to Samuel, and thereon bases the assertion that Samuel's Levitical descent is set aside by the prophecy; but, even if his reference be conceded, this consequence does not follow, for in this prophecy the sense requires us to emphasize not the priest but what is predicted of him.

חַנָּה, 'Anna, Hannah (found in Phœnician also; Dido's sister was named Anna), a common name for women among the Hebrews, signifying "charm," "favor," "beauty," and in a religious sense "grace."

Elkanah's bigamy with Hannah and Peninnah ("coral," "pearl"), like the custom of taking concubines along with the proper wives, is fundamentally opposed to the original divine ordination of monogamy. The Mosaic Law does not forbid polygamy, but never expressly approves it; it accepts it as a custom and seeks to restrict and govern it by various regulations (Lev. xviii. 18; Ex. xxi. 7-10; Deut. xvii. 17; xxi. 15-17). According to Gen. iv. 19 it was a Cainite, Lamech, that first violated the original ordinance. As it was usually only the men of more wealth and higher position that took two or more wives, we may suppose that Elkanah was a wealthy man.—The curse which attached to this relation appears in Elkanah's married and family-life; Peninnah, who was blessed with children, exalts herself haughtily above the childless Hannah, and embitters her soul. The resulting discord in the family-life shows itself at the holy place, where Hannah's heart is continually troubled by her "adversary," while Elkanah seeks to console her by all the more affectionate conduct.

Vers. 3-5. Elkanah's yearly worship and sacrifice at Shiloh. And this man went up, etc.—The expression "from year to year" (חֲדָשִׁים) is used in Ex. xiii. 10 of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and so elsewhere (Judg. xi. 40; xxi. 19). On the traces of the Passover in the Period of the Judges see Hengstenberg Beitr. [Contrib.] III. 79-85. It is this Feast that is meant here. For Elkanah is said in the text to have traveled regularly every year with his whole household (ver. 21) to the Sanctuary. This journey was not taken at pleasure, but at an appointed time, and therefore at one of the festivals at which the people were required by the Law to appear before the Lord, Ex. xxxiv. 23; comp. Deut. xvi. 16. It was only at the Passover that the whole family were accustomed to go up to the Sanctuary, only then that every man without exception went. But Elkanah attended the feast regularly only once a year. Nothing but the Passover, therefore, can be meant here. At this feast Elkanah went up once every year to the Sanctuary with his whole family. [This statement—that the feast which Elkanah attended was the Passover—would be probable, if we could assume regularity in carrying out the Mosaic Law at this time; but this cannot be assumed. See Judges xvii., xviii., xix.; 1 Sam. ii. 12-17. Some prefer to see here a feast different from any of the three great festivals, referring to the feasting (ver. 9) and David's "yearly sacrifice," 1 Sam. xx. 6; comp. Deut. xii. 11-14 (Bib. Comm. in loco). This, however, is not conclusive; feasting would be appropriate at the great festivals, (see Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 12); and the question what occasion this was must be left undecided.—Tr.]

To worship and to sacrifice.—The beautiful picture of Israelitish piety which we have in the following account of Elkanah and Hannah is introduced by these features as the chief and fundamental ones. The worship relates to the name of the Lord who dwells in His chosen place in the Sanctuary, and is the expression of the remembrance of this name before the Lord. The sacrifice is the embodied prayer; in the sacrifice worship is presented to the Lord as the act by which the offerer brings himself, and all that he has, to the Lord. According to the Law (Ex. xxiii. 15; xxxiv. 20; comp. Deut. xvi. 16) those who came to the Sanctuary to attend the festival were not to appear empty-handed before the Lord, but "every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which He hath given thee."

The זֶבֶחַ ("to sacrifice") is to be understood of the Shelamim, which consisted of free-will offerings (Deut. xvi. 10), partly from the tithes set apart for this purpose (Deut. xiv. 22 sq.) and the first-born of cattle (Deut. xv. 20; Numb. xviii. 17), which were preceded by burnt offerings, (Numb. x. 10) and followed by joyful feasting. (Oehler, Herzog R.-E. IV. 386). With reference to this sacrificial meal, which belonged essentially to the peace-offerings (Shelamim), the whole act of sacrifice is designated by זֶבֶחַ, because this word denotes slaying with reference to a meal to be afterwards held, and the expressions שְׁלָמִים (peace-offerings) and זִבְחֵי (sacrifices) are exactly equivalent, the זֶבֶחַ זֶבֶחַ ("to sacrifice a sacrifice") being used of the Shelamim. This peace-offering, whose performance is called זֶבֶחַ "slaughter," was preceded by a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, of which the former removed the alienation from God occasioned by sin, and the latter through the worship offered made the offerer acceptable in the sight of God; and thus the peace-offering was the representation and confirmation of the relation of integrity, the peaceful and friendly communion between the Lord and the man who was brought near to Him (שֵׁם integer fui); comp. Oehler in Herzog X. 637, Hengstenb. Beitr. III., p. 85 sq.

To the Lord of Hosts, Jehovah Sabaoth. Elkanah draws near with worship and with sacrifice. The signification of the name יְהוָה [Jahveh, which probably, and not Jehovah, is the correct pronunciation,—Tr.] is the ground of the worship and of the presentation of the offering. The living, unchangeable eternal God, who by His historical self-revelation as His people's Covenant-God has prepared Himself the name by which they are to know and call Him, and by which He comes into direct intercourse with them, has thus first made possible for His people the worship and sacrifice which they are to bring to His honor, and also made it a sacred duty.

* The addition of the Sept. ἡ Ἀρπαθαία does not warrant the supposition that the corresponding Heb. expression has fallen out after מַעֲרִיר, but seems to be an explanation of the translator.—חֲדָשִׁים not "at his usual time" (Luther), nor "state is diabolus" but "from year to year," yearly (Ex. xii. 10), comp. ii. 19; זֶבֶחַ הַחֵדֶשׁ "the yearly offering."

In Shiloh Elkanah brings his offering to the Lord of Hosts. Shiloh (שִׁלֹה), that is, "Rest") lay in the territory of Ephraim, "on the north side of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem and on the south of Lebonah," Judg. xxi. 19. Here the Sanctuary of Israel, the Tabernacle with the Ark, which immediately after the entrance into Canaan was placed in Gilgal (fifty stadia from Jordan, ten from Jericho), was located from the time mentioned in Josh. xviii. 1 (the sixth year after the passage of the Jordan according to Joseph. Ant. V., i. 19), to the capture of the Ark by the Philistines. For a time only, during the Benjamite war (Judg. xx. 27), the Ark was in Bethel. Shiloh was the permanent seat of the Sanctuary till the unfortunate Philistine war under Eli. And this Sanctuary was, during the whole period of the Judges up to Samuel's time when the Ark fell into the hands of the Philistines, the only one that the people of Israel had, the national Sanctuary instituted by Moses, where men came into the presence of the Lord, where all sacrifices were offered and the great festivals celebrated, where the whole nation assembled: the dwelling, the house, the temple of God (vers. 7, 9, 22). In regard to Shiloh as the religious centre of the people during the whole period of the Judges on account of the location there of the Sanctuary with the Ark by Joshua, see for further details Hengstenb. Beitr. [Contrib.] III., p. 52 sq. Shiloh was the home of the prophet Ahijah under Jeroboam II. (1 Ki. xi. 12, 14) and was still in existence at the time of the Exile (Jer. xli. 5). Jerome found there some ruins and the foundation of an altar (see on Zeph. i. 14). According to Robinson (III. 302 sq. [Am. ed. II. 267-270]) and Wilson (The Lands of the Bible, II. 292 sq.) the ancient Shiloh is the present ruin Seilûn, whose situation answers exactly to the description in Judg. xxi. 19. The position of the place was such that, in accordance with its name, the Sanctuary of Israel could there have a quiet permanent place. This quiet place, situated on a hill (Ps. lxxviii. 54) was the scene of the mighty revolution brought about in the history of the Theocracy by the call of Samuel to be the Prophet of God and by the overthrow of the priestly house of Eli.

Instead of "and there the two sons, etc." (שְׁנֵי בָנָיו) the Sept. gives kal êkēi HAl kal ol ôvo vlot aïrov ("and there Eli and his two sons" ver. 3), as if the text had read "and there Eli," etc. (עֲלֵי שְׁנֵי); but this is clearly a change of the original text occasioned by the fact, which seemed strange to the translator, that not Eli but his two sons are mentioned at the beginning of the Book. This mention of the priests accords with the following narrative, which speaks of the sacrificial function, which Eli on account of age no longer discharged. Eli, though termed only priest, yet filled the office of High-priest, but had made over the priestly duties to his sons; hence it is that they, and not he, are here specially mentioned as persons who were priests to the Lord (שְׁנֵי כֹהֲנֵי ה'), by which it is intimated that there were others who performed this priestly service before the Lord. From the fact that only these two, with their father, are here mentioned expressly, it has been concluded that the Priesthood was numerically very meagre and simple; but this conclusion is wholly unfounded; for, on the one hand, not all the priests are mentioned here, but only the two who figure in the succeeding history and illustrate the corruption of the Priesthood, and, on the other hand, from the fact that all Israel sacrificed at the Sanctuary at Shiloh it is clear that two or three priests would not suffice for the service, comp. ii. 14, 16. What a contrast is given us here in the two sons of Eli, representatives of a priesthood inwardly estranged from God and sunk in immorality, and the pious God-fearing Elkanah and his consecrated wife Hannah!

Ver. 4. "The day" (הַיּוֹם), that is, on the day when he came to Shiloh to sacrifice.*

That Elkanah's sacrifice (זֶבַח) was a praise or thank-offering is clear from what follows; for, according to the Law (Lev. vii. 15) the flesh of this offering, of which the offerer kept a part, had to be eaten on the day on which it was brought. This praise-offering or thank-offering is (Lev. vii. 11 sq.) the first and principal sort of the peace-offering (זֶבַח שְׁלָמִים) — זֶבַח עֹלָה-תּוֹדָה — שְׁלָמִים or זֶבַח תּוֹדָה ש' vers. 13, 15), the sacrifice of the thankful recognition of God's undeserved benefits. The second sort of peace-offering is the vow-offering (זֶבַח נֶדֶר), which was promised when a request was made for God's favor, and offered when it was granted; the third sort is the free-will-offering (זֶבַח נִדְבָה) for a special experience of God's favor, and in a wider sense a voluntary contribution to the Sanctuary and its furniture [Ex. xxxv. 29.—Tr.].—Elkanah's whole family took part in the feasts which he made there from the Shelamim [peace-offerings] in accordance with the provision of the Law, Deut. xii. 11, 12, 17, 18. These meals had a joyful character, comp. Deut. xii. 12; xvi. 11; xxvii. 7. In Elkanah's household this joy was disturbed all the while by the childlessness of Hannah.

While he divided to Peninnah and her children their pieces, parts, portions of the flesh of the offering, he gave Hannah

Ver. 5. כִּנְיָה אֶחָת אֶפְסִים. Of the various explanations of these words (in which the אֶפְסִים makes the difficulty), only two now deserve consideration; the first (Syr., Targ., Geesen., Winer, De Wette, Bunsen, Keil [Wordsworth, Bib. Com., Cahen]) takes אֶפְסִים in the sense of "persons," so that it would read "a portion for two persons," or "for persons" ([Fürst, Bunsen, that is, "a large piece"]); the second (Thenius, Böttcher, "nouve exeget. krit. Aehrenlese s. A. T.", p. 85 sq.) after the Vulgate and Luther renders אֶפְסִים "sad," or better, "displeased," "unwilling." Against the first explanation is the fact that the sing. אִישׁ never has the meaning "person," nor can it be shown that this meaning belongs to the dual; it means "countenance," but it is only by forcing that the signification "person" can thence be gotten (Keil) on the ground that אִישׁ is equivalent to אִנְשֵׁי in 1 Sam. xxv. 23, and אִנְשֵׁי is used for "person" in 2 Sam. xvii. 11. It is, however, on linguistic grounds, better to explain the word, according to its usual signification, as expressing a displeased disposition or emotion, akin to anger. It is then to be taken adverbially (as, for example, the opposite feeling אִנְשֵׁי , Deut. xxiii. 24; Hos. xiv. 6) equivalent to אִנְשֵׁי in Dan. xi. 20, "in anger."

*[The phrase יוֹם הַיּוֹם means "once," or "it happened once," the Heb. using the Def. Art. (because the day is defined by what follows) where we use an indefinite phrase. See 2 Kings iv. 8, 11, 18.—Tr.]

In contrast with the joy which ought to have reigned undisturbed at this feast, Elkanah's heart was full of sadness because his beloved Hannah remained without the blessing of children, while her adversary, proud of her children, vexed her with it; for childlessness was held to be a great misfortune, a reproach, yea a divine punishment (Gen. xix. 31; xxx. 1, 23). The one portion, which alone he could give Hannah, was a contrast to the many portions which he gave to Peninnah and her sons and daughters, and was, as it were, the mark of her desolate despised condition over against the fortunate and boastful Peninnah.

[It is difficult to give any satisfactory rendering of this much-disputed phrase. The word אִנְשֵׁי has only three meanings in the Old Test. (excluding this passage): 1) nostrils (Gen. ii. 7; Lam. iv. 20); 2) face (1 Sam. xx. 41); 3) anger (1 Sam. xi. 6). The rendering, therefore, "sadness," "displeasure," defended above by Dr. Erdmann, is hardly allowable. Nor does the word mean "person" in 2 Sam. xvii. 11 (adduced by Keil) the similar word אִנְשֵׁי means not "persons" but "presence," and offers no support to this rendering. The Chaldee translation "a chosen portion" takes it in the sense "presence," "a portion worthy to be set in one's presence," as the bread in the Tabernacle was called לֶחֶם אִנְשֵׁי "bread of presence," "show-bread." Another translation (mentioned by Gesenius, Thesaurus s. v.) is "one portion of faces," that is, two slices of bread with meat between. The Syriac translation "double" is apparently based on an accidental resemblance in two words. The Sept. omits the word and renders "one portion," but the context requires an explanatory word here. The original strictly allows only two translations, either "a portion of anger" (so Abartanel, who speaks of two angers or griefs which Elkanah had), which seems out of keeping with Elkanah's character, or "a portion set in one's presence," that is, "an offered portion," which is jejune. In this failure of the strict rendering to make sense, it is perhaps better to conjecture a meaning "persons" for אִנְשֵׁי , (following Syr. and Arab.) and render "a double portion."—Tr.].

Vers. 6-8. Hannah, provoked by her adversary, consoled by Elkanah. Peninnah is Hannah's adversary on account of Elkanah's special love for the latter (ver. 5); out of jealousy she is her rival. Bigamy, which is in opposition to God's appointment, bears its bitter fruits for Elkanah and his house.— אִנְשֵׁי —"with anger (or vexation) also." אִנְשֵׁי is not simply "vexation" in a subjective-intransitive sense, but is found also in an objective-transitive sense, as in Deut. xxxii. 27 (the wrath which the enemy produces in me) and 2 Kings xxiii. 26 (אִנְשֵׁי , provocations to anger, in reference to God). This last is the sense here also, and the אִנְשֵׁי ("also") indicates the heaping up of anger and vexation which Peninnah occasioned in Hannah. In what sense and with what design Peninnah did this is shown by the following words (אִנְשֵׁי , etc.). The word (אִנְשֵׁי) in Hiph. means "to rouse, excite, put in lively motion;" here, as the context (אִנְשֵׁי) shows, against God; she not only held up before her her unfruitfulness, itself reckoned a reproach, but represented it also as a punishment from God, or at least as a lack of God's favor.—In ver. 7 Elkanah cannot be taken as subject, as is done in the present pointing (אִנְשֵׁי); for in the preceding independent sentence (ver. 6) Peninnah is the subject; still less, for the same reason, can the suffix in אִנְשֵׁי (when she went up) according to this construction be referred to Hannah. In accordance with the tenor of the narrative it is better, with Luther, De Wette, Bunsen, Thenius, to read אִנְשֵׁי and translate "and so it happened." [Others read not so well אִנְשֵׁי "and so she did."—Tr.]. The two אִנְשֵׁי (so . . . so) correspond therefore in relation to Peninnah's conduct, not in relation to Elkanah's bearing towards Hannah, and Peninnah's provocation (Keil). "So it happened (in reference to Peninnah) etc., thus she provoked her (Hannah)." The words "and she wept, etc." (אִנְשֵׁי) are referred naturally to Hannah by a sudden change of subject, which is allowable only in this understanding of the subjects from "it happened" (אִנְשֵׁי) on.—In ver. 8 Elkanah's consoling address is contrasted with Peninnah's provocations. After "Hannah" the Sept. adds: "and she said, 'Here am I, my lord, and he said,'" but we are not to suppose (with Thenius) that the corresponding Hebrew words have fallen out of the text, for this phrase, a very common one in the circumstantial accounts of speeches and conversations, is here clearly an insertion. The attempt to give a more fitting expression to Elkanah's feeling gives too subjective a character to this reading; and this feeling is sufficiently portrayed by the Masoretic text, in which the first three questions about the why or wherefore of her grief set it forth in a climax (weeping, not eating, grief of heart). The translation of the Sept. τί ἐστὶ σοὶ οὗτο ("what is to thee that") does not warrant us in taking (with Thenius) for the original text the corresponding Heb. (אִנְשֵׁי) instead of "why" (לָמָּה), for, comparing it with lari [why] for the second and third "why" of the Heb., it is easily explained as a freedom of the translator. Elkanah, by the reference to himself, "am I not better to thee than ten children?" will comfort his wife for her lack of children. This supposes that she feels herself united to him by the most cordial love. We here have a picture of deepest and tenderest conjugal love. The number ten is merely a round number to express many.

II. Hannah's Prayer for a Son. Vers. 9-18 a.

1. First in vers. 9-11 an account is given of her prayer and vow before the Lord. The "eating and drinking" is the sacrificial meal of the whole family, at which Hannah was present, though out of sorrow she ate nothing, and at the conclusion of which she rose up in order to pray to the Lord. As it is expressly said, "she ate nothing," and Elkanah asks "why eatest thou not?" we must not, with Luther, translate "after she had eaten," on the groundless assumption that she had done so on Elkanah's consoling address (Von Gerlach). The Sept. renders rightly according to the sense μετὰ τὸ φαγεῖν αὐτοῖς [after they had eaten], though this does not justify us (Then.) in so reading the Heb. (אָמַל). The passage from rose up (קָמָה) to drunk (שָׁוֵה) on this Inf. Abs. for Inf. Con., see Ewald, § 339 b) is to be connected with prayed, ver. 10 (וַתִּתְפַּלֵּל) the latter expressing the act which followed her rising from the meal; the rest, from "Eli" to "soul" is parenthesis, which, in two circumstantial sentences, gives the ground and explanation of the following narrative. Eli's sitting at the entrance of the Sanctuary is specially mentioned because of his after conduct to the praying Hannah; Hannah's bitterness of soul is mentioned because it was the reason of her praying to the Lord. [The Heb. favors the translation, ver. 9, "after she had eaten ... and drunk;" it may be a mere general expression, or she may have yielded to her husband's request. There is no contradiction in this case between ver. 7 and ver. 9. See Bib. Comm. in loco.—Tr.].

In distinction from his sons, who are called "priests of the (to the) Lord" (כֹּהֲנֵי יְהוָה), Eli is called the priest (וְהַכֹּהֵן). Though called simply "the priest," he yet filled the office of High-Priest (Aaron and Eleazar, his son, are so called Num. xxvi. 1; xxvii. 2). In the beginning of the period of the Judges Phinehas, son of Eleazar, was High-Priest, Judg. xx. 28. This office was bestowed not only on him, but also on his posterity, Num. xxv. 13. At the end of the period of the Judges it is in the possession of Eli, who, however, was a descendant, not of Eleazar and Phinehas, but of Ithamar, Aaron's fourth son. In 1 Sam. ii. 28 the continued existence of the High-priesthood from its institution to Eli is taken for granted, and is confirmed by Jewish tradition (Josephus, Ant. V. 11, § 5). According to this the High-priesthood continued to exist indeed in the period of the Judges, but did not remain, in accordance with the promise in Num. xxv., with "the seed of Phinehas," but passed over to the family of Ithamar. It is not our author's purpose to tell anything of the history of the High-priests and Judges. What he relates in the beginning of his Book of Eli and his sons serves only to illustrate the history and importance of Samuel's call, and to show that it was a historical necessity that the reformation of religious-moral life should be undertaken by the Prophetic Order which entered with Samuel as a new and mighty factor into the development of the Theocracy over against the corrupted priesthood.—The door-post (מַדְבָּח), at which Eli sat, hardly accords with the curtain which formed the entrance to the Holy Place, except on the supposition that, after the Sanctuary was permanently fixed in Shiloh, a solid entrance-way, perhaps of stone, with doors, was built; this is favored by iii. 15, where the "doors" are presupposed by the door-post here. הַיָּכֵל יְהוָה is the Tabernacle in relation to God as King of Israel; it is his "palace" where, in His royal majesty as "King of glory" (Ps. xxiv.), He dwells in the midst of His people, meets with them, and holds with them covenant-communion (Ex. xxv. 8; xxix. 45, 46).—Hannah was "in bitterness of soul" (כִּרְתַּת נַפְשִׁי) at the continuance of her hopelessness, and the vexations which she suffered from her adversary (comp. 2 Kings iv. 27).—Her supplication was the outpouring of her troubled soul before the Lord, and the words of the prayer (that her request for a son might be heard) were accompanied with many tears (וַתִּבְכֶּה תְּבִיבָה); that was the expression of her grief because her petitions had been hitherto unheard.

Ver. 11. And she vowed a vow is, as it were, the superscription and theme of the following words, which form a vow-prayer. The word here used (וָרָא) usually means the positive vow (Num. vi. 2-5 is an exception), the promise to return fitting thanks to the Lord, in case the petition is granted, by something performed for His honor or by an offering (the first ex. is in Gen. xxviii. 20-22); the negative vow, the promise to refrain from something, is נִדָּא or נִדָּא=obligatio (Num. xxx. 3). The former is connected with the Shelamim, as here Hannah's vow with Elkanah's peace-offering. [For the law of vows in the case of married women, see Num. xxx. 6-16.—Bib. Comm. in loco.—Tr.]—Hannah addresses Jehovah Sabaoth in view of His all-controlling power, by virtue of which He can put an end to her disgrace. The "if" (אִם) denotes not doubt, but the certainty of the fact, that, etc. The three-fold expression: "if thou wilt look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget," betokens in the clearest manner her confidence that God cares for her, has fixed His eyes on her person and her troubles, and characterizes the fervor and energy of her believing prayers. The thrice-repeated "thy handmaid" expresses the deep humility and resignation with which she brings her petition to the Lord. The object of her petition is male seed, a son. (אֶשְׂכֵּנָה plural of שָׂכָה, comp. Ewald, § 186 f.)—[The Sept. has ἐπιβλέψης ἐπὶ τὴν ταπεινώσειν τῆς δούλης σου, which are the identical words of the Magnificat. He hath regarded the low estate of his handmaid (Luke i. 48). Bib. Comm. in loco.—Tr.]—The vow (then I will give him, etc.) has two parts: 1) the consecration of the son all the days of his life to the Lord; she will give him to the Lord for His own, that he may serve the Lord all his life in the Sanctuary.* The emphasis is on the words "all the days" (כָּל-יְמֵיָּו): the son was already called and pledged as Levite to service in the sanctuary, but not till his thirtieth or twenty-fifth year, and then to periodical service; Hannah consecrates him to the Lord all the days of his life, that is, to a life-long and constant service in the sanctuary. But this is entirely independent of the second part of the vow. 2) "No razor shall come upon his head," that is, he shall be a Nazir (נָזִיר), one set apart to the Lord. The nazirate (naziriteship), as we see it in its representatives in the time of the Judges, Samson and Samuel, belonged to the holy institutions with which special consecration to God was connected. The Nazarite-vow belonged to the negative or abstinence-vows. According to the legal prescriptions in Num. vi. 1 sq. (which indeed presuppose the nazirate as a custom, and only regulate it, and affirm its importance), the characteristic marks of the Nazarite were the refraining from wine and all intoxicating drinks, letting the hair grow, and avoiding defilement by corpses even of the nearest kin. The one controlling ethical principle in these three negative prescriptions is expressed in vers. 2, 5, 8: the separation or abstinence is for the Lord; the Nazir is holy to Jehovah (קָדֵשׁ לַיהוָה). To the negative element answers the positive—the special devotion and consecration of person and life to the Lord. This shows itself 1) in the abstinence from intoxicating drinks, which betokens the maintenance of complete clearness of mind for the Lord in the avoidance of sensual indulgences which destroy or hinder communion with God; 2) in avoiding contact with the dead, which sets forth the preservation of purity of life against all moral defilement, and its complete devotion to the living God, and 3) in keeping the razor from the free-growing hair, which indicates the refraining from intercourse with the world, and the consecration of the whole strength and the fullness of life, whose symbol is the free growth of hair as the ornament* (קָדֵשׁ of the Lord, ver. 7) of the head. It is in keeping with the great importance which is attached (in ver. 7) to the hair of the Nazarite as "consecration (קָדֵשׁ) of his God upon his head," that here this mark alone is mentioned, and Hannah thereby distinguishes her desired son as one vowed to God, see Num. vi. 11. Comp. Oehler in Herzog's R.-E. s. v. Nasiräat. [A similar omission occurs in the case of Samson, Judg. xiii. 5, who is, however, called a Nazarite. It may, perhaps, be doubtful whether all the conditions of the Nazirate were observed in these cases. Comp. the fuller statement concerning John the Baptist, Luke i. 15. The Sept. inserts "And he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink," plainly an addition to bring it into exact accordance with the law in Num. vi. It is possible that some freedom was used in making the vow, as the time was left at the option of the sanctuary-service seemed the best pursuit of life; but God had something better for the son. Yet Hannah's devout spiritual purpose is maintained in her son's life.

* [This local service promised by the mother was afterwards interrupted, chiefly by the call of Samuel to higher duties as prophet. To the mother the Sano-

* [This word קָדֵשׁ in Num. vi. 7 means "consecration," not "crown," or "ornament." The root (Arab. nadhara) means to "set," "impose," and thus is applied to setting apart the Nazir, or to setting a crown on the head of a priest or king.—T.L.]

consecrator. Samuel was what the Talmud calls נָזִיר קוֹלֵם, "a perpetual Nazarite."—The preservation of the hair does not seem to symbolize withdrawal from the world; and in fact the Nazarite did not lead a secluded life. The view of Oehler, adopted above by Erdmann, that the hair represents vigor and life, is perhaps supported by the connection between the hair and strength in Samson's case. Another view, that it symbolizes the subjection of man to God, is adopted by Baumgarten and Fairbairn; the latter refers to Paul's teaching in 1 Cor. xi. 10. On the general subject see Smith's Bib. Dict., Fairbairn's Typology II. 346.—Tr.]—The nazirate is in its essential elements related to the priesthood, and represents the idea of a truly priestly life withdrawn from earthly-worldly things and devoted to God. But it has nothing in common with the priestly order as such; it was, along with that, a special temporary form of consecration to the Lord in opposition to the unholy, impure life of the world. The Nazarites were not bound to service in the sanctuary, and not all who were called to this service were Nazarites. The son whom Hannah had consecrated by her first vow to life-long service in the sanctuary she consecrated by her second to be a Nazarite for life. The latter was the condition and foundation of an all the more hearty and faithful devotion to the Lord in His sanctuary-service. The life-long nazirate, to which children could be devoted before birth, as was true here and with Samson (comp. John the Baptist), was the highest and most comprehensive presentation of that idea. This double vow of Hannah and its fulfillment gave to Samuel from childhood on the disposition of heart and direction of life towards the Lord, in which all the powers of his mind, all the striving and struggling of his inner and outer life were consecrated for the performance of the holy mission which he had received from the Lord.

2. Vers. 12, 13. Eli's profane view of the condition of the praying Hannah. Her manner of praying is very distinctly described: 1) she prayed much and long, before the Lord—this marks the energy of thorough devotion and ardent piety towards God; 2) she spake to her heart (לֵבָהּ) is not "in," nor is it—לִפְנֵי, Gen. xxiv. 25, where there is a similar phrase); in her prayer Hannah looked altogether into her heart, that she might obtain consolation and rest for it, and thus it was certainly in fact speaking in her heart. This marks the deep sincerity of heart, the profound concentration and emotion of soul with which she prayed; it was so intense that only her lips moved as the involuntary expression of her emotion, and her voice was not heard, which was the necessary result of the fact that her heart was turned in on itself and thoroughly immersed in God.—In contrast with this picture of the believing suppliant, Eli's conduct is portrayed as really profane; his view of Hannah's condition is precisely the opposite of the truth. He appears here as a very bad Judge. He judges merely from the outward appearance; he looks only at the movement of her lips (דָּבָר), which from the Heb. expression (נִפְלֵט) must have been lively; he remains fixed at the surface, while, considering the source of Hannah's emotion, he ought to have seen the prayerful energy of her heart through the outward appearance; he passes rash judgment on her, holding her from the signs of her emotion to be a drunken woman; instead of "making the best" of what seemed to him strange, he suspiciously takes it in the worst sense, for he must have seen that Hannah came to pray, and was really praying, and need not have thought of drunkenness to explain her demeanor. There is a noteworthy irony in the fact that, while the High-priest takes her to be drunk, she has made a vow for her son which looks to the very opposite. This conduct is characteristic of Eli. With all his piety and good nature, he was lacking religiously and morally in proper earnestness and true depth and thoroughness. To the same source, his natural-fleshly disposition of heart, whence came his conduct towards his unworthy sons, we must refer his profane conduct and his so false judgment on the praying Hannah. Yet there was some ground for his hasty suspicion of Hannah in the frequent occurrence of such cases in connection with the sacrificial meals; and this points to a certain externalized and brutalized condition of the religious-moral life in the very precincts of the sanctuary under a brutalized priesthood. "Such heartfelt prayer seems not to have been usual at that time" (Bunseu).

8. Vers. 14-18 a. Hannah's conversation with Eli concerning her prayer shows again the striking contrast between Eli's pre-judgment of her condition and her real frame of heart (vers. 14, 15), and Hannah's deep heart-felt piety as the source of her supplication (vers. 15, 16), but brings out also Eli's better nature, the expression of which is the wish for a blessing (vers. 17, 18).

Ver. 14. Eli sat at the door-post of the sanctuary no doubt to keep watch and prevent all things improper; but his address to Hannah shows how unworthily he did it. The question "How long wilt thou be drunken?" must have wounded her heart all the more in the sorrowful mood of her prayer, and grieved her no less deeply than Peninnah's speech. (On the form אֵלִי see Ewald, § 191, and Gesen., § 47, 3). The order: "put away thy wine from thee," that is, "take steps to get sober again," or "go and sleep off thy debauch" (comp. xxv. 37), is as rude and profane as the question—least of all becoming to, and to be expected from, a priest. Here, looking at Eli's sons, we cannot but think of the German proverb: "The apple falls close to the tree."* It is the same unworthy littleness that we see in Acts ii. 13 ("they are full of new wine"). The Sept. has here in Eli's interests inserted "youth, servant" (ὑἱοὶ) before "Eli," and put the rudeness off on him; but then his dismissal must have been mentioned here, and Hannah could not have answered the servant: "no, my lord," which words are addressed to Eli (comp. Böttch. against Thenius). To Thenius' remark that the masoretic recension has here for unknown reasons abridged, we reply that such abridgement, which sets Eli in so bad a light, certainly cannot be regarded as probable. In reference to the "servant" of the Septuagint, the canon of criticism holds that the harder, more offensive reading is to be preferred.

Ver. 15sq. Hannah's answer is an energetic denial of Eli's charge; in the spirited fullness of her reply, we may see something of the indignation which Eli's unworthy speech had called forth in her heart. Her language is in part a denial of his assumption, in part an explanation of her condition of mind as the reason of her conduct in prayer; each of these parts has a three-fold expression, so that each denial answers to an explanation. First, she denies simply and sharply with "no, my lord" (אֵלִי לֹא) the drunkenness imputed to her, and explains that her condition of soul is one of deep sorrow. According to the masoretic text Hannah says: "I am hard of spirit" (קָשָׁה רִיחִי). Though in Ezek. iii. 7 the similar phrase "hard of heart" (קָשָׁה לֵב) means "obstinate," "stiff-necked," yet the combination of this Adj. (קָשָׁה) in the signification "heavy" (Judg. iv. 24 [the hand . . . was heavy against Jabin]; Ex. xviii. 26) with the subet. (וְהָיָה) = disposition, mind, Gen. xli. 8; Ps. xxxiv. 19 [18]) may give the signification "heavy-hearted." It is not clear why it should sound strange (as Thenius thinks) that Hannah, in her condition, should speak of herself as heavy-hearted; the expression is so natural in reply to Eli's outspoken suspicion, that she had dulled her mind with intoxicating drink. Hence, also, follows immediately the express denial of this suspicion. The Sept., on the other hand, has the strange expression: γυνὴ ἐν σκληρῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐγὼ εἰμι (I am a woman in a hard day). This is based on the reading "hard of day" (קָשָׁה יוֹם), an expression which in Job xxx. 25 ["in trouble"] describes one who has a hard day, a hard life, is unhappy. So the Vulg.: infelix nimis ego sum, "I am very unfortunate." Perhaps this is the original reading, as Thenius supposes. Clericus: "This reading is not to be wholly despised."—The negation advances from the simple "no, my lord," to the denial that there is anything in her case to produce drunkenness, that is, that she has drunk wine or any intoxicating drink (שָׁכַר); with this denial she connects, so as to bring out a sharp contrast, the explanation and assurance that she has "poured out her soul before the Lord." Comp. Ps. xlii. 5 [4]: I pour out my soul in me; Ps. lxii. 9 [8]: Pour out your heart before him; and Ps. cxlii. 3 [2]: "I pour out my complaint before him." This expression, common in German [and English] also and Latin (fundere preces), indicates the lightening of the deeply moved, sorrowful heart by complaints, petitions, etc., before God the Lord, based on humble submission to His will and trust in His help, that is, on the opposite of the feeling which Peninnah wished to excite in Hannah (ver. 6). Comp. Calvin on Ps. cxlii. 3: "He sets the pouring out one's thoughts and telling one's trouble over against the confused anxieties which unhappy men nurse in their hearts, preferring to gnaw the bit rather than flee to God." Such pouring out of the heart before the Lord witnesses for Hannah of itself against Eli's charge of intemperance and drunkenness.—A third and still stronger denial she makes (ver. 16); and this time it refers to the bad, worthless character which he had imputed to her. "Daughter of worthlessness" (on the etymology of לְבַיִשָּׁה, comp. Gesen. s. v.)=bad woman. The words "count not," etc. (לֹא-חֲשׂוֹתָ, etc.), cannot be explained: "Do not make me the scorn of bad women" (Clericus), but must be rendered: "Do not in thought set thy handmaid before (לְפָנַי) a worthless woman," that is, let not thy handmaid be taken for a worthless woman, do not liken her to such a one. She grounds her denial of this bad opinion of her on the assurance, which answers to the two positive explanations, and forms their conclusion, that out of the abundance (בְּרַב) of her complaint and grief she had spoken "hitherto" (לְהִיטָרְוֹתַי), that is, as long as Eli had observed her.—Comp. Calvin ad A. I.: "Consider the modesty of Hannah, who, though she suffered injury from the High-priest, yet answers with reverence and humility."

* [Equivalent to the Eng.: "Like father, like son."
—Th.]

Ver. 17. Eli's reply. Eli, as Calvin remarks, "not only insulted a feeble woman, but blasphemed against God Himself, though unintentionally." Now he retracts his accusation; indeed, he really, though silently, accuses himself of injustice to Hannah, in that 1) he replies with the usual parting-formula "Go in peace?" and 2) he adds the wish that her request may be granted. (לְפָנַי is for לְפָנֶיךָ). There is no prophecy in this; it was a wish which God fulfilled.—Ver. 18. Hannah's answer does not ask for his mediation (Keil), but is a respectful request that the High-priest would further grant her his favor, as he had already done (comp. ver. 26).—[There seems to be no advantage in closing this section in the middle of ver. 18. The latter part of the verse forms a fitting conclusion to the interview of Eli and Hannah, since it describes the result to Hannah of her prayer and conversation, and ver. 19 begins a new narrative, as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]

III. The Answer to the Prayer. Vers. 18 b-20.

Hannah went her "way," namely, back to her husband. The words of the Sept.: "and she went to her inn" and (after "she did eat") "with her husband and drank," are explanatory and descriptive additions to the original text; it is inconceivable why these words, if they stood in the text originally, should have been left out. [The words "and did eat" are wanting in the Syriac and Arabic versions and in five MSS. of Kennicott, and were omitted perhaps because supposed to be inappropriate; but they fitly describe Hannah's more cheerful mood.—Tr.] "And her countenance was no more to her"—that is, her countenance was no longer disturbed as before. There are similar expressions in German. Comp. Job ix. 27, where, from the context, the word "countenance" (פָּנָיו) is likewise to be taken in the sense "sad countenance" ["heaviness" in Eng. A. V.—Tr.].*

Ver. 19 describes circumstantially and vividly, almost solemnly, the return to Ramah after early worship together before the Lord. Elkanah knew his wife (יָדָע, "know," as in Gen. iv. 7). "The Lord remembered her," indicates the fulfilment of her request; the divine control, under which (ver. 11) she had placed herself, is quite appropriately here again expressly mentioned. At the end of the verse the Sept. (Alex.) adds "and she conceived," explaining and filling out the "remembered." There is no necessity for supposing (with Thenius, following the Sept.) that this expression has fallen out of the original text, where it was a needful explanation of the "remembered," since in the following ver. 20 the significance of the latter is expressed, though it cannot be considered a mere addition. [The change in the text of the Sept. (in the Vat., not Al.) is easily explained. The Heb. (ver. 20) reads "and in the course of time Hannah conceived and bare a son." The Greek translator stumbled at the place assigned the conceiving, and therefore changed the word from after to before the "course of time." The difficulty is removed when we remember that "conceived and bare" was the common phrase to express the birth of a child. The other versions sustain the Heb. order of words.—Some Heb. MSS. read "in the course of a year" (so De Wette), or, as some translate, "at the beginning of the new year" (in the autumn, Feast of Tabernacles), but there is no authority for this.—Abarbanel: "At the end of a month."—Tr.].—Ver. 20. "Up to the circuit or conclusion of the days or of the regular time"—that is, not "in the space of a year," but "at the conclusion of the period of pregnancy" (Thenius), at the end of the time necessary for what is afterwards said.—"She bare a son, whom she called Samuel." Hannah herself gives the explanation of this name, not etymological but factual, "I asked him from the Lord." (On the form שְׁמוּאֵל see Gesen. 44, 2, Rem. 2.) According to this explanation the name שְׁמוּאֵל (which belongs to two other persons only, Numb. xxiv. 21; 1 Chr. vii. 2) is formed by contraction from שְׁמוּעָה, the y falling out (Ewald, Gr. § 275, A. 3). The Rabbinical derivation from שְׁמוּעָה and אֵל, whence שְׁמוּעָה אֵל and שְׁמוּעָה אֵל is far-fetched and improbable. [That is, "asked of God"]. The name signifies literally "heard of God," auditus Dei. For Samuel was for his mother the sign of a special answer to prayer. Similar names of children, suggested by their mothers' experiences at their birth, are found elsewhere, for example, in Jacob's children (Gen. xxix. 32 sq.; xxx. 5 sq.).—The omission of "and she said" is original; the Sept. has clearly again here filled out and explained (against Thenius). Hannah's saying, introduced without this addition, is thereby characterized as an explanation, historically handed down, of this name in reference to what preceded Samuel's birth. [This whole incident is discussed in the Talmudical Tract "Berakoth," fol. 31 b, but the discussion offers nothing of special value.—Tr.].

* [So the Voss. Chald. "bad countenance;" Syriac "disturbed count." Vulg. "in diuersa mentis." Arab. "changed on account of the reproach of her rival;" Sept. "her countenance no longer fell."—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.*

[This is the appropriate place to introduce a brief statement of the chronological relation between the latter part of "Judges" (end of chap. xvi.) and the beginning of "Samuel." We shall not attempt to discuss the various schemes of the chronology which have been presented by different writers, but merely give the biblical data for determining the chronological relations of Samson, Eli, and Samuel. The first datum is given in 1 Kings vi. 1, and, putting the fourth year of Solomon B. C. 1012, fixes the Exodus in B. C. 1492, the entrance into Canaan B. C. 1452, while David's accession falls B. C. 1056. The second datum is found in Jephthah's statement, Judg. xi. 26, according to which the beginning of his judgeship falls 300 years after the entrance into Canaan, that is, B. C. 1152. From this time to the death of Abdon (Judg. xii. 7-15) is thirty-one years, and Abdon's death is to be put B. C. 1121. We have thus between the death of Abdon and the accession of David a space of sixty-five years in which to put Samson, Eli, Samuel, and Saul. It is clear that their histories must be in part contemporaneous. Eli dies an old man, while Samuel is yet a youth, and Samuel is an old man when Saul is anointed king. The following table may give approximately the periods of these men:

Samson's Judgeship,	B. C. 1120-1100
Eli's Life (98 years)	" 1208-1110
Eli's Judgeship (40 years)	" 1150-1110
Samuel's Life	" 1120 (or 1130)-1060
Saul's Reign	" 1076-1056

According to this view the judgeships of Samson and Eli were in part contemporaneous, and Samuel was twenty (or thirty) years old when Samson died, the work of the latter being confined to the west and south-west, while Samuel lived chiefly in the centre of the land. The forty years of Philistine oppression (Judg. xiii. 1) would then be reckoned B. C. 1120-1080, reaching nearly up to Saul's accession, and the third battle of Ebenezer would fall in B. C. 1080 when Samuel was forty years old. Hannah's visit to Shiloh occurred about (or, a little before) the time that Samson began to vex the Philistines, but it is probable that the hostilities were confined to the territories of Judah and Dan. Partly for this reason, and partly because the history has been given already in the Book of Judges, our author does not mention Samson, whose life had no point of contact with that of Samuel, who is the theocratic-prophetic centre of the Books of Samuel. On the general subject see Herzog, Art. "Zeitrechnung (biblische)", Smith's Dict. of Bible, Art. "Chronology," Comm. on Judges in Lange's Bible-work, and Smith's Old Testament Hist., chap. 17, Note (A) and ch. 19, Note (A). But it is doubtful whether we have sufficient data at present for settling the question.—Tr.]

1. The beginning of the Book of Samuel coincides

* [The German is "Religionsgeschichtliche und biblisch-theologische Ausführungen," literally "theocratico-historical and biblical-theological developments (or comments)."—Tr.]

with a principal turning-point in the history of the kingdom of God in Israel, introducing us into the end of the Period of the Judges, which is to be included with the Mosaic under one point of view, namely, that of the establishment of the Theocracy on its objective foundations. The Mosaic Period of the development of the Israelitish religion—which is based on God's revelation in the Patriarchal Period in order to the choice of the one people as the bearer of the Theocracy, first in germinal form in the family, and then in its first national development in Egypt—shows us the firm establishment of the Divine Rule, which embraced and shaped the whole life of the people, on the theocratic law-covenant, and on the word of the divine promise. The establishment of the Rule of God in His people, in their outer and inner life, in all things great and small, by means of the institution of the Law, in which His holy will is the norm for the people's life, is the aim of the whole revelation of God in the Mosaic Period, as it appears in commandments, statutes, holy institutions, and legal principles. The land in which this God-rule in the chosen people was to reach historical form and development, was the object of the promises in the Patriarchal Period, and the period of Joshua and the Judges shows how this promise was fulfilled in the acquisition and division of the land. What sudden changes, from complete defeats to glorious victories in battle against the heathen peoples in and out of the land of promise, from divine deliverances to apparently complete abandonment by God, as a consequence of the vacillation of the people between idolatrous apostasy from the living God, and return to His help forced on them by need and misery, are exhibited in the history of the post-Mosaic times! But through all the gloom shines out continually the goal, the fulfilment of the promise of the complete possession of the land; and in the midst of the people's sin and misery the Theocracy stands fast unshaken, with its Mosaic law controlling the popular life, and all its great objective institutions which, even in times of most wretched disorder, marked Israel as the chosen people of the living God. The Mosaic period of development of the Theocracy in Israel up to the end of the period of the Judges is therefore the time of its establishment in the chosen people by the institution of the covenant of the law and the geographical-historical realization of the idea of the Theocracy in the permanently acquired land of promise.

But now came the task of bringing the people, they being at rest and permanently fixed in Canaan, face to face with their theocratic destination and their calling (Ex. xix. 6) in their whole inner and outer life. The content of the revelations, which had produced the covenant of the law and the fulfilling of the promise in the Mosaic Period, was to be inwardly appropriated and become the life of the people in knowledge, heart and will. For this there was needed on God's side the progressive realization and announcement of His counsel of revelation; and on man's side there was the unceasing obligation to penetrate with the whole inner life, with understanding and feeling, with mind and will, into God's revelation in law and promise, and appropriate inwardly its content. This task—the deep, inward implanting of the revelation of God in law and promise in the heart and feeling of individuals and in the life of the whole nation—could be fulfilled neither by the judges, the lives of some of whom corresponded poorly to their theocratic calling, nor by the priesthood, which showed its fall from its original theocratic elevation in the transition from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar and in the house of Eli, nor by the mere existence and use of the objective theocratic-historical institutions, national sanctuary, feasts, offerings. This impossibility is vividly set before us in the beginning of the Books of Samuel. But we are there at the same time pointed to the new element in the development of the Theocracy, the prophetic office, which was to be the instrument of fulfilling this task, and of realizing the idea of mediation between God and His people through their living permeation by* His objective revelation of word and promise; so Moses, as type of prophecy, represented it. The turning-point from the Mosaic to the prophetic period of development of the Theocracy falls in the beginning of the Books of Samuel; that is, in the first years of Samuel's life. (Comp. Oehler, Prolegom. zur Theol. des A. T., 1845, pp. 87, 88; and W. Hoffmann, Die göttliche Stufenordnung im A. T. in Schneider's Deutsche Zeitschrift, 1854, Nr. 7, 8.) From Samuel's time Peter (Acts iii. 24) dates the prophetic office; from then on the prophets, devoted to the service of the Theocracy, form a separate Order, and, as organs of God's revelations to His people, a continuous chain. (See Tholuck, Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen, 2 ed. 1861, p. 26.)

2. The end of the Period of the Judges, like its previous history, reveals a deep disorder of the theocratic life, which neither judges nor priests could help, because they were themselves affected by its corrupting influences, as is shown by the histories of Samson and Eli. The unimportance and weakness to which the Judgeship was fallen may be inferred from its connection with the High-priesthood in the person of Eli, the latter office having evidently passed from Phinehas' family to Ithamar's, contrary to the promise in Num. xxv. 11-13, because the condition of "zeal for the Lord" was not fulfilled. And the conduct of Eli and his sons, and especially God's judgment against his house, show how badly the High-priesthood was represented in him. The political life of the nation was crushed under the constant oppression of external enemies, the heathen nations on the east, and especially the Philistines on the west, and under internal national distraction; the tribes were at enmity with one another, did not unite against foreign foes, and could gather together "as one man" only against one of themselves (Benjamin), and that was the last time (Judg. xix.-xxi.).† And though individual men, called of the Lord to be deliverers, exerted a mighty influence on the distracted national life, yet their influence was restricted to particular tribes, and was not permanent—was always followed by a sinking back into the old wretched condition.

The cause of this was the deterioration of religious life, which was wide-spread among the people; the worship of the living Covenant-God was mingled with the nature-worship of the Canaanitish nations, not all of whom were completely conquered, and especially with the Baal-worship of the Philistines; or it was suppressed by these heathen worships. Gideon's ephod-worship (Judg. viii. 27) and Micah's image-worship (Judg. xvii., xviii.) belonged also to this corruption of the religion of Jehovah. With this moral decline and distraction of theocratic life was connected corruption of moral life, such as we see in some parts of Samson's history (he succumbs morally, as well as physically, to the Philistines), in the crime of the Benjamites (Judg. xix.), which calls forth all the rest of the nation against them in stubborn, bloody war, and in the unworthy character of the sons of Eli, who disgrace the sanctuary itself with their wickedness. The whole popular life had fallen into an anarchy in which "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judg. xxi. 25).

3. The necessity for a reformation of the whole national life from within outward, that is, a renewal of the whole Theocracy on a religious-moral basis meets us at the beginning of the Books of Samuel. The holy institutions, the ordinances of divine worship, and the theocratic legislation of the Mosaic Period are present indeed in the time of the Judges (comp. the exegetical explanations). The people had their national central sanctuary in Shiloh as sign of God's abode among His people, celebrated their festivals, and brought their offerings there. The priestly service in the sanctuary was arranged; the nazirate and the institution of holy women* in connection with the sanctuary were the special forms of consecration of life to Jehovah's service. It is a false view to regard the time of the Judges as a period of fermentation, out of which first arose fixed legal institutions and appointments. Rather the whole Mosaic legislation and the history of the establishment of the Theocracy on the basis of the covenant of law is in many places presupposed in the Book of Judges and in the beginning of the Books of Samuel themselves (comp. Hengst., Beitr. III. 40 sq. [Eng. transl., "Contributions to an Introd. to the Pentateuch," Clark, Edinb.]). But it is true (as is expressly stated in Judg. ii. 10 sq.), that in the religious-moral life of the people there was a general defection from the living God to strange gods. Though in particular circles and families (as Samuel's, for ex.) there was true service of God and piety, yet the national and political life of the distracted and shattered people was on the whole not in the least in keeping with its priestly calling. The gap between the people's religious-moral condition on the one hand, and the theocratic institutions and the demands of the divine law on the other was become so wide and deep, that a great reformer was needed, who, by special divine call and in the might of the Spirit of God, should turn the whole national life to the living God again, and make Him its unifying centre. To this need of a reformation of the Theocracy by new revelations of the covenant-God, and by the return of the covenant-people to communion with their God answered the special divine working by which the prophetic office, instead of the priesthood, was united with the true theocratic Judgeship in the mighty God-filled personality of Samuel.

* [Germ: durch das Flügelgewand seines objectiven Offenbarungswortes, etc.—Ta.]

† [This civil war occurred, however, soon after Joshua, since Phinehas, grandson of Aaron, was then High-priest (Judg. xx. 28): whether there was afterwards a general national uprising, we do not know.—Ta.]

* [See note on 1 Sam. ii. 22.—Ta.]

4. The special divine working shows itself in the providential plan by which God chose and prepared the great instrument for leading His people into the path, in which they were to find their holy calling and merge their whole life in the divine rule and communion. The reformer of the Theocracy, the second Moses, sprang from a thoroughly pious family, faithful and obedient to the law of the Lord. In its very commencement his life is specially consecrated by the hearing which God vouchsafed to the prayer of his pious mother for a son. In the same Tribe, whence came the saviour of the people from the bondage of Egypt and the founder of the Theocracy through God's wonderful working, and which by divine appointment represented the whole people in the Sanctuary-service, was born the man of God, who in the highest sense as Prophet of the Lord, was all his life to do priestly service in renewing the theocratic life, and restore it from its alienation from the living God to communion with Him. Specially also it was the energy and earnestness of his mother's piety which from the first gave to this great man's life the direction and determination by which he became God's instrument for the regeneration of His people. Hannah, in devoting her child to the perpetual service of the Lord (thus giving Him back what her prayer had obtained from Him), did unconsciously and silently, under the guidance of the Spirit of the Lord, a holy deed, which, taken into the plan of the divine wisdom, was the beginning of that series of great God-deeds by which, through this chosen instrument, a new turn of world-historical importance was given to the history of Israel. The name which she gives her son marks him out for the people as an immediate gift of God, through which, as Calvin says, "God in His mercy ordained a reformation of His worship in the people."

5. In Samuel's early life we see again the importance (even for the Kingdom of God) of theocracy of a truly pious family-life in the Old Dispensation. There were still in Israel houses and families in which the children (who, according to the Law, were not usually carried to the great feasts celebrated at the Sanctuary), were introduced to the public religious life, and accustomed to the religious service of the people; and this is a sign that, in spite of the desolation of the theocratic life and the degradation of the religious-moral life, there still lay hidden in domestic life a sound germ of true piety and fear of God. From this uncorrupted vigorous germ which appears religiously in the earnest life of prayer of the parents, and ethically in their tender, considerate conjugal love, Samuel's life sprouts forth as a plant consecrated from its root directly to the Lord's special service.

6. Thus the religious-moral life was not so far gone that it could not, by God's power, produce from the narrow circle of the house and family such a person as Samuel; nor, in spite of the general depravation and disruption of the theocratic-national life, was it impossible for Samuel, as God's instrument sprung from this soil, to find positive points of connection and a responsive receptivity for his work of reform as Judge and Prophet. The spirit which gave shape to his childhood and youth from the first moments of his life, had shown itself, sporadically it is true, yet living and powerful in individual facts in the time of the Judges (comp. Deborah's Song, Judg. v.; Gideon's word "Jehovah shall rule over you," Judg. viii. 23; and especially the energetic reaction of the theocratic seal of the whole people against the Tribe of Benjamin, who, contrary to the command "be ye holy," had refused to deliver up the offenders, by whose execution evil was to be put away out of the midst of Israel, Judg. xx.) The prophetic reformer, called by God out of the domain of a deeply pious family-life, found in that theocratical spirit, which was concealed under the general corruption, the receptive ground on which he could plant himself in order to gather the whole people about the living God and His word, and press His revelations into their very heart and soul.

7. The divine name Jehovah Sabaoth (יהוה צבאות), which does not occur in the Pentateuch or in the Books of Joshua and Judges, is found here for the first time, and seems to have come into general use particularly in the time of Samuel and David (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 2, xvii. 45; 2 Sam. vii. 8, 26 sq.; Ps. xxiv. 10). It seldom occurs in the Books of Kings, is found most frequently in the Prophets, except Ezekiel and Daniel, and never in Job, Proverbs, the later Psalms and the post-exilic historical books, except in Chronicles in the history of David, where it is to be referred to the original documents.—The word 'Sabaoth' is never found in the Old Test. alone. The Sept. sometimes gives it as a proper name, Σαβαώθ, as here, where it has also the full form κύριος ὁ θεὸς (Lord God), which answers to the proper complete expression of this divine name, Jehovah God of Sabaoth (יהוה אלֹהֵי צבָאוֹת comp. Am. iii. 18; iv. 13; v. 14; or יהוה צבָאוֹת), of which Jehovah Sabaoth is an abbreviation.*

The signification "God of war" (see Ex. vii. 4; xii. 41, where Israel is called "the hosts of Jehovah," יהוה צבָאוֹת) cannot be regarded as the original sense of this expression, though the latter includes the glory of God manifested in His victorious power over His enemies. If this were the proper and original signification, it would be inexplicable why the name is wanting precisely in the histories of those wars and battles, which were Jehovah's own (Num. xxi. 14), though

* And as the combination אלֹהֵי צבָאוֹת is not unfrequent (Ps. lxx. 6; lxxx. 5, 8, 15, 20; lxxxiv. 9) and in the mas. text the יהוה, when אלֹהֵי precedes, never has the points of אלֹהֵי but always of אלֹהִים—and further as the word יהוה as a proper name cannot be construed with a Gen.—the combination יהוה צבָאוֹת is not to be taken as stat. const., but as a breviloquence or ellipsis, the general notion "God" being supplied from the proper name Jehovah. So (against Gesenius and Ewald) Oehler in Herzog & v. Hengstenberg, Christologie i. 436 sq. (Eng. tr. i. 376) and Kell, Comm. 16 (Eng. trans. p. 19). [See Smith's Bib. Dict., Am. ed., Sabaoth.—Ta.]

Israel is expressly called His "hosts." Appeal is made in support of this signification to passages like 1 Sam. xvii. 45 (God of the armies of Israel), and Ps. xxiv. 8-10, (Jehovah strong and mighty, mighty in battle); but as these phrases are attached to the name "Jehovah of Hosts," they show (as Hengstenberg, on Ps. xxiv., and Oehler, ubi sup. point out) that the latter means something different, that "Jehovah of Hosts" means something higher than "Israel's God of war." Its meaning must be derived from Gen. ii. 1, where דָּמַי "the host of them" refers properly only to "heavens"—and only by zeugma to "earth" (Oehler). Comp. Ps. xxxiii. 6; Deut. iv.

19; Neh. ix. 6, where דָּמַי-לָךְ "all the host of them" refers exclusively to the heavens. "The hosts are always the heavenly hosts, not created things in general" (Hengstenberg). They are of two classes, however, the material, the stars, and the spiritual, the angels. In reference to the stars as the "host of heaven" (Ps. xxxiii. 6) and the "host of God," praise is rendered to God's power and government of the world, by which He controls these glorious objects (Isa. xl. 26; xlv. 13), against the Sabian worship of the stars as divine powers, and against the danger to which Israel was exposed of perversion to such star-worship. This danger became great enough in the Period of the Judges and in the beginning of the Kingly Period to make the supposition allowable that the expression, with the sense of opposition to idolatry, came into use at this time. In Isa. xxiv. 23 this meaning of Jehovah Sabaoth comes out unmistakably in the reference to God's creative power which is loftier than the splendor of the stars, and in the contrast between His worship and that of the stars. The reference of the name "God of hosts" in Ps. lxxxix. 8 sq. to the angels is equally certain. The angels are marshalled around Jehovah in heaven, awaiting His commands, ready to perform His will on earth, especially as His instruments for the execution of His will in grace and judgment, for the protection of His people, for the overthrow of His enemies (1 Kings xxii. 19 sq.; Job i. 2); they go along with God in the revelation of His judicially power and glory (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 18); they form the Lord's heavenly battle-host (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2; Josh. v. 14 sq.; 2 Kings vi. 17). By the reference to the two hosts, of stars and angels, which represent the creation in its loftiest and most glorious aspect, this expression sets forth the living God in His majesty and omnipotence over the highest created powers, who are subject to His control and instruments of the exercise of His royal might and power in the world. But God's glory, in His majesty and power over the star-world, and in His lordship over the spirit-world which stands ready to do His bidding in the world, exhibits Him of necessity in His royal omnipotent control of the whole world; and so "Jehovah Sabaoth" means in several passages the almighty controlling world-God, who has His throne in heaven, of whose glory the whole world is full, who "is called the God of the whole earth," who "buildeth His upper-chamber in heaven, and foundeth His arch on the earth." So Ps. xxiv. 8-10; Isa. vi. 3; liv. 5; Am. ix. 5, 6. In connection with the name "Jehovah" the expression indicates, with special reference to Israel, the almighty and victorious God, who overcomes the enemies of His people and His kingdom, who is the protection and help of His people against all the powers of the world.—The name occurs frequently in connection with wars and victories, in which God helps and protects His people against hostile powers; 1 Sam. xv. 2; xvii. 45; 2 Sam. vii. 8, 26 sq.; Ps. xxiv. 10; xlv. 8, 12; lxxx. 8, 15; Isa. xxiv. 21-23; xxv. 4-6; xxxi. 4, 5. This name of God, Lord of Hosts, first appears in the beginning of the Books of Samuel, near the end of the Judges, and just before the kingdom was established, and occurs most frequently in the time of the Kings; and this fact has its deepest ground herein, that during this time God's royal power as almighty lord and ruler of the world and heavenly king of Israel first unfolded itself in all its fulness and glory—in victories over the enemies of His kingdom in Israel, in the almighty protection which He vouchsafed His people in the land of promise, and in the powerful aid which He gave them in establishing, fixing and extending the theocratic kingly power.*

8. A characteristic mark of Hannah's sincere piety is the vow (v. 11) which she makes to the Lord. The vow, from the Old Testament-point of view, is the solemn promise by which the pious man binds and pledges himself, in case his prayer is heard or his wish fulfilled, to show his thankfulness for the Lord's goodness by the performance of some special outward thing. Hence vows are almost always connected with petitions, though never as if they were the ground for God's fulfilment of the request. The positive vow (נִדָּר), the promise of a special offering as a sign of gratitude, includes also the negative element of self-denial, so far as it is a relinquishment of one's own possessions, which are given to the Lord. This custom—namely, by a special promise making a particular act or mode of conduct a moral duty, and basing the obligation of performance not on the divine will, but on a vow made without divine direction—answers to the legal standpoint of the Old Testament and the moral minority founded on it. Forbearing to vow, was however, by no means regarded as sinful (Deut. xxii. 22); thus not only was the moral principle of voluntariness brought out, but the idea that the vow was in itself meritorious, was excluded. The vow, as a custom corresponding to moral weakness and consciousness of untrustworthiness in obedience to the Lord, is never legally commanded, nor even advised (comp. Prov. xx. 25; Ecc. v. 4, with Deut. xxiii. 22); but it is required that a vow made freely shall be fulfilled (Num. xxx. 3; Deut. xxiii. 21, 23; Ps. l. 14; Ecc. v. 3). But, as the hearing of a prayer is conditioned strictly on true piety, so, that a vow should be well-pleasing to the Lord, presupposes an humble, thankful soul which feels itself pledged and bound to the Lord, to devote everything to Him. The ethical idea of the vow finds its realization and fulfilment, as well as its clear and true apprehension, from the New Testament stand-point also in the vowing and dedicating to the Lord for life in baptism the personality renewed by the Holy Ghost, (who in the Old Testament also is recognized and prayed for as the source of sanctification, Ps. li.). Hannah's vow is an analogue of Christian baptism in so far as it (the vow) consecrates the life of the child obtained by prayer wholly to the Lord for His property and for permanent service according to the stand-point of Old Testament piety, but this from the New Testament point of view comes to full truth only in the free spiritual devotion of the heart and the whole life to the Lord. [There is no warrant for introducing the lower Old Testament conception into an ordinance of the New Testament. Christian baptism, into the name of the Trinity, sets forth the free and full consecration of the believer to God, as Dr. Erdmann points out, and is no otherwise a vow, is never so spoken of in the New Testament.—Tr.].

* [For a good exposition of "Jehovah Sabaoth," see Plumptre's "Biblical Studies"—Ta.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.*

Ver. 2. Holy Scripture lets us see how not merely single sins in disposition, word and deed, but also general conditions and customs which spring from sin—such as polygamy—are the object of God's patience and long-suffering, and how there is in this no hindrance to the purposes of God's love and wisdom, but rather all such things are overruled by Him for good. [HALL: Ill customs, where they are once entertained, are not easily discharged: polygamy, besides carnal delight, might now plead age and example; so as even Elkanah, though a Levite, is tainted with the sin of Lamech, like as fashions of attire, which at the first were disliked as uncomely, yet, when they are once grown common, are taken up of the gravest. Yet this sin, as then current with the time, could not make Elkanah not religious.—Tr.]. CRAMER: God distributes His gifts in a wonderful manner, to one He gives, the other He suffers to want, Gen. xxix. 31. Temporal gifts God gives not only to the worthy, but also to the unworthy, Matt. v. 45.—Ver. 3. STARKE: Worship stands first, to show with what devoutness and reverence he makes his offering, and at the same time that praying is better than offering. [Comp. CORNELIUS: "Thy prayers and thine alms," Acts x. 4.—Tr.].—The offering was the deed which established the truthfulness of the praying word. CALVIN: This subject-matter of adoration is to be referred to the three following heads: first, that when about to adore God we recognise that we owe all things to Him, and in giving thanks for past blessings we implore a still further increase of His gifts, and help in difficulties and perplexities; secondly, that confessing our sins as suppliant and guilty, we pray Him to grant us true knowledge of our sins and repentance, and to have mercy on us who pray for pardon; thirdly and finally, that denying ourselves and taking His yoke upon our shoulders, we profess ourselves ready to render Him due obedience, and to conform our affections to the rule of His law and to His will alone. [Ver. 4. The whole family take part in the feast of the peace-offerings. So as to the idol-worship in Jer. vii. 18, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven." Both this passage and that, as to true religion and false, may impress upon us the importance of family worship and family religion.—Tr.].—Vers. 4–8. Elkanah's love to Hannah is a model of the true inner love with which husbands should not merely love their wives in general, but as regards their special troubles and sorrows, instead of being worried and vexed at them should rather feel these as their own, and with them bear in patience and gentleness whatever lies heavy upon their heart and weighs them down (ver. 5), and also protect them against provocations and vexations, which in an unrighteous and ill-disposed way are inflicted upon them (vers. 6, 7), and refresh them with consolation and encouragement (ver. 8).—[Ver. 5. Children were regarded as a blessing, by Hannah and the women of Israel in general (comp. Gen. xxx. 23; Luke i. 25), and the lack of them as a sad deprivation; and the correctness of this view is distinctly confirmed by the inspired writers, Ps. cxlii. 9; cxxvii. 3–5; cxxviii. 8. The contrary feeling which is now so rapidly growing in America is evil, both in its causes and in its consequences. The subject would require delicate handling in public discourse, but is exceedingly important.—Tr.]. When the Lord refuses us a gift which we are begging Him to grant, and the heart is full of mourning at the deprivation, then the temptation lies near to grumble about it against the Lord and quarrel with Him. This temptation comes partly from our own heart, which is a perverse and desponding thing, and will not reconcile itself to the dispensation of the Lord; partly it comes in upon us from without, through men who by their unloving conduct excite and embitter our hearts, and infuse into them the poison of discontent with those leadings of the Lord which contradict our desire and hope (vers. 6, 7).—In a devout marriage the love of the one party should not merely be to the other a fountain of consolation and of quieting as to painful dispensations of the Lord, but for whatever by the Lord's will is lacking in good fortune and joy it should seek to offer all the richer compensation (ver. 8).—Every violation of the holy ordering of God upon which marriage and the family life should rest, has as a necessary consequence—as is true of bigamy here—its punishment in the grievous disorder of conjugal and domestic life, in the destruction of peace in heart and home by all manner of sins, such as envy and jealousy.—Hannah makes no reply to the bad words of her adversary, and bears her hostility with patience.—STARKE (ver. 7): A Christian must not requite evil with evil, railing with railing, but bear all patiently and hope in God; for His hand can change every thing (Ps. lxxvii. 11 [Eng. A. V. ver. 10. LUTHER translates it: "But I said, I must suffer that; the right hand of the most High can change everything," but this rendering is not authorized by the Hebrew.—Tr.]).—Ver. 8. SEE. SCHMID: For the lack of one good, God knows how to compensate the pious by a greater and more manifest good.—J. LANGE: As the marriage-bond is much closer than that between parents and children, it follows that husband and wife must hold each other nearer and dearer than all children. Each must help to bear the other's burdens, and seek to lighten them, Gal. vi. 2.

* [In the German literally "homiletical hints."—Tr.]

Vers. 1-8. The priestly calling of the man in his house: 1) in the close connection of his whole house with the service in the house of the Lord (prayer and offering); 2) in the nurture and admonition of the children for the Lord; 3) in expelling and keeping at a distance the evil spirit of unlovingness and dissension amid the members of the family; 4) in the constant exhibition of faithful, comforting, helping love towards his wife.—A truly pious house is that which 1) is at home in God's house, 2) diligently performs divine service in prayer and offering, in which 3) tender and true conjugal love dwells, and 4) the sufferings and deprivations imposed by the Lord are borne with patience and resignation.—The preservation of genuine piety amid domestic troubles: 1) in persevering prayer, when the Lord proves faith by not fulfilling particular wishes and hopes; 2) in enduring patience towards vexatious members of the family; 3) in consoling and supporting love towards members of the family who are easily assailed.—Vers. 9-14. Amid vexations and assaults, what should impel us to prayer? 1) The certainty that if men do us hurt, it does not occur without Divine permission. 2) The feeling that even the best human consolation cannot satisfy the heart which thirsts to be consoled. 3) Firm confidence in the help of the Lord, who in His faithfulness will help and in His power can help, when men will not help or cannot.—[CHRYSOSTOM: When standing to pray she did not remember her adversary, did not speak of her revilings, did not say, "Avenge me of this vile and wicked woman," as many women do; but not often remembering those reproaches, she prayed only for things profitable to herself. This do thou also do, O man—do not pray against thy enemy, but beseech God to put an end to thy dependency, to quench thy grief. By so doing this woman derived the greatest benefits from her enemy. For her enemy contributed to the bearing of the child. And how, I will tell. When she reproached her and made her distress greater, from the distress her prayer became more intense, the prayer drew God's favor and made Him consent, and so Samuel was born. So then if we be watchful, not only will our enemies be unable to do us hurt, but they will even bring us the greatest benefits, making us more zealous towards every thing.—TR.]—The prayer of faith in heart-grief and trouble: 1) Its nature is that the heart (a) weeps itself out before the Lord, to whom tears wept before Him are well-pleasing, (b) pours out all its sorrow before the Lord, who wishes us to cast all outward cares upon Him; 2) Its reliance is (a) on the power of the "Lord of Sabaoth" to help, (b) upon His faithfulness, wherein He knows the special grief and woe of His children, and does not forget them; 3) It leads (a) to a firm hope that the request will be heard and granted, (b) to a joyful vow, that what the Lord graciously gives shall be thankfully given back to Him.—What parents, especially mothers, so rear their children as to honor and please the Lord? Those who 1) bear them, from the beginning of their life, prayerfully on the heart, 2) devote them, for their whole life, as an offering to the Lord.—The highest appreciation of children's souls consists in 1) regarding them as a gracious gift from the Lord, and 2) designing them as a grateful gift to the Lord.—[HALL: The way to obtain any benefit is to devote it, in our hearts, to the glory of that God of whom we ask it: by this means shall God both pleasure His servant, and honor Himself.—TR.]

Ver. 12. STARKE: A devout prayer must proceed from the very bottom of the heart, and may be offered without outward words as with them, Psalm xix. 15 [14]; xxvii. 8; lxii. 9 [8], Isa. xxix. 13, 14.—Vers. 13, 14. A Christian should not be too swift in judging, Luke vi. 37; 1 Cor. iv. 5; Prov. xvii. 27. Even upon pious or innocent people there are often many unjust judgments passed. J. LANGE: We must be very careful in deciding from appearances, lest we sin against our neighbor, Acts ii. 13. Even pious teachers may err and mistake in judging their hearers, and regard some as ungodly who are truly pious.—Ver. 15. CRAMER: He who is reviled, let him revile not again, but save his innocence with mild words, Rom. xii. 17. [CHRYSOSTOM speaks eloquently of the fact that Hannah did not scornfully neglect, and did not bitterly resent, the unjust accusation.—TR.]—Prayer serves to lighten the heart; well for thee, O soul, if thou often seekest thus to lighten it, Ps. xlii. 5 [4]; lxii. 9 [8].—Ver. 17. OSLANDER: God is certain to hear our prayer, proceeding from true faith, and if He does not help us at all according to our will and as seems good to us, yet this is done for our best good, as He knows that it is most profitable for us.—When one has erred he should confess it, and also recall his error.—[HALL: Even the best may err, but not persist in it. When good natures have offended, they are unquiet till they have hastened satisfaction.—TR.]—Ver. 18. J. LANGE: It is a property of faith that it makes the heart happy and joyous for everything.—Ver. 19. STARKE: A Christian must not only pray, but work; both bring blessings, Ps. cxxviii. 2.—CRAMER: Although God never forgets His own, yet He often acts as if a stranger, Ps. xiii. 2 [1]; Jer. xiv. 8; Song of Sol. ii. 9.—STARKE: When pious parents receive their children with calling on God and in His fear, then is every child a Samuel.—OSLANDER: When we have received a benefit from God, we should not forget gratitude to Him.

Vers. 12-20. The fervent prayer of troubled souls: 1) measures itself not by time, but exalts the soul above time into eternity; 2) troubles itself not about human observation and judgment, but is a pouring out of the heart before the living God; 3) suffers not itself to sink into grief and sorrow, but has for its fruit a joy given by the Lord.—Defence against unjust accusations: 1) For what purpose? As a tribute to truth, for the honor of the Lord, for the maintenance of our own moral worth; 2) In what manner? In quietness and gentleness without sinful passion, in humility and modesty; 3) By God's help, with what result? Convincing the accusers of their wrong, changing their bad words into blessings, lightening our own heart of a heavy load.—The naming of children no indifferent matter for pious parents: Thankfully regarding the grace of the Lord, who has given them; 2) Earnestly regarding the destination for the Lord, to whom they are to lead them.

SECOND SECTION.

Samuel's Consecration and Restoration to the Lord.

CHAP. I. 21-28.

I. The child Samuel at home till he is weaned. Vers. 21-23.

- 21 And the man Elkanah and all his house went up to offer unto the Lord 22 [Jehovah] the yearly sacrifice, and his vow. But Hannah went not up; for she said unto her husband, I will not go up until the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord [Jehovah], and there abide 23 for ever. And Elkanah her husband said unto her, Do what seemeth thee good; tarry until thou have weaned him; only the Lord [Jehovah] establish his word.
 So the woman abode, and gave her son suck until she weaned him.

II. Samuel given back by his mother to the Lord. Vers. 24-28.

- 24 And when she had weaned him, she took him up with her, with three bullocks, and one ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine, and brought him unto the house of 25 the Lord [Jehovah] in Shiloh; and the child was young. And they slew a [the] 26 bullock, and brought the child to Eli. And she said, O my lord, as thy soul liveth, my lord, I am the woman that stood by thee here, praying [to pray] unto the Lord 27 [Jehovah]. For this child I prayed; and the Lord [Jehovah] hath given me my 28 petition which I asked of him: Therefore also I have lent [given] him to the Lord [Jehovah]; as long as he liveth he shall be lent [he is given] to the Lord [Jehovah].
 And he worshipped the Lord [Jehovah] there.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 28. Erdmann renders: I have made him one prayed for (asked, erbeten) to the Lord as long as he lives; he is asked to the Lord (for the Lord). See Exegetical Notes in loco.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21. And the man Elkanah and all his house went up. This he did yearly, in order to present the offering of the days and the vow. The "offering of the days" is the annual offering, the offering which every Israelite was obliged and accustomed to present annually. "The offering of the days and the vow" is the brief statement of what is detailed at length in the Law. In going up with his whole house, Elkanah did as is commanded in Deut. xii. 17, 18: "Thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil, or the firstlings of thy herds or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, nor thy freewill-offerings, or offering of thine hand; but thou must eat them before the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, thou and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates; and thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God." The offering of the days "is, as it were, the yearly reckoning with the Lord, the presentation of those portions of the property which fall to him in the course of the year." Hengstenberg, Beit. [Contributions to an Introd.

to the Pent.] III., 89, 90.—The Sing. "his vow" refers to the vow which Elkanah also had made based on the hearing of Hannah's prayer. The addition of the Sept., "and all the tithes of his land" is, like the plural "his vows," to be referred to the translator's having in mind the above-quoted passage. Thenius (ad locum) remarks that the corresponding words וְכָל-תְּעֻבֹתָיו אֲרָצָה (and all the tithes of his land) were probably purposely omitted by transcribers who regarded Samuel's Levitical descent as certain, according to 1 Chron. vi. 7 sq. and 19 sq.; but Josephus, who expressly describes Elkanah as a Levite, and follows the Alexandrine translation, has the addition also. It belongs to the category of explanatory additions and changes of which the Sept. is so full.

Ver. 22. After the child is weaned from his mother's breast, Hannah will bring him to the Sanctuary. That the Heb. verb (נָסַךְ) means here "to wean," and does not include the idea of education (Seb. Schmid) as in 1 Kings xi. 20, is plain from the "gave suck," (נָתַן) in ver. 23. The ground adduced for this opinion, namely, that the child would otherwise be troublesome to Eli, is of no force; for, apart from the fact that a child three years old (this was the term of weaning, according to 2 Mac. vii. 27*) is not troublesome in the East, his nurture and education could be committed to "the women that served at the door of the Tabernacle of meeting," (ch. ii. 22).—The "appearing before the Lord," for which Hannah will bring her son to Shiloh, supposes the existence there of the National Sanctuary instituted by Moses, and answers to the law (Ex. xxiii. 17; xxxiv. 23): "Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord Jehovah." The "abide for ever," all his life (עַלְיָם) indicates the life-long consecration to service in the Sanctuary from his weaning on, while otherwise this service was binding only from the 25th year to the 50th. By the education which the boy received in the Sanctuary he was even as a child to grow into the service; and moreover, as a child, he could perform little outward services (Then.), so that the objection, that, as a newly weaned child, he was unfit for the Temple-service, falls to the ground.

Ver. 23. Only the Lord establish His word, that is, maintain, fulfil it, bring it to completion. The "word" (דְּבָרִי) refers not merely to Eli's word, ver. 17, but to God's factual discourse, which consisted in hearing Hannah's prayer, and in the real promise which he had given, by the birth of the child, in reference to his destination to the service of the Lord. Bunsen excellently says: "Word, that is, may He fulfil what He designs with him and has promised by his birth, comp. vers. 11, 20. The words refer, therefore, to the boy's destination to the service of God, which the Eternal has in fact acknowledged by the partial fulfilment of the mother's wish." Similarly Calvin already: "Elkanah seeks from God, and suppliantly begs with prayers, that, since God has bestowed on him male offspring, He will consecrate him and make him fit for His service, and direct him by the power of His Holy Spirit, by which his service shall be grateful and acceptable to God." Since there is no express word of the Lord to which the "word" may be referred, the Sept. avoids the difficulty by translating (groundlessly) τὸ ἐξελεσθαι ἐκ τοῦ στόματός σου "that which came out of thy mouth." The Heb. text is not therefore to be changed (with Then.), to accord with the Sept., into "only, let thy word stand" (אֲנִי יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל). Clericus: "God had shown, not by words, but by very deed, that He approved Hannah's vow, and had promised her a living son; and Elkanah prays that He will perform His promise. There is therefore no need to invent with the Rabbis an oracle uttered to the mother concerning the child about to be born."

* [Rashi says 22 months; Kimchi and others 24 months. For other opinions see "Synopsis Criticorum" in loc. — Tr.]

† [Rashi: "The Bath-qol ('daughter of the voice') went forth, saying: there shall arise a just one whose name shall be Samuel. Then every mother who bore a son called him Samuel; but when they saw his actions, they said, this is not Samuel. But when this one was born and they saw his manner of life, they said, this is that Samuel; and this is what the Scripture means, when it says, 'the Lord confirm His word,' that Samuel may be that just one." — Tr.]

Ver. 24, sq. The case is the same here with the diverging translation of the Sept., "with a three-year-old bullock" [instead of "three bullocks"], which is occasioned by the singular "the bullock" of ver. 25. The contradiction between "three bullocks" and "one bullock" cannot indeed be removed (with Bunsen) by regarding the sing. as collective, Judg. vi. 25 being cited in support of it; but it may properly be said with Keil that "the bullock" in ver. 25 denotes specially the offering with which the boy was returned to the Lord, "the burnt-offering by which the boy was dedicated to the Lord for life-long service in His Sanctuary, the two other bullocks serving for the yearly offering." As it was understood that the two others were for the yearly festival-offering, that is, burnt-offering and thank-offering, it was not specially mentioned that they were sacrificed. Further, three bullocks are required by the quantity (one ephah) of flour which Elkanah takes with him, since, according to Num. xv. 8-10, three-tenths of an ephah of flour was required for a burnt-offering of one bullock. The peace-offering, like the burnt-offering, was connected with a meat- and drink-offering.—A striking example of the arbitrary fashion in which the Alex. translators got over difficulties in the text is found in their translation μετ' αὐτῶν "with them" at the end of ver. 24 [the Heb. reads "the child was a child"]; as if, instead of the difficult עַלְיָם ["child"], to which the sense requires the addition of the predicate "small," the text had read עִמָּם "with them."

The addition of the Sept. to ver. 24, "and his father slew the offering which he made annually to the Lord, and he brought the boy near," and the translation in ver. 25, "and he slew the bullock, and Hannah the mother of the child brought him to Eli" are to be explained as efforts at exegesis, and give us no ground to correct the Heb. text, as Thenius supposes. Not the mother alone, but both parents gave the boy over to Eli, and thus presented him as an offering to the Lord.

Ver. 26 sq. Hannah makes herself known to Eli by reminding him of the circumstances under which she had prayed for the child (ver. 11 sq.).*—On "stood" (עָמַדְתִּי) Clericus remarks: "they prayed to God standing." For the custom of standing in prayer comp. Gen. xviii. 22; xix. 27; Dan. ix. 20. In time of deeper devotion and emotion a kneeling posture also was adopted, (1 Kings viii. 54; 2 Chron. vi. 13; Ezra ix. 5).

Ver. 27. Three things move Hannah's soul deeply and joyfully: 1) The recollection of the moment when she stood here and called on God for this son; 2) the contemplation of the answer to her prayer, and the granting of the thing asked, and 3) the determination now to restore to the Lord what He had given her in this answer to her prayer.

* עָמַדְתִּי in connection with אֲנִי is an interjection, "Aha!" or "I beg!" or "truly, my lord." (Gen. xliii. 20; xlv. 18; Ex. iv. 10, 13; Num. xii. 11; Josh. vii. 8; 1 Kings iii. 17, 26). Many explain it as — "per me obsecro," citing the corresponding Arab oath "per me." Another explanation (Ges.) supposes a contraction of עָמַדְתִּי "request," since "in the Aramaic translations עָמַדְתִּי stands for the Heb. עָמַדְתִּי, for which the Samaritans at least wrote עָמַדְתִּי 'obsecro' without עָמַדְתִּי. Gen. xlii. 30." Ewald says: "Most probably עָמַדְתִּי is shortened from אָמַדְתִּי (Job xxxiv. 38; 1 Sam. xxiv. 12), a simple Interjection."

Ver. 28. "And also I" (וְגַם אֲנִי) refers back to the words "and the Lord hath given me," and implies a requital, et ego vicissim, "and I in my turn," (Cler.). "It cannot be shown that אֲנִי means "lend," as is generally assumed; it occurs in 1 Sam. i. 28, in the sense of "grant," "give." Knobel on Ex. xii. 36. Further, the signification "lend" is here inappropriate, because the "I also" expressly brings out the correspondence to the "gave," of ver. 27. אֲנִי means "cause to ask or demand," "grant what is demanded," "give." The sense is: the Lord gave him to me, and so have I also given him to the Lord, as one asked or demanded. Calvin: "The sense is plain enough, namely, that she gave, dedicated to God the child obtained from Him by prayer." The short concluding sentence "he is asked for the Lord," expresses her determination to give him to the Lord for His service.—"They prayed," not sing., referring to Elkanah, but plur., Elkanah and Hannah, (comp. ver. 19), Samuel not being included. [The plur. "they prayed" is easier, but the Heb. reads "he prayed," (though some regard the form as plur.), and so Chald.; Syr. Ar. Vulg. have the plur.; Sept. omits the clause. If taken as sing. it no doubt refers to Elkanah, who, as head of the household, represented his wife and conducted the worship. (So Abarbanel אַבְרָבָנֵל. This is the view of Keil and Wordsworth. The Bib. Comm. takes it as fem. sing., and makes Hannah the subject.—It is impossible to convey in an Eng. translation the fine play upon words of the Heb. in the principal sentence of this verse and the preceding. Literally it reads: The Lord has given me my asking which I asked of Him; and I also have caused the Lord to ask him; as long as he lives he is asked to the Lord. The contrast between the Qal and Hiph. of the verb "to ask"

(שָׁאַל) is brought out in Ex. xii. 35 (asked, not borrowed, as in Eng. A. V.) and 36 (gave, not lent). Keil and Erdmann make the Hiph. a denominative from שָׁאַל "asked" = "to make one asked," but there does not seem to be authority for this; the best rendering is "give."—Erdmann puts a semicolon after "liveth," but it is better, with Chald. Syr. and Eng. A. V., to put it after the first Jehovah.—The ancient vss. (except Vulg.) take the הִי־הִיא "is" here to be equivalent to הִיא־הִיא "lives," or perhaps read הִיא־הִיא and it is better to adopt the latter reading. Otherwise we must translate "and I also have given him to Jehovah all the days for which he was asked for Jehovah."—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The mother's determination, that the child should not be presented to the Lord in the Sanctuary till after he was weaned, was in keeping with the divine ordination that the child must first, in the bosom of natural maternal love, pass through the elementary conditions of the sustenance and earliest development of his physical life, before he could, in accordance with the divine destination, receive in the service of the Sanctuary the proper education and culture for his theocratic calling.

2. That God gives in answer to prayer, and that man devotes to God what he obtains, so that God takes again what He has given, or lays claim to it for the ends of His kingdom, is the law of reciprocity in the intercourse between the living God and His saints; the latter contribute nothing for the realization of the special ends of His kingdom, which they have not received from him, and are not by Him enabled to contribute.

3. Among the heroes of God's kingdom who have been brought to the Lord by the prayers of their mothers and consecrated as His instruments, Samuel is a shining example of the full, unselfish devotion of the whole life to the Lord's service, which is the condition of great profound capacity to further the kingdom of God.

4. An important principle of education is herein contained: every child should be devoted to the Lord's service, from the beginning of his life on, with self-denial and prayer; and, in accordance with this destination, should receive his life-direction by education, selfish parental love yielding to the counsel of the divine will. CALVIN: "Hannah, forgetting her own advantage, gives all the glory to God, thinking it would be well enough with her, if only God were glorified; and indeed it is right to yield to God all we have, whatever it may be." In the education of children the using them to the divine and holy must begin with the weaning.* From the beginning of his life the child must be "about his Father's business."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 21-23. The presentation of Samuel for constant service in the sanctuary. 1) What preceded it, according to Hannah's wish and Elkanah's consent (vers. 21, 22). 2) How it was performed, in bringing up Samuel to Shiloh and in delivering him to Eli and in prayer to the Lord (vers. 24-23).

Ver. 21. OSIANDER: After receiving divine benefits we should not be more slothful in performing divine service, but rather be so much the more diligent and industrious.—Pious mothers are performing acceptable divine service when they are rearing their children faithfully and in the fear of God.—It is no reproach to a man when he prefers his wife's better opinion to his own. [Ver. 23. MATT. HENRY: So far was he from delighting to cross her, that he referred it entirely to her. Behold, how good and pleasant a thing it is, when yoke-fellows thus draw even in the yoke, and accommodate themselves to one another; each thinking well of what the other does, especially in works of piety and charity.—Tr.]

Ver. 24. CRAMER: The rearing of children gives to parents, it is true, great toil and trouble, but when it is done in faith, it constitutes better works than when monks and nuns perform all their fasting, praying, castigations and indulgence-ceremonies; for those, not these, are enjoined by

* [The German is: mit der Entwöhnung schon hat die Gewöhnung . . . zu beginnen.—Tr.]

God in His word. Accordingly they are true acts of divine service, and receive from God their reward.

Ver. 25. VON GERLACH: That a three-year old boy should be already given over to the temple, was done in order that from the first awakening of his higher spiritual powers he might already be living amid these holy surroundings.—SEB. SCHMIDT: Children must at times be carried to divine service.—STARKE (vers. 26, 27): The wonders of God's goodness we should openly celebrate, and not keep silent about them. Ver. 28. Parents give their children back to God when they advance them to holy baptism, present them to God in prayer, and rear them in a Christian manner. [There are many who think this can be, and often is, quite as well performed without infant baptism as with it.—TR.]—CRAMER: We should devote to the ministry the best talents and dearest children.

[Ver. 28. Giving back to the Lord: 1) All we have was given by the Lord. 2) All we have should be really consecrated to Him, and regarded and treated as His. 3) The Lord will then make all promote both our good and His glory.—Vers. 10, 26-7. Agonizing supplication and joyful thanksgiving. Look on the two pictures and learn the lesson.—Chap. I. Hannah, her sorrows and her joys: I. Her sorrows. 1) She was childless. 2) She was derided and ridiculed. 3) She was unjustly accused by a good man. II. Her joys. 1) In the tender love of her husband. 2) In the answer to her agonizing prayer. 3) In being the mother of a prophet.—TR.] [CHRY-SOSTOM has five sermons on Hannah, which are discursive as usual, but contain some passages in his best vein. Works, ed. Migne, Vol. IV., p. 631.—TR.]

THIRD SECTION.

Hannah's Song of Praise.

CHAP. II. 1-10.

- 1 AND Hannah prayed, and said:
My heart rejoiceth in the Lord [Jehovah'],
My horn is exalted in the Lord [Jehovah'];
My mouth is enlarged [opened wide] over mine enemies,
Because¹ I rejoice in thy salvation.
- 2 There is none holy as the Lord [Jehovah],
For there is none beside thee,
Neither is there any [And there is no] rock like our God.
- 3 Talk no more so exceeding² proudly;
Let not arrogancy come out of your mouth;
For the Lord [Jehovah] is a God of knowledge,⁴
And by him⁵ actions are weighed.
- 4 The bows of the mighty men are broken,
And they that stumbled are girded with strength.
- 5 They that were full have hired themselves out for bread,
And they that were hungry ceased [*ins. to hunger*⁶];
So that [Even⁷] the barren hath borne seven,
And she that hath many children hath waxed feeble.
- 6 The Lord [Jehovah] killeth and maketh alive,
He [om. He] bringeth down to the grave (underworld⁸) and bringeth up.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Instead of "Jehovah." 28 MSS., 3 printed copies, LXX. and Vulg., read "my God," which some prefer as a variation; Syr. and Ar. omit the word. It is better to keep the Heb. text.—TR.]

² ["Because" is omitted in Vat. LXX. (probably by clerical error), retained in Chald. and Syr.—TR.]

³ [The Heb. here repeats the subst. נְבוֹרָה, נְבוֹרָה, "pride, pride," in a superl. sense. Wellhausen takes these words as a quotation, and the הָ as He local, "do not say, high up! high up!" but this rendering has little in its favor.—TR.]

⁴ [Lit. "knowledges." Ewald and Erdmann render "an omniscient God."]

⁵ [Kethib is מִי, "not," and so Syr. and Ar.; the Qeri לִי, "by him," is found in many MSS., and LXX., Chald. and Vulg. See Dr. Erdmann's note.—TR.]

⁶ [On these interpretations of וְהָרֵג וְחַיָּה see exegetical note.—TR.]

⁷ [Heb. שְׂמֹאל, Sheol. See exeget. note.—TR.]

- 7 The Lord [Jehovah] maketh poor and maketh rich,
He (om. He) bringeth low and lifteth up.
- 8 He raiseth up the poor out of the dust,
And [om. And] lifteth up the beggar [needy] from the dunghill,
To set them^a among princes,
And to make [And he makes] them to inherit the [a] throne of glory:
For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's [Jehovah's],
And he hath set the world upon them.
- 9 He will keep the feet of his saints,^b
And the wicked shall be silent^c in darkness;
For by strength shall no man [not by strength shall a man] prevail.
- 10 The adversaries^d of the Lord [Jehovah] shall be broken to pieces;
Out of heaven shall [will] he thunder upon them.
The Lord [Jehovah] shall [will] judge the ends of the earth,
And he shall [will] give strength unto his king,
And exalt the horn of his anointed.

^a [The Heb. has no pronoun here. Some MSS. have a Yod paragog. which may represent an original Waw in the text. The sense is not affected.—Ta.]

^b [Heb. has the sing. in Kethib, but the plur. of Qeri suits the connection better. (So Vulg.) The Kethib may be only a scriptio defectiva. (In Ps. xvi. 10 Kethib is plur.; Qeri, not so well, sing.)—וְיִשְׁכַּח is literally "a favored one," "beloved," rendered by Erdmann "fromm" (pious)—Erdmann renders "shall perish." The word means first "be silent," and then "perish,"—silence being a sign of destruction.—Ta.]

^c [Here again Kethib is sing. and Qeri plur., and the verb is plur. Lit. "Jehovah—his adversaries shall be broken." LXX.: "the Lord will make his adversary weak;" Vulg.: "dominum formidabunt adversarii ejus;" Chald.: "Jehovah will destroy the enemies who rise up to hurt his people." This simpler construction (reading the verb as sing.) is adopted by Wellhausen and the Bible Commentary—but there is not sufficient ground for changing the existing Hebrew text.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The superscription, "and Hannah prayed," does not suit precisely the contents of the following Song, which is not exactly a prayer (נְהִינָה) but a thanksgiving-testimony to the Lord and the revelation of His glory. Clericus: "Hannah rather sings praises to God than asks anything of Him." So the word "prayers" (נְהִינָה) in Ps. lxxii. 20, includes all the Pss. from 1 to 72, in the broad sense of thinking and speaking of God and in God's presence, when the heart is most thoroughly concentrated and deeply immersed in Him, though the form of thinking and speaking to God may be lacking. The "thou," however, referring to God, appears in two places (vers. 1, 2). [Chald.: "H. prayed in the spirit of prophecy."—Ta.]

The content of the Song is: 1) The manifestation of deep joy in the Lord at the deliverance vouchsafed by Him over against enemies (ver. 1). With lofty flight the four-membered strophe rises from the depth of the heart's joyful emotion on high, where the source of salvation and help in the living God is seen and praised. The heart (as elsewhere the soul) is the central organ of all painful and joyful feelings. The "horn" is the symbol—derived from horned beasts, which carry the head high in consciousness of power—of vigorous courage and consciousness of power, of which the Lord is the source, (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 17; Ps. lxxv. 5; lxxxix. 18, 25).^{*} The repetition of the "in the Lord" emphasizes the fact that the joyous frame of mind and lofty consciousness of power has its root in the Lord, and presupposes the most intimate communion with the living God. The "mouth opened wide over my enemies," intimates that the joy and courage that filled her soul had found utterance, partly in exulting over adversaries, as contrasted with the silence of subjection to them, partly in proclaiming the glory of the Lord in thanks and praise for the help received from Him in the attacks of foes. The ground of her joy in the Lord is His salvation, His help against enemies. 2) The praise of the majesty of God in His holiness and His faithfulness, which is as firm as a rock (ver. 2). The "holy" indicates here in the broad sense the infinite superiority of God to everything earthly and human, His isolation from the world, but at the same time His absolute completeness of life in contrast with the nothingness and perishableness of everything in the sphere of the creaturely, as in Ps. xcix. 2-5; comp. 1 Kings viii. 27. This is evident from the double negation: "none is holy as the Lord; for there is none beside thee." The ground of this exclusive holiness is the aloneness and absoluteness of God; there is no God beside which the vall is attached, and which by their position indicate the woman's position as maiden, wife, or mother. There is no trace of such a custom among the ancient Hebrews. The word qeren "horn," is used of the horns of beasts, of horns for blowing and drinking, or for any horn-shaped vessel, (so, the name of Job's daughter Qeren-happuk "paint-horn," "eyepigment-horn"), and of a mountain-peak. It signifies also "ray of light," and the derived verb "to emit rays of light," as of Moses, Ex. xxxiv. 28. From the incorrect translation of the Vulg., "horned" probably came (as Gesenius suggests) the custom of the early painters of representing Moses with horns.—Ta.]

^{*} [There is no reason for supposing here a reference to the eastern custom among Oriental women, (Druses and others), of wearing silver-horns on the head to

^{*} [The Sept. inserts in ver. 10 a quotation from Jer. ix. 23, 24 differing slightly from the present Greek text in Jer. The Chald. gives a paraphrase of the Song rather than a translation, referring the words of the several verses to the Philistines, Nebuchadnezzar, Mordecai, the Greeks, and Magog.—Ta.]

Him, He shares the divine being [Germ. Sein und Wesen] with none; therefore He is apart from everything human and earthly, and lifted up above it.*—The words "there is no rock like our God," express the aloneness and exclusiveness of God's character as set forth by the name rock. This superiority of God to all earthly and worldly being, this absolute glory beyond everything finite and human does not exclude, but is the ground of His self-revelation as the Fixed, Unchangeable, Immovable amid everything earthly and human. The "our God" presupposes the revelation of God by which He, as the Holy One, has chosen His people to be His possession, announced Himself to this people as their God, and made a covenant with them. The symbolical designation of this covenant-God by Rock, which occurs frequently, was suggested naturally by the configuration of the ground in Palestine, where masses of rock surrounded by steep precipices offered an image of solid and sure protection. God is a rock in His firm unshakable faithfulness; and it is the more necessary to suppose this attribute to be here set forth, because His relation to His people as covenant-God is assumed in the words "our God." This term has the signification of faithfulness and indestructible trustworthiness in Deut. xxxii. 4, also; where it is clearly the same as אֱמֻנָה "faithfulness," Pa. xviii. 3, (2) sq.; xcii. 16.†—The presupposition is the declaration "there is none beside Thee." Jehovah, as the Holy One who has revealed Himself to His people as their God in His lofty elevation above the earthly and human, and is alone the truly existing living God, is for this very reason the Rock also in the absolute sense, the unchangeable, unshakably faithful, trustworthy God, and therefore claims from men, to whom He has revealed Himself as their God, and is known as such, unconditioned complete confidence, as it is expressed in this brief sentence, "none is a rock like our God."‡

3) The manifestations of the holy and faithful God in His conduct, as it is determined by His omniscience and omnipotence, partly towards the ungodly, partly towards the godly, vers. 3 8).

Ver. 3. The negative particle is omitted before "come out" (אֵלֵךְ) as before "speak" (דַּבֵּר), and the sense requires that it be supplied (Gesenius, §152, 3). Partly by the "more" [Heb. literally, "do not increase to speak."—Tr.], partly by the doubling of the noun [בְּרִיָּה: "pride;" in Eng. A. V. the intensive doubling is rendered by "exceeding"—Tr.], the boastful vaunting character, the haughty soul of the ungodly is characterized, showing itself, as it often does, in arrogant words, and becoming, as it were, a second nature. The warning, "talk not so proudly, proudly," stands in contrast with the praise of God's grandeur in His holiness, and brings out the more sharply the contrast between human pride and the humility which is appropriate towards the holy God. Herder's reference of the word (Geist d. ebräisch. Poesie 2, 282) to the "heights, which were used for defence, and in which pride was felt" is untenable, the Heb. not permitting it. The talking with so many proud and arrogant words stands in contrast with the expression of humility and gratitude in ver. 2: "My mouth is opened wide, etc., there is none holy." אֲנִי אֲדַבֵּר "arrogance" specially marks the haughty talk as the expression of a bold defiant soul, which will not bend, and manifests itself particularly towards the pious and God-fearing by bold words, comp. Ps. lxxv. 6; xciv. 4; xxxi. 19. Sins of word, corresponding to the proud nature, are here emphasized, because what the heart is full of the mouth will speak.

His warning is supported by pointing to God's omniscience and omnipotence, in which the relation of His holiness to earthly and human things is shown. "For Jehovah is a God of omniscience."

The plu. "knowledges" (עֲלֵמוֹת) indicates that God knows and is acquainted with every individual thing, that, as He is raised above every created thing, and thus present with all things and creatures, so they are present and known to Him; and thus it expresses the thought that the concrete content of God's omniscience is everything finite and created.* The proud and bold men, who speak so haughtily, must recollect that God knows all their deeds and hears their words, that therefore they cannot withdraw from His rule.—Secondly, reference is made to God's power, which controls all things according to a fixed unchangeable plan. We must first inquire whether the "actions" (עֲלֵמוֹת) is to be understood of human or divine deeds, and then whether we are to read "not" (אֵין) or the Qeri "by him" (בְּיָדָיו). The first question can be decided only by the connection. The preceding context speaks not of the deeds, but of the words of ungodly men. In what follows it is similarly not works and deeds of men that are treated of, but the conditions and relations of human life, with which divine agency has to do; in ver. 4, sq., the thought expressly confines itself to divine deeds. We cannot therefore with Böttcher (Aehrenlese, in loco) suppose a question, and, retaining the Kethib, render, "and are not deeds measured?" that is, "is not care taken that human deeds shall not become immoderate, insolent?" nor, with Thenius, adopting the Qeri, "and by Him actions are measured," that is, "He determines how far human doing may go;" nor, with Luther, paraphrase "the Lord does not suffer such conduct to prosper." But, if we have to suppose only divine deeds, then the translation "to him or by him actions are weighed or measured" is certainly

* These ideas are not properly indicated by the word "holy," but may be said to be connected with and suggested by the lofty Heb. conception of the holiness of God.—Tr.]

† [Bible Commentary: "That the name was commonly applied to God so early as the time of Moses, we may conclude from the names Zurishaddai, "my Rock is the Almighty," (Num. i. 6; ii. 12), and Zuriah, "my Rock is God," (Num. iii. 35).—Tr.]

‡ [More literally "there is not a rock like our God."—Tr.]

§ [This is not correct. The neg. is not omitted before בְּרִיָּה which is, according to the Heb. syntax, merely an appendage of אֲנִי, forming with it a compound notion.—This paragraph is improperly assigned in the Germ. to ver. 4.—Tr.]

* [The Heb. plu. means not more than "great knowledge;" our author's exposition cannot be gotten from the simple Heb. word, but is an interpretation into the word (here probably warranted) of ideas gotten from the Scriptures in general.—Tr.]

to be preferred to the other—"are not actions weighed or measured, that is, determined?"—because of the vagueness of the thought in the latter. The thought, then, is this: God's actions are weighed, measured, fixed; He proceeds, in His working, by unchangeable paths established by Himself, so that none can free himself from His omnipotence, as none can withdraw from His all-pervading omniscience. Against the explanation "by Him the actions of men are weighed" (Bunsen: according to their essential worth), Keil properly urges: "God weighs the spirits, the hearts of men indeed (Prov. xvi. 2; xxi. 2; xxiv. 12), but not their deeds. This expression is never found." It is without ground, however, that he introduces the idea of righteousness, since we have here to do with nothing but the free, unrestricted activity of the divine omnipotence, to which, as to His omniscience, men are absolutely subject. [The correctness of this interpretation is open to doubt. The conception of God weighing His own actions, acting with prudence and forecast, is not, I believe, found elsewhere in the Bible; the higher conception of immutable wisdom is every where presented. On the other hand, that God weighs the actions of men, if not (as Keil says) explicitly stated, is yet involved in many passages, in all, for example, which set forth His righteous retribution; as, "Thou renderest to every man according to his work" (Ps. lxiii. 12); "God shall bring every work into judgment" (Eccl. xii. 14); and comp. Ps. x. 18; xi. 5; xiv. 2; Prov. xv. 3; Job xxxiv. 21, 23; Jer. ix. 23, 24; Joel iii. 12. And this interpretation agrees very well with the context. The word "actions" may well include all exhibitions of human character, and the antithesis throughout the Song is between the wicked and the righteous. The thought, therefore, may be: Jehovah is holy and immutable. Give no exhibition of pride, for He knows and weighs your actions. He reverses human conditions, bringing down (i. e. the wicked), and setting up (i. e. the righteous). Expositors are about equally divided between these interpretations. With Erdmann are Targum, Sept., Theodoret, Patrick, Keil; in favor of the other, Syr., Clarke, Henry, Ewald; doubtful, Vulg., Synop. Crit., Gill, Wordsworth. Deut. xxxii. 4 does not seem to bear on the decision, for it is Jehovah's righteousness that is there emphasized.—Tr.]

Vers. 4-8 further carry out the thought of God's almighty working in human life by a series of sharply contrasted changes of fortune. In this it is assumed that God's omnipotent working is just, but it is not explicitly declared till afterwards. "The preceding thought is carried further: Every power which will be something in itself is destroyed by the Lord; every weakness, which despairs of itself, is transformed into power" (O. v. Gerlach).

Ver. 4. As in Isa. xxi. 17 we have bows of heroes instead of heroes of the bow, so here the symbol of human power and might is poetically put first instead of the personal subject. [Dr. Erdmann translates: "the heroes of the bow are cast down," which is, however, giving up the poetical form. Better: "the bows of heroes are broken." So in Isa. xxi. 17: "the residue of the bows of the heroes shall become small."—Tr.] The "broken" (דָּוָל) refers, according to the sense, to the latter (since "heroes" is the logical subject) instead of to "bows," the breaking of which indicates the broken power of those who, like heroes of the bow, trust to their might. The strong are overcome by God, as a hero loses his power when his bow is broken. The antithesis: "And they that stumbled [or, stumble] are girded with strength." As stumbling, tottering indicates weakness and powerlessness, so "being girded" with strength denotes fitness for battle, power prepared for battle. The strong He deprives of strength, the powerless He makes strong—according to the free working of His power.

Ver. 5. The "full," who in the abundance of their wealth had no need, have hired themselves out for bread, that is, must earn their bread in order to appease their hunger. On the other hand, the hungry "cease" (חָלָה) either "to be hungry," or, "to work for bread." The latter is preferable on account of the contrast with "hire themselves out for bread" in the first clause; so Herder ("they now have holiday") and Bunsen ("they no longer need work for bread"). Clericus: "Hannah here rightly attributes to divine providence what the heathen wrongly attribute to fortune, of whose instability they speak ad nauseam." See J. Stobæi, florileg. lit. 105.* The וְ ["till," rendered in Eng. A. V. "so that"] is taken by some expositors in the sense "even" [Germ. sogar]. Clericus explains it as a sort of ellipsis "as if she said that all experienced the vicissitudes of human affairs, even to the barren woman, who," etc. Similarly Keil explains it as a brachylogy: "it goes so far that" This adverbial construction, with the presupposed logical zeugma, would have as much in its favor as the view of Thenius, who asks: "Might not וְ be an adverb: the long barren?" But there are passages in which וְ, from its sense of continuance, must be taken simply as a conjunction, meaning "in that or while" (Jon. iv. 2; Job i. 18; 1 Sam. xiv. 19); in the two last passages it is followed as here by ! ["and"], and introduces an occurrence contemporaneously with which, or following on which, something else occurred. Here then: "while the barren bears seven." "Seven children" is, according to Ruth iv. 15, the "complete number of the divine blessing in children" (Keil). Comp. Ps. cxiii. 9: "he makes the barren woman dwell in the house, the joyful mother of children." [Erdmann translates: "he makes the barren woman of the house dwell as a joyful mother of children."—Tr.] [Ps. cxiii. 7-9 resembles 1 Sam. ii. 5, 7, 8 so closely as to suggest an imitation. It would be very natural in a later writer, in composing a Psalm celebrating Jehovah's majesty and power, to take such general expressions from a well-known song, which we may suppose was committed to writing by Hannah herself, and through Samuel transmitted to the prophetic students, among whom, no doubt, were many psalmists. The Book of "Samuel" itself was probably in circulation soon after Rehoboam's time.—Tr.]

* [The word חָלָה is used in the Bible either absolutely—"cease to exist" (Judges v. 6, 7; Ps. xlix. 8 (9); Deut. xv. 11), or with an explanatory word (Job iii. 17; Pr. x. 9), or its complement is suggested by the immediate action or context (Am. vii. 5; Zech. xl. 12). Here the statement is "the hungry ceased to exist as such," as in Judg. v. 6; Deut. xv. 11.—Tr.]

"And she who had many children languishes away." Clericus remarks: "being exhausted before the end of the usual bearing-time of women, and perhaps left solitary by the death of her children." As to this last point comp. Jer. xv. 9.* [The view held by some that in Hannah's barrenness and subsequent fruitfulness there is a mystical or typical meaning, deserves consideration. It is advocated by Jerome, Augustine, Patrick, Gill, Wordsworth, and the Bib. Comm. Hannah is said to be the type of the Christian Church, at first barren and reviled, afterwards fruitful and rejoicing. As to such a typical character we must be guided, not by outward resemblances, but by fixed principles of biblical interpretation. If Hannah's late fruitfulness is typical, it must be because it sets forth a spiritual element of the spiritual kingdom of God. These facts may guide us to a decision: 1) God's relation to His people is set forth under the figure of marriage; He is the husband, His people the wife (Isa. liv.; Jer. iii.; Hos. i.-iii.); 2) Isaiah (liv. 1) describes God's spiritual people as barren, yet with the promise of many children; 3) Paul (Gal. iv. 27) quotes this passage of Isaiah, refers it to the Church of Christ as distinguished from the Jewish dispensation, and declares that this antithesis is given in Sarah and Hagar. The barren Sarah is the new dispensation, the fruitful Hagar the old. Besides Sarah, other barren women in the Bible become the mothers of remarkable sons: Rebecca, Rachel, Samson's mother, Hannah, Elizabeth. Are these all typical of the new dispensation or the Church of Christ? The answer is to be found in Paul's treatment of Sarah's history. What he declares is, that Sarah is the mother of the child of promise, while Hagar's child was the product of natural fruitfulness. Thus Sarah sets forth the dispensation which is based on promise or free grace and faith; Hagar represents the dispensation of works. Paul quotes Isa. liv. 1, to show simply that the spiritual Jerusalem, the Church of Christ, is our mother. Throughout his argument it is the spiritual element of promise and faith on which Sarah's typical position is based. Only, therefore, where we can show such spiritual element are we justified in supposing a typical character. There must be involved the truth that the origination and maintenance of God's people depend on His promise and not on human strength. This is not necessarily involved in the history of every barren woman who becomes fruitful—certainly not in that of Rachel, probably in that of Rebecca, probably not in the others. These histories teach indeed that fruitfulness is the gift of God; and, as an encouragement to faith, He has in some instances granted to the barren to be the mothers of sons to whom He has assigned important positions in the development of His kingdom. But this fact does not in itself show that these mothers sustained to the kingdom of God the relation which Sarah sustained. Hannah seems to be simply a pious mother whose prayer for a son, contrary to human probabilities, is granted.—Tr.].

Ver. 6. This Keil connects with the preceding, explaining: This comes from the Lord, who kills, etc. But here, as in the remaining members of the Song, we must suppose a logical asyndeton. The contrast of death and life, killing and making alive demands even a wider extension of these conceptions than is indicated in the last clause of ver. 5. Killing denotes (with a departure from the ordinary sense) bringing into the extremest misfortune and suffering, which oppresses the soul like the gloom of death, or brings it near to death—making alive is extricating from deadly sorrow and introducing into safety and joy. This is confirmed by the second member: "He brings down to Sheol and brings up." The same contrast is found in Deut. xxxii. 39, "I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal;" Ps. xxx. 4 (3), "Thou hast brought up my soul from Sheol, Thou hast made me alive," etc.; Ps. lxxi. 20, "Thou, who hast showed us great and sore trouble, wilt quicken us again, and wilt bring us up again from the depths of the earth," [Eng. A. V. reads, with Qeri, me; Kethib, us.—Tr.]. Ps. lxxxvi. 13: "Great is Thy mercy towards me, and Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest Sheol," (comp. Job v. 18, and Ps. lxxxviii. 4-6). So also in Ps. lxxvi. 9, misfortune is conceived of as death, salvation as revival. Calvin: "in the word 'death' Hannah properly embraces everything injurious, and whatever leads step by step to death, as, on the other hand, the word 'life' includes everything happy and prosperous, and whatever can make a fortunate man contented with his lot." [As is apparent from the above exposition, there is no reference in this verse to the doctrine of the resurrection. The word שְׁאוֹל "Sheol," improperly rendered in Eng. A. V. "hell" and "the grave," means "the underworld," (Erdmann, the same, "unterwelt"), the gloomy abode of all the dead, conceived of by the Hebrews as the negation of all earthly activity. It thus became an image of darkness and suffering, only here and there illumined and soothed (as in Ps. xvi.) by the conviction that God's love would maintain and develop into fulness of joy the life which He had bestowed on His servants.—The word is usually supposed to mean a "hole," "cleft" like, Eng. hell (= "hole," "hollow," German hölle.—Tr.).

* [Dr. Erdmann's translation of this clause (1 Sam. ii. 5) is hardly satisfactory. The word וְיָ (lit. "continuance") is used in the senses "while," "until," "so that," and the question is, which is the appropriate sense here. Erdmann renders: "while the barren bears, the fruitful waxes feeble,"—that is, the clause, according to him, affirms the contemporaneity of the two things. This would be appropriate in a narration, but is inappropriate and feeble here. To judge from the passages cited, he supposes the sense to be: "and while the barren is still bearing (that is, in the midst of her bearing), the fruitful languishes," which is plainly out of keeping with the context. Rather we are to take וְיָ—in its well-sustained sense of "till"—as marking the limit of the action involved in the preceding context. The mutations in human life, brought about by God, reach to this astonishing point, namely, that the barren becomes fruitful and the fruitful barren. So Vulg. (donec) and Sept. (ἄχρι). The other versions do not translate the וְיָ. Gesenius and Furst take the word as a preposition: "even the barren, she bears." But it may also be a conjunction. It sometimes by suggestion (though not properly) includes the fact which it introduces.—Tr.]

Ver. 7. By His power the Lord determines the contrast of rich and poor, high and low; comp. Ps. lxxv. 8 (7). The thought of the second clause is developed in ver. 8, with the first half of which Ps. cxiii. 7, 8 agrees almost word for word. Being low is here regarded as being despised, for "dust and dunghill" indicate a condition of deepest dishonor and disgrace, in which one is, as it were, trodden under foot; comp. Ps. xlv. 26 (25). The "raising and lifting" denotes the divine government, by which shame and contempt are changed into honor and glory. The contrast to the dust and the dunghill is the sitting in the company of nobles and princes, on the throne of honor. Calvin: "Hannah goes on to say the same thing of honors and dignities as of fortunes, namely, that, when we behold in this world so many and so great vicissitudes, we should lift up our gaze to the providence of God, who rules all things in heaven and earth by His will, not imagining that there is anything fortuitous in our lives, (. . . but knowing that God's providence controls everything)."—The two last clauses point to the foundation of the Lord's determination and arrangement of the contrasted relations of life and fates of men: "for the pillars of the earth are Jehovah's, and He hath set the earth upon them."* The control and government of God here portrayed is founded on the fact that He is the creator and sustainer of the earth, and therefore by His omnipotence exercises unrestricted rule over the earth-world. Here we have clear and plain the highest point of view, from which all that is said from ver. 4 on is to be looked at: the all-embracing power of the Lord. Clericus: "Hannah, therefore, means to say that God easily effects any change in human affairs, since He is creator and lord of the earth itself."

4. The Song culminates (vers. 9, 10) in the prophetic testimony to the omnipotent rule of the holy God in the manifestation of His justice towards the godly and the ungodly, and in conducting His kingdom to glorious victory over the world. a) To the godly the Lord will grant His protection and salvation, and will guard them from misfortune, comp. Ps. lvi. 13 (14): "Wilt Thou not deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of life [Germ. as Eng. A. V.: 'the living']?" So Ps. cxvi. 8; cxxi. 3; "he suffers not thy foot to fall." The tottering [or falling] of the feet is not to be taken here in an ethical sense; the preservation of the feet from slipping, tottering, stumbling, often denotes deliverance from long-continued misfortune and suffering, so Ps. xv. 5; lv. 23; lxxvi. 9. "His saints" points to the intimate association between God and His people, and its correlative is "my God," "our God." b) The godless will be the objects of His punitive justice. They will perish in darkness. The darkness is the symbol of misfortune and misery, as light of safety and life, Job xv. 22; Ps. cvii. 14. Godlessness is voluntary remoteness from the light of salvation, which God sheds abroad; and so its walking in darkness must end in destruction. For, not by strength, that is, by his own strength, shall a man prevail; "shall a man be strong" (שׁוֹמֵר לִפְתָּי) is an allusion perhaps to the "mighty men" (גִּבּוֹרִים) in ver. 4. The godless rely on their own strength with which to help themselves in the darkness. But it is universally true that "we do nothing by our own strength." Ps. xxxiii. 16, 17. He who leans on his own strength (which cannot be without turning away from the Lord, who alone can help) will receive his just reward, he will perish in darkness. Clericus: "No one can avoid calamity by his own strength, unhelped by divine providence."—Human weakness is here specially brought out by the order of the words; on man [Heb. אָדָם] last word in ver. 9] follows immediately Jehovah [in the Heb., first word in ver. 10], which further stands as absolute subject (comp. Ps. xi. 4) and thus in sharper contrast. As "prevail" in ver. 9 alludes to ver. 4, so here the "broken" to the "broken" in that verse.—The thought, that God's justice is shown in the punishment of the godless, is first very strongly and sharply expressed by the immediate collocation of the two verbs after Jehovah: "broken are his opposers,"* and then illustrated by the allusion to a judicial process which ends with the carrying out of the sentence. The ungodly strive with God as in a judicial contest (קָרָה [Qeri]), but they are confounded in the presence of the process of law to which the Lord comes. The thunder, the sign of His fear-inspiring and destructive power, is the announcement of His proximity to the tribunal. The "judge" (שֹׁפֵט) denotes the holding of the court. The judicial work of God is the outflow of His holiness, justice and almightiness, which three attributes of God have been celebrated up to this point. The object of the judicial interposition of God is not only the members of the chosen people, but the ends of the earth, that is, all peoples, the whole world. As before the whole earthly creation, founded and maintained by God's power, was brought before us in order to establish God's almighty control over the earth, so here our view is extended from punitive justice as it shows itself in the sphere of God's people to God's judgment as it stretches over the whole earth, to the all-embracing world-judgment. The prophetic view often rises to this universality of God's judicial control as the judge of the whole world (Gen. xviii. 25), which corresponds to the idea of the universal salvation embracing all the nations of the earth; so, for example, Mich. i. 2 sq.; Isa. ii. 9 sq.; iii. 13; Ps. vii. 8 sq.; ix. 8. The conception of this general judgment over all the peoples of the earth, and that of the special judgment over Israel and every individual member of Israel are closely connected. The aim of both is to lead God's kingdom to victory and glory. The broad glance at the ends of the earth filled with the judicial glory of King Jehovah fixes itself in the concluding words on the highest aim and end to be reached by the exercise of God's judicial justice, namely, the unfolding of God's power and dominion in the kingdom in Israel and in the person of His anointed. "And He will give strength to His king, and exalt the horn of His anointed."

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

After the explanation of the content of this Song of praise of Hannah, we must in the first place consider the question of its origin. The answer to this question is inseparable from our historical conception and estimate of the content of the Song, and is therefore connected with the historical and theological remarks. The question is: whether, as the author obviously assumes, Hannah herself sang it from her heart, or, whether it owed its origin to a totally different occasion, and was put into Hannah's mouth by the author.

* [Heb. literally: "Jehovah, broken are His opposers." Some render, "Jehovah will break His opposers."—T.L.]

* [It is not necessary to find a geographical theory in this poetical statement. And, even if it expresses the author's geographical views, it is not the thought of the passage, but only the framework of the thought; the real thought here is solely religious, and has nothing to do with physical science.—T.L.]

According to Ewald, this Song is an interpolation by a later hand, because ver. 1 is the immediate continuation of the concluding words of the first chapter, and is therefore a proper ending like ch. i. 19, ("they worshipped and returned"); but we reply that the words, ch. i. 28, "they worshipped the Lord there," form an appropriate introduction to the following prayer, and that the latter contains nothing out of keeping with the continuity of the narrative—rather its content quite suits the situation, and therefore from this point of view there is no necessity for regarding it (from its content) as a later insertion which breaks the connection.—But particularly two things in the content have been adduced against the ascription of the Song to Hannah or to Hannah's time: the celebration of a glorious victory over foreign enemies, and the assumption of the existence of the theocratic kingdom in the conclusion.—But, as to the first, where in the Song is there the mention of a victory gained in war with foreign enemies? The only passage in which warriors are spoken of contrasts the "mighty bowmen" with the stumbling who are girded with the strength, not to portray heroes of war, but to show how this contrast also (which is parallel with others, none of which have anything to do with war) is brought about by the Lord's omnipotent rule. The description of these contrasts and of the power of God which reveals itself in them is so general that it is impossible to discover here the character of a Song of victory which presupposes a war. The "enemies" against whom the Song is directed are not the national enemies of the people of Israel, the heathen nations with whom they had to fight, but the ungodly within the chosen people as opposed to the truly pious and God-fearing. The contrasts which are introduced have their root in the fundamental view of the religious-moral opposition of pride and humility in reference to the holy God (ver. 3, a), culminate in the testimony to God's righteous judgment on godly and ungodly, and in their movement between these poles exhibit only the religious-moral condition of the people of Israel as the historical background. Nothing is said of opposition to external national enemies. Hence it is just as unfounded to regard David as the author of the Song (Bertholdt, Ewald III. 915), especially to suppose it a Song of praise for his victory over Goliath and the resulting defeat of the Philistines, (Thenius 1 ed., Böttcher), as it is arbitrary to suppose one of the oldest Kings of Judah its author.* Neither one nor the other can be demonstrated, or even shown to be probable.—The second argument against the ascription of the Song to Hannah, and for referring it to the period of the Kings seems weightier; for the words of ver. 10, "He will give strength to his king, and exalt the horn of His anointed," seem to assume the existence of a king. But nothing obliges us so to understand it. If we put ourselves in the period of Samuel's early life, the fact is incontestable that in the consciousness of the people, and the noblest part of them too, the idea of a monarchy had then become a power, which quickened more and more the hope of a realization of the old promises that there should be a royal dominion in Israel, till it took shape in the express demand which the people made of Samuel. The divine promise that the people should be a kingdom is given as early as the patriarchal period, comp. Gen. xvii. 6, 16. The idea of the kingdom as bringing prosperity to the whole people connects itself with the Tribe of Judah, Gen. xlix. 10. Judah will come forth victorious from the battle which awaits him, will remain in possession of everlasting imperishable dominion, and will never lose the sceptre. The period of the Law further develops the idea of this kingdom. The whole people is to be a priestly kingdom (Ex. xx. 6). In Balaam's prophecy the royal power and dominion to which Israel would attain is celebrated under the figure of the Star which rises on Jacob, and in their victory over their enemies, Num. xxiv. 17, 19. This old prophecy is altogether unintelligible if the consciousness of the people did not attach the hope of future development and prosperity to the idea of the kingdom. That the law of the king in Deut. xvii. belongs to the legal period has been improperly doubted, (comp. Oehler in Herzog's R.-E. s. v. Königthum). The proposition made to Gideon to be king (Judg. viii. 23), though rejected by him, shows how in the period of the Judges the felt national disintegration brought out more strongly the desire for a single government which should embrace the whole people and protect them against external enemies. The phrase of refusal "Jehovah shall rule over you," is based on the external non-theocratic conception of the kingdom which underlay that application, and at the same time expresses in the clearest manner the consciousness of the divine rule of which the kingly rule was to be the organ. At the close of the period of the Judges the need of such a theocratic kingdom was felt the more strongly, because the office which was entrusted with the duty of forming and guiding the theocratic life of the nation, namely, the high-priestly office, was itself with the people involved in the deepest degradation. The hope thereon based, that the Lord would set up a kingdom as the instrument of saving the people from their deep corruption, is expressed in our Song in the concluding mention of the anointed of the Lord, who would receive his power from Him, whose horn would be exalted by the hand of the Lord. The same thought is expressed by that man of God (ch. ii. 35), who announces to the High-priest Eli the judgment of his house and the raising up of a faithful priest who will walk before the anointed of the Lord; that is, he indicates a direct interposition by God in the fortunes of His people, by which a new order of things will be brought about under the guidance of a true theocratic priesthood in connection with a divinely established kingdom.

* [Equally arbitrary is the procedure of Geiger (Druckstift u. Uebersetzungen der Bibel, page 27), who makes Hannah's Song an imitation of Ps. cxlii., and refers the latter to the postexilic period, explaining מְלִיכִים as foreign princes reigning over Israel.—T.L.]

This was a testimony of the prophetic spirit which animated that man of God, that spirit of the prophecy and announcement of divine truth and promise, which had by no means completely died out in the time of the Judges. When God introduced the new era of Israel's fortunes, the elevation of the theocratic development of His people's life to a new plane by the prophet Samuel as instrument of His revelation, and first of the continuous theocratic line of prophets, He selected persons in the border-time between the old and the new in whom theocratic hopes dwelt in living power, informed them by direct influence of His Spirit of the approaching fulfillment of this hope, and prepared and impelled them to announce and to celebrate by prophetic testimony God's new revelations of salvation. The "man of God" made such an announcement to Eli, who, according to the divine counsel, was to fall together with his house, that a new true priesthood might arise, which should be closely connected with the "anointed of the Lord," the theocratic kingdom, in its effort to attain its end and aim, namely, God's dominion over His people. Hannah made such an announcement respecting her child Samuel, she knowing by divine revelation that he was to be God's instrument for great things, the renewer and restorer of the theocratic life under the God-given kingdom. She, like that man of God, is filled with the spirit of prophecy, whose representative and instrument she was the more fitted to be, as she belonged to the pious class of the people, and walked before God. Her song is a product of this prophetic spirit, which lifts her far above the joy (felt in her heart, and uttered at the outset) of her heard prayer and God's acceptance of her child to be His possession, and above her personal experience of the might of the living God, and makes her see and celebrate His manifestations of might in his kingdom, which he has established in his people, and will develop in new glory by the revelation of His power and justice. From the depths of humble piety she looks up away from her poor self to the height of the holiness and faithfulness of the living God. The foundations on which rests all God's revelation to His people, as well as His dominion over them, are His holiness and rock-firm faithfulness. On them is built God's government in His kingdom and people, to which Hannah is led by the divine providence in her own life to look up. As she looks, her experience of her "adversaries" and of their pride and presumption is broadened and generalized into a view of God's absolute government and dominion which brings to shame all the pride and insolence of the ungodly, and which is revealed, partly in the unlimited, unconditioned rule of His might, which accomplishes the life-changes of godly and ungodly in the extreme contrasts, contradicting all human calculation (vers. 4-8), partly in the government of His justice, in which He shows Himself as the unchangeable rock of the godly, and gives the ungodly over to destruction (vers. 9, 10). From the idea of this government of justice the song rises finally with rapid flight to the conception of a judgment which the living, just God stretches with His dominion over the ends of the earth, and to the idea of a kingdom, which, in this divine domain, and by this ruling and governing of God, develops its power beyond the limits of Israel, and in the possession of this God-given power is the instrument of the divine dominion—a wide extension of the prophetic view, under the guidance of the divine Spirit, beyond the present which is the foundation of the word of the prophetic testimony. Thus the prophetic-historical description of the establishment of the kingdom in Israel is introduced by this lyric-prophetic witness of the God-ordained and God-serving power of the theocratic kingdom; and on this follows soon the prophetic announcement of the intimate relation in which the renovated priesthood is to stand to the "anointed of the Lord." Hannah "beholds in her individual experience the general laws of the divine economy, and divines its significance for the whole history of the kingdom of God" (Auberlen, Sud. u. Krit., 1860, p. 564).

In this song—uttered, in the spirit of prophecy, in the beginning of the development of the theocratic life, in so far as that development was determined by the kingdom which the people hoped for and God gave—Hannah passes unconsciously, impelled by the divine Spirit, over all the intermediate steps of the development of the kingdom of God, and points to the final goal, at which the divinely established, divinely equipped, royal dominion extends itself over the ends of the earth. To this answers, on the one hand, the idea of a universal revelation of salvation, which appears in that tribe-promise of the Shiloh, to whom the obedience of the nations belongs, and farther back in the patriarchal promises; and, on the other hand, there is connected with it the prophetic content of the songs of praise of Mary and Zachariah (Luke i. 46 sq. and 68 sq.), where there is express reference to the words of Hannah in view of the approaching final fulfillment of the idea, contained in her prophetic announcement, of the dominion of the anointed of the Lord which in divine power is to extend over the ends of the earth.

[Wordsworth: "The Magnificat of Hannah is an evangelical song, chanted by the spirit of Prophecy under the Levitical Law. It is a prelude and overture to the Gospel. It is a connecting link of sweet and sacred melody between the Magnificat of Miriam after the passage of the Red Sea—symbolizing the Death, Burial and Resurrection of Christ—and the Magnificat of Mary, after the Annunciation of His Birth. . . . Let this Song of Hannah be read in the Septuagint, and then the Magnificat in St. Luke's original, and the connection of the two will be more clearly recognized. . . . The true characteristic of Sacred Poetry is, that it is not egotistical. It merges the individual in the nation, and in the Church Universal. It looks forward from the special occasion which prompts the utterance of thanksgiving, and extends and expands itself, with a loving power and holy energy, into a large and sympathetic outburst of praise to God for His love to all mankind in Christ. . . . The Magnificat of Hannah is conceived in this spirit. It is not only a song of thanksgiving; it is also a prophecy. It is an utterance of the HOLY GHOST moving within her, and making her maternal joy on the birth of Samuel to overflow in outpourings of thankfulness to God for those greater blessings in CHRIST, of which that birth was an earnest and a pledge. In this respect it may be compared with the Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.) and the Song of David (2 Sam. xxii.).—Augustine, in his comment on this Song (De Civ. Dei, 17, 4), follows the translation of the Sept. (which is often incorrect), and, along with some good thoughts, has much wrong exegesis and unfounded spiritualizing.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. The joy in the Lord, to which faith attains amid sore conflicts: 1) Its source—not our own heart with its frowardness and its despondency, not help and consolation from men, but only the Lord's grace and compassion, which make the heart joyous again, lifting up with mighty power the mind that has been stricken down; 2) Its object: the fulness of the salvation which the Lord dispenses, and faith ever more richly appropriates: 3) Its expression: an open testimony to the salvation experienced—before God in praise, ("I rejoice in thy salvation"), before men—in confessing and celebrating our experience of salvation, to our companions in the faith that they may unite with us in joy and praise, so that their faith may be strengthened, to the adversaries of the faith that they may be ashamed, may be warned, may repent.—[Hannah's song of praise compared with her former prayer. 1) She was then "in bitterness of soul" (i. 10); now her "heart rejoiceth." 2) Then she was humiliated (i. 5, 8, 11); now she is "exalted." 3) Then her adversary provoked her (i. 6); now her "mouth is opened wide over her enemies." 4) Then she "poured out her soul before the Lord" (i. 15); now she "rejoices in His salvation." Often we remember to pray, and then forget to praise.—Tr.]

Ver. 2. The two characteristics of the life of God's children in their relation to the living God: 1) The humble reverence before Him, in view of His holiness; 2) The heartiest confidence in Him, in view of His unchangeable faithfulness.

Ver. 3. The humbling of the natural man's pride through the testimony concerning the living God: 1) Concerning His universal knowledge; 2) His universal wisdom which determines and regulates all the details of His action (ver. 3); 3) His universal power which determines every change in the fortunes of human life, (vers. 4-8). [The division 2) must be modified if the view of Tr. be adopted as to the reference of the term "actions." See Exegetical on ver. 3.—Tr.]

Ver. 3. "By Him actions are weighed." I. The manner of His weighing—with perfect knowledge (ver. 3), with absolute rectitude (ver. 2), with immutable justice (ver. 2).—II. The result of His weighing is often a total reversal of men's fortunes (vers. 4-8). Application: Be not proud of present prosperity, but look well to the way in which you enjoy and use it (ver. 3).—Tr.]

[HENRY: Vers. 1-3. Hannah's triumph in God's perfections, and in His blessings to her. I. She celebrates His glorious attributes: (1) His purity. (2) His power. (3) His wisdom. (4) His justice. II. She solaces herself in these things. III. She silences those who are enemies to her and to God.—Vers. 4-8. Providence in the changes of human life: 1) The strong are weakened and the weak strengthened, when God pleases (ver. 4). 2) The rich are impoverished and the poor enriched (ver. 5). 3) God is the Lord of life and death (ver. 6). 4) He advances and He abases (vers. 7, 8). 5) And in all this we must acquiesce, for God is sovereign. "The pillars of the earth are the Lord's."—Tr.]

Vers. 4-8. The unity amid change of the opposite ways which the pious and the ungodly must go: 1) One starting-point, the Lord's inscrutable will, which determines them; 2) One hand, the almighty hand of the Lord, which leads them; 3) One goal at which they end, humble submission under that hand.—The wonderful guidance of the children of men upon quite opposite ways: 1) The opposite direction in which they go, (a) from the height to the depth, (b) from the depth to the height; 2) The opposite design which the Lord has therein with men, (a) to lead them from the heights of pride and haughty self-complacency to humble submission under His unlimited power, (b) to exalt them from the depths of humble self-renunciation to a blessed life in the enjoyment of His free grace; 3) The opposite end, according as men cause the divine design to be fulfilled or defeated in them: (a) everlasting destruction without God, (b) everlasting salvation and life in and with God.

Vers. 3-10. The contrasts which the change in the relations of human life presents to us in the light of divine truth: 1) God's holiness and man's sin; 2) God's almightiness and man's powerlessness; 3) God's gracious design and man's destruction.

Ver. 4. Weakness and strength come from the Lord: 1) He makes the strong weak; 2) He makes the weak strong.

Ver. 5. The Lord alone gives full satisfaction: 1) He leads from false contentment in carnal fulness to wholesome destitution; 2) He changes hunger into blessed fulness with true contentment. [Fanciful and strained.—Tr.]—Blessed are they that hunger: 1) Because the Lord brings them from full to hungry, 2) From hungry to full.

Ver. 6. How the living God shows Himself as the Lord of life and of death: 1) In that He leads from life into death, 2) From death into life.

Vers. 7, 8. The sovereign rule of the grace of God: 1) It makes poor, in order to make rich; 2) It humbles, in order to exalt.

Vers. 9, 10. The Lord our God is a just God: 1) Upon the pious He bestows salvation in His light; 2) The ungodly he causes to perish in darkness.—As man with his whole life places himself towards God, so will God in the judgment place Himself towards him as a just Judge: 1) Either in the severity of His punitive justice; 2) Or in the kindness of His saving grace.—The great Either—Or—which God's word writes over every human life: 1) Either with the pious for the Lord, or with the ungodly against Him; 2) Either trusting alone in the saving might of divine grace, or wishing to be strong by one's own power; 3) Either preserved by the Lord with the pious to everlasting life, or banished with the ungodly to everlasting condemnation.

Ver. 10. The judgment of God's punitive justice ("The Lord will judge"): 1) Whom it threatens—the ungodly, "adversaries." 2) How God makes it approach with warning signs ("out of heaven shall be thunder"). 3) How it discharges itself against all the world that is opposed to God ("The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth"). 4) How it promotes the perfecting of His Kingdom.

[Providence in the national government of Israel. Not only was the secular spirit in the nation beginning to desire a king (viii. 5), but the inspired Hannah here predicts it with devout hope. Theocracy, Monarchy and Hierarchy each contributed in turn to the welfare of Israel, and each helped to prepare the way for the great Anointed, at once Prophet, King, and Priest, who should reign over the spiritual Israel.—Interesting lectures might be made on "Psalms outside of the Book of Psalms." (See above, additions to Historical and Theological.)—Tr.]

FOURTH SECTION.

Samuel's Service before the Lord in Contrast with the Abominations of the Degenerate Priesthood in the House of Eli.

CHAP. II. 11-26.

I. The conduct of the sons of Eli in contrast with Samuel, the "servant of the Lord." Vers. 11-17.

11 AND Elkanah went to Ramah to his house. And the child did minister [ministered] unto the Lord [Jehovah] before Eli the priest. Now [And] the sons of Eli were sons of Belial [wicked men]; they knew not the Lord [Jehovah]. And¹ the priest's custom [the custom of the priests] with the people was that, when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with 14 a² flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand; [,] And he (om. he) struck it into the pan, or kettle, or cauldron or pot; all that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself.³ So they did in Shiloh unto all the Israelites that came thither. 15 Also [Even] before they burnt the fat, the priest's servant came, and said to the man that sacrificed, Give flesh to roast for the priest; for he will not have sodden 16 flesh of thee, but raw. And if any [the] man said unto him, Let them not fail to burn⁴ the fat presently, and then take as much as thy soul desireth; [,] then he would answer [say] him [om. him⁵], Nay, but thou shalt give it me [om. me] now; and if not, I will take it by force. Wherefore [And] the sin of the young men 17 was very great before the Lord [Jehovah]; for men abhorred the offering of the Lord [Jehovah].

II. Samuel as minister before the Lord. Vers. 18-21.

18 But [And] Samuel ministered before the Lord [Jehovah], being [om. being] a 19 child, girded with a linen ephod. Moreover [And] his mother made him a little coat [tunic], and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her 20 husband to offer the yearly sacrifice. And Eli blessed Elkanah and his wife, and said, The Lord [Jehovah] give thee seed of this woman for the loan which is lent to the Lord [in place of the gift which was asked for Jehovah⁶]. And they went unto

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 13. Erdmann attaches this clause to the preceding, putting a full stop after "people." See Exegetical Notes in loc.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 13. The Heb. has the Def. Art.; but, as the word is more naturally in st. const., the Art. is better omitted with Sept.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 14. The Eng. A. V. here follows the Sept.; Heb. reads וּבְיָדוֹ "in it;" Erdmann, damit, "therewith."—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 15. The Heb. Inf. Abs.: "let them (or, they will) verily burn."—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 16. Kethib is "to him," Qeri "no" (and so 18 MSS. some printed Eds., LXX., Syr., Vulg., Arab., and one MS. of Targ. cited by De Rossi); the latter better suits the following וְ, which, however, yields a good sense as it stands in the text. It may be translated "but," supposing a preceding "nay," as in Eng. A. V.; or regarded as introducing the substantive clause, and rendered "that."—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 20. Lit.: "in place of the petition which one asked for Jehovah." Erdmann changes the form of the verb to the fem., and renders "instead of the begged one (das Erbetene) whom she begged from the Lord." Others point as part. pas. בְּמִנְיָתָא. The 3 sing. fem. is found in one MSS.; 2 sing. "thou askedest" in one MS., LXX., Syr., Vulg.; and Arab. has "thou gavest." It is better to retain the Heb. text and render it as impersonal.—Tr.]

21 their own home [to his' place]. And the Lord [Jehovah] visited Hannah, so that [and] she conceived, and bare three sons and two daughters. And the child Samuel grew before the Lord [Jehovah].

III. Eli's conduct towards his worthless sons. Vers. 22-26.

22 Now [And] Eli was very old, and [ins. he] heard all that his sons did unto all Israel, and how [that] they lay with the women that assembled [served⁷] at the 23 door of the tabernacle of the congregation [meeting (or assembly)]. And he said unto them, Why do ye such things? for I hear of your evil dealings [deeds] by 24 [from] all this people. Nay, my sons; for it is no good report that I hear; ye 25 make the Lord's people [Jehovah's people are made] to transgress. If one man sin against another [If a man sin against a man], the judge [God⁸] shall judge¹⁰ him; but if a man sin against the Lord [Jehovah], who shall intreat¹⁰ for him? Notwithstanding [And] they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because 26 the Lord would slay them [for it was Jehovah's will to slay them]. And the child Samuel grew on and was in favour [grew in stature and favour¹¹] both with the Lord [Jehovah] and also [om. also] with men.

⁷ [Ver. 20. The plu. suffix "their" is found in 12 MSS., Syr., Chald., Ar.; Vulg. "in locum eorum," some MSS. of Targ. have the sing. Wellhausen, combining LXX. and Heb., gives as the true reading "he went to his place;" but the more difficult reading seems preferable. See Exeg. Notes in loco. Erdmann's translation omits, by typographical error, the last sentence of ver. 20.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 22. The verb means "to perform service, military or other." So in Ex. xxxviii. 8.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 25. See Exeg. Notes in loco.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 25. Erdmann: "will adjust" and "who can use his interest (or interpose) to adjust."—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 26. See Exeg. Notes in loco.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 11-16. In ver. 11 the Sept. again clearly shows the effort to combine explanations with the translation of the Heb. text, rendering: "and they left him there, and they went away." [The Vat. MS. reads in both instances "she" instead of "they."—Ta.]. There is the less need to change the Heb. text to accord with this, because, as Böttcher (ubi sup. p. 69) rightly remarks, "the Elkanah" of the former is quite sufficient, since this name would suggest to every reader Elkanah and his household, and the only one that remained behind is mentioned immediately afterwards. From ch. i. 21 Elkanah can be thought of only together "with his whole house."—The child "was ministering to the Lord," or "serving the Lord." These words express the whole work which the growing boy Samuel, conformably to his consecration, had to perform, certain duties connected with the service of God being laid upon him. "Before Eli" that is, under his supervision, and according to his appointment. Ver. 12. The sons of Eli were sons of worthlessness;* their character and conduct forms the sharpest contrast with what they ought to have been before the whole people as highest in position, as children of the High-priestly House. Observe the sharp asyndeton in this short sentence: they knew not the Lord, that is, they did not live in the fear of the Lord, they did not trouble themselves about Him; comp. Job xviii. 21. This godlessness and irreligiosity is the source of their moral worthlessness, which is afterwards described. The two together give the religious-moral characteristics of Eli's sons.—Ver. 13. This is not to be rendered: "And the custom of the priests with the people was this"

—this would certainly require simply מִשְׁפָּטָם הָיָה without וְכַדִּינָם ["this is the custom"] without "the priests"; comp. Gen. xi. 6 (Böttcher); nor is it: "the right (that is, the assumed right) of the priests in respect to the people was as follows" (Keil), for מִשְׁפָּטָם ["right"] alone cannot be so understood; but the words are to be connected with the preceding: they troubled themselves not about God, nor about the real, true right of the priests in respect to the people, that is, "about what was the legal due of the priests from the people" (Thenius).

[The construction of this difficult clause adopted by Erdmann (with Vulg., Cahen, Wellhausen, Thenius, and perhaps Sept.) is open to grave objections. The reply to Keil is correct; מִשְׁפָּטָם cannot well mean "assumed right." The objection to Böttcher's translation (where read מִשְׁפָּטָם הָיָה instead of Erdmann's מִשְׁפָּטָם הָיָה) is forcible in so far as we should expect הָיָה to introduce the clause (comp. Deut. xviii. 3); but the possibility of the omission of the pronoun, and of an apposition of the two clauses must be admitted. To the translation of וְ by "legal right" Wellhausen properly objects that the וְ (even) in ver. 15 introduces a graver outrage, and therefore the proceeding described in ver. 13 must be illegal.—But against Erdmann's rendering it is to be said that the meaning assigned to יָדָעוּ (know) "trouble one's-self about" is rare and difficult; it is found only in poetical passages. The phrase "to know the Lord" occurs, and always in the sense of intimate sympathetic apprehension; but this sense will not suit the וְ. Moreover, if וְ here means "right" we should expect the prep. מִכֵּם "from" (as Deut. xviii. 3) instead of מִכֵּם

* [For meaning of Heb. בְּזָוָה, "worthlessness," see on ch. i. 15.—Ta.]

* [מִשְׁפָּטָם.—Ta.]

"with," the latter must be retained here, though the former is read in 9 MSS. and in LXX., Syr., Chald. Further, the narrative is, in this construction, introduced very abruptly ("when any man, etc."). צדק means not only "right," but also "custom, manner;" see 2 Kings xi. 14; Judg. xiii. 12. The "custom" here described was not the legal right, but was in force under, apparently introduced by, the sons of Eli, the priests (כֹּהֲנֵי); ver. 13 details one imposition of the priests, and a more serious imposition is properly introduced (ver. 15) by "even" (גַּם).—We retain, therefore, the rendering of Eng. A. V. (with Philippon, Bib. Comm. and others).—Tr.]

Then follows the statement of the priests' legal right.—The connection required that the people's part in the offering should now be distinctly set forth, in order to put the unseemly conduct of Eli's sons in its true light. Therefore the participle "sacrificing" in connection with the indefinite subject "every man," stands first in absolute construction, like the Lat. Abl. absolute (comp. Gesen. § 145, 2, Rem.), = "when any man offered, then came, etc." Ewald, § 341 c.: "If the subject of the circumstantial sentence is wholly undefined, then the mere combination of the participle with the subject suffices to express a possible case (Gen. iv. 15)." Here is vividly portrayed the grasping selfish conduct of the priests in the preparation of the sacrificial meal after the offering was presented, which had already become the rule ("so they did to all the Israelites").—But still further. Ver. 15. Even before the offering, before (in accordance with the law, Lev. iii. 3-5) the fat was burned that it might be offered to the Lord as the best portion; they committed a robbery on the meat, which they wanted only חַי , that is, raw, fresh, full of juice and strength, in order to roast it. [Bib. Comm. points out that vers. 13-15 repeat the language of the Law, and thus give evidence to its existence. See Lev. vii. 31-35, 23-25, 31; xvii. 5; also Ex. xxix. 28; Dent. xviii. 3. Philippon: "Roast was common in heathen sacrifices, and even now the Orientals do not like to eat boiled meat."—Tr.]. Ver. 16. The remonstrance of the offerer based on the legal regulation, of which they should be the guardians, is set aside. כֵּן = "at this time, now," as in Gen. xxv. 31; 1 Kings xxii. 5. The Qeri "not" is preferable to the Kethib "to him;" "no, but now thou shalt give it;" threats were combined with violent seizure. Rude force was added to lawlessness.—Ver. 17. The "young men" are not the servants of the priests (Keil) but the priests themselves, the sons of Eli. Their arbitrary conduct was "a very great sin before the Lord," because the fat burned on the altar pertained to the Lord, and their legal portion of the sacrifice-meat fell to them only after the burning of the fat. What made their sin so great was the fact that they brought the offerings into contempt with the people, in so far as the wicked conduct of the priests took away in the eyes of the people their true significance as offerings to the Lord. Minchah (מִנְחָה) "means here not the meat-offering as the adjunct to the bloody offerings, but the sacrificial gift in general as an offering to the Lord" (Keil). In the succeeding narrative Samuel's "service before the Lord" is contrasted with this wicked conduct of Eli's sons in relation to the offering.

II. Vers. 18-21.—Ver. 18. The "Ephod" can mean nothing but a garment resembling in form the High-priest's ephod, consisting of two pieces which rested on the shoulders in front and behind, were joined at the top and held about the body by a girdle. Therefore it is said also: Samuel was girded with the ephod, comp. Ex. xxviii. 7, 8. In distinction from the material of the High-priest's ephod, it was made of the same material as the other priestly garments, white linen (לִבְנָן). That the priests then all wore this ephod appears from ch. xxii. 18. It was the sign of the priestly calling, and was worn during the performance of the priestly functions. David was thus clothed, according to 2 Sam. vi. 14, when he brought back the Ark, and in connection with this ceremony performed quasi-priestly functions. As the mention of this priestly dress of Samuel is connected expressly and directly with the reference to his calling as minister in the Sanctuary before the Lord, it is thus intimated that he, called to this life-long service, received therewith an essentially priestly calling. [Bib. Comm.: The word minister is used in three senses in Scripture: 1) Of the service of both Priests and Levites rendered unto the Lord, Ex. xxviii. 35, etc.; 2) of the ministrations of the Levites as rendered to the Priests, Numb. iii. 6; 3) of any service, as that of Joshua to Moses, that of Elijah to Elijah, that of the angels in heaven, 2 Sam. xiii. 17; Ps. ciii. 21, etc. The application of it to Samuel accords most exactly with his condition as a Levite.—Tr.]. Ver. 19. While the ephod was the High-priestly dress, which the boy received on the part of the Sanctuary (Thenius), the little *meil (מֵעָל) was his every-day dress, which his mother renewed for him once a year, when she came with her husband to the Sanctuary to present the annual offering. The unbroken connection which the household thus maintained with the Sanctuary prevented any estrangement between the child Samuel and the house of his parents.—The Impf. "made" (עָשָׂה) indicates a continued customary action, and thus answers to the Latin tense which is so called in a stricter sense.

Ver. 20. Eli's blessing† refers to two things: to the act of consecrating the son to the service of the Lord, and to the compensation which Eli wished the Lord to make for the son who was offered to the Lord. Keil explains the בָּרַךְ (asked [Eng. A. V. "lent"]) as 3 pers. singular instead of 2 pers. singular or plural "from the indefinite form of speech (comp. Ewald, § 249 b with § 319 a) which the narrator chose because, though it was Hannah who in Eli's presence had obtained Samuel from the Lord by prayer, yet Eli might assume that the father, Elkanah, had shared the wish of his pious wife." But the circumstance which alone permits such change of person, or rather of gender, in the subject, namely, the indefiniteness of the subject as indicated by the context, does not exist here, since such indefiniteness is undoubtedly excluded by ch. i. 27, 28. Böttcher properly takes the verb form with altered points as 3 sing. fem. "she asked."*—The sing. pronoun in "his place" (for which we should expect "their place") does not require the change of "they went" into "the man went," as Böttcher and Thenius prefer, following the Sept. καὶ ἀπήλθον δ' ἀνδρῶν; the singular suffix (after the plural verb) is explained "by the fact that the place of residence is determined by the husband or owner of the house."

* [The meil was the outer garment worn by kings, nobles and others, probably a loose robe. The High-priest's meil was peculiar in shape and color (Ex. xxviii. 31 ff.). Bib. Comm.: "The pointed mention of the ephod and robe, taken in connection with his after act, seems to point to an extraordinary and irregular priesthood to which he was called by God in an age when the provisions of the Levitical law were not yet in full operation."—Tr.]

† וַיְבָרֶךְ , not וַיְבָרֵךְ because the saying as well as the blessing itself (hence also וַיְבָרֵךְ) was repeated every year; and this is expressed by the Perf. consec. (Böttcher). [The two Perfects indicate a distinction between the blessing and the saying, but do not necessarily express repeated action; rather they sum up as complete Eli's action in pronouncing the blessing and uttering the wish."—Tr.]

Ver. 21. 'פ is neither with Bunsen to be translated: "When now Jehovah visited Hannah she conceived," nor with Thenius to be complemented by "it came to pass," nor to be referred to "and Eli blessed" (ver. 20), according to the view of Keil, who inserts a sentence ("Eli's word was fulfilled," or "they went home blessed") in order to retain the causal meaning, but it is to be considered as strengthening the following assertion, with reference to the blessing in ver. 20, and = "indeed" "in fact" immo [German, ja, in der that]. See Ewald, § 310 c and § 330 b. Comp. Isa. vii. 9; xxxii. 13; Job viii. 6.†—Samuel's growth "before the Lord" indicates not only that he remained in the Sanctuary, but also that (as the condition of his calling) he grew in fellowship of heart and life with God.

III. Vers. 22-26. The chief thing in the content of this section is the description of Eli's conduct towards his sons. But at the same time their worthlessness in relation to the Sanctuary in yet another direction is brought to view. They desecrated the latter not only by the wickedness described in vers. 12-17, but also by their unchaste dealing with the women who served at the Sanctuary. Wherein consisted their service at the door of the Tent of Assembly is not said in Ex. xxxviii. 8, where they are mentioned. They formed a body, which was regularly and formally drawn up (צבא) at the door of the Tent for the performance of its duty, which consisted "probably in the cleansing of the vessels used in offerings." Since, therefore, they were persons dedicated to the holy God, the wickedness of Eli's sons, who seduced to the service of fleshly lust these persons destined for the service of the Lord, appears in so much the stronger light.—The wickedness of Eli's sons in what pertained to the sanctuary attached itself to the whole people, who were to hold themselves a holy people to the Lord through this Sanctuary and through the offering and persons connected with it.—Eli's conduct in connection with their misdeeds is in the beginning by the words "and Eli was very old" represented as the weakness of old age, not thereby to excuse or justify his slackness, but to explain it.

Ver. 23. The question: Why do ye such things? is but a feeble rebuke of their gross misdoings. It cannot be translated: "Why do ye according to the words which I hear" (Keil)? for the Heb. word (וְכִכְרִים) cannot mean "reports about you," nor could these reports be termed "evil," since they would be true reports of evil deeds; but the proper rendering is: "Why do ye as these things?" that is, such things.* "For I hear of your evil dealings from all this people," that is, those who came to the Sanctuary, and there saw the wickedness.—Ver. 24. "Do not so (אֵל) my sons." Not good is the "report," or objectively "the thing heard;" this answers to the "evil dealings (or things)." The "I hear" (שָׁמַעַתִּי) corresponds to the "report," "thing heard" (שְׁמָעָה), and [being a particip. —Tr.] shows that it constantly came to his ears. What follows is the explanation of the words: "it is no good report."

The words: "Jehovah's people are made to transgress" (מַעֲבִירִים, etc.), express the guilt which the sons of Eli incurred by their misdoing towards "the Lord's people." The difficulties in the explanation of the particip. (ס "are causing to transgress") have given occasion to attempts at alteration, which, however, are unsatisfactory.

"Michaelis' alteration (into מַעֲבִירִים): 'the report which I hear incidentally (from people passing by) from God's people,' is against grammar," so says Thenius. "But," says Böttcher rightly, "Thenius' own reading (made from Sept. and Arab., and therefore insecure): 'you plague, oppress the people of Israel' (מַעֲבִירִים אֶת עַם יִשְׂרָאֵל) is wholly without ground. For מַעֲבִירִים means only 'make to serve,' 'enslave,' or 'make to work,' plague with work (Ex. i. 13; vi. 5). From the last in the later prophetic style (Isai. xliii. 23) has developed the meaning 'weary,' 'burden,' just as German: schaffen machen ['to give trouble,' lit. 'to make to do'], πράγματα παρέρχιν ['to cause trouble'], and so always with the idea of 'work' as fundamental. Eli's sons, it is true, robbed and dishonored the people (vers. 13 seq., 22); but they did not burden them in such a way that our term 'give trouble' would suit. The expression does not come

* Böttcher: "Historically for שָׁמַעַתִּי must have stood שָׁמַעַתִּי (so 1 Cod. of Kennicott), this alone being correct and connecting itself immediately with the context. But, because שָׁמַעַתִּי stood immediately before with the same פ, or because the feminine signification was obvious from the connection, the exceptional form sheala (which appears elsewhere also), without the final פ, was written." [The 3 sing. masc. שָׁמַעַתִּי may be retained here without great difficulty. See "Textual and Grammatical Notes" in loco. Chap. i. 27, 28 (cited by Erdmann above) excludes indefiniteness as to the fact, but not in the expression.—Tr.]

† [Eng. A. V. here follows Sept., reading וְכִכְרִים instead of וְכִכְרִים, and this seems the simplest way of taking it: "and Jehovah visited Hannah."—Tr.]

* פ has a comparative force, Gen. § 154, 3 seq.—The following וְכִכְרִים is a conjunction, and—not so much for ["because"] as as ["as"], but, like the latter, goes over into the causative sense; it refers to "such things," and points out the occasion and cause of the rebuke (comp. Ew. § 333, 2 a with § 331 c 3; Gen. § 156, 2 d).

up to the reality, for it is too narrow for the rebuke. And the addition of 'ye' (אֲנִי) here is both violent, and cannot be inferred from the Arab. text, where it was a necessity of Shemitic construction." The view thus opposed by Bötcher is maintained by Thenius (in his 2d ed. also) to suit the connection perfectly, though, on the other hand, he declares that Ewald's explanation, in which there is no change of text, must be accepted; this latter is held by Bötcher to be the only one permitted by the language and matter, and he gives it thus: "to send forth a cry (קוֹל), thence to cause to be called out, and to cause to trumpet forth (שֹׁמֵר) are common expressions, appropriate to the simplest style, Ex. xxxvi. 6; Lev. xxv. 9; Ezra i. 1; x. 7. Why then should not "send forth a report" (דָּבָר שְׁמִיעַ) be said as well as 'send forth a voice' (קוֹל)?"

The report which (as) I hear, God's people are circulating, is quite proper; the plu. particp. is joined to the collective 'people' as in 1 Sam. xiii. 15." To this Thenius properly objects that it is a superfluous statement after ver. 23 ("which I hear from all the people"), and that we should here expect a more significant word. The train of thought requires after the declaration "not good," etc., a statement of the ground of Eli's judgment. The usual rendering: "ye make the Lord's people to transgress" satisfies the demands of the connection of thought. Only, as the pers. pron. (אֲנִי, "ye") is wanting, the particp. must be rendered impersonally: "people make . . . to transgress" (comp. מְשַׁלְחִים, ch. vi. 3, and אֲקָרִים Ex. v. 16). The objection that the object of the transgression, which is elsewhere always found with this verb as exacter determination, is not here expressed (comp. ch. xv. 24; Isa. xxiv. 5; 2 Chron. xxiv. 20; Num. xiv. 41), cannot set aside the meaning: "cause to sin or transgress," "because the exact definition is contained in the context" (Keil). The sin of the sons was, according to the context, very great before the Lord (vers. 12-17), but was at the same time committed against the people of the Lord (vers. 13, 22) in reference to their holy calling, and had the destructive effect of bringing the Lord's offering into contempt (ver. 17). The "people of the Lord" not only knew and spoke of the wickedness of Eli's sons, but were made by the latter partakers of their guilt, were seduced into transgression of the Law by those who ought to have watched over its fulfillment.

Ver. 25. Pillel (לָלֵךְ) is used, in connection with wicked actions, in the sense "to give a decisive judgment," and so between two contending parties, "to compose a strife by judgment;" comp. Ezek. xvi. 52; Ps. cvi. 30. The elohim, however, cannot here mean the judge, or the authority that judges, but God is described as He who composes by judging. The sense of Eli's discourse is: "When men sin against men, it is God (of course through the appointed human organs), who restores the disturbed relations by composing the strife; but when we have to do with the relation, not between man and man, but between man and God, when a man sins against God, offenses against God's honor, who will interpose to arrange the matter?" Eli sets two things therefore before his sons: 1) that their sin is a sin immediately against God, from which point of view it has been regarded in the whole preceding narration (vers. 12, 17); 2) that the consequent guilt is so great, that divine punishment therefor is certain. [Wordsworth: A man may intercede with God for remission of a penalty due for injury to himself; but who shall venture to entreat for one who has outraged the majesty of God?—Tr.]—Eli's weakly mild words were too indefinite and general to check the bold wickedness of his sons. It was too late. They sinned against the Lord "with a high hand" (בְּיָד רָמָה), as it were, with hardened hearts.—And they hearkened not to the voice of their father.—As reason of this ('2, "because") is stated, "that it pleased God, was God's will, to slay them;" that is, they were in a state of inner hardening, which excluded the subjective condition of salvation from destruction, and so they had already incurred God's unchangeable condemnation. As hardened offenders, they were already appointed by God to death; therefore the word of instruction had no moral effect on them.—Ver. 26. In contrast with them, Samuel is now again presented, as he developed in his childhood as well physically as morally; while the sons of Eli were a horror to God and men, he was well-pleasing to God and men. On לָלֵךְ, comp. Gen., § 131, 3, Rem. 3. It is used frequently to express continuance in the sense "advance," "continue," and then also expresses advancing increase, the participial construction being not seldom employed in such cases, as here: "The child Samuel grew constantly in stature and goodness." [See Luke ii. 52.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Since Eli's judgeship rested on his high-priestly dignity, the High-priestship, thus connected with the judicial office, had so much the higher calling to establish the theocratic unity of the people with their centre, the national sanctuary at Shiloh. But, in the person of the weak Eli, it showed itself incapable of fulfilling this calling. The godless priesthood, represented by the sons of Eli, corrupted the inner religious-moral life of the people, whose external centre and theocratic unity were in the Sanctuary. The priesthood could no longer fulfil its calling of mediating between God and His people, because its representatives, lacking the religious-moral conditions of the calling, were unworthy of it; they were not servants of God, but servants of sin.

2. The sins of Eli's sons were a symptom of their spiritual heart-hardening and ruin in alienation from God and in immorality. They sinned with "a high hand" boldly, presumptuously (comp. Num. xv. 22-31). To this internal judgment of hardening answered as necessary consequence the judgment of their rejection by God, which was a thing determined on in God's will, because they knew nothing of God and His law (ver. 12). Their crime against the divinely established holy ordinances and the sanctuary, the visible sign of God's abode with His people, was at the same time a crime against the people of the Lord, and culminated in the crime against God Himself, in which indeed was its root.

3. Samuel, though not a priest, but only a Levite, is (by his repeated designation as "servant of the Lord" (vers. 11, 18), and by the reference to his priestly clothing) contrasted with the representation of the official priesthood as God's chosen instrument for truly fulfilling, in and by the prophetic calling which was to take the place of the priesthood that mediated between God and His people, the priestly mission,* to fulfil which the existing priestly race had shown itself both powerless and unworthy. The condition of this theocratic calling of Samuel, the earnest, personal fellowship of life with the Lord, is pointed out in vers. 21, 26. The life of the youth, who was chosen and called by the Lord to restore the theocracy, develops itself in the service of the sanctuary before the Lord in conformity to his divine mission, in order that some day he may become in place of the desecrated sanctuary the living personal centre of the theocratic national life, and in place of the corrupted priesthood the consecrated organ of God's new revelations for His people.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 12. STARKE: Where the true fear of God is lacking in the heart, there ungodliness prevails in the life, and thereby the heart reveals itself. S. SCHMID: It is a bad state of things, when those who teach others the fear of God, do not fear God themselves.—J. LANGE: Preachers should most carefully guard against scandal, and earnestly strive to pursue a course of life which shall be not merely without offence, but also edifying, 1 Tim. iv. 11.—STARKE: He who in the office of teacher seeks only his own—namely, how he may become rich and have a good time—but not that which belongs to God and Jesus Christ, is a false prophet, a thief, and a hireling. Mark that, you who bear the vessels of the Lord, Phil. ii. 20, 21; iv. 17; 2 Cor. xii. 14; 1 Pet. v. 2 sqq. [The misconduct of these leaders of worship may well suggest lessons for Christian ministers; but it should never be forgotten that the Christian minister corresponds much more nearly to the Old Testament prophet than to the priest, and that all Christians are priests, 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Rev. i. 6; v. 10.—Tr.]

Ver. 16. STARKE: When hearers see something bad in him who has the care of their souls, they should duly remind him of it, and should not approve and commend his bad deeds, much less imitate him therein.

Ver. 17. STARKE: Nobody makes more Atheists than godless teachers, and even if the people still remember so much as to do according to their words and not their works, yet they retain a powerful influence upon the furtherance of godlessness. That wicked teachers with their godless life make great their damnation, is beyond dispute; but it is irrational to infer from this that there is no such thing as religion. ["The sin of the young men was very great" is the text of a sermon by WESLEY (Sermon CIX., Vol. II. p. 368) on the question "whether God ever did bless the ministry of ungodly men."—Tr.]

* [This statement is liable to misconception. The prophet could never take the place of the priest. The priest represented the idea of atonement by blood, a universal, fundamental religious fact; the prophet expounded the spirituality of God's law and service. These complementary offices were equally necessary, and existed till they both culminated in Jesus Christ.—Tr.]

Ver. 18. STARKE: And so he (Samuel) was a right pious lad; for such piety is more acceptable to God than when one leads a good life among only pious people, since there is a greater victory and greater fidelity in living piously among the wicked. Comp. Enoch's example, Gen. v. 24; vi. 9.

Ver. 19. DAECHSEL: Petty little histories, cries unbelief. What matters it whether one knows that Samuel had a little coat or not! Holy Scripture is not written for the wise, but for child-souls, and a child-like soul does not doubt that even the little coat which Hannah prepared for her Samuel has its history. If I think of Hannah as every year sewing this coat at her home in Ramah, I know that at every stitch a prayer for her Samuel rose up to the throne of the Lord.—The coat which she was sewing would remind her that she had given her Samuel to the Lord; and when the coat was ready, and she brought it to Shiloh, then every time with the coat she anew gave Samuel to her God, and said: I give him to the Lord again for his whole life, because he was obtained from the Lord by prayer.

Ver. 21. STARKE: Whoever gives to God what is God's, to him God also gives what his heart desires.—OSLANDER: Nothing is better invested than what is given to God the Lord and to His service; for He richly repays it all.—DAECHSEL: When our faithful God accepts from us poor creatures an offering of love, He takes it only to give it back five-fold, a hundred fold, and a thousand-fold; from His fulness we receive grace for grace. Look at our Hannah! It was grace, that the Lord taught her to pray for Samuel; grace, that He gave her the promise; grace, that He made her willing to dedicate Samuel to him; but what shall we say of the fact that in place of the one child whom He had caused to be given to Himself, the Lord gave her five children, three sons and two daughters? When we in His service do for Him the least thing out of love, it is not enough that He gives to the act itself such blessedness, but, consciously or unconsciously to us, He crowns such an act with a rich blessing of grace, and this grace is completed when He blesses us with the greatest of all blessings, eternal life.—[Vers. 22-25.] STARKE: O, how often do pious parents, by indulging their wicked children, plait a scourge for their old backs! [HALL: I heard Eli sharp enough to Hannah, upon but a suspicion of sin, and now how mild I find him to the notorious crimes of his own. The case is altered with the persons. With all the authority of an Oriental father, a high-priest, and a judge, he was solemnly bound to do more than mildly censure his sons, chap. iii. 13.—Tr.]

Ver. 25. CRAMER: The sins of the first table are much weightier and more perilous than the sins of the second table.—OSLANDER: Let no one sin purposely or wilfully and heap sins upon sins; for if he does, the door of grace is at last closed to him, and he finds no more place for repentance.—STARKE: The purpose of God was not the cause of their disobedience, but their disobedience was a sign that they were now ripe for destruction, and that the righteous purpose of God in their case should now soon be executed.

Ver. 26. STARKE: The best way to make ourselves agreeable and beloved among men is to seek to please God in Christ, act according to our conscience, and lead an exemplary life.—S. SCHMID: Whoever uses the grace of God aright, to him God gives more and more grace.—DAECHSEL: Our history is throughout a strong, firm consolation for parental hearts—for those who have to give back to the Lord in death a dear child which He has given to them in birth, for He can otherwise rejoice and bless them (vers. 20^{sq.}); and also for those who have to let their sons and daughters go out into the wicked world, full of evil examples and corrupting influences, for He can even then shield and preserve their children, and carry them on in faith and godliness (vers. 21–26).

Vers. 18–26. Young Samuel the pattern of a pious life in youth in the service of the Lord: 1) Planted and rooted in the soil of the early habit during childhood of consecrating himself to the Lord, vers. 18, 19; 2) Growing and increasing in the fear of the Lord under the care of godly parents and teachers, vers. 19–21; 3) Preserved and proved amid the temptations and influences of an evil world, vers. 22–25; 4) Blessed with favor in the sight of God and man.

Vers. 23–25. The judgment against obduracy in sin against the Lord: 1) Wherein is it founded? (a) In persistent, conscious sinning on against the Lord in spite of divine and human warning. (b) In the holy, unchangeable will of God, who does not suffer Himself to be mocked. 2) How is it executed? (a) In that God gives up the sinner to the service of sin from one degree to another. (b) In that the punitive divine justice gives over the sinner to the destruction to which he has condemned himself.

[Vers. 12–25. On wicked children of pious parents. 1) The number of such cases is often greatly exaggerated, because men are surprised at them, and notice, and remember; but it is in fact sadly great—in the Scripture histories—in our own observation. 2) The probable causes of this. (a) Piety is not properly hereditary—in what sense it is, and in what sense it is not. (b) Pious parents may, out of mistaken kindness, improperly indulge, and but feebly restrain—as Eli. (c) In other cases, they are too strict and severe. Application—to parents—to the children of the pious.—TR.]

Ver. 26. The fruit of a godly life: 1) The gracious approval of the Lord; 2) Recognition by God-fearing men.

FIFTH SECTION.

The prophecy of a Man of God of the divine judgment on Eli's house and of the calling of a faithful priest.

CHAPTER II. 27–36.

- 27 AND there came a man of God¹ unto [to] Eli and said unto [to] him, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah], Did I plainly appear [reveal myself] unto [to] the house of thy father when they were in Egypt in Pharaoh's house [in servitude² to the house of Pharaoh]? And did I choose [I chose³] him [it] out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest [to do priestly service to me], to offer⁴ upon my altar, to burn incense, to wear an ephod before me? [om. ?], and did I give [I gave] unto [to] the house of thy father all the offerings made by fire [the fire-offerings] of the children of Israel? [om. ?]. Wherefore kick ye at [trample ye under foot] my sacrifice and at [om. at] mine [my] offering which I have commanded in my habitation,⁵ and honor⁶est thy sons above me to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings [the best of every offering] of Israel my people?⁷ Wherefore [Therefore] the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel saith, I said indeed⁷ that thy house and the house

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 27. Chald. "a prophet of Jehovah."—TR.]

² [Ver. 27. ל often expresses possession, and is here so rendered by Chald. and Sept.—TR.]

³ [Ver. 28. The following וַיִּבְחַר makes it better not to carry on the interrogation here. Erdmann: "I chose it (thy house) to perform priestly service."—TR.]

⁴ [Ver. 28. The Heb. form here may be Qal ("ascend") or Hiphil ("offer") but the sense is the same in both cases.—TR.]

⁵ [Ver. 29. See Exeg. Notes.—TR.]

⁶ [Ver. 29. The ל is probably repetition from the last letter of the preceding word; see Josh. x. 21 for similar case.—TR.]

⁷ [Ver. 30. "Indeed" is merely intensive, Heb. Infin. Absol.—TR.]

of thy father should walk before me for ever; but now the Lord saith [saith Jehovah], Be it far from me; for them that honor me I will honor, and they that 31 despise me shall be lightly esteemed. Behold, the days come that I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house, [ins. so] that there shall not be an 32 old man in thine house. And⁸ thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation in all the wealth which God shall give Israel [thou shalt see distress of house in all that does 33 good to Israel]; and there shall not be an old man in thy house for ever. And the man of thine whom I shall not cut off [And I will not cut off every man of thine⁹] from my altar shall be [om. shall be], to consume thine eyes, and to grieve thine [thy] heart; and all the increase of thine [thy] house shall die in the flower 34 of their age.¹⁰ And this shall be a [the] sign unto [to] thee, that [ins. which] shall come upon thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas: in one day they shall die both of 35 them. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that [who] shall do according to that which is in my heart and in my mind [soul], and I will build him a sure¹¹ 36 house, and he shall walk before my anointed for ever. And it shall come to pass that every one that is left in thy house shall come and crouch to him for a piece¹² of silver and a morsel of bread, and shall say, Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priests' offices, that I may eat a piece of bread.

⁸ [Ver. 32. On the text of this verse see Exeg. Notes.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 33. See Exeg. Notes.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 33. Lit. "shall die men;" Sept. "by the sword of men," which Wellhausen prefers, but see Exeg. Notes.

—Ta.] ¹¹ [Ver. 35. The Heb. word is the same as that rendered "faithful" just before.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 36. More exactly "a small piece;" Erdmann: eine Bettelmünze, "a beggar's coin."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 27. The "man of God" (for the expression comp. Deut. xxxiii. 1; Judg. xiii. 6) who appears here is undoubtedly to be regarded as a prophet, both from this title, which marks him as standing in a specific relation to God, and from the introduction of his address: "Thus saith the Lord." This is, however, not the first mention of a prophet after Moses (Thenius); against this are Judg. iv. 14; vi. 8.—[Bib. Comm.: "The term (man of God) is applied to Moses in Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 6; and to different prophets upwards of forty times in Judg., Sam. and Kings, most frequently in the latter. In the Prophets it occurs only once (Jer. xxxv. 4). It occurs six or seven times in Chron., Ezra and Neh., and in the inscription of Ps xc., and nowhere else in the Old Testament. The sudden appearance of a man of God, the only prophet of whom mention is made since Ju. vi. 8, without name, or any notice of his country, is remarkable."—Ta.]—Thus saith the Lord.—Called and commissioned hereto by the Lord, he is nothing but His instrument; what he says is the very word of the Lord.—Did I reveal myself?—The interrog. particle (אֵל) stands here to strengthen the reality of the fact treated of, a question being introduced to which an affirmative reply is a matter of course, where in German [and in English] a not must be inserted. Comp. Jer. xxxi. 20; Job xx. 4; Ges. § 153, 2. The Inf. Abs. (אֵלֶּיךָ) shows the feeling of the question, and strengthens the assurance or assertion contained in it. By Eli's father's house we cannot understand Ithamar and his family, since a divine revelation to them in Egypt is out of the question; it is rather the family of Aaron (from whom Eli descended through Ithamar), as the high-priestly house. Aaron and his four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, when they were in Egypt, "belonged to Pharaoh's house," were its subjects, property (אֲבֵדָה); the suffix אֵלֶּיךָ (when they were) refers not to the children of Israel, but to "the house of thy father."

During the Egyptian bondage Aaron received the divine revelations by which he was called along with Moses to be God's instrument for the redemption of His people; and with Moses he received the command to institute the feast of the Passover (Ex. iv. 14 sqq., 27; xii. 1, 43). These revelations were the preparation and foundation for the calling of Aaron and his house to the high-priesthood.—[So far as the calling was concerned, the house of Aaron and the house of Eli were identical. Hence Eli is in this discourse identified with Aaron as to his privileges, but distinguished from the whole house as to his sin and its punishment.—Ta.]

Ver. 28. [Erdmann renders: "I chose it (the house of thy father) to perform priestly service."—Ta.]*

How that house (Aaron and his sons) were formally called and appointed to the priestly office is circumstantially related in Ex. xxviii., xxix.

* Textual and Grammatical.—The Inf. Abs. אֵלֶּיךָ stands for the Verb. fin., as a Verb. fin. has preceded in the same sentence (Ges., § 131, 4 o). But the Interrog. אֵלֶּיךָ does not extend to this Inf. Abs., which stands for the Perf., and makes the discourse absolute.—אֵלֶּיךָ is better referred to אֵלֶּיךָ than to אֲבֵדָה, on account of the following "tribes." But then we must read with Böttcher and Thenius לִבְהֵן instead of לִבְהֵן, "as agreeing better with the preceding אֵלֶּיךָ and the succeeding Inf." (Böttcher). So the Sept. λεπερεν, Comp. Ex. xxxi. 10.—לִבְהֵן is contracted from לִבְהֵן. See Deut. i. 33; 2 Sam. xviii. 3; Eccl. v. 5.

Comp. especially Ex. xxviii. 1; xxix. 9, 30, 44, with Lev. viii. 1 sq. and Num. xviii.—The priestly service is described in three grades, corresponding to the three divisions of the Sanctuary: 1) "to offer* on my altar," where the altar of burnt-offering with its service is meant; 2) "to burn incense." Incense had to be burned daily. The incense-offering alone is named, and represents the other offerings as the indication of the priestly service in the Holy Place, Ex. xxx. 8; 3) "to wear the ephod before me." The high-priest wore the ephod† when he went officially into the Most Holy place to represent the people before God, Ex. xxviii. 12, 29, 30.—And I gave to the house of thy father, etc.—The divine wages for these priestly services is the maintenance which the priests derived from the offerings. The "firings" (fire-offerings, אֵשׁ זָרָה) are the same as "the firing and the firings of the Lord" (Lev. i. 9; ii. 10; Deut. xviii. 1) in the offerings, and so are the things offered. According to Num. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9; xviii. 1, the Levites, and therefore the whole priesthood, received no inheritance in land; their support was provided for by the portions of the offerings appointed them by law, that is, all sacrificial gifts, so far as they were not burnt in offering the sacrifice, Lev. vi. 7; Num. xviii.

Ver. 29. In the preceding verses (27, 28) reference is made to the favor which had been shown the family of Eli in their selection and calling to the service of priests in the Sanctuary, and their maintenance with the offerings is mentioned as proof of the Lord's care for His servants; there the question (ver. 27) was introduced by the simple interrog. sign (וְלָמָּה); here the more sharply toned question with "why" (לָמָּה) portrays in distinct contrast the wicked conduct of the priests: Why do ye trample under foot? etc.—"Sacrifice and offering" (זֶבַח וְעֹלָה) is a "general designation for all altar-offerings" (Keil). נָעַט "is in Aram. first tread (Heb. דָּרַךְ), and might thence (as דָּרַךְ, Judg. v. 23; Prov. xxvii. 7) like 'tread' in many languages figuratively mean to treat with contempt" (Böttcher). בֵּיתִי, the "dwelling," in pregnant sense is the Tabernacle, as the Lord's dwelling-place in the midst of His people. Though the word has not elsewhere in itself this meaning, yet it follows here and in ver. 32 from the connection, which without difficulty permits the same addition that we find in Ps. xxvi. 8, "of thy house." There is no need therefore here to suppose (with Thenius) either a wrong reading or in general anything superfluous, particularly not the latter, because the Lord's abode with His people was in fact the scene of the priests' enormities, and their guilt thus appeared so much the greater. בֵּיתִי is Accus. of place "in the dwelling" (בֵּיתִי "in the house"). Böttcher proposes as a "faultless text" וְלָמָּה צִוִּיתִים אֲנִי, "why do ye trample under foot, . . . what I commanded them, sinfully," where the suffix "them" refers to the Israelites

(ver. 28), and עַל, "sin," is taken in the sense of עָלָה, "in sin," which is found in Ps. li. 7. But according to the preceding explanation there is no need for such a change, apart from the fact "that the sinfully precisely speaking is already contained in the 'trample under foot'" (Thenius). He says: "why do ye trample," etc., because Eli was partaker in the guilt of his sons; because he, not only as father towards sons, but also as high-priest towards them as priests, was weakly lacking in the proper chastisement and in the enjoined holy strictness. Eli ought to have opposed his sons as a zealous contender for the Lord's honor; since he did not do this, he not only made himself partaker of their guilt, but honored his sons before the Lord, more than the Lord, because he spared them, and showed unseasonable paternal gentleness. In the plu. pron. "make yourselves fat," Eli's guilt is again referred to; what they did, namely, that they took (ver. 15) the first (רֵאשִׁית) of the offering before the best of the offering (טֵבֵל) was presented to the Lord by burning it in the fire of the altar, that he did along with them; they made themselves fat. The wickedness of Eli and his sons in connection with the offering is also put here in two-fold form, namely, against God ("my offering"), and against the people as the people of the Lord (all the offerings of Israel, my people).* After the reference to the guilt follows now the judgment, the announcement of punishment, which applies to Eli as well as to his sons and his whole house.

Ver. 30. אָמַרְתִּי—I had said.—The house of thy father in connection with "thy house," indicates the whole priestly connection in all its branches from Aaron down, to whom with his sons the same expression in ver. 27 refers. For this reason, if for no other, because "the house of thy father" must mean the same here as in ver. 27, we must set aside the view that here only Ithamar's family is meant, to which the high-priesthood passed from Eleazar's family, and to which Eli belonged. But also the expression: should walk before me for ever, is in conflict with this view. The "walking before the Lord" would be understood in too narrow a sense, on the one hand, if it were restricted to the entrance of the high-priest into the Holy of Holies, and in too wide a sense, on the other hand, if it were regarded as a general description of a pious walk before God, as in Gen. xvii. 1. Rather it points to the life in priestly service before the Lord promised to the house of Aaron for ever (Ex. xxix. 9). The promise of the "covenant of an everlasting priesthood" was renewed to Phinehas, the son of Eleazar (Num. xxv. 18) for his zeal for the Lord's honor. This fact and its motive contribute essentially to the explanation of what here follows. The "and now" introduces a declaration opposed to that promise, not in the sense that the latter is annulled, but in reference to its non-fulfilment for those in whom the condition of its fulfilment was lacking.—Far

* לְעַמִּי "is periphrasis for the Gen., and is chosen

* [The Germ. has steigen, "ascend," error for opfern, "offer."—Tr.]

† [Germ. achselbündel, "shoulder-dress," "amice."—Tr.]

in order to make the 'my people' more prominent" (Keil). On this periphrasis of the Gen. see Ew. Gr. § 292, a. 2.—[But this does not apply here. See Textual Notes in loco.—Tr.]

be it from me, that is, this promise shall not be fulfilled unless the condition be fulfilled which is expressed in the words: Those that honor me I will honor.—According to the priests' attitude towards God the Lord in their whole walk will be His attitude towards them in respect to the fulfilment of His promise.

Vers. 31, 32. The general truth of the last words in ver. 30, which emphasize in the distinctest manner the ethical condition of the exercise of the holy sacerdotal office in the priest's bearing towards God, is applied to Eli and his house in ver. 31, and contains the standard by which he with his sons is judged. I will out of thy arm.—The "arm" signifies might, power, Ps. x. 15; Job xxii. 9. "There shall not be an old man in thy house." Thus will be shown that the strength of the family and the house is broken; for strength is shown in reaching a great age. No one in Eli's house shall attain a great age. This supposes that sickness will early consume its members. "On the aged rested the consideration and power of families" (Böttcher). As the house of Eli will perish, so will also the house of God suffer affliction (ver. 32). וְיָ always means to look with astonishment or attention (Böttcher, Num. xii. 8; Isa. xxxviii. 11; Ps. x. 14); וְיָ is only "oppressor" or "enemy," and is not to be rendered "rival" or "adversary," as Aquila (ἀντιζηλος) and Jerome (amulus), and also Luther and De Wette give it; בְּמִקְוֵהוּ "dwelling" is here to be understood of the dwelling-place of God, not of Eli. From these meanings it follows that Samuel cannot be here referred to, since he was not an enemy of Eli, nor the installation of Zadok in Abiathar's place (1 Ki. ii. 27), for Zadok was not Abiathar's enemy. Something must be meant which Eli lived to see with astonishment or consternation in the house of the Lord, and it can therefore only be the oppression of the house by the oppressor or enemy who met Israel in the person of the Philistines, carried away the ark, and thus robbed the Lord's house of its heart. We do not need therefore to alter the text to "rock of refuge" (צֶדֶק בְּמִקְוֵהוּ), as Böttcher proposes. "In all which" (בְּכָל אֲשֶׁר) is not to be rendered with De Wette "during the whole time which." In וְיָ, "shall do good" we must not supply a ' as name of Jehovah (Kennicott), nor, as is commonly done, make Jehovah the subject (De Wette, Keil, etc.). "There is no reason why we should not take "all which" itself as unpersonal subject; precisely where ' has an unpersonal subject, it has, as here, a simple Acc. after it, Pr. xv. 13, 20; xvii. 22; Ecc. xx. 9, while, with a personal subject, a preposition follows, Ex. i. 20; Num. x. 32; Judg. xvii. 13" (Böttcher). The affliction of God's house from the loss of the Ark remained, while under the lead of Samuel there came blessing to the people. This is the fulfilment of this prophecy in reference to the affliction of God's dwelling. "Not an old man" is repetition of the threat in ver. 31, and return of the discourse to the judgment on Eli's house. "All the days" [Eng. A. V. for ever], for ever, that is, as long as his family existed. [Both text and translation of ver. 32 offer great difficulties. Vat. Sept. omits it. Al. Sept. and Theod.: "Thou shalt see strength" (καταίωμα), etc. The Syr. and Arab.: "and (not) one who holds a sceptre in thy dwelling," which involves a totally different text. Targ. has "thou shalt see the affliction which will come on a man of thy house in the sins which ye have committed in the house of my sanctuary." The omission in Vat. Sept. was probably occasioned by the similar endings of vers. 31 and 32; the other versions and all the MSS. contain the verse, one MS. only of De Rossi giving בְּמִקְוֵהוּ, "strength," instead of בְּמִקְוֵהוּ, "dwelling." We must therefore retain the Heb. text, and explain the repetition of the last clause as intended to give emphasis to the statement in question. But, as וְיָ frequently means "distress," and as the course of thought here suggests affliction for Eli's house rather than for God's, it is better to render: "thou shalt see distress of dwelling in all that brings prosperity to Israel," the contrast being between the national prosperity and his personal affliction, which would thus exclude him from the national rejoicing, and so from the evidence of the divine favor. And we may regard the latter clause of the verse: "there shall not be an old man," etc., as defining the "affliction" which is here brought out as a punishment additional to the "weakness" of ver. 31.—Tr.]

Ver. 33. Böttcher declares De Wette's explanation: "and I will not let thee lack a single man," to be incorrect, and Thénius' reference to the definite one "Ahitub" (xiv. 3; xxii. 20) to be without ground, and then remarks (on וְיָ): "There remains no other course but to regard it as an infrequent, but not unexampled exceptional case. In Heb., as is well known, a negative in a sentence with וְיָ ("man") and כָּל ("all"), whether it stand before or after, negatives these words not alone, but in connection with the whole sentence, and thus וְיָ לֹא אִישׁ mean not "not every one," but "no one," and so too וְיָ לֹא אִישׁ אֶחָד, Ex. xvi. 19; xxxiv. 3; Lev. xviii. 6. But when the accent falls on the word expressive of universality by an adversative particle, as here (וְיָ), the following negation may affect this word alone, as in Num. xxiii. 13. Accordingly we render here: "Yet I will not cut off every one from thee." The following words: to consume thine eyes and to grieve thy heart, or "that I may consume," etc., mark the highest degree of punishment which would befall Eli but for the limitation contained in the words "not every man." Thénius refers this limitation specially to Ahitub, son of Phinehas, and brother of Ichabod, against which Keil justly remarks that it cannot be proved from xiv. 3 and xxii. 20 that he was the only one who survived of Eli's house.*—The following words: the great majority or mass shall die as men, not only answer to the repeated threat in vers. 31, 32, that there should be no old man in the house, but at the same time explain the declaration of v. 31: "I will break thine arm;" for "men" (עֲמָלָאֵךְ) indicates the power and strength of the house, and is contrasted with "old man" (Luther: "when they have become men;" Van Ess: "in mature age").—On עַם, "multitude," "majority," not "offspring," comp. 1 Chron. xii. 29; 2 Chron. xxx. 18.—[Sept.: "And every survivor of thy house shall fall by the sword of men." Vulg.: "and the great part of thy house shall die when they attain the age of men." Targ.: "and all the multitude of thy house shall be slain young." Syr.: "and all the pupils (so Castle renders marbith) of thy house shall die men." Philippson: "and all the increase of thy house shall die as men." The Eng. A. V. probably gives the sense. The adj. "all" does not suit the rendering "multitude," which Targ. and Erdmann adopt. In regard to the first clause of the verse, the rendering of Eng. A. V. seems to be possible, that is, the taking מִן as indef. rel. clause. Erdmann regards the reservation of the "man" as a limitation of the punishment ("consume, grieve"); Eng. A. V. better, with most expositors, as an element of the punishment. Mendoza (in Poole's Synopsis): "I will take from thee the high-priesthood, which thou hast by privilege; I will give thee or thy descendants the priesthood of the second order, which thou hadst by hereditary right." Grotius: "They shall live that they may be the greatest grief to thee."—Long afterwards this curse was held to cling to the family of Eli. Gill cites a saying of the Talmud that there was a family in Jerusalem the men of which did not live to be more than eighteen years old, and Johanan ben Zacchai being asked the reason of this, replied that they were perhaps of the family of Eli.—Sept. has "his eyes" and "his soul," instead of thy; but there is no good ground for altering the Heb. text.—Tr.]

* Böttcher: וְיָ לֹא אִישׁ is for וְיָ לֹא אִישׁ אֶחָד, one of the numerous clerical errors in these books.—[It is by no means clear that there is a clerical error here, since we may suppose a stem אֶחָד-אֶחָד as אֶחָד-אֶחָד.—Ta.]

Ver. 34. The fact announced, the death of his two sons in one day (iv. 11), was to be a sign to Eli, who lived to see it, that this threat affecting his whole house should be fulfilled. The realization of this threat began with that event. Not all of Eli's descendants indeed perished in this judgment, and among his immediate posterity were some who filled the office of priest, namely, Phinehas' son, Ahitub; Ahitub's sons, Ahiah (xiv. 3, 18) and Ahimelech (xxii. 9, 11, 20); Ahimelech's son, Abiathar (xxii. 20). Ahiah and Abiathar filled the high-priestly office. But Ahimelech and "all his father's house, the priests, who were at Nob" were hewn off from Eli's family-tree. And Abiathar, Ahimelech's son, who escaped that butchery (xxii. 19), and as a faithful adherent of David enjoyed the dignity of high-priest, was deposed from his office by Solomon. The office of high-priest passed now forever from Ithamar's family, and went over to Eleazar's, to which Zadok belonged; the latter from now on was sole high-priest, while hitherto Abiathar had exercised this office along with him.—Thus was to be fulfilled the negative part of the prophetic announcement (vers. 31–34): gradually Eli's house went down in respect to the majority of its members [better, in all its increase.—Tr.]; the office of high-priest, which the surviving members for some time filled, was at last taken away from it altogether.

Ver. 35sq. Now follows the positive part of the prophecy.—But I will raise me up a faithful priest.—The priestly office, as a divine institution, remains, though those that fill it perish because they are unworthy, and because their life contradicts its theocratic meaning, and therefore falls under the divine punishment. The "faithful priest" is, in the first place, to be understood in contrast with Eli and his sons, to whom the above declaration of punishment was directed. We may distinguish the following facts in the announcement of this priest of the future, who is to assume the theocratic-priestly position between God and His people in place of Eli and his house: 1) he is to be raised up by God directly, that is, not merely called and chosen, but (according to the exact meaning of the word) set up; his priestly position is to be historically fixed and assigned by God directly and in an extraordinary manner; 2) he will be a faithful priest, that is, will not merely be in keeping with the end and meaning of his calling, but, in order to this, will be and remain personally the Lord's own in true piety and in firm, living faith, constantly and persistently devoted to the Lord his God, and seeking only His honor; 3) he will do, act, according to the norm of the divine will; as faithful priest of God, he knows what is in God's heart and soul, he knows His thoughts and counsels; these will be the rule by which (וְכִפְּסָם) he will act as a man of God, as a servant after his heart; 4) and I will build him a sure house, his family will continue as one well-pleasing to me and blessed, and will not perish like thine—this shall be the reward as well as the result of his faithfulness; 5) he shall walk before my anointed for ever. The "anointed" is the theocratic king, whom the Lord will call. Walking before Him denotes the most cordial life-fellowship with Him. In this reference of the prophetic announcement to the "anointed of the Lord" is expressed the same expectation of a theocratic kingdom as in the close of Hannah's song.

In ver. 36 is added another feature in the portraiture of the faithful priest: in this close connection with the kingdom, he will occupy so exalted, honorable and mighty a position over against the fallen house of Eli, that the needy and wretched survivors of that house will be dependent on him for existence and support.—On the לָּ before הַנִּזְכָּר, where, on account of the following Article, it signifies all, whole, comp. Ges., § III., 1 Rem., Ew., § 290 a. "All the rest, all that remains." The אֲנִיָּה פְּסָף is "a small silver coin collected by begging" (Keil). The lower the remains of Eli's house sink even to beggary, the higher will the "faithful, approved priest," of whom the prophet here speaks, stand. In the immediate future of the theocratic kingdom he will see far beneath him those of Eli's house who are still priests in humble dependence on him.

This prophecy found its fulfillment from the stand-point of historical exposition in Samuel. That the author of our Books had him in view in his account of the man of God's announcement is clear from the narration immediately following in ch. iii.; here the voice of the divine call comes to the child Samuel at the same time with the revelation imparted to him of the judgment against the house of Eli. He is indeed expressly called by the divine voice to be prophet; his first prophetic duty, which he performs as God's organ, is the announcement of the judgment on Eli in the name of the Lord; it is true, it is said of him in ver. 20, that he was known in all Israel to be faithful and confirmed (נִבִּי) as a prophet. But the summary statement of his prophetic vigor and work in vers. 19-21, in which the epithet "faithful, confirmed," points back to the same expression in ii. 35, is connected with the reference to Shiloh and the constant revelations there, which had begun with the one made to Samuel; by the express reference to Shiloh Samuel's prophetic character and work are at the same time presented under the sacerdotal point of view. An essential element of the calling of priest was instruction in the Law, the announcement of the divine will (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxxiii. 10), and Mal. ii. 7, expressly declares the duty of the priest in these words: "the priest's lips shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law from his mouth, for he is a messenger of heaven;" and so that prophecy of a faithful priest is all the more fulfilled in Samuel (whose words to the people, iii. 19-21, had the pure and the practical word of God in the Law for their content), because the priesthood of his time had proved itself unworthy and unable to fulfil this calling. The further sacred priestly acts which Samuel performed (iii. 19-21), and the mediating position between God and the people as advocate and intercessor expressly ascribed to him in vii. 5 characterize him as the faithful, approved priest who is announced here in vers. 35, 36. The other single traits in the picture suit Samuel. In the list of theocratic instruments of the succeeding period there is none that surpasses him; he surpasses them all so far, that our gaze fixes itself on him in seeking for a realization of this announcement in connection with the fulfilment of the threat against Eli and his house. Samuel's bearing and conduct is everywhere such that the declaration "he shall do according to what is in my heart and soul," is verified in no other theocratic-prophetic and priestly person so eminently as in him. A sure house the Lord built him according to 1 Chron. vi. 33; xxv. 4, 5. His grandson was Heman "the singer, the king's seer in the words of God," father of fourteen sons and three daughters. The intimate relation of Samuel to the theocratic kingdom under Saul and David, the Lord's anointed kings, is an obvious fulfilment of the prophecy "he shall walk before my anointed for ever." The raising up of the fore-announced priest was to follow immediately on the punishment of Eli and his house. In point of fact Samuel steps into the gap in the priesthood which that judgment made as priestly and high-priestly mediator between God and the people, as is shown by the passages cited and by the whole character of his work. By the corruption of its traditional representatives the hereditary priesthood had come to be so at variance with its theocratic significance and mission, that the fulfilment of this mission could be attained, in this great crisis in the development of Israel's history into the theocratic kingdom, only in an extraordinary way, through direct divine calling, by such an instrument as Samuel. The statement, in the concluding words, of the walking of the faithful priest before the Lord's anointed is fulfilled exactly (according to the above explanation) in Samuel's relation to this kingdom.—It is held by some that the prophecy in vers. 30-36, (compared with 1 Kings ii. 27, and Joseph. V. 11, 5; VIII. 1, 3), refers to the transition of the priestly dignity from the house of Ithamar to the house of Eleazar, and therefore that this prophecy, in whole or in some parts, was composed in or after the time of Solomon, (De Wette, Einkl. § 178 b.; Bertholdt, Einkl. III. 916, and Ewald, Gesch. I. 190); against which Thénius (p. 15) properly points out that even after this change the high-priesthood remained still in the family of Aaron, while the words "and the house of thy father," (vers. 30, 31), clearly shows that the prophecy does not speak of a change in the family, and that in vers. 27-36 we have a genuine ancient prediction of a prophet. Against the view that the prophecy of the "faithful priest" was, according to 1 Kings ii. 27 fulfilled in the complete transference of the high-priesthood, by the deposition of Abiathar, to the family of Eleazar, to which Zadok belonged, we remark: 1) that (if the advocates of this view mean this family and its succeeding line of high-priests) the words of the prophecy speak of a single person, not of several, or collectively of a body; and 2) that, if Zadok is held to be the "faithful priest" in whom the prophetic word was fulfilled, his person and work have no such epoch-making theocratic significance in the history as we should expect from the prophecy; the expectation is satisfied only in Samuel's priestly-prophetic eminence. For the rest, the words of 1 Kings ii. 27 give no ground for the opinion that the prophecy in ver. 35 is in them referred to Zadok (Thénius), since the passage, having in view Abiathar's deposition, is speaking merely of the fulfilment of the threatened punishment of Eli's house, and not at all of the fulfilment of the positive part of the prophecy; there is, therefore, no occasion to speak (with Thénius) of a false conception of this prophecy as early as Solomon's time. The lofty priestly position, which Samuel took in his calling as Judge and Prophet before the Lord and His people, the priestly work, by which (the regular priesthood completely retiring) he stood as mediator between Jehovah and His people in sacrifice, prayer, intercession and advocacy, and the high theocratic-reformatory calling, in which his "important, sacred duty was to walk before the anointed, the king, whom Israel was to receive through him, while the Aaronic priesthood fell for a good time into such contempt, that, in the universal neglect of divine worship, it had to beg honor and support from him, and became dependent on the new order of things begun by Samuel," (O. v. Gerlach),—these things prove that, from the theocratic-historical point of view, in him is fulfilled the prophecy of the faithful priest.

[Four different interpretations explain the "faithful priest" to be Samuel, Zadok, Christ, or a line of priests, including Samuel and Zadok, and culminating in Christ; the last seems to be the only tenable one. I. We cannot restrict the prophecy to Samuel, for 1) the "established house" promised the faithful priest is clearly a priestly house, as is evident from a comparison of ver. 35 with vers. 30, 31, where the everlasting official sacerdotal character of this house is contrasted with the fall of Eli's priestly house; and Samuel founded no such house. 2) Eli's house was not immediately deprived of the high-priesthood, nor was it at all excluded from the priesthood. Up to Solomon's time descendants of Eli were high-priests, and the Jews held that his family continued to exist. Nor did Samuel succeed Eli immediately as Priest and Judge. 3) It is an important fact that Samuel is nowhere called a priest, and it is an exaggeration of his position to ascribe to him a complete sacerdotal character. His mediatorial work belonged to him largely as a man of God, and similar work was performed by Moses, David, Solomon, none of whom acted as priests. It is doubtful whether Samuel sacrificed at all, still more whether he usually performed this service. The people are said to have sacrificed (1 Sam. xi. 15), where is probably meant that they did it through the priests, and one passage (1 Sam. ix. 13), seems to exclude Samuel from the act of sacrifice. At any rate his performance of sacrificial service may be regarded as extraordinary and unofficial like that of Gideon (Judg. vi. 26, 27) and Solomon (1 Kings iii. 4). But it is true that Samuel's life developed the conception of the theocratically pure and faithful priest in contrast with the self-seeking and immorality of Eli's sons. He was the first protest against their profane perversion of the holy office, the first exemplification after Eli's time of pure-hearted service of God. II. Rashi, Abarbanel and the majority of modern commentators suppose the reference to be to Zadok, Christian writers usually adopting also the Messianic interpretation. And, though 1 Kings ii. 27 mentions only the deposition of Abiathar as the fulfilment of the judgment on Eli's house, yet this, taken with ver. 35, can hardly be severed from the installation of Zadok as sole high-priest; the final exclusion of Eli's representative is followed immediately by the elevation of the Zadokite family, which continues in an unbroken line to Christ. That the Zadokites were the true divinely-appointed priests, is assumed throughout the following books of the Old Testament, and especially in such passages as Ezek. xlv. 15, (quoted by Keil). Erdmann's objections to this view do not seem conclusive. He urges: 1) that the prophecy (vers. 27-37) speaks not of a change within the Aaronic family, but of a setting aside of that family in favor of a non-Aaronic priest.—But this is not the declaration of the prophecy, (ver. 30 speaks of the exclusion of unworthy members, and the reference is plainly to Eli's immediate family), and is contradicted by the facts of history; for the Aaronic priesthood did continue to the end, while the change announced (ver. 36) was to take place in the history of Israel. Samuel founded no priestly family, and the restriction of the prophecy to him alone is not in keeping with the broadness of its declarations. 2) That Zadok was not specially prominent, and does not exhibit a commanding character cannot be urged against this view, since the prophecy promises not intellectual vigor in the "faithful priest" but theocratic official purity and personal godliness, which Zadok and his descendants in the main exhibited. III. Augustine (De Civ. Dei 17, 5) explains the priest here announced to be Christ alone, basing his view on the breadth and fulness of the statements made about Him. The text does not allow this exclusive reference to Christ, looking plainly, as it does, to the then existing order of things (as in ver. 36, which Augustine interprets of Jewish priests coming to worship Christ), but it may include Him, or rather point to Him as the consummation of the blessedness which it promises; and the remarkable fulness of the terms in ver. 35 naturally leads us to this explanation. IV. If the prophecy finds a partial fulfilment in Samuel and Zadok, and also points to Christ, then it would seem best to regard it as announcing a line of faithful men who would do God's will in full official and personal sympathy with His law. First comes Samuel, not indeed an official priest, but a true representative of the spirituality of the divine service (see 1 Sam. xv. 22). He is followed by Zadok, the father of a long line of priests, who (with many defects) in the main preserve among the people and in the presence of the king the fundamental ideas of the sacrificial service, and are a type (Ez. xlv. 15) of the perfect priesthood into which they are finally merged. To this Erdmann objects that the reference is plainly (ver. 35) to one person, and not to a body of men; but he himself understands the "anointed," in which the expression of singleness is not less distinct, of Saul and David. If the anointed is to be understood of a line of kings, why not the priest of a line of priests?—This last view then seems best to meet the demands of this confessedly difficult passage. See Keil and Wordsworth in loco.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The "man of God" who, by divine commission, predicts the punishment of Eli and his house is a proof that the prophetic gift, which appears sporadically in the Period of the Judges, had in this its gloomy close not yet disappeared. After it had been said: "there arose not henceforth a prophet in Israel like Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. xxxiv. 10), nevertheless in the time of the Judges, by whose word as spoken according to the divine calling and commission, the people had to govern themselves, we see prophecy reappearing in the following individuals: Judg. ii., the messenger of the Lord,* who comes up from Gilgal to Bochim, and exhorts the Israelites to repentance in the name of the Lord; chap. iv., the Judge Deborah, who, expressly described as "prophetess," combines the offices of Judge and Prophet, being the organ of Jehovah's communications; chap. vi., the Prophet who was sent by the Lord as His messenger, to rebuke Israel for their idolatry, and to call Gideon to deliver Israel from the Midianitish bondage. The content of the prophetic declarations, in keeping with the history of the times, is: announcement of divine punishment for the people's idolatry through the oppression of enemies, exhortation to repentance, promise of help.

* [It is doubtful whether the malak can be considered other than an angel.—Tr.]

2. The internal decline of the theocratic life of God's people showed itself in the close of the Period of the Judges principally in the corruption of the sacerdotal office as cause and effect. In regard, therefore, to the priestly mediation between God and the people, there was needed a thorough reformation and a re-establishment of the proper inner relation between them by a true priestly mediation. For this reason the prophetic announcement of the "faithful, true priest" stands at the beginning of the new period, and, at the commencement of the new theocratic development, has an epoch-making fulfilment in Samuel's person and work, in which the priestly side is chiefly prominent.

3. Samuel is in this respect a type of Christ; the idea of the priesthood, as here in ver. 35 expressed, found in all respects its completest and most universal fulfilment in Christ's high-priestly office of mediator between God and man.

4. The conception of the honor of God and of knowing Him is impossible, without the idea of the personal living God, and without the existence of a relation, established by Him, between Him, the living God, and man, in which the consciousness of absolute dependence on Him is connected with that of the obligation to be heartily consecrated to Him and in fellowship with Him. The declaration "he who knows Me," etc. [ver. 30] expresses God's righteous procedure in regard to the recognition or non-recognition of His honor by men.

5. When the guilt of the corruption and decline of the religious-moral life of the people rests on "the house of the Lord," "it is time that judgment should begin at the house of God," 1 Pet. iv. 17.

6. [The walking of the priest before Jehovah's anointed indicates a definite separation between the sacerdotal and judicial or governing offices, and a certain subordination of the first to the second. This was a condition of the developed Israelitish state, and appears in proper form first under David. Saul seems to have exercised authority over the priesthood, but in David's time the relation of political subordination was first united with sincere religious unity of heart and purpose, and thus one step taken towards the perfect and complete form (king, prophet, priest), which was to shadow forth the office and work of Christ.—And, as of Hannah's anticipation of the king, so we may say of the prediction by this man of God of the united king and priest, that it had its root in the felt need of the times, which, as it existed in its distinctest and intensest form in the most spiritual minds of the nation, was guided and elevated and intensified by the Spirit of God into prevision and prophecy.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 27. A man of God. 1) His office is to come to the people with "Thus saith the Lord." Though inspiration cannot now be expected, he may be "thoroughly furnished" from the Scriptures (2 Tim. iii. 17). 2) When called to give rebukes and warnings, he should do it with faithfulness, solemnity, and tenderness.—Tr.]

Vers. 27-36. The prophet's sermon of censure, [German Strafpredigt] against Levi and his house.

1) Looking back to the past, it recalls the manifold exhibition of the benefits of God's grace, vers. 27, 28; 2) Looking around upon the present, it holds before Eli his sins and those of his house, vers. 29, 30; 3) Looking out upon the future, it proclaims the divine judgment, vers. 30-36.

Vers. 27-30. To what are we bound by the experience of overflowing manifestations of God's grace?

1) To be always thankfully mindful of them; 2) To proclaim everywhere the praises of God; 3) By a sober and holy walk to promote the honor of His name.

Vers. 27-36. God's righteousness and grace in union with each other. 1) Grace in union with righteousness, vers. 27-32; (a) The actual proofs and gifts of God's grace (vers. 27-29) contain serious demands by the holy and righteous God; (b) The promises of grace are in respect of their fulfilment conditioned by the conduct of man towards God, which is weighed by his righteousness, ver. 30; (c) In proportion as man in view of the revelation of divine grace gives God the honor or not, he is requited by God according to his righteousness, ver. 30. 2) The severity of God's righteousness does not exclude grace, ver. 30. (a) It suffers itself to lean upon forbearing, softening grace, in order that justice may not execute complete destruction, vers. 33, 36; (b) It does not take away the arrangements which grace has established, but guards and preserves them against the sin of men, vers. 27-29; (c) It does not cause the promises of grace to fall away, but makes room for their fulfilment in another way, ver. 35.

Ver. 30. God the Lord, according to His righteousness, remains no man's debtor: 1) Whoever honors Him, will He also honor; 2) He who despises Him shall be despised in return.—To honor God the loftiest task of human life: 1) Wherein it consists; 2) How it is performed; 3) What promise and threatening are here concerned.—[I. Some of the ways in which we may honor God. (1) By speaking His name with reverence. (2) By keeping the Lord's day holy to Him. (3) By propriety of behaviour in public worship. (4) By practically recognizing our dependence on His Providence. (5) By performing all the duties of life as to the Lord (Col. iii. 17). II. Some of the ways in which He will honor us. (1) In causing us to be respected by our fellow-men (Prov. iii. 16). (2) In making us the means of converting others. (3) In receiving us to glory, honor and immortality in heaven (Rom. iii. 7).—BAXTER: Never did man dishonor God, but it proved the greatest dishonor to himself. God will find out ways enough to wipe off any stain upon Him; but you will not so easily remove the shame and dishonor from yourselves.—Tr.]

Ver. 35. The exercise of the priestly office, which is well-pleasing to God: 1) Its personal condition and pre-supposition, fidelity, firmness, steadfastness, "I will raise me up a faithful priest;" 2) Its rule and measure, "according to that which is in my heart and in my soul;" 3) Its blessing and reward, "and I will," etc. [Upon the phrase,

"he shall walk before my Anointed forever," comp. above on ii. 10, Hom. and Pract.—Tr.].

Vers. 27–30. The heavy guilt of neglecting the office of household-priest in the rearing of children:

- 1) It wrongs the welfare and honor of the house, so far as in earlier times God has in grace and compassion crowned it with blessings, vers. 27–29;
- 2) In indulgent and weak love to the children it robs God of the honor which He demands, ver. 30;
- 3) It thereby prepares for the children a sure destruction, ver. 34; 4) It often thereby brings a curse and ruin upon succeeding generations, vers. 31–33, 36.

[HALL: Indulgent parents are cruel to themselves and their posterity. Eli could not have devised which way to have plagued himself and his house so much, as by his kindness to his children's sins. . . . I do not read of any fault Eli had but indulgence; and which of the notorious offenders were plagued more!—Tr.].

SECOND SECTION.

Samuel's Call.

CHAPTERS III.—IV. 1 a.

- 1 AND the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord [Jehovah] before Eli. And the word of the Lord [Jehovah] was precious¹ in those days; there was no open
- 2 vision [vision spread abroad²]. And it came to pass at that time, when [that³] Eli was laid down [lying down⁴] in his place, and his eyes began to wax dim that he
- 3 could not see. And ere [om. ere⁵] the lamp of God went out [was not yet gone out] in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was [om. in the temple was⁶] and Samuel was laid down [lying down⁴] to sleep [om. to sleep, ins. in
- 4 the temple of Jehovah where the ark of God⁷ was], That [And] the Lord [Jehovah] called [ins. to] Samuel, and he answered [said], Here am I. And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I, for thou calledst me. And he said, I called not;
- 6 [ins. go back and] lie down again [om. again]. And he went and lay down. And the Lord [Jehovah] called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel arose and went to Eli, and said, Here am I, for thou didst call [calledst] me. And he answered [said], I
- 7 called not, my son, [ins. go back and] lie down again [om. again]. Now Samuel did not yet know⁸ the Lord [Jehovah], neither was the word of the Lord yet [and
- 8 the word of Jehovah was not yet] revealed unto him. And the Lord [Jehovah] called Samuel again the third time. And he arose and went to Eli, and said, Here

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. — "rare," see Isa. xlii. 12; Chald. renders "hidden."—Tr.]

² [Ver. 1. This word (פָּרַץ) is variously rendered: Sept. διαστέλλουσα, "distinguishing," "explaining," whence some would (without ground) change the text to פָּרַץ (which perhaps the Alex. translator read, the Nun omitted from preceding Nun); Chald. "revealed" — "broken open;" Syr. as Heb.; Arab., "the Lord had deprived the children of Israel of revelation in those days, and there was no revelation to any one of them, and nothing appeared to him;" Vulg. "manifesta;" others, "broken," "diffused," "multiplied;" the Jewish interpreters (Rashi, Kimchi, Kalbag) follow the Targ.: Luther, wenig weissagung, "little prophecy;" Erdmann, verbreitet, "spread abroad;" Cahen, répanda. This last is probably the correct sense, see 1 Chr. xlii. 2; 2 Chr. xxxi. 5.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 2. Erdmann renders "when" (as Eng. A. V.) in order to show that the description from this point is introductory to ver. 4; but the literal translation, given above, clearly indicates the connection of thought, and avoids the interpretation of a construction into the text.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 2 and ver. 4. Or, "was sleeping."—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. מָהֹרָם with Impf. following the subject — "not yet."—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 3. The Eng. A. V. in making this unwarranted inversion of clauses, was probably controlled by the same motive which led the Masorites to separate שָׁכַב ("was lying") from בְּהֵיכָל ("in the temple") by the Athnach, namely, to avoid the seeming assertion that Samuel was sleeping in the sacred building. The Targum accordingly renders "was sleeping in the Court of the Levites," borrowing this term apparently from Herod's temple. For explanation see Exeg. Notes, in loco.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 3. This is the only place where אֱלֹהִים ("God") in the phrase אֲרוֹן אֱלֹהִים ("the ark of God") occurs without the Art.; אֱלֹהִים often occurs with the force of a proper name, but no reason is apparent why the Art. is omitted here in this standing phrase. For discussion of the difference between אֱלֹהִים and אֱלֹהִים see Quarry's "Genesis and its authorship," pp. 270 sqq.—Tr.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. Erdmann: "had not yet learned to know," which is substantially the same as Eng. A. V. On pointing of יָדָא see Exeg. Notes, in loco.—Tr.]

am I, for thou didst⁹ call [calledst] me. And Eli perceived that the Lord [Jehovah] had called [was calling] the child. Therefore, [And] Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down, and it shall be, if he [one¹⁰] call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord [Jehovah], for thy servant heareth. So [And] Samuel went and lay down in his place. And the Lord [Jehovah] came, and stood,¹¹ and called as at other times [as before], Samuel, Samuel. Then [And] Samuel answered [said], Speak, for thy servant heareth. And the Lord [Jehovah] said to Samuel, Behold, I will [om. will] do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle [the which whosoever heareth, both his ears shall tingle]. In that day I will perform against Eli all things [om. things] which [that] I have spoken concerning his house, when I begin, I will also make an end [from beginning to end]. For [And] I have told [I announced to] him that I will [would] judge his house for ever for the iniquity¹² [sin] which he knoweth, because [that he knew that] his sons made themselves vile [brought a curse on themselves¹³], and he restrained them not. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged [expiated] with sacrifice [ins. of blood] nor [ins. unbloody¹⁴] offering forever. And Samuel lay until the morning,¹⁵ and opened the doors of the house of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Samuel feared to show Eli the vision. Then [And] Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered [said], Here am I. And he said, What is the thing that the Lord [om. the Lord, ins. he] hath [om. hath] said unto thee? I pray thee [om. I pray thee¹⁶] hide it not from me. God do so to thee and more also, if thou hide anything from me of all the things [om. the things] that he said unto thee. And Samuel told him every whit, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord [He is Jehovah]; let him do what seemeth him good.

And Samuel grew; And the Lord [Jehovah] was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground. And all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord [Jehovah]. And the Lord [Jehovah] appeared again [continued to appear] in Shiloh; for the Lord [Jehovah] revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh: by [in] the word of the Lord [Jehovah].¹⁷

CHAP. IV. 1 a AND the word of Samuel came to all Israel.

⁹ [Ver. 8. The "didst" might now suggest an emphasis not given by the Heb.—Tr.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 9. The impersonal subject is proper, as Samuel did not know who the caller was.—Tr.]

¹¹ [Ver. 10. Chald. softens this anthropomorphism into "revealed himself," and the Rabbin add, by a voice from the Holy of Holies.—Tr.]

¹² [Ver. 13. יָצָא is difficult. It can be understood here only as in stat. const. with the following clause: Eli's sin was "that he knew, etc." So the Vulg. The Targ. and Syr. render as Eng. A. V.; Sept. gives "the iniquities of his sons," and omits "that he knew;" Wellhausen omits יָצָא.—Tr.]

¹³ [Ver. 13. לָהֶם is here taken as reflexive. The true reading here is not clear; the old translators and critics treated it variously. Sept. has θεός as if it read אלהים, which Geiger (Urschrift, p. 271) and others adopt. See Erdmann's remark on this in Exeg. Notes, in loco. Chald. reads as the Heb. (Targ. renders קלל by גלל here and elsewhere); Syr. has "his sons brought ignominy on the people," reading apparently לָהֶם. This is one of the eighteen cases of the "correction of the Scribes" (see Buxtorf's Lex. s. v. קלל), who are said to have changed the original reading לִי "me" to לָהֶם "themselves," to avoid the blasphemy, for which reason also Geiger holds that אֱלֹהִים "God" was changed. Others suggest that the לִי stood for יהוה "Jehovah." But it is hard to say how much reliance is to be put on these alleged corrections of the old Jewish critics, and here (as Wellhausen remarks) we expect the Acc. לָהֶם not לִי after קלל. The external critical evidence is in favor of the reading לָהֶם "God," but, the objection to this urged by Erdmann being strong, we can only, with him, retain the present text.—Tr.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 14. It seems desirable to express in an Eng. translation the difference between בְּיָמָיו and בְּבִרְיָו.—Tr.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 15. Sept. here adds "and rose in the morning," which Thénien and Wellhausen think stood originally in the text, and fell out by similar ending. On the other hand, it is a natural filling out of a terse account, quite in the manner of the Sept.—Tr.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 17. The Eng. "I pray thee" is too strong for the Heb. אֵל, for which we have no good equivalent.—Tr.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 21. On the addition of the Sept. here see Thénien and Wellhausen.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The history of Samuel's call to be prophet is introduced (ver. 1) by a brief statement of what it presupposed, and what led to it in Samuel himself and in the condition of the Israelitish theocratic life. As to the first point, the connection shows that the "boy" Samuel had grown to be a youth, and was therefore intellectually capable of receiving the revelation of the Lord; his character as servant of the Lord in the Sanctuary is again stated (comp. ii. 11, 18), and his relation to Eli as his guardian and guide is anew affirmed by the words "before Eli" (ii. 11). The call which Samuel receives supposes the fact that he belongs to the Lord as a gift from his parents, and, as servant in the Sanctuary, is, in this priestly life under the guidance of the High-priest, prepared to be a special instrument of God's for His people.—As to the second point, the condition of the theocratical life, the religious character of the times is marked by a twofold expression: 1) the word of the Lord was "precious" (קִדְּוָה), that is, the word was rare that came directly from the Lord by prophetic announcement to the people; the proper organs were lacking, persons who were filled with the Spirit of the Lord, that they might be witnesses of His word; there was lacking also in the people the living desire for the direct revelations of God in His word, and receptivity in religious feeling for the living declaration,—and this was true even in the highest planes of theocratical life; 2) "There was no vision spread abroad." פָּרַץ "break through," thence "spread out from within," "become known outwards, become public," Ps. iii. 10; 2 Chr. xxxi. 5.—Hazon (חֲזוֹן) [vision] is the feeling or perception which corresponds to a direct real divine revelation made to the imagination of the prophet.* This "vision" is the means of the reception of the word to be announced. Little was heard of such revelations of the Lord by visions, they were not spread abroad. Therefore the word of the Lord was precious. The second fact had its ground in the first. In the theocratical life there was lacking both a truly God-fearing, living priesthood, and a proclamation of God's word that should extricate the people from their religious-moral depravation, the vitalizing power of the divine Spirit through prophetic organs.

Vers. 2-10. The circumstances and individual elements of the calling. In ver. 2 the "and it came to pass" and the statement of time are so connected with ver. 4 that all the intermediate from "and Eli" to the end of ver. 3 is explanatory parenthesis.†

Samuel might have supposed, when he was awaked by hearing his name called, that he had to render some service to the half-blind Eli; and so it is expressly mentioned at the beginning of these descriptive sentences that Eli was growing blind. The word "began" shows that the statement afterwards made, "he could not see," is by no means to be understood as meaning complete blindness.‡—To the chronological datum in the beginning of ver. 2 is added in ver. 3 an exacter and more definite statement in the words: And the lamp of God was not yet gone out;—no doubt this indicates night-time, near the morning, since the seven-lamped candelabrum in the Sanctuary before the curtain, which (Ex. xxvii. 20, 21; xxx. 7, 8) was furnished with oil every morning and evening, after having burnt throughout the night and consumed its oil, usually, no doubt, got feebler or went out towards morning (comp. Lev. xxiv. 2, 3). The words "and S. was sleeping" are not to be regarded, as the Athnach under the last requires, as a parenthesis separated from "in the temple" (as is usually done), if the latter expression is understood to mean sanctuary in distinction from the most holy place; for we cannot suppose that Samuel slept in this Sanctuary. But hekal (חֵיכָל) is here, as in ch. i. 9; Ps. xi. 4, the whole sanctuary, the entire space of the tabernacle, as the palace of God, the King of His people, who has His throne there. This throne is the "ark of God," for above the ark was the symbol of the presence, yea, of the royal dwelling and enthronement of God in the midst of His people (iv. 4). Samuel's sleeping-place was in one of the rooms, which were built in the court for the priests and Levites on service (Keil). The name Jehovah stands after "temple," because it is the Covenant-God, who descends to His people and dwells with them, that is brought before us. On the other hand, in connection with the lamp and the ark "Elohim" is used "in the sense of the divine in general," (Then.), that is, God is viewed in His loftiness and power over the whole world, as He who is to be feared and venerated, as lofty majesty (which conception is made clear by the plural).

In vers. 2, 3, is described the situation in which Samuel received the call of the Lord,—it is night, the High-priest lies in his place in the sanctuary, the lamps of the candelabrum are still burning,* the morning is near, it is the time when dream-life rises to its height; near Samuel was the ark of God, whence the revelations of God came.

Vers. 4-10 give the whole history of the call, with the attendant circumstances, in its individual elements.—Samuel hears the call of a voice, which has awakened him from sleep, but takes it to be not the call of a divine voice, as it was, but a call from Eli. Eli, to whom he hastens, sends him back to his couch with the answer: "I did not call thee." This is repeated in ver. 6.—Ver. 7 gives the reason why Samuel thought he heard not God's voice, but Eli's.† Knowing God means here not the general knowledge of God which every Israelite of necessity had, but the

* [Hazon, which is used chiefly in the later books of O. T., is 1) the picture presented to the mind in the ecstatic prophetic state; 2) the body of truth thus given to the prophet. It is the technical word for divine revelation (so contrasted with מַרְאֶה).—Ta.]

† [See the remark of Ta. under "Textual and Grammatical."—Ta.]

‡ פָּרוּחַ is either verbal adj. בְּרוּחַ, which forms a single conception with the preceding fin. verb ("they began dim," i. e., "began to become dim"—as in Gen. ix. 20 the same verb is connected with a subst., Ges. § 142, 4, Rem.—or Inf. Qal פָּרוּחַ (comp. Isa. iii. 7; Gen. xxvii. 1; Deut. xxxiv. 7; Job xvi. 8; Zech. xi. 17), "which the punctuators avoided only because they had not elsewhere met with it" (Böttch.). [This whole note, quoted by Erdmann and Thénius from Böttcher, is somewhat unclear. The passages cited for the Inf. hardly bear on the question. Wellhausen declares the Inf. here without ל impossible; but see Deut. ii. 25, 31. Winer makes it Pl. Inf.—Ta.]

* [The Sept. has "before the lamp was prepared," which may point to the custom of keeping one light burning during the day, and thus indicate the late night or early morning.—Ta.]

† מָרַם is seldom used, as here, with the Perf. of past time; comp. Ps. xc. 2; Ew. § 387, 3, c. We might however point also מָרַם with Böttcher, and thus read, "in accordance with the following נִלְהָה, a Fiens [Impf.] with מָרַם, as is usual."

special knowledge of God, which was given by extraordinary revelation of God. The experience which now comes to Samuel is marked as the first of the sort. The word of God had not yet been revealed to him. He had not yet received such a special revelation of God through His word; therefore he did not yet know the God who revealed Himself in this way.—“It was a gloomy time, poor in revelation, as in exemplary religious life. For Eli, the High-priest, was weak, his sons defiled the sanctuary, the people served idols (vii. 3 sq.), and the Philistines ruled oppressively. Hence it came that Samuel did not yet know how the Lord was used to reveal Himself to the prophets, the announcer of His word to men (iii. 1, 7)” (Nägelsbach, Herz. R.-E. XIII. 395 sq.). After the third repetition of the call (ver. 8), Eli observed the divine origin of the call, and showed Samuel (ver. 9) how he should deport himself towards the divine voice. His answer was to be: “Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.”—Up to this point the medium of the divine revelation was the thrice repeated call of a voice, which so strongly impressed Samuel’s hearing, that he was awakened out of sleep. This is the meaning of the narrative; it does not mean a voice, which he thought he heard in a dream merely. In ver. 10 a new factor is introduced: the divine revelation by means of a voice becomes a vision: Jehovah came and stood, that is, before Samuel. That an objective real appearance is here meant is clear from ver. 15, “the vision” (נִרְאָה). Three factors are to be combined: the dream-state of Samuel’s soul (the internal sense), the hearing a voice on awakening, the seeing an appearance.

Vers. 11–14. Here follows the divine announcement of the judgment on Israel and the house of Eli. The Pres. (עֹשֶׂה partcp.) brings the act, though still in the future, before us as near, immediately and surely impending.* The tingling of both ears is the mark of dread and horror, which comes suddenly on a man, so that he well nigh loses his senses. Clericus’ reference to the Lat. attonitus is excellent, comp. Jer. xix. 3. The unheard of horror which was to make both ears tingle was (chap. iv.) the frightful defeat of Israel in battle with the Philistines, and the loss of the ark to this heathen people.—As in ver. 11 the horror, which is to come upon Israel, is announced, so in vers. 12–14 is declared the judgment of the house of Eli.

In ver. 12 the Inf. Abs. (הֵחֵל וְנִלְיָה) serve to explain and define the verb fin., “beginning and ending,” that is, from beginning to end, fully, entirely. Not one word of the minatory prophecy (ii. 27 sq.) is to remain unfulfilled. (See Ew. § 280, 3 a).—In ver. 13 this announcement is recapitulated. The declaration was a threat, no longer a warning. Judging is in sense (comp. Gen. xv. 14) identical with punishing. This punishment will be inflicted on Eli’s house “for ever;” the judgment will never again be removed from it. In what did Eli’s sin consist? In the neglect of the duty which he ought to have performed to his sons as father, high-priest and judge, by the employment of severe chastisement and punishment.

He knew their crimes, but let them go unpunished. מְקַלְלִים לָהֶם “cursed themselves” is very hard to explain, unless with Sept. and Then., we read מְלִיחִים for לָהֶם, and translate “they brought God into contempt,” the Pi. being taken as causative, and Qal=“to come into contempt.” Certainly this rendering would agree with chap. ii. 17; but—aside from the untrustworthiness of the Sept. in relation to the Heb. text, which also may here have been arbitrarily treated on account of this difficulty—against this reading is the fact that God Himself here speaks.

The conjecture adduced by Grotius, לִי (“the Hebrews wrote that for לָהֶם ‘themselves’ formerly stood לִי ‘me,’”) must be rejected on account of the difference in the letters. There remains no other course than to translate “cursing, bringing a curse on, themselves,” according to the usual explanation.* Luther gives the correct sense: “that his sons behaved shamefully.” [So Eng. A. V. “made themselves vile,” but this is not exactly correct. See translation and textual note.—Tr.]—Ver. 14. The announcement that the punishment is imposed for ever (ver. 13) is here marked by the divine oath as irrevocable. (םא, in view of the ellipse, with negative force, Ges. § 155, 2 sq.). The transgression of Eli’s house is here spoken of because not only did Eli’s sins of omission and his sons’ sins of commission prove them personally worthy of punishment before God, but the religious depravation that issued from them affected the whole family, even their posterity. (תַּבְּרָא Pass. for the usual תַּבְּרָא). Because the guilt can never be expiated, therefore the sentence will never be recalled, but, agreeably to the Lord’s true word, will be carried out on Eli’s house. The double “for ever” at the end of the two declarations (vers. 13, 14) expresses the terrible earnestness of the divine justice. [As to the relation between this announcement (iii. 11–14) and the other (ii. 27–28), the latter is founded on and supposes the earlier, but does not exactly repeat it. The first message seems (strangely enough) not to have produced the desired effect, namely to rouse Eli and save his house; for, though it is expressed absolutely, we have to suppose that the doom might be averted by repentance and obedience, as in the case of Nineveh. But the old man was too weak, and his sons (who must have heard of the prophet’s threatened punishment) too far gone in sin. No moral change occurs to remove the implied moral condition of the doom, and the sentence is to be executed. Still God will not leave His old servant without another appeal; He sends another message by Samuel. The first prophecy (chap. ii.) reviewed the history of the sacerdotal house of Eli, exposed its unfaithfulness, announced its deposition, and looked beyond to the glory of a new and faithful priestly house. The second prophecy, given through Samuel, reaffirms the punishment, emphasizes Eli's personal guilt, and declares the sentence on the priestly house to be irrevocable. Its object, then, would seem to be two-fold: 1) to rouse Eli and his sons to repentance and quickening into spiritual life, (see Eli's response in verse 18, whereas no answer of his to the first threat is recorded); 2) to accredit Samuel as a prophet by making him the bearer of a message that the whole nation would hear of, and to develop his spiritual-prophetic earnestness and faithfulness by bringing him into personal contact with the most serious events. It is hardly to be supposed that the conduct of Eli and his sons had been unobserved by Samuel. Rather they must have occasioned him (in connection with the man of God's announcement) much serious thought, so that his message to Eli was not something apart from his own intellectual and spiritual life. We must notice, also, the difference in breadth and maturity between the declaration committed to the (doubtless) full-grown man of God, and that delivered through the youth Samuel.—Tr.]

* On the intrans. מְקַלְלִים see Ew. § 196 d [comp. Green’s Heb. Gr. § 142, 2.—Tr.].

* כִּדְהָ Pi. here trans. “to make faint, weak, frighten” by threatening, terrifying conduct, as elsewhere נָפַר with 3, incorpore aliquem.

Vers. 15-18. Samuel before Eli as called prophet of the Lord in his first prophetic function. Although Eli had already received from the "man of God" (ii. 27) the prediction of punishment, yet his conduct gives occasion to the repetition (through Samuel who had a direct call from the Lord) of the prophetic announcement of judgment on his house as a word of immediate revelation from the Lord.—Vers. 15 sq. describe with such psychological and historical minuteness, such clearness and truth to life Samuel's external situation and tone of mind after the revelation and appearance, and the conduct of Eli who was roused to earnest interest* by the thrice-occurring call to Samuel, that neither here nor in the preceding description (vers. 1-14) is there any ground for Ewald's opinion that this is not an original tradition. After this revelation Samuel sleeps in his bed till morning. Opening "the doors of God's house" was a part of his duty in the sanctuary. By the doors we are not to understand the curtains, but real doors, which belonged, however, not to the cells which were perhaps built around, but "to the house of God" itself. Originally, indeed, the Tabernacle, being a tent, had no doors, but, after it was fixed in Shiloh with a solid enclosure, it might somehow have been provided with them. "Perhaps it stood within a larger frame, or a solid temple-space of stone built for its protection" (Léyerer in Herzog's R.-E. XV. 116).—Samuel is afraid to tell Eli the vision, the appearance (הֵמָּנָה) which had presented itself to his internal sense, in which God's revelation concerning the house of Eli had been set forth before him—partly from awe at the divine word which formed the content of the revelation, partly on account of the dreadful significance it had for Eli, partly by reason of the sorrow of which, in his reverence and filial piety towards Eli, he could not rid himself. But Eli compels him to tell what he had so wondrously learned.—On "my son," ver. 16, Theinüs admirably remarks: "How much is expressed by this one word" In ver. 17 observe the climax in the words with which, in three sentences, Eli demands information from Samuel; it expresses the excitement of Eli's soul. He asks for the word of the Lord; he demands an exact and complete statement; he adjures Samuel to conceal nothing from him. God do so to thee and more also, if, etc., is a frequent form of adjuration,* which threatens punishment from God, if the request is not complied with, comp. xiv. 44; xx. 18.—Ver. 18. And Samuel told him every whit. His fear was overpowered by Eli's demand. In obeying Eli he was at the same time obeying the Lord, whose command to enter on his prophetic calling before Eli he must have recognized in the latter's demand. And he (Eli) said. Two things Eli says: It is the Lord! This is the utterance of submission to the Lord. He sees confirmed what the man of God announced to him, and recognizes the indubitable revelation of the Lord. Let Him do what seemeth Him good. This is the expression of resignation to the unchangeable will of the Lord. To the overwhelming declaration of God Eli shows a complete resignation, giving himself and his house into God's hands, without trying to excuse or justify himself, but also, it is true, without exhibiting thorough penitence.

Vers. 19-21. The result of Samuel's call to the prophetic office, and, at the same time, transition to the description of his prophetic work in Israel. 1) In ver. 19 a the divine principle in his development into a man of God in his prophetic office is expressly emphasized, his growth from youth to manhood (גִּלְיָהוּ) being set forth under the highest theocratic point of view, which is marked by the words: And the Lord was with him.—To him were imparted God's revelations for Israel, because he was a man after God's heart, who, amid the temptations to evil that surrounded him in Shiloh, was now as a youth mature and tried in true fear of God and sincere fellowship with God; and his growth rested on a childhood consecrated to the Lord. "The Lord was with him." This refers not merely to the general proofs of God's goodness and mercy, to the blessing which he received from the Lord throughout his life, but also to the special revelations and gifts of the Spirit which the Lord imparted to him as His chosen instrument. For 2) in ver. 19b in the words And he let none of his words fall to the ground is emphasized the divine demonstration of Samuel's prophetic character by God's fulfilment of what he prophetically announced as the word revealed to him. The expression "did not let fall" indicates that the word was not spoken in vain, but was fulfilled,† comp. Josh. xxi. 45; xxiii. 14; 1 Kings viii. 56; 2 Kings x. 10. 3) Ver. 20 exhibits his general recognition in Israel as a tried instrument for the Lord in the prophetic office. The geographical indication of the extent of this recognition supposes that Samuel was made known to the whole people from Dan on the north to Beersheba on the south (Judg. xx. 1) as a prophet of the Lord by his declaration of the word of God. (יְהוָה, "found trustworthy," "tried," Num. xii. 7). From this it is evident that the people of Israel, in spite of their disruption, yet formed religiously a unit. In spite of the general lack of the declaration of God's word, there was still altogether a receptivity for it; notwithstanding the decline of the religious-moral life there was not lacking a sense for the self-revelation of the living God through His chosen instrument, the prophet Samuel. It is no doubt intimated in ver. 20 "that Samuel, in contrast with the hitherto isolated appearances of prophets, was known as a man called to a permanent prophetic work" (Nägelbach, Herz. R.-E. XIII. 26). For the factual ground of ver. 20 is given in the closely connected v. 21, where 4) are stated the continued direct revelations of God to Samuel in Shiloh. "Jehovah continued to appear in Shiloh." This points to visions as the form of revelation for the internal sense, and as the continuation of the mode of appearance which is set forth in vers. 10, 15 as "vision." The words "for the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord" leave no doubt that that revelation in visions also was made to Samuel, and that the word was the heart and the guiding star of these revelations of the Lord made to him that they might be imparted to the people. As the people had hitherto had its centre in Shiloh in the Tabernacle with the ark as the symbol of God's indwelling and presence, so now it found in the same place a new centre in the continued revelations of the Lord to Samuel through His word. From now on God made known His will to the people by the revelation of His word to Samuel, the first representative of the permanent prophetic order.* Thus, then, the beginning of the fourth chapter: And the word of Samuel came to all Israel—is closely connected with the preceding. The word of Samuel is in content "the word of the Lord," which was directly revealed to him, he being from now on favored with this revelation (ver. 21) in the form of the vision (חֵזיוֹן); thus the declaration "God revealed Himself to Samuel" is by no means superfluous (Then.); for it is not "the revelation mentioned above" which is here meant, but that which was constantly repeated in vision, by virtue of which Samuel was the Roeh (רוֹאֶה), seer. In form the word of Samuel was prophetic announcement, as organ of which he was Nabi (נָבִי), God's spokesman, interpreter.† His word came "to all Israel." In these words is comprised 5) his prophetic work in all Israel, and the permanent effect of his call to the prophetic office (made by the first revelation) is indicated. The word which came to him from God went by him to the whole people. This close connection of these words with the preceding context, and their closing and comprehensive character shows plainly how incorrect is the ordinary view which connects them with the following, and regards them as a call by Samuel to battle with the Philistines. They are the summary description of his prophetic work, on which his judicial labors rested, the transition to these latter being made in the following narration of Israel's public national calamity.

* [This means not "may God do to you as you do to me," but "may God visit your refusal with appropriate punishment."—Tr.]

† [The origin of the figure has been sought for in various occurrences, as the spilling of water, the fall of an arrow, or any weapon of war, or of a house, but it is better understood in a general way as signifying "failure," in contrast with a firm, upright position.—Tr.]

* [The words "Eli who was roused to earnest interest" have been supplied by the translator, something amounting to this having fallen out of the text, probably by typographical error.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Samuel's person and labors as prophet. "So the Lord's training had borne its fruits. Samuel had been preserved amid the temptations of Shiloh. He had grown up to be a consecrated man and faithful prophet of the Lord—a man of God in the midst of an apostate race—a light in the darkness, and much was gained when God's word was once more to be found in the land." (Schlier, Die Könige in Jer., 1865, 2 ed., p. 5.)

"The vigorous and connected ministry of the prophets begins with Samuel, who is therefore to be regarded as the true founder of the Old Testament prophetic order (comp. Acts iii. 24). It was that extraordinary time when, with the removal of the ark, the Tabernacle had lost its significance as centre, the high-priest's functions were suspended, and now the mediatorship between God and the people rested altogether in the inspired prophet. While the limits of the old ordinances of worship are broken through, Israel learns that Jehovah has not restricted His saving presence to the ancient symbol of His indwelling among the people, rather is to be found everywhere, where He is earnestly sought, as God of salvation." Oehler in Herz. R.-E. s. v. Prophetenthum des A. T. XII. 214.

2. The time of Samuel's appearance in Israel as prophet was the time of an internal judgment of God, which consisted in the preciousness of God's word, that is, in the lack of intercourse of God with His people by revelation. It was a theocratic interdict* incurred by the continued apostasy of the people from their God, and inflicted by God's justice. It had the disciplinary aim to lead their hearts back to the Lord, who had long kept silence, had long suspended His revelations. Such a judgment of the cessation of all revelation-intercourse of God with man came upon Saul, xxviii. 6, 15; comp. the complaint in Ps. lxxiv. 9, "there is no longer any prophet," and the wail in Am. viii. 11 sq. over the famine of God's word. The same law presents itself in all periods of the kingdom of God; men lose the source of life, God's revealed word, by a divine judgment, when they withdraw from intercourse with the living God, and will not accept His holy word as the truth which controls their whole life.

3. The form of God's revelation in prophecy is, as we see in Samuel, internal sight, the vision, to which the original appellation Roeh (רוֹאֶה or רוֹחֵה) † (according to 1 Sam. ix. 9, the earlier usual designation of the prophet) points. "Vision and word of God are in iii. 1 parallel expressions for prophecy." "The vision is nothing but the inner incorporation, and therefore also symbolization of what is felt in the mind—whether it be in visible

* [It is an old opinion that there is here a reference to the personal Word, the second Person of the Trinity. The Targ. has "the word of Jehovah was his help." and so some modern commentators, as Gill. But plainly there is no ground for this.—Ta.]

† [On Roeh and Nabi see on chap. ix. 9.—Ta.]

* [The Papal Interdict forbids the celebration of divine service, the administration of the sacraments, ecclesiastical burial and marriage (by Romish ministers), and enjoins fasting and prayer.—Ta.]

† [On the relation between רוֹאֶה and רוֹחֵה see below, chap. ix. 9.—Ta.]

shape for the inner eye, or vocally for the inner ear." (Tholuck, Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen, 1861, p. 54.) The internal sight, by means of which the prophet knows that the content of the prophecy, the matter of the announcement to be made, has been imparted to him by God directly, altogether independently of his own activity, is the vision in the wider sense. For this reason Samuel, like all other prophets, is called a Seer. After his soul, detached from the outer world of sense through the medium of the dream, has thus been brought into a state of more concentrated receptivity for the revelation of God, he sees with the internal sense the matter of the prophetic declaration directly imparted to him by God. "But when the revelation presents its content in visible shape before the prophet's soul, there results the vision in the stricter sense." (Oehler, Herz. R.-E. XVII. 637.)

4. In the history of Samuel's call to the prophetic office are united prototypically all essential moments of theocratic prophecy*: 1) the ethical condition of the absolute consecration of the person and the whole life to God's service on the basis of sincere life-communion with Him, and of mutual intercourse between God and the prophet—"Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth," comp. Jer. xxxiii. 2 sq.: "call unto me, and I will answer thee, and show thee great and mighty things, which thou knowest not"); 2) the definite, direct, clearly recognized and irresistible call of God to be the instrument of His revelation, the declarer of His word which is to be imparted to him, connected with the gift of inspiration and capacity therefor by the controlling power of the Spirit of God; 3) the reception of God's special revelation by word independently of human teaching and instruction and his own investigation and meditation, together with the consciousness of having been favored with a disclosure of God's objective thoughts; 4) the internal sight as the subjective medium of the reception of the revelation of God, the psychical form of prophecy; 5) the declaration of the revelation received, with the certainly and confidence (produced by the Spirit) that the announced word will be confirmed by the corresponding divine deed. Comp. Oehler, Weissagung, Herz. R.-E. XVII. 627 sqq.†

5. The triple repetition of the divine call to Samuel betokens God's holy arrangement for preparing His inner life, that he might become an exclusive organ of divine revelation (comp. vers. 7, 8), freed from human authority, his soul open only to the utterances of the living God, as is shown by Samuel's answer to the divine voice: "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth" (vers. 9, 10); for by this answer Samuel assumes the position of one who has direct converse with the Lord, that he may, as his servant, hear what the Lord will say to him by His revelations, and thereby the end of the threefold preparative call is fulfilled.

6. That the light of the divine word may illuminate the inner life, the latter must be open to this light, as it is given by divine revelation. The humble readiness to hear and accept God's counsels with the ear of faith is called forth by the awakening call of God's voice, and leads to the clear knowledge of His word. The way to fellowship with the living God and service in His kingdom is opened and prepared only by God's act of grace in calling men by the voice of His word; and so living and abiding continually in fellowship with the Lord is conditioned on the word of revelation, in which the Lord speaks to the soul that stands fast in the obedience of faith. Thus the individual elements of this history of Samuel's call present a picture of the grace of God that calls us, as all they learn or experience, who, like Samuel, occupy such a position towards God's word, that to God's call they answer with him: "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth."

7. *Pardoning grace (ver. 14) is open to every sinner, and is denied by God for no sin, if there be, on the man's part, honest, hearty repentance for sin as enmity against God and violation of His holy will, and confident trust in His grace and mercy, that is, if there be a thorough conversion to the Lord. In Eli's house, in spite of the preceding divine warnings and threatenings, there was continued, persistent sin, and Eli did not summon the resolution to make an energetic cleansing of his house and thoroughly to remove his sons' wickedness, which he ought to have felt especially bound to do as high-priest; such sin makes it impossible that God's grace should be shown in the forgiveness of sin, puts a limit to God's patience and long-suffering, and draws down on itself His punitive judgments as necessary proofs of His holiness and justice. [The Mosaic Law had no offering for presumptuous sins; but underneath the Law (which was civil-political in its outward form) lay the fundamental principle of the forgiveness of the penitent sinner, developed, for example, in Ps. li. and others. This principle, however, though doubtless part of the spiritual thought of ancient Israel, did not find full expression till it was announced that the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin. But in the New Testament, as in the Old Testament, there is no pardon without repentance.—Tr.]

8. The true permanent unity of Israel, dismembered, as the nation was, during the Period of the Judges, was established by Samuel by means of the word of God which, in his prophetic proclamation, embraced all Israel. Even in times when the national, political and religious-ecclesiastical life is most sadly shattered and disrupted, the divine word, if it is only preached lovingly by preachers that live in it, shows its purifying and unifying power, the receptivity for it being present, and only needing to be called forth.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. CRAMER: That is the greatest and most perilous scarcity, when God causes a dearth, not of bread but of His word.—WUERT. BIBLE: God does not give His holy word to every one and at every time in great abundance, but causes at certain times also a scarcity therein to be suffered, Ezek. iii. 26; Amos viii. 11, 12.

[Vers. 3-14. STANLEY: The stillness of the night—the sudden voice—the childlike misconception—the venerable Eli—the contrast between the terrible doom and the gentle creature who has to announce it—give to this portion of the narrative a universal interest. It is this side of Samuel's career that has been so well caught in the well-known pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds.—Tr.]

* [Momentum, translation of Germ. "moment," "essential or important element."—Tr.]

† [See also Fairbairn on Prophecy, Chap. I., and Lee on Inspiration.—Tr.]

* [In the Germ. verschönnungs-gnade—"grace of explanation."—Tr.]

Vers. 3-10. STEINMEYER (Testimonies to the glory of Christ, Berlin, 1847): The call of Samuel the Prophet, as an image of our entering into communion with the Lord; 1) How the occasion for this communion is given on the part of God, 2) How the condition of it is fulfilled on the part of Samuel, and 3) How this communion itself was begun.—Awaking from sleep! What a striking designation of the turning point between the old and the new in our life also. We were like them that sleep, them that dream, before we entered into communion with God. It is, however, certainly no arbitrary pre-supposition, that this pure, simple, upright nature had definite prementiments that he must be in what was his God's, and that he was moved by a longing, even though not understood, after the hour which now struck; and even this position of heart appears to find in the image of sleep its beautiful, exactly-corresponding expression. More or less, however, the comparison will also be applicable to us all. If the grace of the Lord caused us to grow up in the temple of His church, as Samuel in the sanctuary at Shiloh, if we were, like him, from childhood nourished with the sincere milk of the word, then there will always in our awaking be a definite recollection that already long before we found ourselves unawares in this sphere, only that hitherto our eyes were holden, while now we are allowed to look freely and without hindrance into the riches of His grace and His truth.

[How far this sort of analogical preaching may be carried, is a question of opinion. There are many who will think it has been carried quite too far in this paragraph.—Tr.]

Vers. 8-9. The fact that Samuel, notwithstanding the old man's assurance that he had not called him, appeared again, and came the third time, without consulting with flesh and blood, was a proof of his simplicity and uprightness. This is indeed the same uprightness which the Redeemer commends in Nathaniel, and here we have certainly a striking example of the Scripture saying: The Lord makes the upright prosper.—That the youth was ready without fretting to present himself three times for the service of his fatherly teacher—what else is it than his obedience towards him to whose discipline and service he had now devoted himself, so firmly grounded in obedience that he did not allow himself to be turned away from his simple, quiet path, not even by the most wonderful testimonies, by perfectly incomprehensible directions. And so with us too, if in any relation whatever we have only learned true obedience, if the position and state of our heart has become that of full and humble subjection, then we are no longer far from the Kingdom of God, which demands blind, unshakable obedience, within which one cannot maintain himself without giving himself up unconditionally to the one authority of Christ in faith as well as in life, and which utterly excludes all selfishness, in whatever form it may come up, all self-will, all entering upon a self-chosen path. [The analogy here and in what follows is extremely remote, and such a use of the passage would seem injudicious.—Tr.] —If we too have only first reached in general the point of being able to believe without seeing—for faith too must be learned—able to believe in the first place the human teaching, rebuking, consoling word,—well, then we are on the way, since the voice of the divine word is believably received by us.

[HENRY: There was a special Providence in it, that Samuel should go thus often to Eli; for hereby, at length, Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child, ver. 8. (1) This would be a mortification to him, and he would apprehend it to be a step toward his family's being degraded, that when God had something to say he should choose to say it to the child Samuel, his servant that waited on him, and not to him. (2) This would put him upon inquiring what it was that God said to Samuel, and would abundantly satisfy him of the truth and certainty of what should be delivered, and no room would be left for him to suggest that it was but a fancy of Samuel's.—Tr.]

Ver. 10. So then for the first time Samuel stands with consciousness in the presence of the majesty of God—and immediately all the riddles of life begin to be solved for him, and the meaning of his own life to become clear. What he says bears the clearest stamp of a really begun communion with the Lord. Is it not the resolve to say and to do all that the Lord might show him of his lofty thoughts and ways—is it not this, and nothing but this, that is expressed in Samuel's words: Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth? Has he not thereby once for all renounced self-knowing and self-will? That was the faithfulness as a prophet, which all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba recognized in him (ver. 20). And that which thus first established a true communion with the Lord could also alone be the power that maintained it. The constant prayer, "Speak, Lord," and the constant vow, "Thy servant heareth,"—that is the hand which takes hold of God's right hand, to be held fast by it with everlasting life.

Ver. 10. "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth," a testimony of unconditional devotion to the Lord: 1) How such a testimony is reached, (a) through the Lord's awakening call, (b) through receptivity of heart for God's word, and (c) through the deed of self-denial in the renunciation of all self-knowing and self-will; 2) What is therein testified and praised before the Lord: (a) humble subjection (Speak, Lord), (b) steadfast dependence on the Lord in free love (thy servant), (c) unconditional, joyful obedience to His will (thy servant heareth.) —Conditions of a blessed fulfillment of one's calling for the Kingdom of God: 1) The experience of the power of the divine word: I have called thee by thy name; 2) The repeated call in prayer, "Speak, Lord!" and 3) The fulfillment of the vow: "thy servant heareth."

Ver. 11. LANGE: It is God's design that when He causes great judgments to occur, men shall with holy terror accept them as a warning. God begins in good time to bring into holy fear the hearts of those whom he wishes to make special and great instruments of advancing His honor. Ver. 12. STARKE: The Lord's word is true; Ps. xxxiii. 4 [in German; Eng. Ver. correctly:

right.—TR.] Let men therefore not mock at God's word and threatenings.—CALVIN: The guilt becomes so much the greater, when God warns sinners of their transgressions, and they notwithstanding persevere in them. Ver. 13. Eli's guilt becomes so much the greater from the fact that it was known to him how shamefully his sons behaved, and he did nothing to remove this abomination from his house and from the sanctuary. CALVIN: Those who are set for the purpose of chastising the wicked make themselves partakers of a like guilt with them, and go quite over to their side, when at most they express censure with words, and so give themselves the appearance of strictness and earnestness, but do not use the power conferred on them to interfere with the godlessness by deeds.—Ver. 14. If the sons of Eli had earnestly repented, they would have obtained grace. But as they were given up to their godless disposition, they must of necessity be hardened in their sins, and in spite of the offerings they presented, which were an abomination in the sight of the Lord, must suffer judgment.

[Vers. 11–14. Compare this warning with that previously sent to Eli (ii. 27–36). 1) It is simpler, as was appropriate when given through a youth. 2) It is mainly a repetition of what he had been told before, as are so many of God's messages to men;—the sin mentioned is 'the iniquity which he knoweth' (ver. 13), and the punishment is 'all that I have spoken' (ver. 12). 3) It contains a still more severe threatening, as the former had not led to repentance; (a) an unknown horror is predicted, (b) a punishment of his family that shall never cease. 4) It arouses Eli to enough of spiritual life for submission (ver. 18), but not enough for amendment. (Comp. addition by TR. to Exegetical on ver. 14).—TR.]

Ver. 18. We should never venture to dispute with God nor wish to speak against and oppose His purpose, but must, even when we do not recognize the ground of His judgments, yea, when we think we are suffering unjustly, adore the righteousness and holiness of His judgments. Eli bowed himself, it is true, in humility and reverence before the Divine Majesty, but we do not see that he stirred himself up to fulfil his duty towards his godless sons, whereby he would have made known by action the earnestness of his own conversion from the slackness and yielding compliance, which made him the sharer of his sons' guilt. We should therefore lay it earnestly to heart, not merely with the mouth to give God the honor for His wisdom and righteousness, but upon His call to repentance to subject our own life to an earnest self-examination, in order that then we may beseech God to forgive our sins, and may with our whole heart avoid and flee from evil.—Ver. 19. The word of God does not return void, whether it promises or threatens, and preachers of the word of God learn with Samuel that none of their words fall to the ground, and this just in proportion as they are diligent to preach nothing else than God's word.

[Vers. 15–18. Evil Tidings. 1) Samuel shrinks from telling them, as a painful duty. 2) Eli is anxious to be told. (a) He apprehends ill news for himself—accusing conscience—reminded of the warning given through the prophet (ii. 27 sqq.) (b) But he desires to know the worst—earnestly conjures Samuel to tell him all. 3) Eli hears evil tidings with submission. (a) 'He is Jehovah'—the sovereign God—the covenant God—'too wise to err, too good to be unkind.' (b) 'Let him do,' etc. He submits humbly, trustfully, lovingly. HALL: If Eli have been an ill father to his sons, yet he is a good son to God, and is ready to kiss the very rod he shall smart withal.)—TR.]

Ver. 20. Samuel a true prophet of the Lord; 1) Whereby he was such. 2) How he proved himself such before the whole people. 3) How he was recognized as such by them. 4) How he is an example for the faithful in the ministry of God's word.

CRAMER: Not only of the whole church in general, but of every Christian hearer in particular is it demanded, that with reference to the doctrine taught he shall perceive whether it is right and true or not, and stand his ground. In the case of Samuel the word did not hold good: The prophet has no honor in his own country. He comes before us here as a prophet who has much honor in his own country, 1) Because he was a faithful prophet of God, 2) Because he was counted worthy by God of continual revelations through his word, and 3) God confirmed his proclamations by the publicly manifested fulfillment of them as a fulfillment of his word.

[Vers. 19–21. HENRY: The honor done Samuel as a prophet: 1) God did him honor (a) By further manifestations of Himself to him. (b) By fulfilling what He spake by him. 2) Israel did him honor. (a) He grew famous. (b) He grew useful and very serviceable to his generation. He that began betimes to be good, soon came to do good.—TR.]

SECOND DIVISION.

SAMUEL'S WORK AS PROPHET, PRIEST AND JUDGE.

1 SAM. CHAPTER IV. 1 b—CHAPTER VII.

FIRST SECTION.

Infliction of the Punishment prophesied by Samuel on the House of Eli and on all Israel in the unfortunate Battle with the Philistines.

CHAP. IV. 1 b—VII. 1.

I. Israel's double defeat and loss of the Ark. IV. 1 b—11.

- 1 Now¹ [And] Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside 2 Ebenezer²; and the Philistines pitched in Aphek. And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel, and when [om. when] they joined battle³, [ins. and] Israel was smitten before the Philistines, and they slew of the army in the field
 3 about four thousand men. And when the people were come [And the people came] into the camp, [ins. and] the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the Lord [Jehovah] smitten us to-day before the Philistines? Let us [We will] fetch the ark of the covenant⁴ of the Lord [Jehovah] [ins. to us] out of [from] Shiloh unto us [om. unto us], that, when it cometh [and it shall come] among us [into our midst]
 4 it may [om. it may, ins. and] save us out of the hand of our enemies. So [And] the people sent to Shiloh that they might bring [and brought] from [ins. from] thence the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts, which dwelleth between the cherubims [who sitteth upon the cherubim⁵]; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were there⁶ with the ark of the covenant of God.
 5 And [ins. it came to pass], when the ark of the covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] came into the camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang
 6 again⁷. And when [om. when] the Philistines heard the noise of the shout [ins. and] they said, What meaneth the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] was come into 7 the camp. And the Philistines were afraid, for they said, God⁸ is come into the camp. And they said, Woe unto us! for there hath not been such a thing heretofore. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty gods? these are the gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues [every sort of

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. The LXX here insert: "and it came to pass in those days that the Philistines gathered themselves together against Israel to battle," a natural introduction which we should expect in this place, but for that very reason suspicious, since it might easily be added by a copyist to fill out our brief and abrupt text. It is not unlikely, as Bib. Comm. suggests, that the account is taken from a fuller narrative, and is introduced here chiefly to set forth the fulfilment of the prophecy against Eli's house, that is, from the theocratic-prophetic point of view. See Erdmann's Introduction to this Comm. § 4. The Vulg. here agrees with the Sept., the other vss. with the Hebrew.—Tx.]

² [Two articles as in Jo. iii. 14; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5, to give prominence to each word.—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 2. Chald.: "The combatants spread themselves out," Syr.: "there was a battle," Sept.: ἐκλήθη δὲ πόλεμος "the battle turned (against Isr.)," Vulg.: into certamina, Erdmann: "der Kampf ging los." The stem שָׁחַ means "to put away, scatter;" here literally "the battle spread out," of which the rendering in Eng. A. V. is probably a fair equivalent. Thenius suggests that the Sept. read שָׁחַח, but Abarbanel also renders the verb by שָׁחַ "leave," as if the defeat of the Israelites was referred to.—Tx.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. Sept. omits "covenant," and had a different text from ours, but it has no claim to reception.—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 4. Sept. καθήμενον χειροβίμ, Chald. and Syr. "on" (as in 2 Sam. xxii. 11), Vulg. "super."—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 4. Sept. omits "there" and thus gives a very good sense; Vulg. supports Sept., and Heb. is supported by Ch. and Syr. Wellhausen thinks the word was inserted from ch. i. 3.—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 5. or "shook." So Erdmann: erbebte.—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. The Chald., to avoid seeming irreverence, has "the ark of God is come." The text of Sept. is here very bad.—Tx.]

- 9 plague] in the wilderness? Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you; quit 10 yourselves like men and fight. And the Philistines fought, and Israel was smitten, and they fled every man to his tent [tents¹⁰]; and there was a very great slaughter [the slaughter was very great], for [and] there fell of Israel thirty thousand foot-
 11 men. And the ark of God was taken, and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain [the two sons of Eli perished, Hophni and Phinehas.]

* [Ver. 8. To avoid the historical difficulty here LXX. and Syr. insert "and" and Chald. "and to his people wonders" before "in the wilderness." See Exeg. Notes in loco.—T_a.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 10. Ch. "cities."—T_a.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Israel's march to battle against the Philistines does not stand in pragmatical connection with the preceding words 'and the word of Samuel came to all Israel,' as if this latter meant a summons to war with the Philistines (as is held by most of the older expositors, and, among the later, by Keil and O. v. Gerlach.) Rather these words conclude and sum up the description of the origin and commencement of the prophet's work and of his announcement of the word of the Lord. We are now introduced immediately to the scene of the history, on which Samuel will henceforth appear as the Lord's instrument, a position he has reached by the call in ch. iii.—iv. 1 a. The narrative sets us straightway into the midst of Israel's conflict with the Philistines. That the latter were now already in the land is assumed in the narrative, since not only is nothing said of an incursion by them, but the expression "the Israelites went out against the Philistines" in connection with the succeeding statement of the place of encampment points to the fact that the Philistines had already possessed themselves of the land.* In support of the view that Samuel summoned the Israelites to war Clericus remarks that he did it in God's name, that they might be punished by a defeat; but this is inconsistent with the divine justice. The pressure of the Philistine yoke, under which Israel groaned, was already a punishment from God. If this defeat also is so regarded, it can be only on the supposition that the Israelites hazarded this battle not by God's will, and therefore without a summons by Samuel. The name of the Israelitish camp, Ebenezer, is here given by anticipation, its origin being related in ch. vii. 12, on the occasion of the victory of the Israelites over the Philistines, twenty years after this defeat. According to vii. 12 it was near Mizpeh in Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 26; from which we must distinguish the Mizpeh in the lowland of Judah, Josh. xv. 38. Aphek cannot have been far from this, and is therefore "perhaps the same place with the Canaanitish royal city Aphek (Josh. xii. 18), and decidedly a different place from the Aphekah in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53); for the latter lay south or southeast of Jerusalem, since, according to Josh. loc. cit., it was one of the cities which lay in the neighborhood of Gibeon."† (Keil)—In ver. 2 an orderly battle-array on both sides is described. The שָׂרָא does not describe the spreading of the tumult of battle (as is clear from the following statement that the Israelites were beaten in the line of battle, and thence made an orderly retreat to their camp), but the sudden mutual assault of the opposing lines (Vulg.: initio proelio). It is said: "Israel was smitten before the Philistines," with reference to the local relation and the victorious superiority of the Philistines, but at the same time in respect of God's punishing hand which therein showed itself, as is expressly declared in v. 3.* The Israelites lost in the battle—"in the field," that is, in the plain, about 4000 men.

Ver. 3. After the return to the camp, it is assumed as a fact in the ensuing deliberation of the elders, that God had smitten them before the Philistines, and the cause is discussed. The whole people here appears as a unit, which is represented by the elders.—The ark here spoken of is no other than the Mosaic, the symbol of God's presence with His people, the place of His revelation to them. Cf. Ex. xxv. 16–22. When the Israelites say: "We will fetch the ark of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, and it shall come into our midst and save us from our enemies," they assume that the Lord and the ark are inseparably connected, and that they can obtain His help against the foe, (of which they recognize their need), only by taking the ark along with them into battle. They connected the expected help essentially with the material vessel, instead of bowing in living, pure faith before the Lord, of whose revealing presence it was only a symbol, and crying to Him for His help. This is a heathenish feature in the religious life of the Israelites, and shows that their faith was obscured by superstition, there being no trace here of earnest self-examination with the question whether the cause of the defeat might not lie in God's holiness and justice thus revealing itself against their sins. Grotius therefore well remarks: "It is in vain that they trust in God, when they are not purged from their sins."

Ver. 4. Jehovah as covenant-God is more precisely designated in a twofold manner, corresponding to the situation, in which the Israelites desire His almighty help, which they think to be externally connected with the ark. As Jehovah Sabaoth He is the almighty ruler and commander of the heavenly powers. As Jehovah who "dwells above the Cherubim" [or, "is enthroned upon the Cherubim"—T_a.], He is the living God, the God of the completest fullness of power and life, who

* [On the chronology see Trans.'s note on p. 84. The dates are difficult, but the first battle of Ebenezer may be put approximately B. C. 1100, about the time of Samson's death, when Samuel was about 20 (or perhaps 30) years old. The third battle of Ebenezer (ch. vii.) falls about 1080.—T_a.]

† (Mr. Grove (in Smith's Dict. of the Bible) thinks it likely that the Aphek is the same as that mentioned in

1 Sam. xlix. 1, and different from the places mentioned in Josh. xii. and xv., but not far from Jerusalem on the north-west. But see on 1 Sam. xlix. 1.—T_a.]

* [This fact is not involved in the word before, which belongs to the common formula for a defeat, but is a part of the religious belief of the Israelites.—T_a.]

reveals Himself on earth in His glory, exaltedness and dominion over all the fulness of the life which has been called into existence by Him as Creator. The designation of God, "enthroned on the Cherubim," is never found except in relation to the ark, which is conceived of as the throne of the covenant-God who dwells as King in the midst of His people. Comp. Hengstenberg on the Ps., xcix. 1. The Cherubim are not representatives of the heavenly powers, since they are, as to form, made up of elements of the living, animate, earthly creation which culminates in man. Representing this, they set forth, in their position on the ark, the ruling might and majesty of the living God, as it is revealed over the manifoldness of the highest and completest life of the animate creation. In these two designations of God, then, reference is had to the glory and dominion of God, which embraces and high-exceeds all creaturely life in heaven and on earth, and whose saving interposition the Israelites made dependent on the presence of the ark. In sharpest contrast to this indication of God's loftiness and majesty stands the mention of the two priests Hophni and Phinehas, whose worthlessness has been before set forth, and who represent the whole of the moral corruption and sham religious life of the people. They brought the ark. Berlenburger Bibel: "taking the matter into their own hands, without consulting the Lord, and also without example, that what was testified of Hophni and Phinehas, ch. ii. 24, might be fulfilled." The loud exulting cry of the people* in the camp (ver. 5) was the expression of the joyful conviction that, now that the ark was with them in battle, victory would not fail. Probably this confidence was strengthened by the recollection of former glorious victories, gained under the presence of the ark in battle.

Vers. 6-9. And the Philistines heard, ver. 6sq. The Philistines' camp was so near that of the Israelites that they could hear the latter's shout of joy. For this reason the Aphek, near which the Philistines now had their camp, cannot have been the Aphekah in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53), which was south or southeast of Jerusalem, while, on the contrary, the Mizpah, near which we must put Ebenezer, was about four [English] miles northwest of Jerusalem.† Noteworthy is here the lively, distinct description of the contrasted tone of the Philistines, the psychological truth of which, in the transition of feeling from consternation to fear, from fear to despair, and from despair to encouragement was most strikingly confirmed. The victors must have been at first astonished and dismayed by the shout of joy of the vanquished. Their astonishment then must have turned into fear and terror, when they learned through scouts that "the ark of the Lord" had come into the camp of the Israelites. First, from their heathen stand-point, to which, as we have seen, that of the Israelites here approached very near, they saw therein the actual presence of the God of the Hebrews. "As all heathen feared to a certain extent the power of the gods of other nations, so also the Philistines feared the power of the god of the Israelites, and the more, that the fame of his deeds in former times had come to their ears." (Keil.) Further, they look from this dreaded god at the supposed dangerous position in which they now suddenly find themselves in contrast with their preceding success. As certainly as the Israelites see their victory in the ark of the Lord, so vividly do the Philistines, with the cry "woe to us!" conceive the defeat which the god of the Israelites will prepare for them. They even fall into despair. The thought of a possible averting of the threatened danger turns into a picturing of the invincibility of the God of the Israelites, and the impossibility of deliverance from him. The predicate "mighty" (אַדְמֹרִי) stands with elohim in the Plu. and not in the Sing., because here the polytheistic view of heathendom is set forth.* Calvin: "It is not strange that they say 'gods' in the plural, for unbelievers ever feign many gods. Therefore this is the speech of unbelieving men, ignorant of the truth. Though the Hebrew word is often used in the Scripture in the plural of the true and only God, yet in this case the attached adjectives and verbs are always in the Sing." אֱלֹהִים (Elohim) is only used very frequently and purposely with the Plu., where polytheism or idolatry is meant, Ex. xxx. 11, 4, 8, 1 K. xii. 29, or a visible spirit (God), 1 Sam. xxviii. 13, or where heathen speak or are spoken to, Gen. xx. 13" (Ew. Gr. § 318 a).† The fear and despair of the Philistines were founded on the revelation of the irresistible power of this God in the history of the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt. The acquaintance of the heathen nations with the wonderful demonstrations of the power of the God of Israel in this His deliverance was wide-spread. As this deliverance from Egypt was engraved indelibly in the religious consciousness of Israel, and is very often cited in the Old Testament as a type of all mighty self-revelations of God for the salvation of His people, so it was to the surrounding heathen nations the frightful instance of the invincible power of the God of Israel. This is stated, for example, in Ex. xv. 14sq. in reference to the Philistines: "The nations heard, they quaked, fear seized the inhabitants of Philistia," and in Josh. ii. 10 sq. "We have heard how Jehovah dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt . . . , and when we heard it, our hearts melted, and there remained no longer courage in any man, because of you."—With every kind of plague in the wilderness.—As the "every kind of plague" can only refer to the plagues inflicted by God on Egypt before the exodus of Israel, and the "in the wilderness," which can mean only the catastrophe in the Red Sea, does not agree with this, Sept. and Syriac have inserted "and" before "in the wilderness;" and Bunsen accepts this as probable, in order to refer the "and in the wilderness" to the destruction in the Red Sea. Against this Böttcher rightly

* [It was the army that here acted, rather than the people in a political capacity; but the word "people" perhaps points to the absence of a regular army.—Tr.]

† [Neb. Samw. which is identified by Robinson with Mizpah, is about five miles from Jerusalem. Bonar and Stanley prefer Scopus (about a mile from Jerusalem), as the site, and this view is favored by Mr. Grove. Smith's Bib. Dict. s. v. Mizpah.—Tr.]

* [And, therefore, it should be rendered plural—"mighty gods," and not, as Erdmann in his translation, die es mächtigen Gottes, "this mighty god."—Tr.]

† [But see Gen. i. 26, xl. 7, xx. 13, 2 Sam. vii. 22, Ps. lviii. 12, where the renderings "gods," "deity," etc. are not quite satisfactory.—Tr.]

remarks: "the wherewith and the where of two actions are not usually so connected by and." So against Ewald's expedient, to insert "in their land" before "and in the wilderness," Böttcher excellently says, that this would be very tame and flat, that there was no occasion for the supposed omission, and that the expression "with every kind of plague" cannot in any case suit the destruction in the Red Sea, even if the word כָּכָה "blow" should be applied to the downfall of the army. Böttcher proposes to remove the difficulty by two insertions, of "and" before "in the wilderness," and after the latter phrase some expression of a greater demonstration of power, as "destroyed them" (הִמָּחִיזָם) from Deut. xi. 4, but this is too bold. Over against such arbitrary additions to the difficult text, it is by no means a "worthless expedient," as Thenius calls it, if we suppose that the narrator represents the Philistines as expressing their incorrect and confused view, which corresponds also psychologically with the excitement and precipitation with which they here speak. There is a sort of zeugma here, the recollections of two facts, the plagues and the destruction in the Red Sea, being combined into one expression, whence results a statement in itself incorrect. Keil thinks that, according to the view of the Philistines, all God's miracles for the deliverance of Israel were wrought in the wilderness, because Israel had dwelt in the land of Goshen on the border of the wilderness; but the phrase "in the wilderness" is against this. A confusion of view in the Philistines, and an exact relation of it by the narrator may be the more readily assumed, because, on the one hand, the Philistines were not investigators of history, and from their heathen stand-point, had no interest in an exact statement of those remote miracles of God for Israel, and, on the other hand, for these words of the Philistines the narrator had [possibly] before him a lyric-like song of real lamentation, as the Philistines then uttered it; just as, on the Israelitish side, he had similar bits of poetry in David's lament over Jonathan, and in the song of the women on David's victory. In ver. 9 the tone of fear, of despair, which had hitherto shown itself, suddenly, and without cause, turns to the opposite. Clericus' insertion, "others said," is, certainly, inadmissible; but, from the context, it hardly admits of doubt, that here different speakers from the former are introduced, that now the leaders enter, and, with encouraging words, urge the terrified body of the army to bold struggle. The repeated "be men!" is set over against the twofold expression of despondency "woe to us!" The "be strong—fight!" is directed against the "who will save us?" The reference to the diagnose, which subjection would bring on the Philistines as servants of the Israelites, is based on the pride of the people, and its force is strengthened by reference to the dependency, on the other hand, of the Israelites on them. Comp. Judg. xiii. 1. It is a martial, curt, energetic word, which is in striking contrast with the wide lamentation just heard, and therefore cannot have come from the same mouth as that. The false, secure, superstitious reliance of the Israelites on the present ark, their advance to battle not in the fear of the Lord and in proper trust in Him, and the newly-kindled courage of the Philistines resulted in terrible defeat of the former; the defeat was very great, especially in comparison with the first, in which 4000 fell. The result of the battle was 1) for the Israelitish army a complete dispersion ("every man fled to his tents") with the terrific loss of 30,000 footmen (the Israelitish army consisted at this time of footmen only); 2) for the ark, its capture by the Philistines, and 3) for the sons of Eli, death. Thus a terrible divine judgment was executed on Israel and its whole religious system, dead, as it was, and void of the presence of the living God. The priesthood was judged in its unworthy representatives; the loss of the ark to the heathen was the sign that the living God does not bind His presence to a dead thing, and withdraws its helpfulness and blessings where covenant-faithfulness to Him is wanting; the mighty army was destroyed, because it had not the living, Almighty God as leader and protector, and He gave Israel, as a punishment of their degeneracy, into the power of the enemy.*

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The Tabernacle was, according to the divine arrangement, to be the consecrated place, where the covenant-God, dwelling among His people, would be enthroned in the revelation of His holiness, mercy and majesty; according to its designation, it was "the place where God met with the people." It contravened, therefore, this sacred ordination of God, that Israel should without authority separate the sacred tent and the ark that belonged to it, and drag the latter into the tumult of battle, under the superstitious impression that, removed from the quiet holy place where the people assembled, and where they met with God, it would secure the mighty intervention of God. Thereby was God's holy method of meeting with His people disturbed and destroyed. For the space outside the Holy Place and the Most Holy was the appointed place where the people assembled and drew near to God through the priesthood; and the place of the priests, symbolizing their mediating office, was between the court and the Most Holy Place; and the Most Holy Place, symbolizing God's dwelling enthroned amid His people, did this for the whole sanctuary and for the theocratic people only through "the ark of the covenant or of the testimony," and through its symbolic representation of God's gracious presence; and therefore the removal of the ark of God from this consecrated place, and its separation from what was intimately connected with it by the idea of the indwelling of God in His people and their meeting together, not only stripped the Holy of Holies of its holy meaning, but also destroyed the whole order and comprehensive aim of the sanctuary. According to this divine order and aim, the people were here to draw near to their God. The people here, on the contrary, demand that God shall come to His people with His help, while they have not approached Him with penitence and humility, with prayer and sacrifice. Herein is set forth the deepest inward corruption of the priestly office, which not only did not prevent, but positively permitted such an inversion of the theocratic order.

* [These two battles are the first and second battles of Ebenezer; for the third, see 1 Sam. vii.—Tr.]

2. The ark, as the most essential part of the sanctuary, whose signification as "dwelling of God" it alone fully expressed, was the symbol of God's presence with His people in the chief aspects of His self-revelation as covenant-God: first in His holiness and justice, the testimony of which in the covenant-record of the Law as the revelation of the holy and righteous will of God to His people, formed the content of the ark; secondly, in His grace and mercy, indicated by its cover, the kapporeth [mercy-seat], as the symbol of God's merciful love, which covered the sin of His penitent people; and thirdly, in His royal majesty and glory, whose consoling and terrifying presence over the cover of the ark was symbolized by the cherubic forms. These forms are to be regarded, not as a symbolical representation of real personal existences of a higher spirit-world (Kurtz, Keil), but, both in the simpler shape in which the human form is the prominent and governing one (Ex. xxv.), and in the more elaborate composite form, as in Ezekiel (ch. i.), as the symbolical representation of the majesty of God (presented in full glory to the covenant-people), as it is set forth in the completest creaturely life of the earthly creation. The people of Israel, enlightened by their elders (ver. 3), uncounselled by their high-priest, perverted now the saving covenant-order symbolized by the ark thus constituted, in that, by the external conveyance of the ark into the battle, they severed the mighty unfolding of God's majesty and glory against His enemies and His saving presence from the ethical condition necessary on their part—that is, in that they did not observe covenant-fidelity in obedience to the law of God, nor sought His grace and mercy in sincere penitence, but rather, in fleshly security and in dead, superstitiously degenerate religious service, deluded themselves into believing that God's presence would secure protection and help without the moral condition of obedience to His holy will, without penitent approach to Him, and without free appropriation of His offered grace, and that it was, in its essence and working, connected with the sensely and natural. This was in open contradiction to the fundamental view of the religion of Israel, by which the idea that God dwelt above the ark amid His people in a sensely way was excluded.

3. The unauthorized, self-determined inversion of the holy order,* in which is founded the fellowship of God with man and of man with God, is followed by the opposing manifestation of God's punitive justice. It does not suffice to see and confess, like the elders of Israel, under the pain of self-incurred misfortune and misery, the revelation therein of the smiting hand of the almighty God; but there must be joined with this the penitent, sorrowful recognition of our own sin as its cause, and the penitent seeking after God's mercy and help, of which there is no trace in the people and their elders. He who does not, by penitence, living trust in His mercy and obedience, make himself absolutely dependent on God and subject to Him, comes by his own fault into this inverted relation to Him, that he seeks to make Him, the holy and righteous God, subject to himself, and to secure His helping grace according to His own perverse will. Theodoret says in Quest. in I. Reg. Interrog. X.: "By the loss of the ark God taught the Hebrews that they could rely on His providence only when they lived obedient to His law, and when they transgressed His law, could rely neither on Him nor on the sacred ark."—Berl. Bibel on ver. 2: "The elders were right in recognizing the fact that the Lord had smitten them (Am. iii. 6). But they were arch-hypocrites in that they did not lay the blame on themselves, and make a resolution to cleanse themselves from sin and idolatry (vii. 3, 4), and turn to the Lord in downright earnest and with the whole heart, but only counselled to carry the ark of the covenant into battle, put their trust in the outward, and so directed the people. If only the ark were with them, thought they, the Lord must help them. Very differently did David, and in his deep need would hold directly up the Lord; therefore he had the ark of the Lord carried back into Jerusalem (2 Sam. xv. 24 seq.). But they had to learn also that, as they had let obedience to the Lord go, so the Lord would let these outward signs go, with which He was not so much concerned as with obedience.—Out of God we seek in vain for help; nothing can protect us against His wrath. We must give ourselves up to Him, and that is the best means of quieting His anger. And we must so give ourselves up to Him, that we do not once think of trying to quiet His anger."

4. There is a merely fleshly natural joy in the external affairs and ordinances of religious life and service, in that we think of and use these, not as means of glorifying God and furthering His honor, but as means of satisfying vain desires, selfish wishes and earthly-human ends. The Lord punishes such pretence, not only by thwarting these ends, but by sending the opposite, privation and distress, and even taking away the outward supports and forms of hypocritical godliness and piety, as the ark was taken from the Israelites by the Philistines. "He who has, to him shall be given; and he that has not, from him shall be taken what he has." [Wordsworth refers, for a similar state of things, to Jer. vii. 4 sq.—Tr.]

5. It is one of the weightiest laws in the Kingdom of God, that when His people, who profess His name, do not show covenant-fidelity in faith and obedience, but, under cover of merely external piety, serve Him in appearance only, being in heart and life far from Him, He gives them up for punishment to the world, before which they have not magnified the honor of His name, but have covered it with reproach.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. Berleb. Bible: Israel smitten before the Philistines, is to-day also the spectacle presented by the condition of God's people. The enemies of the Divine name, the hostile powers of darkness have for the most part the upper hand. Anxiety about sustenance or love for earthly things everywhere plays the master, and even the best Israelites are thereby overcome and made to fall.—STARKE: It is indeed not wrong to defend ourselves against the enemy who attacks us; but such defense must be undertaken in true penitence, that we may have a reconciled God and His assistance.

* [We must guard, however, against laying too much stress on the ceremonial, symbolical order, which David violated (1 Sam. xxi.) without wrong. The Israelites were punished, not because they violated symbolic logic in removing the ark from the sanctuary, but because their whole religious life was perverted and disobedient. This was only the occasion of the lesson.—Tr.]

Vers. 3. 4. STARKE: In the punishments of God men seldom think of their sins committed, but only of outward means of turning away the punishments, Deut. xxvi. 18; Ps. lxxviii. 56-62. SCHMID: Hypocrites leave the appointed way, and wish to prescribe to God how He shall help them.

[Ver. 3. Failure in religious enterprises, as in efforts to evangelize a particular community, or in some field of home or foreign missions. We are prone to see only the external causes of such failure, instead of perceiving and lamenting our lack of devotion and spirituality, and to ask, as if surprised or complaining, "Wherefore has the Lord smitten us before the Philistines?" And in seeking remedies, we are apt merely to hunt out striking novelties in outward agencies, instead of forsaking our sins and crying for God's mercy and help. Such novelties may be employed, provided a) they are lawful in themselves, and b) we do not take it for granted they will be accompanied by God's presence and blessing.—Ver. 4. The tabernacle and its leading contents, 1) as symbols of God's manifested presence, His majesty, justice, and mercy, and of the need of purification, sacrifice, and priestly intercession in approaching Him; and 2) as foreshadowing the incarnation of God's Son, and His work of atonement and intercession.—Tr.]

Ver. 5. OSIANDER: So joyful are the ungodly in their carnal security that they let themselves dream of a happy issue, while yet they do not think of repentance and reformation of life. [HALL: Those that regarded not the God of the ark, think themselves safe and happy in the ark of God.—Tr.].—BERLENG. BIBLE: The holiest things and the most precious institutions of the Lord may, as we here see, be most horribly misused contrary to God's intention, and bring on men the utmost ruin, if they are not handled and read in a holy way and according to the will of God. How clearly is here depicted that false confidence of hypocritical Christians, which they place in outward signs, yea, in Christ Himself, without true repentance and reformation of life.

Vers. 7, 8. SCHMID: Even the mere rumor of God and of His works fills the ungodly with fear; how much more God's written Word. God convinces even unbelievers of His majesty, that they may have no excuse, Rom. i. 20.

Ver. 9. STARKE: O ye children of God, do learn here by the example of the Philistines, that as they encourage one another for the conflict against God's people, you, on the contrary, may encourage yourselves for the conflict against the children of Satan, Eph. vi. 10 sq.—SCHMID: So desperately wicked is the human heart, that it opposes itself to God in perfect desperation rather than submit itself to Him in repentance.

Vers. 10, 11. STARKE: When the ungodly have filled up the measure of their sins, God's anger and punishment is sure to strike them.—

SCHMID: When unbelievers show themselves so brave that it appears as if they had overcome God and His people, they gain nothing by it except that they at least experience God's heavy vengeance.—WUERTEMBERG BIBLE: The outward signs of God's grace are to the impenitent utterly unprofitable, Jer. vii. 4, 5.—TUEBINGEN BIBLE: God often punishes a people by taking away the candlestick of His word from its place, Rev. ii. 5.

—SCHLIER: The Lord's arm would first chastise the secure and presumptuous people, before help could be given; the blows of the Philistines were the Lord's rods of chastening. But there also was help near to those who would only open their eyes, for the Lord's chastisements are meant to be unto salvation. And Israel was soon to be able to see that with their eyes. The Lord had chastised His people; but they were not to despair or to perish.—[HALL: The two sons of Eli, which had helped to corrupt their brethren, die by the hands of the uncircumcised, and are now too late separated from the ark of God by Philistines, which should have been before separated by their father. They had lived formerly to bring God's altar into contempt, and now live to carry His ark into captivity; and at last, as those that had made up the measure of their wickedness, are slain in their sin.—Tr.]

II. The Judgment on the House of Eli. Chap. IV. 12-22.

- 12 AND there ran a man of Benjamin¹ out of the army, and came to Shiloh the 13 same day with his clothes rent, and with earth upon his head. And when [om.
when] he came [ins. and] lo, Eli sat upon a [his²] seat by the wayside³ watching; for his heart trembled for the ark of God. And when [om. when] the man came into the city and told it [came, in order to tell it in the city] [ins. and] all the city

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 12. Instead of the Gen. construction, as here, the Heb. has more commonly the tribal name as Adj. (gentilic), as in Judg. iii. 15; 2 Sam. xx. 1; but for ex. of this form see Judg. x. 1.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 13. The Art. here points to some well-known or accustomed seat.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 13. It is generally agreed that we must here read, with the Qeri and Syr., ׀ instead of ׀, but the 14 cried out. And when [om. when] Eli heard the noise of the crying, he [om. he, ins. and] said, What meaneth the noise of this tumult? And the man came in 15 hastily [hasted and came] and told Eli. Now Eli was ninety and eight⁴ years old,

 16 and his eyes were dim [set] that he could not see. And the man said unto Eli, I
 17 am he that came out of the army, and I fled to-day out of the army. And he said, 18 What is there done, my son? And the messenger answered and said, Israel is 18 is taken. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he 19 fell from off the seat backward by the side⁵ of the gate, and his neck brake, and he 20 died; for he was an old man [the man was old], and heavy. And he had judged 21 Israel forty⁶ years. And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas' wife, was with child, near 22 to be delivered;⁷ and when she heard the tidings that the ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and tra-20 vailed, for her pains came upon her. And about the time of her death the women that stood by her said, Fear not; for thou hast borne a son. But she answered 21 not, neither did she regard it. And she named the child Ichabod, saying "The glory is departed from Israel," because the ark of God was taken, and because of 22 her father-in-law and her husband. And she said, The glory is departed from Israel, for the ark of God is taken.

absence of the Art. in וַיֵּשֶׁב makes a difficulty, and the Sept. and Chald. seem to have rendered from a slightly different text. Sept. has: "Eli was near the gate, watching the way," and Chald.: "Eli sat in the path of the way of the gate watching." So in וַיֵּשֶׁב the Heb. text "side of the gate." It would seem probable, therefore, that וַיֵּשֶׁב "the gate" has fallen out here.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 15. Sept. here gives 90 years, and Syr. (followed by Arab.) 78.—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 18. Wellhausen objects to בְּעַד, rejects the עַד as repetition by error, and reads בֵּית. But this is unnecessary; comp. the אֵל in 2 Sam. xviii. 4, and the force of בְּעַד in Job ii. 4.—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 18. Sept. gives 20 years, other vers. 40.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 19. לֵית לִדְתָּהּ, the only place where this contraction occurs (so Rashi).—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12 sq. The persons and events of the following narrative are described with peculiar vividness, so that we may here without doubt suppose the narration to rest on the direct account of an eye-witness. A man of Benjamin.—Thenius: "This exact statement vouches for a faithful tradition." That he comes with mournful tidings is shown by his rent garment and the earth strown on his head, as signs of sudden deep grief, in which the heart is rent with sorrow. Comp. Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; Numb. xiv. 6; Josh. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xv. 32; Ezek. xxvii. 30.—To Shiloh the man came straight from the army (מִן־הַצִּבְיָה). Vulg. ex acie. According to the Jewish tradition† this man was Saul, who snatched from Goliath the Tables of the Law, taken out of the ark, in order to save them. Instead of the וַיֵּשֶׁב (he slew) of the text, which is unintelligible, we must read וַיֵּשֶׁב (side): He sat by the side of the way, watching. Thenius remarks: "What a strange expression!" But the sitting in the way, or on the side of the way by which the first message must come, answers precisely to the intense expectation in which Eli, though blind, had taken this position, so as, if not with the eyes (which, however, had perhaps still a glimmer of light), yet with the sense of hearing to learn straightway the arrival of the first messenger. Eli sits, as in ch. i. 9 at the inner, so here at the outer gate of the Sanctuary, on his seat,* and, as appears from ver. 18, on the side of the gate, which was also, therefore, the side of the adjacent way.—His heart was heavy, not merely "from anxiety and care for the ark, which without divine command he had let go from its dwelling-place into the camp" (Berl. Bib.), but also in respect to the issue of the battle itself for the people of Israel.—Eli's blindness explains the fact that he failed to observe the messenger, who ran hurriedly by† without noticing him. It is the cry of lamentation, raised by the people of Shiloh at his news, that directs Eli's attention to the announcement. His question concerning the loud outcry around him, on which the messenger came to inform him, is explained in ver. 15 by reference to his

* [This word (כִּסֵּא) everywhere else clearly means "throne" (unless perhaps in 1 Ki. ii. 19; Ps. ix. 14), and comp. Zech. vi. 13. Yet, in the infrequent occurrence of any word for an ordinary seat (and see Es. xxviii. 2, כִּסֵּא "seat of God"), though the word seems to imply something of official dignity, the rendering throne (Josephus: θρόνον ὑψηλόν ἐρόνον) would here be not so good as "seat."—Tr.]

† [The messenger probably entered the city by the gate where Eli was sitting.—Tr.]

* [On the importance of "runners" see note in Bib. Comm. on this verse, which remarks also, that as the messenger came from Ebenezer within the day (ver. 16) it must have been near.—Tr.]

† [See Talmudical Tract Sota, and the Midrash of Samuel, and comms. of Rashi and Abarbanel.—Tr.]

‡ [See "Textual and Grammatical" note on this word.—Tr.]

blindness, the result of old age.—Eli was 98 years old, and his eyes were set. (The Fem. Sing. עָנָה with עָנָה is explained, according to Ewald, § 317 a, by the abstract conception which connects itself with the Plu. of the Subst. by the combination into an abstract idea of the individuals embraced in it, “especially in lifeless objects, beasts, or in co-operating members of one body, in which the action of the individuals is not so prominent—and so in the Dual,” as here). For “were set” comp. 1 Kings xiv. 4, where occurs the same expression for blindness caused by old age. It is the vivid description of the lifeless, motionless appearance of the eye quenched by senile weakness, “a description of the so-called black cataract, amaurosis, which usually ensues in great old age from the feebleness of the optic nerves” (Keil, in loco). In iii. 2 the process of this blinding is indicated by the word כָּהָה as “waxing dim.”

Ver. 16 sq. The sorrowful tidings. The remark in ver. 15 concerning Eli's senile weakness and blindness explains both the preceding ver. 14 and the statement in ver. 16 as to the way in which the messenger personally announces and introduces himself with the words: I am he that came out of the army.—But he says, “I am he that came” not merely on account of Eli's blindness, but also on account of the importance of the announcement with which he approaches the head of the whole people. It is not allowable, therefore, to translate: “I come” (De Wette). At the same time the messenger declares himself a fugitive, and so intimates that the army is completely broken up. Eli's question refers not to the How (how stood the affair? De Wette, Bunsen), but to the What: “What was the affair?” (Thenius), Vulg.: quid actum est?—The answer of the messenger to Eli's question (ver. 17) contains nothing but facts in a fourfold grade, each statement more dreadful than the preceding. There is a power in these words which comes out in four sharp sentences, with blow after blow, till its force is crushing: Israel fleeing before the Philistines, a great slaughter among the people, Eli's sons dead, the ark taken. The double “and also” (וְגַם) is to be observed here as characteristic of the lapidary style of the words, and the excitement with which they were spoken.—The narrator remarks expressly that the fourth blow, the news of the capture of the ark by the heathen, led to Eli's death. This is again a sign of the fear of God, which was deeply rooted in his heart; the ark represented the honor and glory of the God who dwelt in His people; the people's honor and power might perish; the destruction of his house might be irretardable, unavoidable; prepared beforehand for it, he had said: “It is the Lord, let him do as seemeth him good!” But the loss of the ark to the heathen was his death-blow the more surely, the firmer had been his hope that, as of old in the time of Moses and Joshua, the host of Israel would win the victory over the Philistines under the lead of the ark which he, a weak guardian of the Sacred Vessel, had sent off to the battle without Divine command, weakly yielding to the elders of the people whose trust was not in the living God. His judicial and high-priestly office, lacking as it was in honor and renown, he closed with honor; though the manner of his death was terrible, and bore the mark of a divine judgment, he nevertheless died in the fear of God. Berl. Bib.: “It is besides an honorable and glorious death to die from care for God's honor.” His judgeship had lasted 40 years. The Sept. reading, 20 years for 40, results, according to Thenius, from the confusion of the numeral letters 2 and 3, as the reading 78 (Syr., Arab.) for 98 in ver. 15, according to the same critic, may be due to the confusion of 2 and 3. Further, our text “is sustained by the fact that Eli hardly became Judge in his 78th year” (Thenius).

Vers. 19 sq. Here follows the pathetic narrative of Eli's daughter-in-law, in which is shown how the judgment on Eli's house is still farther fulfilled in his family.* The wife of Phinehas was so violently affected by the horror and sorrow that her pains came prematurely on her. Literally it reads: “her pains turned upon her,” or “began to turn themselves within her.” This expression is suggested by the ground-meaning of the word (סָרַף), “something turning, winding, circling.”—Ver. 20. The comforting word of the women who stood by: “thou hast borne a son” does not rouse the mother's joy in her heart, and cannot overcome or soften its sorrow at the loss of the ark, which is more to her than the loss of husband and father-in-law—and this is set forth by two expressions in the narration: “she gave no answer, and laid it not to heart,” did not set her mind on it. Comp. Pa. lxii. 11 שָׁמַח לִבִּי. What is commonly for a mother's heart at such a time the greatest joy (Jno. xvi. 21), was for her as if it were not; so is her soul occupied and taken up with sorrow for the lost ark. This shows the earnest, sincere piety, in which she is like her father-in-law. Eli's house, made ripe by his weakness for so frightful a judgment, was not in all its members personally a partaker of the godlessness and immorality of those who certainly, before the Lord and the whole nation, stamped it as ripe for God's righteous punishment. “The wife of this deeply corrupt man shows how penetrated the whole people then was with the sense of the value of its covenant with God” (O. v. Gerlach).†—Ver. 21. She gives expression to what fills her heart by naming the child Ichabod. This name is not “where is

* The ל before לֵית — לֵית is that of time, our towards, on, about; comp. Josh. ii. 8, “the gate was for closing,” that is, was to be closed immediately; Ew. Gr. 217, 2 b. So here: towards bearing, near to bearing. On the contraction of לֵית into לֵית comp. Ew. Gr. § 236, 1 b, and § 80.—לֵית is often used, as here, to point out the object to which the narration relates—with the verbs “say, relate.” Comp. Gen. xx. 2; Ps. li. 7; lxix. 27; Is. xxxviii. 19; Jer. xxvii. 19; Job xlii. 7. It is explained by the fact that, in narrating or speaking, the mind is directed to the object, stands in relation to it. Comp. לֵית Is. v. 1. That it here depends on a subst., and not, as usually, on a verb, does not affect the principle, since a verbal conception lies in this subst.

† [We can hardly draw a conclusion concerning the whole nation from the example of one person, and Gerlach's inference is, for other reasons, doubtful.—Tr.]

glory?" (וְאֵלֶּיךָ), that is, nowhere, but it = "not glory."* She explains the name Not-glory, Un-glory by saying (וְאֵלֶּיךָ): "the glory of Israel is carried into captivity." (The לָמָּה, as in verse 19, is "in reference to," "having regard to," and belongs to וְאֵלֶּיךָ as the continuation of the words of the narrator, not of the dying woman). The narrator has in mind her words, on which she based that ejaculation, but does not state them as hers till afterwards; here he states beforehand the fact contained in them as a historical explanation. We must note, however, the difference between his explanation and her reason for that exclamation in ver. 22.

While he mentions the reference (לָמָּה) to the two dead, she bases the name (וְאֵלֶּיךָ) on the one thing only, the capture of the ark. The honor or glory is the divine majesty, the glory of God, which is enthroned above the ark. Grotius: "The ark above which God was accustomed to appear in glory." With the capture of the ark "Israel's glory is carried into captivity," "with the abandonment of the earthly throne of His glory, the Lord seemed to have annulled His covenant of grace with Israel; for the ark, with the tables of the law and the kapporeth [mercy-seat], was the visible pledge of the covenant of grace which Jehovah had made with Israel" (Keil). Eli's son's wife dies, as Eli himself, in consuming sorrow over what was the core of this national and domestic misfortune, over the judgment of the turning away of the almighty living God from the covenant-people, the outward sign of which was the removal of the ark, on which, in accordance with His promise given in the law, He would sit as Israel's God and dwell in the midst of His people. Comp. Ex. xxv. 22; xxx. 6, 36; xl. 35 ("the glory of the Lord filled the dwelling"), 1 Kings viii. 10, 11. [Bib. Comm. refers to Ps. lxxviii. 61, 64 as containing allusions to this incident. Wordsworth: "With God there is no Ichabod."—Tr.] "The necessary result of this national view of the ark is that there was only one sanctuary, so that all those passages which affirm it may be cited as direct testimony to the fact that there was only one sanctuary." (Hengst. Beil. [Contrib.] III. 55.)

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. In the history of His kingdom on earth God the Lord often permits times to come, when it seems as if the victory had been forever borne away from His people by the hostile world, and the holy ordinances of His kingdom, and its gracious benefits forever abandoned to the power of unbelief. Such times are times of judgment on the house of the Lord, the purpose of which is to make manifest all who truly belong to the Lord's people, to put an end to the hypocrisy of dead belief and of the unbelief which is concealed under outward forms and the appearance of godliness, to lead to earnest, honest repentance, and bring men to seek again God's mercy in true living faith.

* וְאֵלֶּיךָ is not וְאֵלֶּיךָ contracted, as in וְאֵלֶּיךָ, Nu. xxvi. 30; Ew. § 84 c, but = "not," "without." Ew. § 273 b, A. 1, p. 667, comp. § 209 c, to which the context points.

2. Outcry over inbreaking outward and inward corruption, in which God's judgments are inflicted, is nothing but an expression of the sorrow which flesh and blood feels, a sign of the distance and alienation of the fleshly heart from God, unless therein the cry is heard: "It is the Lord, this the Lord hath done," and the confession is made: "We have deserved it by our sins," and unless recourse is had in penitence and faith to God's grace and mercy. And all this was lacking in the outcry of that whole city and its loud tumult.

3. "Being in God"—that is, the union of the heart with Him in the deepest foundation of its being, reveals itself in times of great misfortune and suffering in this, that the sorrow and mourning is not restricted to the loss of earthly-human possessions, but directs itself chiefly to the loss and lack of God's gracious presence, and thus shows that for the inner life the glory of God and blessedness in communion with Him is become the highest good. So here in this refraining from grief over the loss of what to the flesh was the nearest and dearest, and in the outspoken sorrow only over the violence done to God's honor and the contempt cast on His name, is verified the Lord's word: "He who forsaketh not father or mother, or brother, etc., is not worthy of me."

4. Eli and his son's wife are shining examples of true heartfelt piety in the gloom of the corruption that reigned in the high-priestly family and the judgments that came on it, in that they are not taken up with their own interests, but bewail the violation of the sanctuary, the contempt put on God's honor as the highest misfortune; and so in times of universal confusion and degradation which God the Lord lets befall His kingdom in this world, He has always His people in secret, who look not on their own need and tribulation as most to be lamented, but sorrow most deeply and heavily that the ends of His grace are thwarted, the honor of His name violated, and the affairs of His kingdom in confusion.

5. Even a sudden terrible death under the stroke of a merited judgment of God may be a blessed death in the living God, if the heart breaks with the cry: "To God alone the glory!"

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 12. The outward signs of mourning, such as were usual among the people of Israel—rending the garments and putting ashes or dust on the head—ought to be a symbolical representation of godly sorrow for sin, in which the heart is broken to pieces by the word of the holy and righteous God, and the whole man casts himself humbly and penitently into the dust before his God. [Very fanciful.—Tr.] But, as then under the oppression of Philistine rule in Israel, there is nowhere a trace to be found of such repentance, when the misfortune over which men mourn and lament is not regarded and felt as a punishment of God for sin, and the smiling hand of the righteous and holy God is not therein recognized.

Ver. 13. S. SCHMID: We must take care not to do any thing with a doubtful conscience, that we may not have always to stand in fear, Rom. xiv. 23.—Those who will not cry out over their sins in true repentance must at last cry out over the punishment and their misfortune.

Vers. 17, 18. STARKE: When men sin without distinction, God also punishes without distinction, and regards no person, dignity, age, nor condition, Wisdom vi. 7.—S. SCHMID: The honor of God and the true service of God must lie more on our hearts than our own children and parents.—BERL. BIBLE: It is a wonderful thing that whereas the people were so powerful and had gained so many victories, as long as God protected them, they now fly and let themselves be overcome almost without a struggle, as soon as ever God ceases to be on their side. If God protects us in a special way, we are a match for our enemies; but if He leaves us only for a little to ourselves, into what weaknesses do we not then fall! So that we unite with our enemies in contributing much to our downfall.—We must, however, regard it as an effect of God's compassion when He permits us to be smitten. For if this did not happen, we should not sufficiently recognize our weakness, and our great need of His assistance.—It is an honorable and glorious death to die from concern for the honor of God.—Vers. 21, 22. BERLEB. BIBLE: As soon as we lose this presence (God's), we fall into the utmost weakness and into powerlessness, so that we can no more do what we have done before. We also cease to be a terror to our enemies; for these, on the contrary, now rejoice over our defeat.—WUNDERLICH (in DAECHSEL): So prevalent in Israel was a regard for the glory of God, which streamed down upon the people, so deeply implanted was the theocratic national consciousness that a woman in travail forgot her pains, and a dying woman the terrors of death, a mother did not comfort herself in her new-born son, and sorrow for the lost jewel of the nation outweighed even sorrow for the death of a father and of a husband, and this in a family and in a period which must be regarded as degenerate.

Vers. 12–22. A terrible and yet an honorable end—if 1) With the humble confession "It is the Lord" the hand of God as it smites down is held back;

2) In complete unselfishness one's own misfortune and ruin is quite forgotten over the shame brought upon the honor and the name of God; and 3) The hidden man of the heart, with all his striving, turns himself alone towards the honor and glory of God as his supreme good.—The defeats of God's people in the conflict with the world which is hostile to His kingdom. 1) Their causes: a) on their side: unfaithfulness towards the Lord, arbitrary, self-willed entrance into the strife without God, cowardice and flight; b) on God's side: punitive justice, abandonment to the hands of their enemies. 2) Their necessary consequences: deep hurt to the yet remaining life of faith, injury to the honor of God, and shame brought upon His glorious name. 3) The results contemplated by God in permitting them, or their design: sincere repentance, all the more zealous care for the Lord's honor, glorifying His name so much the more.—Without honor to God no honor to the people: 1) In the inner life of the people—error and heterodoxy, where the light of His revealed truth does not shine, sin and unrighteousness, where there is a lack of faithful obedience to His holy will, spiritual-moral wretchedness and ruin, where God must withdraw His gracious presence; 2) In the outer life of the people in relation to other peoples, oppression and subjection, introduction from without of godlessness and immorality, loss of their good name.—The cry, Ichabod, the glory is departed from Israel, is a cry which 1) as a lamenting cry, is grounded in the proper recognition of the cause, greatness and significance of the ruin and wretchedness which come from being abandoned by God, and 2) as an awakening cry is designed to admonish to earnest repentance and returning to the Lord, that the light of His glory may again break forth out of the gloom.

[Vers. 19–22. The pious wife of Phinehas. 1) Pious, though living in an age of general corruption. 2) Deeply pious, though the wife of a grossly wicked husband. 3) So pious, that in her devout grief all other strongest feelings were swallowed up: a) maternal feeling, b) conjugal and filial feeling, c) patriotic feeling.—Tr.]

III. The Ark and the Philistines. Chap. V. 1–VII. 1.

1. The Chastisement of the Philistines for the Removal of the Ark.

CHAP. V. 1–12.

- 1 AND the Philistines took the ark of God, and brought it from Ebenezer unto
- 2 Ashdod. When [And] the Philistines took the ark of God,¹ they [and] brought
- 3 it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon. And when [om. when] they of Ashdod arose early on the morrow,² [ins. and] behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah]. And they took Dagon, and
- 4 set him in his place again. And when [om. when] they arose early on the morrow

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Vers. 2 and 4. This verbal repetition is quite after the manner of Hebrew historical writing.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 3. Here Sept. inserts: "and went into Dagon's house and saw,"—a very natural explanation, but, for that very reason, suspicious as the probable addition of a copyist or annotator.—Tr.]

- morning,¹ [ins. and] behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground [earth] before the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold; only the stump of [om. the stump of]
 5 Dagon was left to him. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon unto this day.
 6 But [*And*²] the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them, and smote them with emerods [boils], even [om. even] Ashdod and the coasts³ thereof. And when⁴ [om. when] the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, [ins. and] they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us, for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god. [ins. And] they sent there-
 8 fore [om. therefore] and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered [said], Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about [removed] unto Gath. And they carried [removed] the ark of the God of Israel about thither [om. about 9 thither]. And it was so [And it came to pass] that, after they had carried it about [removed it], the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] was against the city with a very great destruction [; there was a very great consternation]; and he smote the men [people] of the city, both small and great, and they had emerods in their secret parts [*and boils broke out*⁵ on them]. Therefore [And] they sent the ark of God to Ekron.
 10 And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about [om. about] the ark of the God of Israel to 11 us [me], to slay us [me] and our [my] people. So [And] they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again [return] to his [its] own [om. own] place, that it slay us [me] not, and our [my] people; for there was a deadly destruction [consternation]
 12 throughout [in] all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there. And the men that died not were smitten with the emerods [boils]; and the cry of the city went up to heaven.

¹ [Ver. 4. It seems better to omit this explanatory phrase, which is not found in the Heb., and to leave the word "Dagon" to be explained in the exposition; for, though the phrase is probably correct (see Erdmann's account of Dagon), it is still an interpretation rather than a translation.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 6. The text of the Sept. here deviates decidedly from the Heb., for attempts to reconcile the two see Thénien and Wellhausen, loc. loco. There is no good ground, however, for departing from the Heb.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 6. The versions here all follow the Qeri lekoria, which word most of them take to mean a part of the body (posteriora), and not a disease. Chald. and Syr. have this very word. Chald. "maricem," Syr. "posteriora," Arab. "sodes." Vulg. "in secretiori parte natum." Philippon's "schambeulen." Geiger thinks that the Kethib means "posteriora," and the Qeri a disease of that part of the body, the change of reading having been made for decency's sake. This was probably the reason of the change, but the Kethib seems to mean the disease, while the Qeri means both a disease and a part of the body. No explanation has yet been given of the reading of the Sept. "ships" (καὶ πλοῖα); it may be simply an error of transcription for ἐπὶ πλοῖα, which is found in ver. 9.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 7. The word "coasts," not now used in its original sense of "sides," has here been retained because of the difficulty of finding another equally good rendering of the Heb. word (עֲרֵב).—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 9. Erdmann: "zu grossem erschrecken," but it is better, with the versions, to take it as an independent sentence.—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 9. Eng. A. V. takes the verb עָלָה as—סָתַר, "concealed," but the connection does not favour this. Gesenius' suggestion "broke out" is adopted by Erdmann, and seems best, but Philippon, from the Arab. root which Gesen. compares, shakara, "ruptus fuit," prefers "broke," as indicating the culmination of the disease—aufbrechen instead of hervorbrechen. Philippon's rendering is etymologically better founded, but does not so well suit the connection.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 10. The Sing. here points to the prince or other person who was spokesman for the people.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-5. Jehovah's demonstration of power against the Philistine heathenism.—Vers. 1 sqq. From Ebenezer to Ashdod.—On the anticipatory use of the name Ebenezer, with reference to ch. vii. 12, see ch. iv. 1. Ashdod, Ἀζωδός, one of the capital cities of the five Philistine princes (Josh. xiii. 3), named in ch. vi. 17 as that seat of Dagon-worship, which comes first to be considered in the course of this narrative—according to Jos. Ant. V. 1, 22 a border-city of Dan; according to Josh. xv. 46, 47, assigned to the Tribe of Judah (Judah was to receive "from Ekron on and westward all that lay near Ashdod, and their [Ashdod's and Ekron's] villages"), but never really held by the Israelites, though the Philistines were at times subject to the Israelites (Josh. xiii. 3)—a mile from the sea, now the little village Edud, on an elevation on the road from Jamnia to Gaza, nine miles south of Jamnia, and about thirty-two miles north of Gaza.—Ver. 2. The house of Dagon is the temple of one of the chief Philistine deities, for which there were places of worship not only in Ashdod, but also, according to Jerome on Isa. xlv. 1, in the other Philistine cities; but, according to Judg. xvi. 23 sqq., there was certainly a central sanctuary in Gaza, where, after the capture of Samson, the princes and the people assembled to hold a sacrifice and feast in honor of Dagon as the supposed bestower of their victory over Samson. Along with the male deity, a corresponding female deity was, according to Diodorus, worshipped, called by the Syrians Derceto (=Atargatis). As this idol-image had the face of a woman, and terminated below the waist in the tail of a fish, so the statue of Dagon, which in vers. 3, 4, is expressly represented as male, had a human head and hands, and a fish-body; he is thus characterized as a marine deity, the symbol of the fruitfulness which is represented in the element of water by the fish, like the Babylonian 'Odānu. Comp. Movers, Religion der Phöniz. I. 143 sq., 590 sq.; Stark, Gaza und die philistäische Küste, Jena, 1852, p. 274 sq. The name is to be derived, not from גֶּזַי, "grain" (Philo Bybl. in Eus. Præp., pp. 26, 32, Bochart, Hieros. I. 381, Movers in Evangel. I. 10, Sanchon., fragm. ed. Orelli, Ersch, Phöniz., p. 405 b) with Bunsen, Ewald and Diestel (Jahrb. für deutsche Theol., 1860, p. 726), according to which Dagon was the god of land-fruitfulness, of agriculture, but from דָּג, "fish" (Winer, s. v.). Compare Kimchi's reference to an old tradition: "It is said, that Dagon had the form of a fish from the navel down, and was therefore called Dagon, and the form of a man from the navel up." Comp. J. G. Müller in Herzog, R.-E. III. 255 sq. Thenius and Keil recognize this personage in a figure found by Layard at Khor-sabad, the upper part of whose body represents a bearded man, adorned with a royal crown, the lower part of the body from the navel on running into the form of a fish bent backwards; that this is a marine deity is beyond doubt, since he is swimming in the sea and surrounded by all sorts of sea-beasts (Layard, Nineve und seine Ueberreste, Germ. ed. of Meissner, p. 424 sq. [Nineveh and its remains]).

Keil rightly remarks: "As this relief, according to Layard, represents a battle between the inhabitants of the Syrian coast and an Assyrian king, probably Sargon, who had a hard struggle with the Philistine cities, especially Ashdod, it is scarcely doubtful that we here have a representation of the Philistine Dagon" (Comm. in loco).—The Philistines ascribed their victory over the Israelites to Dagon; therefore they brought the ark as votive offering to his temple, where, by its position near his statue, it was to set forth for the Philistines the subjection of the God of Israel to the power of their "god" (ver. 7).—But the overthrow of the image, and its recumbent position on its face before the ark (—Theodoret: they saw their God showing the form of worship, τῆς προσκυνήσεως ἐπεδείκνυντα τὸ σχῆμα—), was to be a sign to them that the God of Israel was not the conquered, but that before Him, who had temporarily delivered Israel into the hands of their enemies, every other power must sink into the dust. They set up the statue again under the impression that the cause of the overthrow was an accidental one. But in the following night not only is the prostration of the image at the feet of the ark repeated—it is besides mutilated; the head and the hands are cut off (not "broken off"). They did not lie "towards the threshold," it is true, this is the proper meaning of פָּנָיו, but it also signifies rest, instead of movement, and is = "on," "at;" comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 3; Deut. xvi. 6; 1 Kings viii. 30. From ver. 5 it is clear that the parts cut off lay on the threshold, and this was not only destruction, but contempt, since what lies on the threshold is exposed to be trodden on, the extremest act of contempt. "To him," that is, to the whole represented in the image, was left only the fish-stump, since what was human in him, head and hands, was cut off. Kimchi: "Only the form of a fish was left in him." The "threshold" is without doubt the door-sill of the chamber in which the image stood. Nothing is said directly of a divine miracle. But the matter is so represented by the narrator that we must recognize a special arrangement of the God of Israel for the exhibition of the powerlessness and nothingness of the god of the Philistines.—Ver. 5 gives an account of a ceremonial custom derived from this occurrence: the threshold of Dagon was not trodden on by his priests, etc. The "threshold" of Dagon, that is, of the place where his statue was set up, is distinguished from the house of Dagon, into which they went. This threshold was considered as made especially holy to Dagon by that occurrence, because his head and hands had lain on it. Sept.: ὑπερβαίνοντες ὑπερβαίνοντες, "they carefully step over it." Comp. Zeph. i. 9. According to this passage and ch. vi. 2, there was a special body of priests for the worship of Dagon. The word kohen (כֹּהֵן) is used in the Old Testament also of heathen priests, Gen. xli. 45. The formula "to this day" usually indicates a long time (comp. vi. 18; xxx. 25; xxvii. 6; 2 Sam. iv. 3; vi. 8; xviii. 18), and establishes the remoteness of the narrator from the time of the occurrences described.

Vers. 6-12. God's chastising manifestation of power against the Philistine people by plagues and sickness. Ver. 6. The hand of the Lord is here figuratively put for God's might and power, as it made itself felt by the Philistines in the infliction of grievous severe sufferings as chastisement for the violation of His honor. The sufferings are viewed partly as an oppressive burden, in which God's hand is felt to be heavy (comp. v. 11; vi. 5; Ps. xxxii. 4; xxxviii. 2; Job xxiii. 2), partly as a grievous blow, in which it is felt to be hard (ver. 7, comp. Job ix. 34).—In two ways the hand of the Lord was heavy on the inhabitants of Ashdod: 1) it wasted, destroyed them, and 2) it smote them with boils. The one calamity fell on their land (De Wette: wasted their land); the other was a bodily disease which extended over Ashdod and all its district. The Sept. adds to ver. 6: "and mice were produced in the land, and there arose a great and deadly confusion in the city;" but this does not furnish, as Thenius maintains, "the original, though somewhat corrupt, text, which contained this statement;" rather, as a second translation of this ver. 6 has been wrongly inserted at the end of ver. 3 by a copyist of the Greek, so the second part of this addition is taken word for word from ver. 11, and the first had its origin in an explanation (in itself appropriate enough) of vi. 4 sq. For from vi. 4, 5, 11, 18, where, besides the expiatory or votive offering referring to the bodily disease, a second, the golden mice, is expressly mentioned, it is clear that, in addition to the corporal plague, another, a land-plague, had fallen on the Philistines. Taking into view the passages in ch. vi. the words: "he destroyed them" (like "destruction" [desolation] in Mic. vi. 13, used of persons) denote a wasting of the land, that is, of the produce of the fields, as the support of human life, by mice, "which destroy the land," ch. vi. 5. There is no gap in the Heb. text; but the expression "he destroyed them" is a brief description of the universal land-plague, the nature and cause of which appears from the after mention of the votive and expiatory present brought by the Philistines. "The most prominent characteristic of the field-mouse, especially in southern countries, is its voracity and rapid increase. At times these animals multiply with frightful rapidity and suddenness, ravage the fields far and near, produce famine and pestilential diseases among the inhabitants of the land, and have not seldom forced whole nations to emigrate" (see examples, cited from Strabo, Diodorus, Aelian, Agatharchides, and others, in Bochart, Hieroz. III., cap. 34). Sommer, Bibl. Abhandl. p. 263. The ravaging of the land by field-mice probably stood in causal connection with the second plague, the boil-sickness.—And he smote them with ophalim (עֲפָלִים), which, from the connection, must have been a bodily disease. The points of the word belong to the Qeri tehorim (טְהוֹרִים), which was substituted for the Kethib (and in ch. vi. 4, 5, has even gotten into the text), because the word, which properly signifies "swelling," "elevation," "hill," was supposed to designate the anus, and in its place tehorim, "posteriora," as a more decent expression, was read. It was thence rendered: "He smote them on the anus;" and this view seemed to be supported by Ps. lxxviii. 66, where, in reference to God's judgment on the Philistines after the removal of the ark, it is said: "And he smote his enemies ahor" (אַחֹר), which was taken in the above sense particularly from the following word "reproach;" for ex. Vulg.: "and he smote his enemies in posteriora;" Luther: "in the hinder parts" [so Eng. A. V.]. But this rendering of the Psalm-passage is incorrect; the proper translation is: "And he smote his enemies back, and put everlasting reproach on them" (Geiger, Hengstenberg, Hupfeld). The above rendering has occasioned on the part of the expositors the suggestion of various affections of the hinder part of the body; some think of diarrhoea (Ewald), others of tumors, mariscae, chancres (Keil), others of hemorrhoids [the "emerods" of Eng. A. V.], and the like. But, apart from the fact that no definite local disease of the sort is indicated, the verb (עָפַר with עָ), as Thenius conclusively shows, never means "to strike on something" (for ex., on a part of the body), but means in this connection "to strike with something" (with a disease or plague). According to the radical meaning of the word ophalim, we must render: he smote them with a skin-disease, which consisted in painful boils or large swellings, and was perhaps caused by the plague of field-mice, which Ōken (cited by Thenius in loco) calls "the plague of the fields, often producing scarcity, and even famine." This explanation is supported by Deut.

* [Dagon was probably originally an old Babylonian fish-deity.—Tr.]

xxviii. 27, where the word in question stands along with the names of two skin-diseases, of which one (שֹׁחַרְשֵׁת) is the Egyptian leprosy-like botch, and the other (בִּרְיָ and חִרְס) "scab and itch." Only by supposing such a plague-like disease, which became infectious on the breaking out of the boils (ver. 9), can we explain its immediate universal spread (indicated by the words "and its coasts"), and its deadly effect (vers. 11, 12; vi. 19), facts not explained by the other suppositions. Comp. Win., Reals. II., s. v. Philister. —Ver. 7. In consequence of "its being so," under such circumstances (יִזְּ here as Gen. xxv. 22), the people of Ashdod recognised the fact that the power of the God of Israel was here manifested on them and their god, and resolved to get rid of the medium of this manifestation, for so they regarded the ark.—Ver. 8 furnishes a contribution to the history of the political constitution of the Philistines. The princes (סֵרָנִים, seranim) of the Philistines are the heads of the several city-districts (Josh. xiii. 3), which formed a confederation, each one of the five chief cities holding a number of places, "country-cities" (1 Sam. xxvii. 5), "daughter-cities" (1 Chron. xviii. 1), as its special district. The constitution was oligarchical, that is, the government was in the hands of the College of princes, whose decision no individual could oppose, comp. xxix. 6-11. Grotius: "the Phil. were under an oligarchy." The resolve of the princes is: "the ark shall be carried to Gath," and is forthwith executed. According to this there was no Dagon-temple in Gath; for the purpose was to remove the ark from the sanctuary of Dagon, who, in their opinion, called forth the power of the God of Israel, without being able to make stand against him. The location of Gath, also one of the five princely cities—Gitta (Joseph.), Getha (Sept.), Getha (Euseb.)—is doubtful. In this passage (vers. 8-10) the connection points merely to the fact that it is to be sought for in the neighborhood of Ashdod and Ekron; but it does not thence necessarily follow (Ewald) that it lay between these two. Jerome's statements indicate a location near Ashdod and near the limits of Judea: "Gath is one of the five cities of Palestine, near the border of Judea, on the road from Eleutheropolis to Gaza, and still a very large village (on Micah i.); Gath is near and bordering on Ashdod (on Jer. xxv.)." Comp. Pressel in Herzog, *R. E. s. v. The Sept. takes Gath as subject, inserts "to us" (לָנוּ or לְנוּ) after Israel, and translates: "And the Gittites said, Let the ark of God come to us." But this addition is uncalled for. Thenius indeed prefers this reading on the ground that such a voluntary offer to receive the ark in order to show that the calamity was merely accidental, is completely in accordance with the whole narrative; but, on the other hand, we may conclude from ver. 6 that they regarded as the cause of the evil the relation of the God of Israel to their god Dagon, and the object of the transportation of the ark was to remove it from the region of Dagon-worship.—Ver. 9. The same scourge was repeated in Gath; the plague of boils fell upon all, small and great. Its painful and dangerous character is here more precisely indicated by the once-occurring word (hapaxleg.) sathar (סַתַּר) which means, following the corresponding Arabic verb (Niph. findi, erumpi), the bursting of the plague-boils. The Acc. “great consternation” (מַדְּרָה), giving a sensible representation of the direction and motion, in which an action reaches a definite aim or end, sets forth the final effect or result in the minds of the Philistines of this new manifestation of God’s power; generally, where the point reached is to be indicated, the pref. “to” (לְ) is used (as in chap. iv. 9). “The hand of the Lord was on the city unto great consternation.”*—Ver. 10 sqq. Further removal of the ark to a third princely city, Ekron, according to Robinson (Pal. III. 229 sq. [Amer. Ed. II. 227 sq.]) three miles east of Jamnia and five miles south of Ramleh on the site of the present village Akir, that is, in a northerly direction from Gath. Comp. Tobler, 3 Wand., 53; Josh. xiii. 8. “Although first assigned to the Tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 45), and for a time held by it (Judg. i. 18, on which see Bertheau), then made over to Dan (Josh. xix. 43), it could not be retained permanently by the Israelites, but, when the Philistines advanced, fell again into their hands, and continued in their possession (Josh. xv. 11; 1 Sam. vi. 17; vii. 14).” Rüetschi in Herzog s. v. In ver. 10 is related how the inhabitants of Ekron, when the ark was brought to them, thinking of the late occurrences, made complaint and protest against its entrance.—Vers. 11, 12. The failure of their protest is here silently assumed, and the universal prevalence, and particularly the deadly effects of the plague described. There was every where a “deadly consternation,” that is, a consternation produced by the sudden death of many persons from the plague, which was connected with the boil-sickness. Observe the dimaz in the triple description of the plague; in Gath it is severer than in Ashdod; in Ekron it has reached its greatest height. The words at the end of the description—And the cry of the city went up to heaven—assume that the Philistines saw clearly that in this plague the almighty hand of the God of Israel was revealed. A second council of princes, it is expressly stated (ver. 11, beginning), was called to consult in reference to the restoration of the ark to the Israelites. The proposition of Ekron (as yet undecided on) is indeed based on the deadly effects of the plague on its inhabitants (ver. 11), but at the same time it takes for granted that the removal of the ark to other Philistian places would be attended with the same results, and that the punishment of the God of Israel would of necessity continue so long as the insult offered Him by the abduction of the ark was not done away with. [Bib. Comm. compares this scourge in its object and effects with the plagues of Egypt. See Ex. xii. 33, and also Numb. xvii. 12. With the phrase “went up to heaven” Bp.

* [Eusebius (Onom.) mentions two places called Gath, one between Antipatris and Jamnia (which cannot be the place here meant), the other five miles from Eleutheropolis (identified by Robinson, II. 50 sq., with Beit Jibrin) towards Diospolis. Mr. J. L. Porter, Art. "Gath." in Smith's Bib. Dict., accordingly identifies Gath with the hill called Tell-es-Safieh, ten miles east of Ashdod, and about the same distance south by east of Ekron. —Ta.]

Patrick compares the classical expressions (Virg. Aeneid. II. 223, 338, 488): Clamores simul horrendos ad sidera tollit; Sublatus ad aethera clamor; Ferit aurea sidera clamor.—TR.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Though God brings the judgment on His house and people through world-powers without His kingdom and hostile to His name, He yet shows Himself towards these hostile powers a God that judges righteously in the punishment of the evil they do to the honor of His name in their purpose (though it be by His will or His permission) to oppose His kingdom and hinder its coming. The Philistines, by His counsel and will victorious over the children of Israel, had with His permission taken away the sign of His presence with His people, and brought it into the presence of the idol, that Israel might be right sorely humbled and punished; yet they are chastised as having refused to honor Him as the living God, though the manifestation of His might and glory was set before their eyes.

2. The downfall of the idol-image before the ark and the excision of its most important parts (head and hands) is not merely a symbol, but also a type* of the truth which is illustrated in the history of God’s kingdom, even in its gloomiest periods, namely, that the powers of the world must sink again into the dust before His glory, after they, in truth taken into His service, have done their work, and that the time appointed by Him comes, when His enemies are made His foot-stool. Comp. the declarations in Ex. ix. 16 and xiv. 18 in reference to Egypt. “Where God comes with His ark and His testimony, there He smites the idols to the ground; idolatry must fall, where His gospel finds a place” (Berleb. Bible).

3. The heavy pressure and the hard blows of the hand of God, to which repeated and significant reference is made in connection with the severed hands of the idol-image, was intended not only as a deserved punishment for the Philistines, but also as a disciplinary visitation. All suffering is punishment, but also (as a chastisement of God’s hand) an instrument of correction; that is, under suffering and affliction, as the outflow and result of sin, man is not merely to recognize the causal connection between His sin and the divine punitive justice on the one hand, and the affliction on the other, but also to have His eyes opened to the purposes of God’s holy love, which by adversity and tribulation will draw him to itself, and humble him under God’s powerful hand to reverence His name.

* [Dr. Erdmann here uses the word type, not in the scientific theological sense of a fact of the Old Dispensation, which is intended to set forth the corresponding (spiritually identical) fact of the New Dispensation, but in the general sense of a representative or specimen fact. It is a method of the divine providence inferred from the Scripture and illustrated in history, rather than a spiritual fact of God’s spiritual kingdom prefigured by an outward object or fact in His ancient people or service. The ark symbolized God’s presence in law and mercy, but was not in itself a type, except as a part of the Tabernacle which typified God’s people. The lesson from the punishment of the Philistines, then, is the same as that contained in the slaughter at Samson’s death, the plagues of Egypt, the destruction of Babylon (Psalm cxxxvii. 8), and other cases in which God has interfered to save His cause; only here the procedure is more dramatically striking.—TR.]

* [But on the reading of this verse see “Textual and Grammatical” note.—TR.]

4. When man's heart will not give up its worthless idols, though God's hand draws it to Himself by affliction and suffering, then the distance between Him and the God that offers to be with him becomes greater in proportion to the severity and painfulness of the suffering felt by the soul alienated from God and devoted to idolatry. We shall at last desire to be entirely away from God, as the Philistines at last resolved to carry the ark over the border, that they might have nothing more to do with the God of Israel, while, on the contrary, the ark should have warned them to give glory to the God of Israel, who had so unmistakably and gloriously revealed Himself to them.

5. The cry that ascends to heaven over sufferings and afflictions that are the consequences of wickedness is by no means a sign that need teaches prayer; it may be made from a wholly heathen point of view. The cry that penetrates into heaven is "Against thee have I sinned," and is the expression of an upright, earnest penitence which is awakened in the heart by the chastisement of God's hand.

6. The Philistines do not deride and scorn the sanctuary of the Israelites, but from their standpoint show it reverence and treat it with forbearance and awe; and herein is exemplified the truth that even the enemies of God's kingdom and the opponents of the honor of His name in the affairs of His kingdom stand involuntarily and unconsciously under the influence of His power and glory, and a restraining higher power is near, from which they cannot withdraw. "They cannot advance, whom the Lord's greater power restrains. The supreme controller of affairs so orders all things that the wicked are restrained by fear—though their souls are haughty and they swell with pride and arrogance; and they cannot execute what their minds purpose. For God fetters and holds captive, as it were, their hands, and suffers not His glory to be obscured" (Calvin).

7. Often in the history of His kingdom, amid frightful victories by the hostile powers of the world, God's hand seems bound, and His people fall into the deepest affliction, so that even the most sacred possessions seem to have fallen into the rapacious hands of the world, which is contending against God and His kingdom; yet even then He knows how to maintain His honor inviolate, and His hand is yet free, and (as in the history of this war between Israel and the Philistines) in secret makes the preparation for the liberation and redemption of His people, and the restoration of the sanctuary and the possession of His kingdom, while human eyes do not see it, and human thought does not suspect it. The Lord is mighty and powerful even in the sorest defeats of His kingdom in the battle with the world. He brings every thing to glorious accomplishment.

8. Calvin: "The Philistines seek hiding-places from God's presence. Let us learn that the same thing happens to all God's enemies when they are given over to a reprobate mind. For though they are under the dominion of the lethargy of sin, yet, when God urges them more closely, and their own conscience presses them, they seek hiding-places against the majesty of God, and would save themselves by flight."

9. [This chapter, with the following, strikingly illustrates the non-missionary character of the Old

Dispensation. For centuries the Israelites were near neighbors of the Philistines, and had some acquaintance (apparently not much) with their political and religious institutions. Yet the Philistines had at this time only a garbled and distorted account (iv. 8) of the history of the Israelites, derived probably from tradition, and seemingly no particular knowledge at all of their religion, nor did the Israelites ever attempt, though they were in the times of Samson and David in close connection with Philistia, to carry thither a knowledge of what they yet believed to be the only true religion. This religious isolation was no doubt a part of the divine plan for the development of the theocratic kingdom, guarding it against the taint of idolatry, and permitting the chosen people thoroughly to apprehend and appropriate the truth which was then to go from them to all the world. But if we look for the natural causes which produced this moral isolation in ancient times, we shall find one in the narrowness of ancient civilization, where the absence of means of social and literary communication fostered mutual ignorance and made sympathy almost impossible, and another in the peculiarly national local nature of the religion of Israel, with its central sanctuary and its whole system grounded in the past history of the nation, presenting thus great obstacles to a foreigner who wished to become a worshipper of Jehovah. These might be overcome, as in Naaman's case, but it was not easy to throw off one's nationality (as was necessary for the convert) either at home or by going to live in the land of Israel. All this may palliate the unbelief of the ancient heathen peoples—palliate, but not excuse it, for Jehovah revealed Himself in mighty works which ought to have carried conviction (comp. vi. 6) and led to obedience and love. On the other hand, the Israelite ought to have tried to bring the heathen to the true God, and indeed in the Ps. we find exhortations to them to come and acknowledge Him. But the Jews, as a nation, never freed themselves from the narrowness to which their institutions trained them.—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[HENRY: God will show of how little account the ark of the covenant is, if the covenant itself be broken and neglected; even sacred signs are not things that either He is tied to, or we can trust to.—Tr.]

Vers. 1-5. The ruinous folly of the idolatrous mind: 1) It places God beside the idols, as if one could serve two masters (vers. 1, 2; Matt. vi. 24); 2) It does not allow itself to be pointed to the living God by the nothingness of its idols in contrast with Him (ver. 3); 3) In spite of the destruction of its idols through the power of the Lord before its eyes, it always sets up again the old idolatrous service, and carries it still further (ver. 4); 4) Sinking from one degree of superstition to another, it gives itself up, and is given up by God ever deeper and deeper into selfish idolatry.—Dagon before the ark, or Heathenism conquered at the feet of the living God: 1) In the domain of its power, its own abode (vers. 1, 2); 2) Through the secret demonstration of the power of the Lord (vers. 3, 4); 3) Amid the destruction of its power and glory (the face as a sign of its worthless glory and vain beauty struck down to the earth, the head also as the seat of the wisdom which is alienated from God and opposed to God, the hands as a symbol of the powers of darkness which work therein, cut off) (vers. 3-5).—The fall of heathenism: 1) It is thrown down before the power of God manifesting Himself as present in His word (the law and the testimony in the ark) (vers. 1-3); 2) Its power (head and hands) is broken and destroyed through the secretly working power of the Spirit of God (vers. 3, 4); 3) There is an ever more and more glorious revelation of the power of God which casts down heathenism in the light of the day of salvation, which overcomes the darkness of heathenism.—The defeat which the kingdom of the world suffers in its victory over the kingdom of God: 1) In quiet concealment; 2) Through the miraculous action of God; 3) In open publicity.

Vers. 6, 7. CALVIN: Here it is clearly shown how great is the stiff-neckedness of unbelievers in their error, that when the manifest signs of the divine judgments press ever nearer, and there is no more room at all for excuses, and when they can no longer conceal their fear of the judgment and the power of God, yet they do not recognize their contumacy, and lay aside their hardness of heart, but only seek hiding-places and places of refuge, in order to withdraw themselves as far as possible from the divine power that it may not reach them. What sort of effect do unbelievers let the experience and apprehension of the infinite power of God produce in them? Not a change of disposition, not a zealous striving after the knowledge of the truth in His word, and willingness to give Him the honor which belongs to Him, not humility of heart in subjection to the majesty of God, but rather fear and terror at His presence, and the striving to fly as far from Him as possible, and to keep God removed as far as possible from them.—God avenges Himself on the enemies of His people, in that, even when they have obtained a victory over the people of God, it yet turns out worse for them than for the people of God who are defeated, Job xx. 5-7.—CRAMER: God can even with ease constrain His enemies to confession.

Ver. 8. STARKE: Foolish men, to think that the almightiness of God can be thwarted by change of place.—SEB. SCHMIDT: Against God the devices of men, even the wisest, avail nothing. [Ver. 9. "Boils." There are many other passages in our English version of the Bible in which an apparent indelicacy is due to erroneous translation.—HALL: They judge right of the cause; what do they resolve for the cure? . . . They should have said: Let us cast out Dagon, that we may pacify and retain the God of Israel; they determine to thrust out the ark of God, that they might peaceably enjoy themselves, and Dagon.—TA.]

Ver. 10. God has the hearts of all men in His hands (Prov. xxi. 1), and can speedily turn them to change their will and purposes, so as to promote His honor and the best interests of the Church.—Ver. 12. CALVIN: We should not imitate the Ekronites, who fill heaven with their cry, but with their heart are far from God; rather should we, when the ark of God comes so near us, come with our heart to God. To Him should we cry, when He comes in His judgments, and beg Him for help without complaining, while we confess to Him our sins, and acknowledge that we receive from Him righteous punishment, and that the sufferings which He has inflicted on us are wholesome for us.—SCHLIER: Then could Israel clearly see what an almighty God they had, stronger than the gods of all the heathens and that this strong God wished to be their God, and had interested Himself in behalf of His people.

2. Restoration of the Ark with Expiatory Gifts. Chap. VI. 1-11.

- 1 AND the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] was in the country of the Philistines seven 2 months. And the Philistines called for [together¹] the priests and the diviners, saying, What shall we do to [with] the ark of the Lord [Jehovah]? Tell us 3 wherewith² we shall send it to his [its] place. And they said, If ye³ send away the ark of the God of Israel, send it not empty, but in any wise [om. in any wise⁴] return him⁵ a trespass-offering; then ye shall be healed,⁶ and it shall be known⁷ to

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 2. So the verb is not unfrequently used, as in Josh. xxiii. 2.—TA.]

² [Ver. 2. Or, "how.—TA.]

³ [Ver. 3. The Pron. is not in the present Heb. text, but is found in 7 MSS., in Sept., Syr., Chald., Arab., and apparently in Vulg. It may have fallen out, as Houbigant suggests, from similarity to the following word (הָאֵלֹהִים). Others (so Erdmann) take the construction as impersonal, and render: "if one sends back," etc.—TA.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. This phrase in Eng. A. V. is intended to express the Heb. Inf. Abs.; but where the proper shade of intensity or emphasis cannot be given in Eng., it is better to write the verb simply, and not introduce a foreign substantive idea.—TA.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. Some ancient vss. and modern expositors refer this to the ark, and render "to it," relying on the grammatical connection, and on ver. 9; but the Philistines throughout seem to regard God, and not the ark, as the author of their sufferings. Yet it is possible that, even with this view, their idolatrous ideas might have led them to appease the instrument or visible occasion of the divine infliction.—TA.]

4 you why his hand is not removed from you. Then said they [And they said], What shall be [is] the trespass-offering which we shall return to him? [Ins. And] they answered [said], Five golden emerods [boils] and five golden mice,⁸ according⁹ to the number of the lords of the Philistines; for one plague was [is] on you¹⁰ all and on your lords. Wherefore [And] ye shall make images of your emerods [boils], and images of your mice that mar [devastate] the land; and ye shall give glory to the God of Israel; peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land. [Ins. And] wherefore then [om. then] do [will] ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? [ins. Did they not], when he had [om. had¹¹] wrought wonderfully among them, did they not [om. did they not] let the people go, and they departed? 7 Now therefore [And now] make¹² a new cart, and take¹³ two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie [yoke] the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them. And take the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], and lay it upon the cart, and put the jewels of gold [golden figures¹⁴], which ye return him¹⁵ for a trespass-offering, in a [the¹⁶] coffer by the side thereof, and send it away, that it may go. And see, if it goeth [go] up by the way of his [its] own coast to Beth-Shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil; but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us. And the men did so, and took two milch kine, and tied [yoked] them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home; And they [om. they] laid the ark of the Lord [Jehovah] upon the cart, and the coffer with [and] the mice of gold [golden mice] and the images of their emerods [boils].¹⁸

3. Reception and Quarters of the Ark in Israel. Chap. VI. 12—VII. 1.

12 And the kine took the straight way [went straight forward¹⁷] to the way of [on the road to] Bethshemesh, and [om. and] went along the highway [on one highway they went], lowing¹⁷ as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Bethshe-

⁸ [Ver. 3. Erdmann and others take this sentence as conditional (which is here possible, but somewhat hard) on the ground that the priests are not sure that the atonement-offering will be successful, but propose an experiment (as in ver. 9). Yet in vers. 5 and 6 they are sure, and the experiment in ver. 9 seems an afterthought.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 3. The Heb. text is here supported by Syr., Arab. and Vulg., nor is there any variation in the MSS. (De Rossi); but Sept. has "expiation shall be made for you" (נִסְכָּר), and Chald. "healing shall be granted you" (חִירָר). To the first of these the repetition is an objection, to the second the order of ideas (healing, expiation). It does not appear whether they are loose renderings of our text, or represent a different text.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 4. Philippson renders "tumors" (geschwülste), setting aside the supposed plague of field-mice. See Exek. Notes in loco. The Sept. here departs from the Heb. text in the order of statements and in the number of mice; see the discussion in the note on the passage.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 4. This clause stands first in the original.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 4. Heb.: "them all," and so Erdmann and Philippson. But all the VSS. and 10 MSS. read "you," which the sense seems to require.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 6. The verb (רָחַץ) is Aor., rendered "wrought" in Ex. x. 2 by Eng. A. V.; Sept. and Vulg. render freely "smote"; but Syr. has "they mocked them, and did not send them away, and they went," where the wrong number of the first vb. required the negation in the second.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 7. Or, "take and prepare" (so Erdmann). But the verb קָחַי may properly be taken as expletive or pleonastic here, as in 2 Sam. xviii. 18 (see Ges. Lex. s. v.), though it must be understood before the second accusative "kine."—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 8. The word כֶּלִי means any instrument or implement, and is used of utensils, implements, armor, weapons, vessels and jewels; here, however, it is none of these, but figures, copies or works: Luther, bilder, Erdmann, geräthe, D'Allioil, figures, Cahen, empreintes, and the other modern VSS., of Martin, Diodati, D'Almeida, De S. Miguel, have "figures"; only the Dutch has "jewels," Vulg. vasa, Sept. σκεύη.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 8. The Art. here points out the coffer which belonged to the cart; but as this is not otherwise known or mentioned, the insertion or omission of the Art. in Eng. makes little or no difference. The Al. Sept. inserts a neg. before the word "put" in this verse, perhaps to avoid a supposed difficulty in the number of golden mice.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 11. The Vat. Sept. (but not Al.) omits the words "and the images of their boils," perhaps in order to indicate that the mice were not in the argas or box, and thus avoid the difficulty above-mentioned (see ver. 18). Wellhausen, taking exception to the inverted order here (mice, boils), to the word tehorim, and to the ambiguity of the phrase, omits all of ver. 11 after "coffer," regarding the Heb. as a gloss on the already corrupt Greek. But this is improbable, and the Heb. is sustained by all the VSS. The tehorim is not improbably a marginal explanation of ophalim which has crept into the text (so Geiger and Erdmann); but the text, though not perfectly clear, must, on critical grounds, be retained, since there would have been no special reason why a scribe should insert it, but on the other hand ground for its omission, as the Greek shows tampering with the text to avoid a difficulty.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 12. On the form of the Heb. word see Erdmann in loco.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 12. Ges. Gram. (Conant's transl.), § 75, Rem. I. 2.—Ta.]

- 13 mesh. And they¹⁸ of Bethshemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley; 14 and they lifted up their eyes, and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see¹⁹ it. And the cart came into the field of Joshua a Bethshemite [the Bethshemeshite], and stood there, where [and there] there was a great stone; and they clave the wood of the 15 cart, and offered the kine a burnt-offering unto the Lord [Jehovah]. And the Levites took down the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], and the coffer that was with it, wherein [ins. were] the jewels of gold [golden figures] were [om. were], and put them on the great stone; and the men of Bethshemesh offered burnt-offerings, and 16 sacrificed sacrifices the same day unto the Lord [Jehovah]. And when [om. when] the five lords of the Philistines had seen [saw] it, they [and] returned to Ekron 17 the same day. And these are the golden emerods [boils] which the Philistines returned for [as] a trespass-offering unto the Lord [Jehovah]: for Ashdod one, for 18 Gaza one, for Askelon one, for Gath one, for Ekron one. And the golden mice [ins. were] according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines belonging to the five lords, both of fenced cities and of country villages,²⁰ even unto the great stone of Abel whereon they set down the ark of the Lord, which stone remaineth unto this day in the field of Joshua the Bethshemite [And²¹ the great stone, on which they set down the ark of Jehovah, remaineth to this day in the field of Joshua the Bethshemeshite].
 19 And he smote the men of Bethshemesh, because they had [om. had] looked into [at²²] the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], even [and] he smote of the people fifty thousand and three-score and ten men [70 men, 50,000 men²³]; and the people lamented, because the Lord [Jehovah] had smitten [smote] many of [om. many of] the people 20 with a great slaughter. And the men of Bethshemesh said, Who is able to stand before [ins. Jehovah], this holy Lord [om. Lord] God? and to whom shall he go 21 up from us? And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again [back] the ark of the Lord [Jehovah]; come ye down, and fetch it up to you.
 CHAP. VII. 1 AND the men of Kirjath-jearim came, and fetched up the ark of the Lord [Jehovah], and brought it into the house of Abinadab in [on] the hill, and sanctified [consecrated] Eleazar his son to keep the ark of the Lord [Jehovah].

¹⁸ [Ver. 13. The Heb. has simply "Bethshemesh," the place put for its inhabitants.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 13. Sept.: "to meet it" (לִקְרָאתוֹ), error of copyist.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 18. The first clause of this verse (and along with it ver. 17) is stricken out by Wellhausen on the ground of its incompatibility with ver. 8. The external evidence for the clause is complete; on the internal evidence see the Comm. in loco and Translator's note.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 18. Or: "witness is the great stone," etc., omitting the word "remaineth;" so Erdmann, see Comm. in loco. The simpler translation given above is that suggested in Bib. Comm.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 19. This is the common meaning of the verb (נָסַח) with בְּ.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 19. These numbers, though probably incorrect, are left in the text, because no satisfactory reading has been settled on. The clause should be bracketed. See discussion in Comm.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Vers. 1-11. The ark is sent back with expiatory gifts. The designation of place: in the field is here to be taken in the wider sense of territory, country, as in Ruth i. 2.—The seven months, during which the ark was in the country of the Philistines, was a time of uninterrupted plagues. In addition to the disease of boils came the plague of the devastation of the fields by mice. That the plague of mice was something over and above the disease is plain from vers. 5, 11, 18; in ver. 1 the Sept. adds, "and their land swarmed with mice," which the narrator has not expressly mentioned. Thenius' supposition that, from similarity of final syllables (בִּבְּ-), a clause has fallen out of the Heb. text, is too bold a one. Maurer remarks correctly: "it is generally agreed that the Hebrew writers not infrequently omit things essential, and then afterwards mention them briefly in succession."—Ver. 2. After it had been determined in the council of the princes to send back the ark to the Israelites, the priests and soothsayers are now to tell how it shall be sent back. Alongside of an honorable priestly class appear here the soothsayers [diviners] (that is, the organs of the deity, who reveal his counsel and will through the mantic art) as authorities, whose decision is final. The princes had to consider the political-national and social side, these the religious side of the question.* Inasmuch as it has already been determined to send the ark back, the question "what shall we do in respect to the ark of God?" is only introductory to the succeeding question, "where-with or how shall we send it to its place?" The וְהָיָה may mean either, but the rendering "how, in what way" (Vulg. quomodo) is favored by the connection, since the priests would else not have answered that the ark was not to be sent back without gifts.—Ver. 3. We must here not supply the pronoun "ye" to the Particip. (מְשַׁלְּחִים), but must render (as in ii. 24) impersonally*: "if one sends, if they send." The ark must be restored, not empty, but with gifts. These gifts are to be an asham (אֲשָׁמָה), a debt-offering or expiatory offering; the gift is thus designated, because it is a question of the payment of a debt.† Satisfaction must be made to the angered God of the people of Israel for the contempt put on Him by the abduction of the ark. The word "return, make compensation" ($\text{שָׁבַר$) refers to the unlawful appropriation; it is a matter of compensation. Vulg.: quod debetis, reddite ei pro peccato. לֵאמֹר ["to him," "to it"] is to be referred not to the ark (Sept.), but to God. Send Him a "gift, by which His anger shall be appeased, lest He torment you more" (Cleric.). According to Ex. xxiii. 15 no one was allowed to appear empty-handed ($\text{בְּיָדָאֵם$) before God. Whether, as Clericus supposes, this was known to the Philistine priests, is uncertain. The words אֲשָׁמָה may be taken either as conditional or as assertory. The latter rendering "then you shall be healed" would suit the connection and the whole situation, but that these priests expressly declare it to be possible (ver. 9) that this plague was to be ascribed not to the God of Israel, but to a chance. The hypothetical rendering is therefore to be preferred, which is grammatically allowable, though the conditional particle is wanting. (Comp. Ew. Gr., § 357 b). We must therefore translate: "and if ye shall be healed."‡ In the words "and it shall be known to you why His hand is not removed from you" the present tense offers no difficulty, the sense being: "you shall then by the cure learn why His hand now smites you; His hand is not removed from you, because the expiation for your guilt, which will be followed by cure, is not yet made."

* [The word here employed for "priests" (kohanim) is the same as that used to designate the priests of the true God, the distinctive word for idol-priests (kemanim) occurring only three times in O. T., though frequent in the Syriac and Chald. translations. The Arabic here renders "chiefs" or "doctors" (ahbara), probably to avoid a scandalous application of the sacred name. For etymology of kohen see Ges., Thes., and Fürst, Heb. Lex. —The word rendered "soothsayer" (goem) is probably from a stem meaning "to divide, partition, assign fortunes," and seems to be employed to denote divination by processes such as shaking arrows, consulting teraphim, inspecting livers (Ex. xxi. 26-28 [21-23]), perhaps differing thus from the mantic art proper, which involved possession or inspiration by the deity (which two me-

Bunsen: "It was a universal custom of ancient nations to dedicate to the deity to whom a sickness was ascribed, or from whom cure was desired, likenesses of the diseased parts." This was true also of the cause of the plagues. The Philistines therefore (ver. 4 sq.), when they inquired what they should send along as trespass or expiatory offering, received the answer: "five golden boils and five golden mice." The number five is expressly fixed on with reference to the five princes of the Philistines, who represent the whole people (חֲמִשָּׁה is Acc. of exact determination "according to, in relation to," with adverbial signification. Ges. Gr., § 118, 3). The change of person in the words "one plague is on them all and on your princes" has occasioned the reading "you all," which is for this reason to be rejected.* People and princes are here regarded as a unit, the latter representing the former, and therefore the number of the gifts to be offered for the whole is determined by the number (five) of the princes. Ver. 5 makes in a supplementary way express mention of the devastation which the mice made in the land. "This plague is often far greater in southern lands than with us; so that the Egyptians use the figure of a fieldmouse to denote destruction; there are many examples, it is said, of the whole harvest in a field having been destroyed by them in one night" (v. Gerl.). Comp. Boch. Hieroz. II., 429 ed. Ros.; Plin. Hist. Nat. X. c. 65. By the presentation of the likenesses in gold they were to "give honor to the God of Israel." These words of the Philistine priests explain the expression "pay or return a trespass-offering." By the removal of the ark, the seat of the glory of the God of Israel, His honor is violated; hence the punishment in this two-fold plague; by these gifts they are to attempt to make compensation for the violation of honor, and the wrath of the God who is wounded in His honor is to be turned aside. "By bringing precisely the instrument of their chastisement as a gift to God, they confess that He Himself has punished them, and do homage to His might, hoping therefore all the more by paying their debt to be made or to remain free" (v. Gerlach). The expression "perhaps He will lighten His hand from off you" agrees with that in ver. 3, "if ye be healed," and with ver. 9.

[It is not clear that the Philistines were visited with a plague of mice. In spite of Maurer's remark (on ver. 1) endorsed by Erdmann, it is strange that no mention is made of the mice in chap. v. Philippeon (who translates akbar not "mouse" but "boil") further objects that the assumption of a mouse-plague different from the boil-disease is incompatible with the assertion in ver. 4, "one plague is on you and on your lords," which supposes a bodily infliction (on which, however, see the discussion of the Sept. text of vers. 4, 5, in note to ver. 18). Nor does the Heb. text expressly state that there was such a plague. In ver. 5 nothing more is necessarily said (so Wellhausen) than that they were exposed to land devastations by mice, and that the whole land had suffered, and ver. 18 (however interpreted) adds nothing to the statement in ver. 4. We may on critical grounds keep the present Masoretic text (discarding the Sept. addition to ver. 1) without finding in it the mouse-plague. On the other hand, the figure of a mouse was in Egypt a symbol of destruction, and so might have been chosen here as a fitting expia-thods Cicero calls divination with and without art, Div. i. 18). The word is used in O. T. only of false diviners (for wider use in Arabic see Freytag, Ar. Lex. s. v. qasama). Comp. Art. "Divination" in Smith's Bib. Dict. Articles "Wahrseher" and "Magier" in Winer's Bib. R. W. and Ges. Theol.—Tr.]

* [On this see Translator's note in "Textual and Grammatical"—Tr.]

† [The word asham rather means not "debt," but "offence" and its "punishment" (comp. Gen. xxvi. 10; Ps. xiv. 9; Isa. liii. 10, and the Arab. athama), and is not restricted in the Mosaic Law to cases of restitution (see Lev. v. (Eng. A. V. v.—vi. 7, xiv. 12; Nu. vi. 12). Here it may be used in this latter sense, and is in general more appropriate than hattath, since the Philistines cannot be supposed to have the deeper conception of sin involved in the latter word. It is, of course, a question whether they employed this very word asham.—Tr.]

‡ [Against this see note under "Textual and Grammatical"—Tr.]

* [For defence of the reading "you all" see "Textual and Grammatical" notes in loco.—Tr.]

tory offering. Possibly, as there was a Baal-zebul, "lord of flies" (Zeib Ἀρούμωρ), worshipped at Ekron, so there was a Baal-akbar, "lord of mice," and this animal may have been connected with religious worship.—Others explain the figures of the boils and mice as telemos or talismans. So Maimonides, quoted in Poole's Synopses, in which are cited many illustrations of the wide use of talismans (figures made under planetary and astral conjunctions in the likeness of the injurious object or of the part affected) among the ancients (expanded by Kitto, Daily Bible Illustr., Saul and David, p. 86 sq.). But, supposing there was a plague of mice, these figures were prepared, not by their own virtue to avert the plague (which the talismans were supposed to do), but to appease the wrath of the God of Israel.—Tr.—Lighten from off you, etc., is a pregnant expression for "lighten and turn away from you," so that the burden of the punishment shall be removed from you. In ver. 6 the case of the Egyptians is referred to in order to strengthen the exhortation. We have already seen in iv. 8 the mark of the deep impression made on the neighboring heathen nations by the judgments of the God of Israel on the Egyptians. The Philistine priests see in these plagues judgments like those inflicted on the Egyptians, and set forth the universal and comprehensive significance of this revelation of the heavy hand of God in the words "on [rather from] you, and your god [better, perhaps, gods, as in Eng. A. V.], and your land." They thus refer this general calamity not only to its highest cause in the God of Israel and His violated honor, but also to its deepest ground in the Philistines' hardening of the heart against Him after the manner of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and so show exact acquaintance with the pragmatism of the history of God's revelations towards Egypt and its king. Comp. Ex. vii. 13 sq. with viii. 32. It is evident from the connection that the words of the priests are to be referred only to the obligation to "give honor to the God of Israel" by expiatory presents, not to the restoration of the ark, which was already determined on. The hardening or obduracy of the heart is the stubborn and persistent refusal to give to the God of Israel His due honor, after His honor had been violated.

The word הַתְּעַלְל [“wrought”] points to God's mighty deeds against Pharaoh and the Egyptians; it is found in the same sense “work, exercise power” [“work one's will on”] in Ex. x. 2 and 1 Sam. xxxi. 4. In view of these exhibitions of God's power, they are warned against such a persistent stiff-necked opposition to it. Ver. 6 is not inconsistent with the doubt expressed in ver. 9, whether the plagues come from the God of Israel or from a chance, since it is (in ver. 9) at any rate regarded as possible that the God of Israel has thus exhibited His anger. “The mere possibility of this makes it seem advisable to do every thing to appease the wrath of the God of the Israelites, which the heathen, from their fear of the gods, dreaded under the circumstances not less, yea, more than the anger of their own gods” (Keil).

Vers. 7-9. The arrangements respecting the mode of sending back the ark. In ver. 7 the arrangements are made for a restoration of the ark worthy of and proportionate to the honor of the God of Israel. The Philistines are not, for this purpose, to have a new cart made, but, as the preceding חֲרֹץ shows, to *take one already made, in order to fit it up and prepare it for this end; this is shown by the וַעֲשׂוּ [“and make”]. A new cart and two hitherto unyoked milch cows (comp. Deut. xxi. 3) are to carry back the ark with the presents; only what had not been used, what was still undesecrated, was an appropriate means for the honor destined to be shown to the dreaded

God of Israel. עֲרֹלָה, properly the “rolling thing,” means the transport-wagon, which, according to this, was in use in Philistia, and was usually yoked with oxen. The calves were to be taken along, but afterwards to be carried from behind the drawing cows, back into the house—that is, into the stall. In reference to the cows the Masc. is thrice used in ver. 7 for the Fem., “because the writer thinks of the cows as oxen” (Thenius); and so in vers. 10, 12. In ver. 8 a minute description is given of the manner of loading the cart with the ark and with the coffer (אֲרוֹן). found only here and vers. 11, 15) in which the golden expiatory gifts were to be carried. “And send it away, that it may go.” From the connection it appears that the cart, with the ark, is left to the cows to draw; the direction which they take without being led or driven is decisive of the question whether the plagues are from the God of Israel or not.

Ver. 9. This is stated more precisely by the priests. If the cows went straight to its (the ark's) territory, this would be the sign that the plagues were from the God of Israel; if not, it would show that it was only a matter of chance. From their stand-point the heathen distinguished with perfect logical consistency between the providence of the God of Israel and a mere chance.

“Its territory or coast” (אֶרֶץ) is the land of Israel as its home. Bethshemesh is one of the Israelitish priestly cities on the border of Judah and Dan (Josh. xxi. 16), the nearest of them to Ekron, and the nearest point of entrance from Philistia into the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 10, 11). The valley in or on which (ver. 13) it lay, was the same with the present Wady Surar. The present Ain Shems which rests on it is the ancient Bethshemesh.† S. Robinson, II. 599, III. 224 sq. [Amer. Ed. II. 14, 16, 223-225.] If this direction was not taken by the cows, that was to be the sign that “this was a chance” (כִּסְפָּה) is not adverb. “by chance" (Keil), but Nom. of the subject; and this is no ground for reading (with Böttcher) נִקְרָה, "by chance". The meaning of the priests was, that the cows, being unaccustomed to the yoke, and being, besides, milch cows, from which their calves had been separated, would, in obedience to their natural impulse, wish to turn about and go back to their stall, unless a higher power restrained them, and compelled them to take the road to Bethshemesh and keep it. By God's ordination this was done, and so was for the Philistines the factual confirmation given by the God of Israel of the opinion that He had inflicted the plagues on them. Vers. 10, 11 relate the carrying out of the arrangements which the priests had made. The restoration is performed in the manner prescribed by the priests.

* [Erdmann translates: “take and make a new cart, and take two milch cows.”—on which see note under “Textual and Grammatical.”—Tr.]

† [Robinson: “Just on the west of the village (Ain Shems), on and around the plateau of a low swell between the Surar on the North and a smaller Wady on the South, are the manifest traces of an ancient site. Here are the vestiges of a former extensive city, consisting of many foundations and the remains of ancient walls of hewn stone. The materials have indeed been chiefly swallowed up in the probably repeated constructions of the modern village; but enough yet remains to make it one of the largest and most marked sites which we had any where seen. On the north the great Wady es-Surar—Itself a plain—runs off first west and then north-west into the great plain; while on the south the smaller Wady comes down from the south-east, and uniting with the one down which we had traveled, they enter the Surar below the ruins.”—Tr.]

II. Vers. 12-21. The ark is transported to Bethshemesh. Ver. 12. They kept the road exactly—lit. "they were straight on the way." * Mesillah (מְסִלָּה) is a thrown up, raised way, a highway.

On one highway—that is, without going hither and thither, as is afterwards added by way of explanation, "without turning aside to the right or to the left." They went going and lowing; that is, constantly lowing, because they wanted their calves; yet they did not turn about, but went on in the opposite direction. The Philistine princes went behind, not before them, because, in accordance with the suggestion of the priests, they had to observe whither the animals went. Ver. 13. Bethshemesh is for "the inhabitants of Bethshemesh." Though it was a priestly city, the inhabitants of Bethshemesh are expressly distinguished from the Levites. The Bethshemeshites, who were reaping wheat in the valley (Wady Surar), rejoiced to see the long-lost ark. [The wheat harvest points to May or June as the time of the return of the ark. Robinson: "May 13. Most of the fields (near Jericho) were already reaped. Three days before we had left the wheat green upon the fields around Hebron and Carmel; and we afterwards found the harvest there in a less forward state on the 6th of June" (I. 550, 551). We do not know what species of wheat the ancient Hebrews had; but the crop was the most important one in the country (see 1 Kings v. 11). Mr. W. Houghton says (Smith's Bib. Dict. Art. "Wheat"): "There appear to be two or three kinds of wheat at present grown in Palestine, the Triticum vulgare (var. hybernium), the T. spelta, and another variety of bearded wheat, which appears to be the same as the Egyptian kind, the T. compositum." The phrase "they lifted up their eyes and saw," being the common Heb. formula for "looking," does not show that the object looked at was on a higher elevation than the spectator. Thus Stanley's argument (Sin. and Pal., p. 248) from Gen. xxii. 4 as to the site of "Moriah" has no weight.—TR.] Ver. 14. The great stone in the field of the Bethshemeshite Joshua was probably the occasion of the ark's being stopped here, with the design of using the stone as a sacred spot for the solemn removal of the ark and the presents, as appears from ver. 15. The Levites are expressly mentioned in connection with the setting the ark down on the great stone, a sacred act which pertained to them alone. Since the ark betokened the presence of the Lord, it could be said that they, namely, the Bethshemeshites, offered the kine to the Lord by using the wood of the cart for the burnt-offering. With this they joined a blood-offering. It was lawful to offer the sacrifice here, because, wherever the ark was, offering might be made. Though the people of Bethshemesh are expressly said to be the offerers [ver. 15], this does not exclude the co-operation of the priests, especially as Bethshemesh was a priestly city. From the single burnt-offering in ver. 14, which was offered with the cart and the kine, the burnt-offerings [ver. 15] and the slain-offerings, which were connected with a joyful sacrificial meal, are to be distinguished as a second sacrificial act, which, in its first element (the burnt-offering), set forth the renewed consecration and devotion of the whole life to the Lord, and in its second (the meal) expressed joyful thanksgiving for the restoration of God's enthronement and habitation amid His people, of which they had been so long deprived. Ver. 16. The five lords of the Philistines saw in this occurrence, in accordance with the instruction of their priests, a revelation of the God of Israel; they returned to Ekron the same day.—Vers. 17, 18. A second enumeration of the expiatory gifts, comp. ver. 4. The statement here made varies from that of ver. 4 only in the fact that, while the priests had advised the presentation of only five golden figures of mice, here a much greater number, "according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines," are offered; because, from the expression "from the fenced city to the village of the inhabitants of the low land" (וְהַכְּפֻרִים, Deut. iii. 5) [rather "fenced cities and country* villages"], which shows that every Philistine locality was represented in the mouse-figures, we learn that the mouse-plague extended over the whole country, while the boil-plague prevailed only in the largest cities.† In the second clause, instead of וְיָרָא ["and unto"] read וְיָרָא ["and witness"], and instead of אָבֶל ["Abel"], we must, on account of the attached Adj. and the repeated reference to the "field of Joshua" (vers. 14, 16), read אֶבֶן ["stone"], and translate: "and a witness is the great stone (אֶבֶן) is found in the same sense, Gen. xxxi. 52) . . . to this day." Kimchi's explanation of אָבֶל as the name [the Heb. word means "mourning"] given to the stone on account of the mourning made there

* [The word כְּפֻרָה is explained by the Mishna and the Jews generally, and by Gesenius, to mean "open country," and this signification for the adj. form in the text is required by the contrast with "fenced cities." See Ges. Theo. s. v. The Arab. stem pharaza is "to separate"—and the derived nouns have the sense of "planeness," whence the rural districts may have been called "plane," that is, "unwalled."—TR.]

† [On the supposition that there was no mouse-plague, the mouse-figures equally represented the whole country. In this connection the Greek text of vers. 4, 5 is worthy of attention. It reads: "(ver. 4), five golden hedras (ophatim, 'bolls'), according to the number of the lords of the Philistines; (ver. 5), and golden mice, like the mice," etc.; thus separating the two statements, and omitting the second number five. If this reading were adopted, it would relieve the Heb. text, which, in several places in this chapter, shows traces of corruption. See note under "Textual and Grammatical."—TR.]

* יִשְׂרָאֵל is for יִשְׂרָאֵל, and the י for י. On this form comp. EW. § 191 b, and Gesen. § 47, R. 3.

(ver. 19) is a fanciful expedient, which has also no support in the context, since nothing is afterwards said of a mourning at this stone.

Vers. 19–21. The ark in Bethshemesh. A punishment is inflicted by God on the Bethshemeshites because they had sinned respecting the holiness of God, which was represented before their eyes by the ark. Wherein this sin consisted is stated in the words "because they looked," &c. (בָּרָאוּ בְּעֵינֵי), which are to be connected with the question in ver. 20. From ver. 13 (if we retain the text) it could not have been the mere looking at the ark, which stood on the cart, and was necessarily visible to every body, but, as the ב shows, consisted only in the manner of looking at it. As the unauthorized touching (Num. iv. 15; 2 Sam. vi. 7), so the profane, prying, curious looking at the ark, as the symbol of the holy God who dwells amid His people, is forbidden on pain of death. The fundamental passage, to which we must here go back, is Num. iv. 20. The deepest ground of the strict prohibition to touch and look at the ark lies in the opposition which exists between man, impure through sin, and the holy God, which cannot be removed by immediate and unmediated connection with God on man's part, but only through the means which God has by special revelation ordained to this end. Against Thenius, who holds that this explanation cannot be based on Num. iv. 20, it is to be remarked that this passage speaks expressly not only of unauthorized intrusion, but also of a similar looking at the inner sanctuary. There is no contradiction between this verse and ver. 13, if we regard the Acc. in the latter, and the Prep. "at" (ב) here; this difference in the designation of the object indicates a difference in this connection in the seeing. In Num. iv. 20 also the seeing is more exactly defined by an added word. Other explanations, as: "because they were afraid at the ark" (Syr., Arab.), or: "looked into it" (Rabb.), are entirely untenable. It is true, however, that the words of the text (according to which the above would be the only tenable explanation) present great difficulties, which Thenius expresses in the remark: "One does not see why 'and he smote' (וַיַּךְ) is repeated, and why we have 'the people' (עַם) again after 'the men of Bethshemesh' ($\text{בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$)." Moreover, the following words of this verse, which give the number of the slain, undoubtedly offer an incorrect, or rather a corrupt text; whereby the preceding words would be involved in the corruption. The supposition of a defective text being here so natural, we should be inclined to adopt (with Thenius) the reading of the Sept.: "And the children of Jechoniah among the Bethshemeshites were not glad (chap. v. 13) that they saw the ark, and he smote of them," &c.; but that the objection "that we elsewhere find nothing at all about the race of Jechoniah" is by no means so unimportant as Thenius thinks it. The reading "70 men, 50,000 men" is evidently corrupt. If a process of addition were here intended, then "and" (ו) must necessarily stand before the second number. If a partition were meant (70 out of 50,000 men), then, besides the grammatical difficulty, there is the objection that the city of Bethshemesh (and it alone is here spoken of), could not possibly have had so many inhabitants. The last objection applies with still more force to Ewald's translation, "beginning with 70 and increasing to 50,000 men,"—which would require us to suppose a still larger population. The words "50,000 men" are wanting in Jos. (Ant. 6, 1–14), and in some Heb. MSS. (Cod. Kenn. 84, 210, 418), and are [to be rejected],* since they give no sense, and probably "came from the margin into the text as another solution of the numeral sign which stood there (in the original text stood ל [70], while in another נ [50,000] was found)" (Thenius).—The ground of the sudden death of the 70 of the race of Jechoniah is their unsympathizing, and therefore unholy bearing towards the symbol of God's presence among His people, which showed a mind wholly estranged from the living God, a symptom of the religious-moral degeneracy, which had spread among the people, though piety was still to be found.†

Ver. 20. Who can stand before this holy God?—This question expresses their consciousness of unworthiness, and their fear of the violated majesty of the covenant-God of Israel. The people of Bethshemesh recognize in the death of the 70 a judgment of God, in which He punishes the violation of His majesty and glory, and defends His holiness in relation to His people. God is called the holy in this connection, in that He guards and avenges His greatness and glory, which He had revealed to Israel, when they are violated and dishonored by human sin, by unholy, godless conduct.—From the connection only "God" can be the Subj. of "shall go up" (וַיַּעֲלֶה). The question "to whom shall he go up from us?"

* [The words in brackets are not in the German—omitted probably by typographical error.—Ta.]

† [On the criticism of this verse see De Rossi, Var. Lect., and a good note in Bib. Comm. As to the numbers, it seems impossible to determine anything with certainty, and the conjecture of Thenius (that we read 70, omitting the 50,000) is as probable as any other. That the first part of the verse is corrupt is evident from the variations in the VSS, and the confused character of the Heb. text itself. Two hints for the reconstruction of the true text appear to be given us, one by the Chald., the other by the Sept. The former reads: "and He slew among the men of Bethshemesh, because they rejoiced when they saw the ark," &c. (where the "rejoiced" is apparently taken from ver. 13); the latter reads: "and not pleased were the sons of Jechoniah among the men of Bethshemesh, that they saw the ark," &c. Combining these, we may perhaps infer 1) that the "rejoice" or "pleased" was inserted by a translator or copyist, and 2) that a phrase of several words preceded the words "with the men of Bethshemesh." The verse then, may have begun somewhat so: $\text{וַיַּךְ אֱלֹהִים יְהוָה בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$ and read "and Jehovah was angry with the Bethshemeshites, because, etc. . . . and smote among them" (reading $\text{בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$ for $\text{בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$). From this the present Heb. text might have come by substituting וַיַּךְ (by homoeoteleuton or otherwise) for the first words, and omitting "or" וְהָיָה , and the Sept. text might be explained as a duplet, in which the $\text{בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$ is a corruption of the Heb., and the "displeased" taken from the same source as the Chald.—Wellhausen translates the Sept. into Heb. by the words $\text{וַיַּךְ אֱלֹהִים בְּנֵי בֶּתְשֶׁמֶשׁ}$ and adopts this as the true text. But this is not in itself very satisfactory ("and the sons of Jechoniah were not guiltless," &c.), and does not answer the demands of the VSS, and the context.—Ta.]

refers then indeed to the ark, in connection with which the sin and the punishment had occurred, and supposes that the Bethshemeshites were unwilling to keep it among them, from fear of farther judgments which its stay might occasion. A superstitious idea here mingles with the fear of God, since the stay of the ark is regarded as in itself a cause of further misfortune.

Ver. 21. Kirjath-jearim, that is, "city of forests" [Forestville, Woodville], in the tribe-territory of Judah, belonged at an earlier period to Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17; xviii. 25, 26; Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29), and is the present Kuryet el Enab—"city of wine" [literally "grapes"] (Rob. II. 588 sq. [Amer. ed. II. 11], and Bibl. Forschung. 205 sq. [Am. ed. III. 157], Tobler, Topogr. II. 742 sqq.)* The embassy to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim had two objects: the announcement of the return of the ark, and the demand that they should take it. They are silent as to the misfortune which was connected with its restoration, and as to their reason for not wishing to keep it. Ch. vii. 1 mentions the safe transportation of the ark by the Kirjath-jearimites to their city. The ark is placed in the house of Abinadab בֵּית אֲבִינָדָב, "on the hill," not in "Gibeah" (Vulg., Luther), as if the latter were a suburb of Kirjath-jearim. The house of Abinadab was on a hill, and for this reason probably was chosen as the resting-place of the ark. "They consecrated Eleazar," the son of Abinadab, that is, they chose and appointed him as a person consecrated to God for this service: he had to keep watch and guard over the ark. It is hence probable that the ark found shelter in the house of a Levite. "Nothing is said of Eleazar's consecration as priest. . . . He was constituted not priest, but watchman at the grave of the ark, by its corpse, till its future joyful resurrection" (Hengst., Beitr. III. 66 [Contributions to Int. to O. T.]). Why it was not carried back to Shiloh, is uncertain. The reason may be, that the Philistines after the victory in ch. iv. had conquered Shiloh, and now held it, as Ewald (Gesch. II. 540 [Hist. of Isr.]) supposes; though his conjecture that the Philistines had destroyed Shiloh together with the old sanctuary, is to be rejected, since it is certain that the Tabernacle afterwards moved from Shiloh to Nob, and thence to Gibeon, and that the worship in connection with it was maintained (1 Sam. xxi. 6; 1 Kings iii. 4; 2 Chron. i. 3). Or, it may be that, without a special revelation of the divine will, they were unwilling to carry the ark back to the place whence it had been removed by a judgment of God in consequence of the profanation of the Sanctuary by the sons of Eli (Keil); or simply that the purpose was first and provisionally to carry it safely to a large city as far off as possible, inasmuch as, in view of the sentence of rejection which had been passed on Shiloh, they did not dare to select on their own authority a new place for the Sanctuary (comp. Hengst., ubi sup., 49). It was not till David's time that the ark was carried hence to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi.).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Outside the sphere of His revelations in the covenant-people, the living God has not allowed the heathen nations to be without positive testimonies to His glory; He has, by severe chastisements, made them feel His might and power over them, when they, though they were the instruments of His punitive justice on Israel, did violence to His honor, and transgressed the limits assigned them.

2. The exact knowledge that the Philistine priests and soothsayers had of the punitive revelations of God against the Egyptians, and of the cause of them in the fact that that people hardened itself against Him, is an eminent example of His government of the world, which was closely interwoven with the history of revelation in His kingdom, and in which He penetrated with the beams of His revealed light the darkness of heathenism which surrounded His people, and made preparation for the revelation of the new covenant, which was to embrace the whole world. They were in such light to seek the Lord in their ways, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him (Acts xvii. 27).

3. The need of expiation, as well as the demand for it, is deeply grounded in the relation of man to the holy God; through sin against God's will and ordinances man finds himself in custody under His punitive justice, whence there is no redemption except by an expiation, failing which judgment is pronounced against him. All need of expiation and all means thereto, not only in the sphere of Old Testament revelation, but also in heathendom, are predictions of Christ, who made the universal and all-sufficient expiation for the guilt of the world.

4. The enemies of God's kingdom cannot and are not permitted to retain the possessions of God's sanctuary which they have gotten by robbery, but must bow beneath His mighty hand, and give them up, yea, restore them increased by counter-gifts on their part.

5. "Who can stand before the Lord, this holy God?" The more clearly God's holiness is seen in the mirror of His justice, the deeper and more energetic is the feeling of sin and unworthiness in the human heart before the holy God. The depth of the divine holiness becomes clearest and most sensible to sinful man in those of its manifestations, by which he sees God as "this holy God," that is, in the vigorous exercise of His holiness, of which he has experience in God's punitive justice directed against himself. But the deeper and more thorough the knowledge of one's own sin, the clearer the knowledge of the divine holiness. Yet, to sinful men the light of the divine holiness, which is always for him dulled, must not become intolerable, so that he shall avoid God's face, and abandon fellowship with Him; rather must sinful man bear this light which discloses all his sin and alienation from God, and seek to learn in it the ways of grace and salvation (Ps. li. 5, 6 [4, 5]). The contrary result of the revelation of God's holiness and justice leads to a sundering of relations between sinful man and Him, which by man's fault makes of no effect God's purposes of salvation.

* [Mr. Grove (Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. "Kirjath-jearim") suggests that the ancient sanctity of Kirjath-jearim (it was called Baalah and Kirjath-Baal, and may have been a seat of worship of the Canaanitish deity Baal) was the ground of the ark's being sent thither. He points out also a difficulty in its identification with Kuryet el Enab from the distance (ten miles over an uneven country) between it and Bethshemesh (Ain Shema), and further from the absence (so far as known) of a hill corresponding to that mentioned in vii. 1. But see Porter, p. 270.—Tr.]

6. "The blow which fell on the inhabitants of Bethshemesh in connection with the arrival of the ark, showed the people that they were not yet worthy of the fulfilment of the promise 'I dwell in your midst.' A condition of things had come about like that in the wilderness after the calf-worship, and in the Babylonian exile. The people must first become again inwardly God's people before the sanctuary could be again placed among them. In what had happened they saw God's factual declaration that He wished to dwell no longer in Shiloh" (Hengst. Beitr. 3, 48 sq. [Contrib. to Introd.]).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. [HENRY: Seven months Israel was punished with the absence of the ark, and the Philistines punished with its presence. . . . A melancholy time no doubt it was to the pious in Israel—particularly to Samuel—but they had this to comfort themselves with, as we have in the like distress, when we are deprived of the comfort of public ordinances, that, wherever the ark is, the Lord is in His holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven, and by faith and prayer we may have access with boldness to Him there. We may have God nigh unto us, when the ark is at a distance.—TR.] S. SCHMID: God cannot bear with His enemies too long, but knows how at the right time to save His honor.—Vers. 2, 3. J. LANGE: Bad men, when they are chastised for their sins, are commonly disposed not to recognize the true cause, but maintain that it all comes only from chance or from merely natural causes.—WUERTEMBERG BIBLE: Even false prophets and teachers often have the gift of prophecy: Num. xxiv. 2; John xi. 50, 51; Matt. vii. 22, 23. We must therefore not trust to outward gifts.—TUEBINGEN BIBLE: Even the heathen have recognized that the justice of God must be appeased if sin is to be forgiven.—Ver. 6. CRAMER: God is wonderful, and often even speaks His word through unbelievers and ungodly men (Num. xxii. 28). The word of God loses nothing in certainty, power, and worth, though it is preached by ungodly men (Phil. i. 15). [HALL: Samuel himself could not have spoken more divinely than these priests of Dagon: they do not only talk of giving glory to the God of Israel, but fall into an holy and grave expostulation. . . . All religions have afforded them that could speak well. These good words left them both Philistines and superstitious.—TR.]—Ver. 7. S. SCHMID: That the irrational brutes are under God's providence and control, even the heathen have recognized.

Ver. 9. STARKE: Great and wonderful is the long suffering of God, that He condescends to the weakness of men and suffers Himself to be tempted by them.—S. SCHMID: That in which men prescribe to God and tempt Him, cannot indeed bind God; but it binds the men themselves in their consciences, who prescribe to Him.

Ver. 13. S. SCHMID: Even in troublous times God does not cease to do good to His people.—CRAMER: When God brings forth again the light of His word, it ought to be recognized with the highest thankfulness.—Ver. 14. SEB. SCHMID: It is a great favor when God comes forward before men, and voluntarily appears among them.—Ver. 15. WUERT. BIBLE: When, after we have borne trouble and need, God again manifests to us His favor and help, we should not forget to be thankful.—Ver. 19. SEB. SCHMID: An untimely and venturesome joy God can soon turn into great sorrow.—The plague is fortunate that brings the impatient to repentance.—Ver. 20. BERLENG. BIBLE: When God so to speak only passes by us, through some temporary taste of His presence, it is a favor which He may also impart to sinners. But that He may make His abode in us, as He promises in so many passages of Holy Scripture, that He may be willing to remain with us and in us,—for that there is demanded great purity in every respect.—S. SCHMID: Better is quite too great a fear of God than no fear, if only it does not wholly take away confidence in God's mercy (Ps. cxix. 120).

SECOND SECTION.

The Reformation of Israel by Samuel.

CHAP. VII. 2-17.

- I. Israel's Repentance and Conversion by Means of Samuel's Prophetical Labors. Vers. 2-6.
- 2 AND it came to pass, while the ark abode in Kirjathjearim, that the time was long; for it was twenty years. [And it came to pass, after the day when the ark rested in K., a long time, even twenty years, elapsed], and all the house of Israel
 - 3 lamented after the Lord [Jehovah]; And¹ Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel, saying, If ye do return unto the Lord [Jehovah] with all your hearts, then put away

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 3. Erdmann makes the whole of ver. 2 protasis, and begins the apodosis with ver. 3, in which the result is not materially different from the translation given above, where the apodosis is made to begin with "a long time," so as to preserve as far as possible the peculiar Heb. connection by the conjunction "and."—TR.]

the strange gods [ins. from among you] and [ins. the] Ashtaroth¹ from among you [om. from among you], and prepare [direct²] your hearts unto the Lord [Jehovah], and serve him only; and he will deliver you out of the hands of the Philistines.
 4 Then the children of Israel did put away [ins. the] Baalim and [ins. the] Ashtaroth,
 5 and served the Lord [Jehovah] only. And Samuel said, Gather all Israel to Miz-
 6 peh [Mizpah], and I will pray for you unto the Lord [Jehovah]. And they gathered together to Mizpeh [Mizpah], and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord [Jehovah], and said there,⁴ We have sinned against the Lord [Jehovah]. And Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh [Mizpah].

¹ [Ver. 3. Syr. "fanea."—Ta.]

² [Ver. 3. The Heb. word (יָצַד) means "fix," "establish."—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 6. Syr. "because," as if the Heb. were יָצַדְנוּ, which gives in some respects a preferable sense, but it is not externally supported.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 2-4. The penitential return of the people from idolatry to the sole service of the living God. First, as to the union and connection of these sentences, their close union is so distinctly marked by the five-times occurring Waw ["and"] that to suppose (with Thenius) a gap between vers. 2 and 3 is unwarranted. And also the connection of the individual statements is opposed to such a view. In ver. 2 the phrase "after or from the day" [כִּי, Eng. A. V. "while"] marks a terminus a quo, on which follows the statement of a period of time, of a condition of things which lasted during* this period, and of a definite fact which introduced a new era. The point of time, from which reckoning is made, is the day when the ark rested at Kirjathjearim, important enough, after its long absence, to form the beginning of a new development. The following period of twenty years is characterized as disproportionately long by the added words "and the days grew many." [The sentence reads literally: "and it came to pass, from the resting of the ark in K., and the days were many, and they were twenty years"]. This is done to set forth more distinctly the condition of the people during this period, after the restoration of the ark. The condition of "all the people of Israel" is described by the words נִחַדְוּ, etc. [Eng. A. V. "lamented, etc."] according to the inner side of their life in relation to God. The meaning assigned to this verb (נִחַדְוּ) by Gesenius and others, "assembled," rests merely on Buxtort's "congregati sunt" (Lex. Chald., p. 1810), which is here and elsewhere an utterly incorrect translation of the Chald. Reflexive. Böttcher (Aehrenlese I., p. 111) translates: "the people of Israel quieted themselves, and (in quiet devotion) followed Jahveh," and sees in this the contrast to the "great disquietude" mentioned in ch. vi. 19 sq. But, in the first place, against this view is the phrase "after Jehovah," which, in this translation, requires the arbitrary insertion of another verb "and followed," without which insertion the expression "and quieted themselves after Jehovah" gives no sense. Further, the reference to vi. 19 sq. is irrelevant, because there it is only a local "disquietude" that is spoken of, not one that touched all the people. Rather, according to Böttcher's own remark—that נִחַדְוּ, in the first place, expresses remarkable breathing in general, heavy respiration, with sighing and lamentation, and hence נִחַדְוּ is used of wailing—we must accept as well-grounded the translation: "And sighed or lamented after the Lord." (So נִחַדְוּ is used in Mic. ii. 4; Ez. xxxii. 18).* The matter or the cause of the lamentation is determined by the connection between these words and the following, and by the external condition of Israel during this period. In respect to the latter, Böttcher asks: "Why should the Israelites still mourn after twenty years of immunity and quiet? And how could they have lamented 'after Jahveh,' unless it was that their sanctuary had to move again?" To which we reply by pointing to the uninterrupted oppression of the Philistine domination; for, though the Philistines had brought the ark humbly back (Then.), there is no conflict between this and ver. 3 "He will save you from the hand of the Philistines," since according to the narrative, the restoration of the ark had a definite religious ground, and noways involved the abandonment of the dominion which had been gained anew over Israel by the victory recorded in chap. iv. Indeed, it is expressly assumed in ver. 3 that this dominion had continued. It is, therefore, incorrect to suppose that the Israelites could have had cause and occasion for lamentation only by a new loss of the ark. Their external condition

* [The word נִחַדְוּ is variously treated by the ancient versions and commentators. The Greek renders ἐνδύασι "looked to" (perhaps a loose rendering, or possibly they read ὀνόματι [Schleusner]), and ἐπιστρέψασι "turned to" (general rendering, or perhaps from נִחַדְוּ), the Syr. has shedo "inclined to," and the Arab. aqbala "approached," both of which resemble the second Greek rendering. (It may be noted that Heb. נִחַדְוּ, the Niph. of which would mean "were led" "turned," is also used in the sense of "lamenting," Nah. ii. 8). The Lat. "requirit," and the Lat. transl. of Targ. "quieti fuerunt" (so Böttcher) suggest the stem נִחַדְוּ. As to the Chald. rendering (נִחַדְוּ) Böttcher's remark (quoted and accepted by Thenius and Erdmann), that Buxtort's translation "assembled" is without foundation, seems somewhat rash, for the 1thp. of this verb is employed in Jer. iii. 17 to render Niph. of נִחַדְוּ, and elsewhere (Jer. xxx. 21; xxxi. 22) is to be so rendered. (Levy, Chald., Lex.). Bashi explains the Heb. נִחַדְוּ as — כָּשַׁךְ "to draw," and so explains the Chald., but Abarbanel renders the former "lament." It would seem therefore that the word was read sometimes with נ, sometimes with כ, and that there was a strong disposition to render it by "assembled" (so Philippon and Davies); yet altogether it appears better to say with Maurer "prior significatio (lament) certior est."—Ta.]

* [Or we may just as well understand the repentance to have occurred at the end of the period, the intermediate time representing Samuel's labors in exhortation, the result of which was the repentance and conversion of the people.—Ta.]

under the weight of the Philistine rule was cause enough for sighing and lamenting.

The tone and content of the lamentation is more precisely stated by the context. The succeeding address of Samuel (ver. 3) "if ye return" (properly, "if ye are returning," "are in a state of conversion") and the mention of the sincere penitence of the people (ver. 6), presuppose a very deep sorrow and suffering, in which the foreign Philistine rule was felt to be a judgment of God, there being throughout the whole people a tone of feeling, which led them to return humbly to God, and to sigh and long after Him, now that He had turned away from His people: a return back to the living God, on whom they had often turned their back* to whom, however, they now, in consequence of His continuing judgments, again turned, just as, in the period of the Judges, return so often alternated with apostasy. The "lamenting after the Lord" therefore expresses the penitent disposition and decided direction of the innermost life of the people to their God, in which, with sorrow and pain over the self-incurred national misfortune under the rule of the Philistines, they seek God's mercy and saving help, He having hitherto turned His back on them, and forsaken them. The image is that of a child that goes weeping after its father or mother, that it may be relieved of what hurts it. An allusion to such a relation might perhaps be found in the expression "the whole house of Israel." S. Schmid: "The phrase 'lament after God' is taken from human affairs, when one follows another, and entreats him with lamentations till he assents. An example of this is the Syrophenician woman, Matt. xv."—After the lapse of the twenty years occurred this decided return of the whole people to their God. As, besides the constant pressure of the Philistine rule, no special calamity is mentioned, we must suppose a gradual preparation for this penitential temper of the people, which now, after the lapse of twenty years from the return of the ark, was become universal. The preparation came from within. By what means? by the prophetic labors of Samuel, from the summary description of which, according to their intensive power, their extensive manifestation, and their results in the whole nation (iii. 19-21), we may clearly see, that Samuel without ceasing proclaimed to the people the word of God. And as in ch. iii. 19 it is said that "none of his words fell to the ground," we shall have to recognize this penitential temper and this following after God with sighing and lamentation from the consciousness of being forsaken and needing help, as a fruit of Samuel's prophetic labors, which were directed to the relation of the innermost life of the people to their God. So by his influence the way was secretly and gradually paved for a reformation of the religious-moral life from within outwards. Certainly the lamentation of the people after the Lord was already the turning-point to a better God-ward direction of the inner life (against Keil); the important thing was only that the people should maintain this following after God, should anew devote themselves in heart firmly and decidedly to the living God, and should give an outward confirmation of their resolution by completely breaking with idolatry. This it is to which Samuel will yet further lead the people; on this it depended whether the help of the Lord should be obtained, and the true covenant-relation restored; in this was first thoroughly completed the reformation of the innermost life of the people; therefore the narrator describes this in detail in ver. 3 sqq., while he sets forth that preparation for the reformation only in its last stage of development, and even then merely by hints.

In ver. 3 Samuel's word of exhortation is in the first place described as addressed to the whole people (comp. iii. 20); we see him here in the performance of his prophetic work, which embraces all Israel. The content of this word is first a conditionally expressed preliminary: "If ye return to the Lord with all your hearts." Two things are here assumed and recognized as facts: 1) That a conversion to God had already taken place in the whole nation, and 2) that this conversion was a permanent condition, and that a permanent tendency towards God existed, as we may see from the Particip. "if ye are turning." He thus points back to what is said before of Israel's sighing and lamenting after the Lord. The phrase "with all the heart" involves an exhortation to what must be inseparably connected with conversion, if the latter is to be true and thorough, demands, that is, an internalizing and deepening of what is described in ver. 2 as lamenting after the Lord, in order that the right attitude of soul towards God may exist. Since the heart* is the centre and source of all movements of the inner life, as the bodily heart is the centre of the bloodflow and the life thereon founded, to turn "with all the heart" is so to turn one's self to God, from the central innermost kernel of the personal life, that is, of all thinking, feeling, desiring, willing, that the whole life shall be controlled by the fellowship with Him. To this deeply and thoroughly heart-felt turning, conversion of the whole inner life to the holy God, must now correspond the external confirmation of such a disposition. The demand is in conformity with the condition: "Put away the strange gods from among you," which is exactly the same with the demand that Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 2) once made of his house, and Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 23, comp. ch. xiv.) of his people. "After the return of the ark an earnest longing after the Lord arose among Israel. Samuel, availing himself of this, exhorted them to remove all idolatry from their midst" (Hengst., Beir. [Contrib.] I. 153 sqq.). The strange gods here spoken of, and called Ashtaroth and Baalim† (comp. ver. 4) are the gods of the Philistines, whose worship had gained entrance during the decline of the theocratic life and of the worship

* [In the Old Test. (as in the New) the word "heart" (לֵב) means not merely the seat or faculty of feeling, but the whole spiritual incorporeal nature, thinking, feeling, willing.—Tr.]

† [Baalim and Ashtaroth are the plurals of Baal and Ashtoreth (the plu. form signifying different deities of the name, or gods in general, or statues of the gods), ancient deities of Babylon and Assyria, and thence adopted by the Canaanitish nations. Baal, Bil, Bel, is "lord" or supreme deity. Ashtoreth, Astarte, Istar, was the goddess of war, and probably also the Assyrian Venus; the origin of the name is uncertain (it is not ascrip.). See Rawlinson, "Ancient Monarchies," I. 138, Schrader, "Die Keilinschriften u. das A. T.," p. 79 sq., Bunsen, "Egypt's Place in Univ. Hist.," Eng. Tr., IV. 340 sq.—Tr.]

* [Germ.: rückkehr zu ... Gott, dem man ... den Rücken gekehrt hatte.—Tr.]

of the living God, as indeed during the whole Period of the Judges the idol-worship of the heathen nations was constantly forcing its way in, wherefore the Lord gave them again and again into the hand of the latter (Judg. ii. 11, 13; x. 6, 7). The fellowship with the living God, to which conversion with all the heart leads, is incompatible with idol-worship, the putting away of which is therefore the sign of an upright and thorough conversion. As to the "from among you," comp. Gen. xxxv. 2; Josh. xxiv. 23.—To this negative side of the renovation of the religious life is to be added the positive, which is stated in the following two-fold demand. "Fix your hearts towards or in trust in God." The fix (אָפֿטײַטן) is opposed to the wavering, vacillating state of mind, which may always co-exist with sighing and lamenting, and sets forth, as an indispensable condition, the energy of religious-moral life, with which the man who turns heartily to God must put away everything opposed to God. The "to Jehovah" expresses the fact that movement and tendency towards God must be the aim, as it is the centre and source, of the whole inner life. In this tendency and movement it is required that there be stability, fixedness, steadfastness, proceeding from a heart which is immovably and unshakably fixed on Him alone. Thereby is the second requirement fulfilled: serve Him only; for the heart fixed firmly on Him excludes completely everything, consecration to which might bring it into opposition with God, and cause the surrender of the whole inner life; it attaches itself to God alone, and excludes all other gods.—The following words "and He will deliver you," etc., suppose that the hand, that is, the might and power, of the Philistines was on Israel, and that the foreign rule continued; they contain the promise of deliverance from the Philistine power, holding it out as the consequence of the previously described conversion. The foundation-thought here is this: Re-establish your covenant-relation to God by honest and thorough conversion, manifested by the putting away of all idol-deities, and then God also will turn to you, so that you shall no longer have to lament after Him, and will again announce His relation to you as your covenant-God by saving you from your enemies.—Ver. 4 witnesses that, in these circumstances also, no word of Samuel fell to the ground. Two things are stated: the complete removal of the worship of the strange gods, and the restoration of the exclusive worship of the living God. On the one hand, the designation of the strange gods is here enlarged (see ver. 3) by the addition of Baalim to Ashtaroth; it is thus intimated that there was a complete and comprehensive purification of the religious life and service. On the other hand, the word "only" is repeated from ver. 3, and it is thus expressly said, that the covenant-God alone and exclusively became the object of worship, while it is at the same time involved that the general service of Jehovah had not ceased, but that the worship of strange gods had existed only along with Jehovah-worship.

According to the preceding explanation of the section, vers. 2-4, its particular parts stand in close connection with one another, and there is nothing at all which compels us to suppose either a gap in the narrative, or interpolations of foreign matter, in order to make a connection. The second supposition is adopted by Ewald, who conjectures that vers. 3 and 4 are interpolated, assuming without ground that they break the connection; the first is adopted by Thenius, who assumes a gap between ver. 2 and ver. 3, of which he himself, however, says, that it is possibly as old as our Book, since it is not filled up by any of the old translations. Since, now, he throws the alleged defect back on the original authorities which are here used, the question is, whether his grounds for its existence are tenable, apart from the fact that the context and the narrative exhibit no gap in any essential point. When the Philistines brought back the ark, their dominion over Israel, as Keil properly remarks, was not thereby given up; its continuance is assumed in the words "He will save you," and did not need to be expressly mentioned. As little need was there for express mention of an apostasy to idolatry, when it is stated that Samuel exhorted them to give it up; for in this period, as in that of the Judges, it was a usual thing for idolatry to make its way into Israel, and besides, there had been no complete apostasy from the living God. On the incorrect presupposition that, in consequence of the unmentioned apostasy, Israel had again been given into the hand of the Philistines, Thenius supposes that Samuel, in this time of stress, had been chosen Judge, and that the account of this choice, which, however, is implied in the words: "And Samuel judged Israel in Mizpah," has fallen out. Against which Keil remarks well: "The appearance of Samuel as Shophet [Judge] does not imply that the assumption of this office must have been before mentioned. In general there was no formal assumption of the office of Judge, least of all in the case of Samuel, who had already been recognized by all Israel as an authenticated prophet of Jehovah (iii. 19 sqq.)." Bunsen: "There is no gap here, but a chronological statement."

Vers. 5, 6. The day of penitence and prayer in Mizpah exhibits the whole people there assembled as sincerely penitent, and Samuel as their representative with his petition in the presence of the Lord. The content of these verses is the carrying on further of what is related in vers. 3-5. After idolatry has been expelled, and the worship of God alone restored, Samuel takes another step forward: he calls at Mizpah an assembly of the whole people, through their elders and representatives, for an exclusively religious purpose; they are to declare and set forth as a body the sincere, hearty conversion of their individual members, while he, Samuel, as their head chosen by God, will perform the priestly function of prayer for them before the Lord. "His purpose in this," as Keil well remarks, "could be only to bring the people back to the proper relation to their God, and so to pave the way for their deliverance from the bondage of the Philistines." This assembly was, however, by no means intended, as Keil supposes, to make immediate preparation for the war of deliverance against the Philistines. That the people did not regard the assembly as a military one, and that Samuel therefore had not spoken of such a one, is clear from ver. 7, where it is said, that the children of Israel were afraid of the Philistines, when they heard that their lords had marched forth to fight with them. The Philistines, indeed, thought the assembly a military one, and opened hostilities in the opinion that the assembly was called to make an attack on them, so that Samuel was compelled to consecrate the people to battle against the Philistines, though they had been called together for a purely religious end (ver. 8 sq.), and to go out with them to battle against the Philistines. The place of assembly is Mizpah ("watch-tower") in the Tribe of Benjamin on its western border, north of Jerusalem, and to be distinguished from Mizpeh in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 38). According to Robinson, Tobler, v. d. Velde, Furrer, it is the present Nebi Samuil ("Prophet Samuel"), five hundred feet above the elevated table-land, two thousand, four hundred and eighty-four feet above the level of the sea, near Ramah and Geba (comp. 1 Kings xv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6), visible from Jerusalem, 1 Mac. iii. 46 (κατέναντι Ἱερουσαλήμ, "over against Jerusalem," comp. Jos. Ant. XI. 8, 5), affording an extensive prospect as far as the sea and the transjordanic mountains. The present place is, however, neither the ancient Shiloh, as some hold, nor Ramah of Samuel, as others suppose. The latter view, which Ewald also (Gesch. II. 583) is inclined to maintain, has been completely set aside by Robinson (II. 356-362 [Amer. ed. I. 458-460]).* Samuel chose this place for the assembly of the people, not, as Keil supposes, because, "being on the western border of the mountains, it was the fittest place at which to begin the struggle against the Philistines," but because it was one of the holy places of the land, and, being in the middle of the territory on an extensive plateau, and thus protected against the attacks of enemies, was specially suited for such assemblies. While Shiloh, from Joshua's time on, was the permanent seat of the Sanctuary, the Tabernacle remaining there, even after the removal of the ark, till its transference to Nob (xxi. 6), there were, especially in the central part of the land, several other places, "which, for various reasons, from before or after the time of Moses, had a certain sanctity, and where smaller altars were found" (Ew. II. 583); thus, Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 25, 26), famous from the Patriarchal time on account of its conquest by Simeon and Levi, and as the resting-place of Joseph's bones (Gen. xxxiv.; xlvii. 1)—Gilgal, sacred as the first camping-place of the people after the passage of the Jordan, as the memorial-spot of God's saving help, and as the place where the old covenant-fellowship with God was renewed by the circumcision and passover which were anew ordained by Joshua (Josh. v. 2-12—especially 15), and Bethel, consecrated as a holy place by Jacob, and temporarily the seat of the ark during the civil war between Benjamin and the other tribes (Judg. xx. 18, 23, 26; xxi. 2). At that time Mizpah—which also was one of the holy places (Judg. xi. 11)—was the place where Israel assembled "unto the Lord" (Judg. xx. 1), to save the honor of the people against the outrage of the inhabitants of Gibeah, and resolved on the war against Benjamin. In this place, consecrated to the worship of God, called therefore in 1 Mac. iii. 46 an ancient τόπος προσευχῆς ["place of prayer"] for Israel, remarkable by its historical antecedents (Judg. xx. 21), and favorably situated in the middle of the land, Samuel appointed an assembly of the people. "In the wearisome oppression of a trying time the people gathered at last, like frightened chickens around the hen, with more and more accord about Samuel, in whom they learned to trust; he calls an assembly of the people, which willingly allows itself to be guided, instructed, warned and directed by him" (Ew. II. 510).—The words "and I will pray," etc., exhibit the highest end which Samuel had in calling this assembly: "I will pray for you to God." That is, his purpose is to bring the people back to their God and renew the old covenant-fellowship with him by the intercession of prayer, by a priestly representation of the people before God by prayer and intercession. The object of the prayer is not mentioned, but, from the connection, can have been nothing else than the manifestation of the divine grace and mercy in the forgiveness of sins and the blotting out of the guilt of sin. Thenius: "For your sins up to this time, that they may be forgiven you." That deliverance from the hand of the Philistines was not, at least not immediately, the object of the intercession, is clear not only from the phrase "for you" (לָכֶם), since otherwise Samuel must have used another expression, so as to include himself, but also from the following words, which can be referred only to the deep consciousness of sin and of guilt which was awakened in the people.—In ver. 6 the symbolic act of drawing and pouring out water does not set forth the confirmation of an oath, as some have supposed: "as the poured out water cannot be gathered again, so our word shall not be taken back"—for this signification of the act must in that case have been somehow intimated in the narrative; nor does it appear from the context that an oath, and what sort of a one, was to be confirmed. The water, drawn and poured out, can no more indicate simply tears, as Grotius and others think. Others, again, referring to chap. i. 15, explain it of prayer (Clericus: "to pour out the heart before God, i. e., to pray to Him from the heart, and open the heart to Him"); but they overlook the fact that then it would have been necessary to annex a precise statement of this meaning to the symbolic use of water. Nor can the pouring out of water be regarded as signifying purification from sin, or as the sign of their hope that their sins were now blotted out (so O. v. Gerlach), since the water is not here designated at all as a means of purification, and there is no mention of an act of purification. It is rather a symbolical act of penitence that is here described. Water, which is poured out and disappears, is a frequent image of the state of dissolution and melting away which characterizes human life, especially on its inner side, and is used sometimes of particular aspects of life, sometimes of the whole personality. It is thus used to set forth moral dissoluteness and ethical godlessness in Gen. xlix. 4; * comp. Jude ver. 13. It further denotes the destruction, the perishing of all the happiness and prosperity of the physical life, Ps. lvi. 8; 2 Sam. xiv. 14; and often also the complete dissolution and breaking up of the psychical-spiritual life in fear and spiritlessness, Josh. vii. 5, in care, anxiety, deep misery, Ps. xxii. 15. The latter application of the image is the one here employed, and (since it is the act of pouring out water "before the Lord" that is described) in the sense that the people make confession and present themselves before the Lord in deepest consciousness of their wretchedness and in sadness for their sin and the misery that flowed from it. Comp. Lam. ii. 19.—That we have to regard the action as symbol of the heart and the whole inner life poured out "before the Lord,"—that is, completely carried away and dissolved by the feeling of guilt and consequent misery,—is clear from what follows. The fasting which was performed the same day is the sign of the repentant, humble soul, bowed down before God, the expression of grief in sincere penitence, designated in the Law as "afflicting the soul" (עֲנִיָּה נַפְשׁוֹ), and ordained, as symbol of the humiliation of the whole people in repentance and penitence, for the festival of the great Day of Atonement, Lev. xvi. 29, 31; xxiii. 27, 32; Num. xxix. 7. The word DAY ["fast"], which denotes the form of "wearying and chastening the soul," is not found in the Law, comp. Isa. lviii. 3 sqq. The bodily deprivation which the man imposes on himself expresses his prostration and humiliation of soul. To the twofold confession of sin and guilt, thus set forth in the symbolical act of pouring out water and fasting, answers, as indication of the contrition thus expressed, the verbal confession: "We have sinned against the Lord." The "there" (שָׁם) is not to be understood of time, to which it never refers, but of the place, Mizpah. The person against whom the sin is committed is here introduced by the Prep. לְ ["to," "against,"] as in chap. ii. 25. While the two symbolical acts set forth their state of grief and suffering on account of the disturbance through sin of their relation to God, and their consequent misery, these words point not only to sin as the source and object of this prostrate and humbled feeling, but also to the proper essence of sin as opposition to the holy will of God as Lawgiver and Judge of His people. It is a grand and touching self-presentation of the whole people before their God in true, thorough penitence and conversion, which is here (vers. 3-6) portrayed in its separate features. Samuel's position in this picture exhibits him in his prophetic work, which takes deep hold on the whole people, and brings them back to the Lord; his words to the people, here reported, form the culmination of all preceding announcements of God's word, and complete the work of the conversion of the people to the Lord, with which he had as faithful prophet hitherto occupied himself. The people, who repent before the Lord in this powerfully moving way, are the fruit of his previous prophetic work. And Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpah.—These words cannot, with Keil, be considered as embracing the whole work just before narrated; that is, as showing that Samuel's judging consisted in "Samuel's calling the people together to Mizpah for humiliation before Jehovah, effecting there by his intercession the forgiveness of their sins, bringing back the divine favor, and so restoring Israel's true relation to their God." All this belongs to Samuel's work as Prophet of Israel, comp. iv. 1. Since the statement "Samuel judged Israel in Mizpah" follows immediately on the narration of the solemn act of repentance instituted by Samuel, and afterwards (ver. 15) his judicial work is again mentioned in connection with all that precedes, we must here understand by this "judging" something else than those labors in connection with the religious relation of the people to their God. After Samuel had restored this last by his prophetic work, his succeeding labors were those not only of a prophet, but also of a judge. His judicial office is here named for the first time. The connection in which it occurs shows how it proceeded from and was founded on his prophetic office. It is not, however, the beginning or origin of this office that is here mentioned, as if the Verb (שָׁפַט) meant "he became judge," but Samuel is here set before us in the exercise of his judicial position. It is too narrow a view of this to restrict it to judicial decisions proper, or (as Thenius does) to the punishment of individuals (R. David: "he punished every one according to his offence"). We must rather regard Samuel's judging as a directing and ordering, in accordance with the above act of repentance, of the inner affairs of the people, who were by that religious act inwardly again purified. It consisted both in the administration of right and justice according to the law of the Lord, and in government proper, in the wise carrying out of measures that looked to the good of the people. In their history hitherto the deliverance of the people from the power of their enemies belonged also to the judicial office; with the Judges this, as a judicial function, generally came first, and then followed the direction of internal affairs. With Samuel it was the reverse. The deliverance of the people from the dominion of the Philistines began under his rule as Judge, after he had, as Prophet, brought them back into their right relation to God, and ordered and purified them in their inner life.

* [Stanley (Sin. and Pal., Ch. IV.) identifies Nebi Samuil with the "high place of Gibeon" (1 Kings iii. 4), and Mizpah with Scopus, which, he says, meets all the requirements of the notices of Mizpah, "the assemblies held there by Samuel—the fortification of it by Asa with the stones removed from 'the Mount' of Benjamin (1 Kings xi. 25)—the seat of the Chaldean governor after the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. xl. 6)—the walling place of the Maccabees (1 Mac. iii. 46)." Mr. Grove (Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Mizpah) also adopts this view, laying stress on the carduus of 1 Mac. iii. 46, for which, he thinks, Mizpah is too far from Jerusalem (five miles). Scopus is described by Josephus (B. J. 2, 19, 4) as on the north quarter of the city, seven stadia therefrom, and is now generally held to be "the broad ridge which forms the continuation of the Mount of Olives to the north and east [west?], from which the traveler gains his first view of the Holy City." This view seems probable. Dr. Hackett, however, remarks, in a note to Mr. Grove's Art., that Nebi Samuil "is so marked a feature of the landscape, that it may very justly be said to confront (κατέναντι) the observer as he looks towards it from Jerusalem."—Ta.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The course of true penitence and conversion consists in mourning after God, in a sorrowful seeking after Him, in a complete devotion of the heart to the Lord, which attests itself by a decided breaking with the power of evil, in energetic putting away of everything opposed to God, and in humble subordination of the will to the sole authority of the Lord (vers. 2-4).

* [In Gen. xlix. 4 the image is the boiling up of water—denoting rash and heedless passion.—Ta.]

2. After the ark had lost its significance as theocratic centre of the national life, and Shiloh had ceased to be the central seat of the national sanctuary, after, too, the priesthood, with the rejection of the sanctuary, had lost its prominent middle place between God and the people, then the prophetic office, in the person of Samuel filled with the Spirit of the Lord, took this position, in order to restore the true covenant-relation between God and the people. For this it was necessary that Israel, confessing and repenting of their sin against the Lord, should return in sincere penitence to their God, and put away the abomination of heathendom, which they had taken to them, that God should turn again to His people with grace and mercy, and that the whole national life should assume a completely new form in a righteous disposition and walk, whereby God's holy will would be performed. The point of time to which we have now come is the great turning-point between the Period of the Judges which was just ending and the new era of the theocracy which was just beginning, when Samuel in a threefold point of view forms the centre of the people, and in his mediating position between them and their covenant-God, becomes the instrument and founder of a new life: 1) as Prophet, in the power of God's Spirit, by which he was filled, he announces to the people the word of the law, in order to lead them to repentance and conversion, and to a life again devoted to the Lord in faithfulness and believing obedience; 2) he appears in the exercise of the priestly function, praying and sacrificing, between God and the people, in order to turn His grace and mercy to the people, that the return of God to His people in the manifestation of His help may correspond to the return of the people to God; 3) as Judge, he governs and directs the whole national life, which was inwardly united and bound fast together on the basis of a religious-moral elevation and renewal, in order that they might be consecrated to the Lord in all their members and in all the affairs of life, and serve Him in right and righteousness.—“Samuel's judicial work not only proceeded from the prophetical, but was constantly guided by it. For we may presume not only that he gave legal decisions with prophetic wisdom, but also that in general he conducted the affairs of the people as a man who had the Spirit of the Lord.—Samuel showed himself here (vii. 12 sq.) a hero by the spiritual power of faith and prayer (Heb. xi. 32 sq.). This latter may be called an inreaching of his priestly work into the judicial. For certainly it is especially the business of the priest to pray for the people.” (Nägelsbach, Herz. R.-E. XIII. 397.)

3. The reality of a thorough conversion to the Lord with all the heart must be shown by an earnest and decided breaking with everything that is opposed to God, especially with everything to which the heart clings as its idol. The heart must not desire to be divided between the service of idols and the service of God, and cannot be divided between two mutually exclusive powers. “No one can serve two masters,” Matt. vi. 24. God the Master lays claim to the whole heart; He requires that its service be given to Him alone and exclusively in the obedience of faith. Exclu- siveness in respect to the living God, who claims all honor exclusively for Himself, is of the essence of revealed religion; and in this exclusiveness is grounded its universality, everything must serve and be subject to Him alone.

4. The true welfare of a people's life is based on its proper attitude towards the living God. As defection from Him brings calamity and destruction on all the inward and outward possessions of the national life, infringement or suppression of freedom by foreign power, disruption of unity by strife and discord, so only by return to Him can true inward freedom and elevation and true unity be secured. And, when the national life, in consequence of defection from God, is covered with moral abominations, purification from the defilement of sin must proceed from the innermost life by the complete and thorough conversion of the hearts of individuals to the Lord. Sanctification, purification, unification of the whole national life to a life consecrated to God, serving Him alone, happy under His rule in His kingdom, exists only so far as the individual life has its root in the right attitude of heart towards God, and there stands firm and immovable.

5. The fixed heart (“fixing [Eng. A. V. ‘preparing’] the heart unto the Lord”) is, on the one hand, the attestation of the conversion and purification of the inner life, and, on the other hand, the condition, on which alone the whole life can remain permanently and exclusively in the Lord's service, temptations to defection from Him be victoriously withstood, and idolatry in the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh and the pride of life be thoroughly put away. The exhortation “confirm, prepare your hearts,” does not exclude, but presupposes the truth “it is good that the heart be confirmed by grace” [Heb. xiii. 9].

6. Samuel's intercession for the whole people was a priestly act, whereby he, with the same right as Moses, who also was not officially a priest, could come into God's presence as representative of the people. “He, too, who by His personal dignity stands near to God, the Prophet, may thus approach with intercession and expiatory acts for his people. So Moses, Ex. xxxii. 10 sq., 32; Nu. xiv. 12 sq. (Lev. viii. 15, 19, 28). But it pertains to the office of the priesthood, and may be done by them, therefore, in the whole body of their official acts.” (Schultz, Attest. Theol., 189 sq.).

7. The confession “We have sinned against the Lord,” made by the whole people, presupposes the correct knowledge of the essence of sin as the transgression of His holy will, involves the admission that they were worthy of punishment before the Lord, to whom man is bound by his sin as a debtor, and is the condition of help and salvation from the living God. As the individual can regain his proper relation to the Lord only by such humble, sincere, penitent confession, so for the people in general there is no other way out of grievous sin-wrought corruption and self-incurred misery to a new national life in the fear of God but this way of a common abasement before the Lord, with reflection on their relation to the holy God, and the penitent confession “Against thee have I sinned.” Comp. Ps. li. 6 [4].

8. Fasting is one of those outward things which are an expression and therefore a symbol of the sorrowful spirit and humble disposition before the Lord, like rending the garments, strewing ashes on the head, and putting on a coarse garment (comp. Joel ii. 12, 13). Later this religious-morally significant fasting was expressed by a word (DAY) which indicated its form, namely, bodily privation; but in the Law itself we find only a phrase which expresses its significance, namely, "afflict the soul" (Lev. xvi. 24, 31; xxiii. 27, 32; Nu. xxix. 7; comp. Isa. lviii. 3 sq.; Ps. xxxv. 13 sq.).—Legal provision for fasting by the whole people was made only in the single case of the Day of Atonement, when they were as a body thus to manifest the penitent, humble disposition, without which they could not hope for forgiveness of their sin, Lev. xvi. 29. Elsewhere fasting is merely allowed by Moses.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 3. OSIANDER: Those who wish to be shielded against misfortune or delivered from it, must begin, not with weapons of warfare, but with true repentance, Jer. iii. 12.—CRAMER: True repentance is the best reformation in religious matters, Ezra ix. 6 sq.; x. 1 sq.—HALLE BIB.: Conversion that is not with all the heart, is only a hateful hypocrisy, Deut. iv. 29.—S. SCHMID: Only that is a true conversion which does away with all ungodliness, and especially with idolatry, and thus prepares the heart to serve God alone, Hos. vii. 16.—[HALL: How happily effectual is a word spoken in season! Samuel's exhortation wrought upon the hearts of Israel, and fetched water out of their eyes, confessions and vows out of their lips, and their false gods out of their hands.—TR.]

[Ver. 4. "And served Jehovah only." It is a mournfully common thing among those who have knowledge of the true God to be striving to combine His service with that of idols, or of the world. Not only is it seen here, but in Elijah's exhortation: Either Jehovah or Baal, whichever is God, but not first one and then the other (1 Kings xviii. 21); in our Lord's great word: "No man can serve two masters. . . . Ye cannot serve God and Mammon" (Matt. vi. 24); and in that of the last surviving apostle: "Love not the world. . . . If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him" (1 John ii. 15). Yet how many of us to-day are endeavoring, perhaps with painful earnestness, to love both the Father and the world, to serve both God and Mammon. The many cases of this sort do far more weaken our current Christianity than the few cases of gross vice.—TR.]

Vers. 5, 6. [HENRY: Ministers should pray for those to whom they preach, that God by His grace would make the preaching effectual. And when we come together in religious assemblies, we must remember that it is as much our business there to join in public prayers, as it is to hear a sermon.—TR.]—STARKE: No intercession, not even that of Christ Himself, can stand a man in stead, if he is not truly penitent.—LEGALATURES and CONGRESSES, if any thing good is to be done in them, should be opened with penitence and prayer.—S. SCHMID: Then especially is it proper to pray for our neighbor, when he is so conducting himself as to afford hope that, according to the divine plan, the prayer may be heard.—If candid confession of sin is wanting, the repentance is not honest.

Ver. 2. The blessing of national mourning in a time of universal distress: 1) Penitent recognition of the national sin which has occasioned the distress; 2) Painful experience of the mighty hand of the Lord which has inflicted it; 3) Sorrowful, penitent seeking after the Lord's consolation and help, which ends in finding.

Ver. 3. Samuel's sermon on repentance to Israel when again seeking the Lord's face: 1) The instruction as to what true repentance is (if ye return with all your hearts); 2) The demand for that by which this repentance shall be really and fruitfully shown: (a) put away the strange gods from among you, b) direct your hearts unto the Lord, and serve Him only; 3) The promise of deliverance and help (and He will deliver you).

Ver. 4. Proofs of genuine and hearty repentance by actions: 1) By doing away with all idolatry of worldly life; 2) By serving the Lord only in a life exclusively consecrated to him.

Ver. 5. Intercession to the Lord for the salvation of others: 1) Its exercise unlimited, the individual as well as the whole people being its subject (comp. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2); 2) Its answer conditioned by the need of salvation and the capacity for salvation of those for whom it is made.

Ver. 6. The penitent confession—"We have sinned against the Lord.": 1) Who has to make it (the individual, family, congregation, school and church, the whole people); 2) How it is to be made (with attestation of its truth and uprightness by deeds of repentance); 3) What are its consequences (forgiveness of sin, deliverance from the power of the wicked one, salvation).

II. Israel's Victory over the Philistines under the Lead of Samuel. Vers. 7-14.

7 AND when the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together to Mizpeh [Mizpah¹], the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel. And

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 7. Mizpah is written always with the Art.—"the watch-tower"—the significance of the name continuing to be felt. It is every where Mizpah, except in Josh. xviii. 26. Mizpeh was a town in the plain of Judah.—TR.]

- 8 when the children of Israel heard it, they were afraid of the Philistines. And the children of Israel said to Samuel, Cease not to cry unto the Lord [Jehovah] our 9 God for us,² that he will save us out of the hand of the Philistines. And Samuel took a sucking lamb, and offered it³ for a burnt-offering wholly unto the Lord [Jehovah], and Samuel cried unto the Lord [Jehovah] for Israel, and the Lord
 10 [Jehovah] heard [answered] him. And as Samuel was offering up the burnt-offering, the Philistines drew near to battle against Israel; but [and] the Lord [Jehovah] thundered with a great thunder [noise] on that day upon the Philistines, 11 and discomfited⁴ them, and they were smitten before Israel. And the men of Israel went out of Mizpeh [Mizpah], and pursued the Philistines, and smote them
 12 until [as far as] they came [om. they came] under Bethcar.⁵ Then [And] Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh [Mizpah] and Shen,⁶ and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying [and said], Hitherto⁷ hath the Lord [Jehovah] helped us.
 13 So [And] the Philistines were subdued,⁸ and they [om. they] came no more into the coast of Israel; and the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] was against the Philistines all
 14 the days of Samuel. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel, from Ekron even [om. even] unto Gath; and the coasts thereof⁹ did Israel deliver¹⁰ out of the hands of the Philistines. And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites.¹¹

III. Summary Statement of Samuel's Judicial Work. Vers. 15-17.

- 15, 16 AND Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. And he went from year to year¹² in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh [Mizpah], and judged Israel 17 in all those places.¹³ And his return was to Ramah,¹⁴ for there was his house; and there he built an altar unto the Lord [Jehovah].

² [Ver. 8. Literally: "keep not silence from us, from crying," etc. Comp. Ps. xxviii. 1.—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 9. The Kethib has the shorter personal suffix, the Qeri the longer.—Tx.]

⁴ [Ver. 10. קָרַע—Qal Imperf. of קָרַע with pronom. suffix.—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 11. For Beth-car Chald. has Beth-sharon, "house of the plain;" and Syr. Bethyashan, "house of age." The second seems a corruption or clerical error; the first is apparently translation of Bethcar, "house of the plain." Whether there is here a reference to the plain of Sharon is uncertain.—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 12. Shen, always with the Art.—"the tooth;" that is, "the crag,"—whether name of a town or a rock is not clear. Syr. has Yashan, "ancient," and Sept. τῆς ὀρέας, both apparently reading [שן] in the Heb., "old,"—from which, however, we can hardly infer that Shen was an inhabited place (Wellhausen).—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 12. Hitherto—that is, "up to this time," not "up to this place."—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 13. Literally: "humbled." Erdmann: gedemüthigt.—Tx.]

⁹ [Ver. 14. That is, of the cities; not (as Sept.) of Israel.—Tx.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 14. Syr. wrongly: "the Lord delivered Israel," etc. The reference here is to Israel's military prowess.—Tx.]

¹¹ [Ver. 14. Erdmann has, by typographical error, Ammonites.—Tx.]

¹² [Ver. 16. כָּךְ, from כֵּן, "from," and נָךְ, "sufficiency"—"as often as."—Tx.]

¹³ [Ver. 17. Sept.: "sacred places"—an exegetical paraphrase; or, they read מקדשים instead of בָּקוּמוֹת. For Ramah Sept. has Ἀρραμὰι. See on chap. i. 1.—Tx.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 7-14. Israel's victory over the Philistines under the lead of Samuel.—The last words in ver. 6 referred to Samuel's judicial work in Mizpah, after the general assembly for repentance and prayer had been held with the whole people. The express mention of this judicial work at the end of the narrative in vers. 2-6 confirms the view (which is besides suggested from the whole connection) that this popular assembly was not concerned with military preparations for an attack on the Philistines, but only with arranging the internal affairs of the national life, the religious-moral and civil, according to the divine law. We have seen how Samuel there acted at the same time as prophet and judge, and how the function of priest connected itself immediately with that of prophet. It now falls to his lot, like the earlier judges, to fulfil his judicial mission against foreign enemies also, and show himself the leader of the people against their oppressors; this he does indeed in quite a different manner, not sword in hand, but wielding the weapons of prayer, and gaining for his people a victory, from which dates the history of Israel's deliverance from the hands of the Philistines.—Ver. 7. The Philistines hear of the assembly of the children of Israel. Either they supposed it to be a military one, knowing nothing of its real end (Berl. Bib.), or they well knew this end, and wished to surprise the Israelites in their unarmed condition (Joseph.). Their princes went up, since the assembly was held on the high land, and on Mizpah, which was still higher than this.—The following description of the behaviour of the children of Israel and the conduct of Samuel, there being no hint of arming against the Philistines, or of an attempt by Israel to make a military movement against the advancing foe, shows clearly that the Israelites were not in readiness for such an attack, and had made no military preparations. Not the arms of Israel put the Philistines to flight, but the prayers of Samuel, and the thunders above their heads manifesting the might of the Lord, the terrors of which the Philistines had not forgotten since their experience with the ark.—When the Israelites heard of the advance of the Philistine princes with their hosts, they were afraid of them. This is inconceivable, if the assembly was held to equip themselves inwardly and outwardly for the war of freedom against the Philistines. In ver. 8 the people press Samuel to beseech God with unceasing and instant crying for their deliverance out of the hand of the Philistines. The solicitude corresponds with Samuel's previous promise to pray to the Lord for the people in this assembly (ver. 5). The object of the petition, salvation out of the hand of the Philistines, had already been promised by him on the condition of sincere return to the Lord (ver. 3). Now the moment of fulfilment has come. The condition is complied with, the children of Israel beseech Samuel: "cease not to cry to the Lord, our God." They have found their God again, after whom they had till now sighed and mourned. Samuel, having by his intercession first restored the covenant-communion between the penitent people and the pardoning God, now intercedes for the deliverance of the people, and thus performs the judicial act which, for the earlier judges, was coincident with their entrance into their office. Samuel had first, as prophet and judge, to lead the people to a thorough reformation of their inner life, before he could begin the work of external deliverance. He began it as judge and as priest at the same time, as is further related in ver. 9. Samuel represented the people in twofold priestly function before the Lord, with offering and prayer. The offering consisted of a young tender lamb, which was still nourished with milk; though, according to the Law, Lev. xxii. 27, it must have been seven days "with its mother." A burnt-offering (עֹלָה) is offered as sign of the complete consecration of the whole man, here of the whole people, to the Lord in the consecration and devotion of the whole life to Him, as is set forth by the fact that the whole animal (חֵלֶב Lev. i. 9) was burnt in the fire of the altar, and so ascended [the Heb. word means "that which ascends"], in distinction from the offerings which were only partially burnt on the altar. This is expressed by the addition of the word "wholly" (כָּלֵל) which is also used of the vegetable and meat-offerings which were to be wholly burned (Lev. vi. 15). In poetic language (Deut. xxxiii. 10) it stands for עֹלָה, burnt offering, while here, as in Ps. li. 21 [19] (there connected by "and") it is an explanatory addition to indicate that the burnt-offering is a whole-offering, the offerers not receiving a part of it, as in the Shelamim [peace-offerings] or Zebachim [slain-offerings]. The idea of the whole-offering is thus specially again expressed, because the resolution to devote themselves to the Lord fully and undividedly, a devotion conditioned on the whole-hearted conversion and the purpose to serve the Lord alone (ver. 3 sqq.) is expressed by the presentation of the burnt-offering. In accordance with the people's demand (ver. 8) Samuel combined with the offering earnest, instant prayer for them.—And the Lord answered him, is the declaration that the prayer for help and deliverance was heard, comp. Ps. iii. 5; iv. 2. [See also Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1, for the estimation in which Samuel's power in prayer was held.—Tr.] The answer of the Lord is given in the occurrence related in ver. 10 sqq. in the factual help of the Lord, not merely in the thunder (Keil), though the latter was the cause of the consternation and confusion of the Philistines. The vividness of the description is noticeable: Samuel is engaged in offering the sacrifice, during which the Philistines approach nearer and nearer, Israel is waiting on Samuel's prayer for the Lord's help, terrific peals of thunder follow one after another, thereby the Philistines are confused and confounded (comp. Jos. x. 10), they take to flight, their plan is frustrated.—Ver. 11. The men of Israel now advance from Mizpah, and pursue them as far as under Bethaar = "House of the lamb or of the meadow, the field." Jos. Ant. VI., 2, 2: Corrae. A place called Corrae lay between Jericho and Bethshean; V. Raumer (4 ed., p. 178, R. 158 sq.) thinks that it could not be this place. It remains at least doubtful.—After this victory was won, a monument was set up in remembrance of the help of the Lord there experienced. Samuel set a memorial stone between Mizpah and Shen ("Tooth," either a prominent rock-formation (comp. ch. xiv. 4) or a place situated on a crag near Mizpah). The name Ebenezer ["stone of help"], which he gives it, is at the same time explained: Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.—This was the thanksgiving in the name of the whole people as answer to the Lord's answer, the accompanying explanation of the act of thanks. The "hitherto" points to the fact that this victory did not complete the deliverance from the yoke of the Philistines. [Wellhausen would explain Ebenezer as = "this be witness (וְזֵכֶר) that Jahveh hath helped us."—Tr.].—Vers. 13, 14, state the happy results for Israel of this victory over the Philistines, gained without arms, the wonderful gift of God's hand. First is mentioned the humiliation [Eng. A. V. "subdued"] of the enemy, in consequence of the manner in which this victory was gained.* It is then declared that, in consequence of this victory, the Philistines made no more such incursions into the coasts of Israel. The following words: "and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel," are improperly restricted to the period of his active judgeship (Lyra, Brent, Nägelsb., Herz. XIII. 403 sq.); since Samuel, according to ver. 15, judged Israel all the days of his life, they must be understood of his whole life-time. During this time the Philistines continued to occupy the land (ix. 16; x. 5; xiii. 5, 13), though the occupation was territorially restricted. The continuance of the Philistine oppression is presupposed in these words themselves: "the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines," comp. xiv. 52. After the victory at Mizpah they could gain no more territory, and in Israel's battles with them, however much of the land they still held, the hand of the Lord was mighty against them so long as Samuel lived, therefore during Saul's reign also, since Samuel died only a short time before Saul; the help of the Lord against these mightiest foes of the land continued during Samuel's life-time. See Introduction, p. 9 sq. Thus is intimated the mediating position which Samuel in this respect also assumed between God and the people of Israel as their representative and intercessor.

* [The word here employed (נָחַל) meaning originally "to humble," is also frequently used in the sense of "subdue" and it is better so to understand it here, and not, as Erdmann takes it, in the sense of a humiliation from their perception of the miraculous intervention of God.—In this sentence the words "of the enemy" are not in the German, probably from typographical error; the sense requires some such insertion.—Tr.]

Ver. 14. A further consequence of the victory was the regaining of the cities which belonged to the land of Israel with the territories appertaining to them, lying on the Philistine frontier from Ekron to Gath. These two cities are not included, but indicate on the Philistine side the direction and limits of the space in which the Israelites regained the lost cities and territories. The sense is: "Israel recovered their cities which lay on the Philistine borders, reckoning those borders from Ekron to Gath" (Seb. Schmid). Finally, a consequence of the abasement of the Philistines was the peace between Israel and the Amorites. These "are mentioned here, because they were in the region in question next to the Philistines the mightiest enemies of Israel, comp. Josh. x.; Judg. i. 34 sq." (Thenius). According to the latter passage (Judg. i. 34) they "especially forced the Danites back out of the plain into the mountains" (Keil).*

Vers. 15-17. Summary view of Samuel's judicial work. Ver. 15 gives the duration of his office; that the latter dates from the day of Mizpah (Keil) is by no means certain; but its precise commencement is not stated. All the days of his life denotes the period up to his death. His sons were his assistants up to the establishment of the kingdom. During Saul's government he kept unchanged the position of a prophet, who employed the authority of the divine will for the direction of the national life, the mediating priestly position between God and the people; but he also, as last Judge, held in his hands the highest control of the theocracy and the kingdom.

Ver. 16 sqq. The way in which he fulfilled the duties of the office. He went round every year, holding court at three places: Bethel, Gilgal and Mizpah. These were at the same time holy places, in which Jehovah was worshiped, where therefore the people could be more easily brought together in large assemblies, and those who desired legal decisions could more easily meet Samuel. Ewald's supposition that Samuel visited one of these places at each of the great annual feasts is properly objected to by Thenius, with the remark "that at that time there was hardly a regular feast." The question whether this Gilgal was the old place in the Jordan-valley between the Jordan and Jericho (Josh. iv. 19), or the one southwest of Shiloh near the Jerusalem-road, now Jiljilia (Deut. xi. 38; 1 Kings ii. 1), must be decided in favor of the former, for the reason that Samuel would certainly choose for such assemblies the place which was consecrated by its historical association and its religious importance. The order of the names here does not warrant us in deciding (Keil) in favor of the other, the northern Gilgal.—כָּל־הָאֵלֶּה [Eng. A. V.: "in all those places"] must be taken as local Accus., and וְהָאֵלֶּה as Acc. particle.

It cannot here mean "near," "it is used indeed to express the proximity of one place to another (Judg. iv. 11; 1 Kings ix. 26), and still oftener of things or persons to persons, but not that things or persons are close by places, for which we find only בְּ or בֵּ (Josh. xxiv. 26; Judg. xviii. 3)" (Böttcher).—Ver. 17. From his circuits Samuel returned always to Ramah. Here was his permanent residence as householder. In respect to his work there, we have two brief statements: 1) he acted as judge, when he was not absent on his circuit. (On בִּשְׁפָּט, Ew., Gr., § 138 a: "the š of the Perf. becomes š only in pause, except once in 1 Sam. vii. 17.") His judicial labors were therefore uninterrupted. 2) There he built an altar to the Lord.—The priesthood had declined, the central sanctuary was broken up; instead of the local and the institutional-personal uniting point in the high-priest, Samuel forms from now on for the religious life and service also of Israel the personal centre consecrated by God's choice and guidance. His priestly work continues along with his judicial, both embraced and supported by the prophetic. Besides the already-existing holy places, where prayer and sacrifice were offered to God, he makes his residence a place of worship. The direction and furtherance of matters of religious life and worship is in his hands. Having effected a thorough reformation of the deep-sunken theocratic life on the basis of the renewed relation between God and the people, he now proceeds vigorously, as judge, priest and prophet, to build it up and finish it on this foundation.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. On the significance of the burnt-offering as a whole offering, see on ver. 8. It is the sacrificium laetificum [laetific sacrifice, or sacrifice of service], since, by the complete consecration of the animal, it denotes, for the individual and the nation, the complete consecration and devotion of the whole life to the Lord. The burnt-offering has a propitiatory significance for the offerer in a general way (not, however, in respect to particular offences which require special expiation), on which see Oehler in Herz., R. E. X. 635. The fresh, tender, sucking lamb, which was used in the offering at Mizpah, was intended, perhaps, to set forth how the people, new-born by their conversion, should, in the first freshness of their new life, dedicate themselves wholly and undividedly to the Lord, to be His property and serve Him. The conjunction of the burnt-offering with prayer is founded on the fact, that both express the same disposition of complete consecration of the heart to God.

* [The name "Amorite" is given to various tribes on both sides of the Jordan, and either the race was a widely extended one, or the name is sometimes used in a general way for the inhabitants of Palestine. The word is now generally held to mean "mountaineers" (Num. xiii. 29), and is by some supposed to be a local, rather than a tribal designation, but in Judg. i. 34 the Amorites seem to be dwellers in the plain. Apparently they had been at war with the Israelites before Samuel's victory.—Ta.]

2. The sacrificial service, together with prayer, was conducted for the whole people by Samuel (as formerly by Moses, Ex. xvii. 9; xxxii. 25 sqq.), though he was simply a Levite, and not a priest; for he acted as mediator between God and His people by virtue of His prophetic character and work alone. He therefore filled the office of priest in an extraordinary way, sentence of rejection having been passed on its legal incumbents. On Samuel's further priestly work in offering sacrifices at the holy places of the land, comp. ix. 12; x. 8; xi. 15; xiii. 8 sqq.; xvi. 2 sqq. Samuel exercised the priestly function of prayer and intercession elsewhere, xii. 16 sqq.; xv. 11, 35.

3. In the period of the Judges the prophetic work was completely (with the single exception of Deborah, Judg. iv. 4 sqq.) separate from the judicial, and the former was as good as absorbed in the latter; both are again united in the person of Samuel, in that he thus shows how the external guidance of the covenant-people can and ought to rest essentially only on an internal, religious-legal foundation. "As he is thus the founder of the kingdom in its genuine theocratic form, so is his priestly work also the preparation for the flourishing condition to which the cultus attained in the Davidic-Solomonic period; it was necessary to break with the law-opposing priesthood of Eli and his race, in order that the establishment of a true priesthood, as it was new-formed under David and Solomon, might become possible" (Hävern., Vorles. über bibl. Theol.). The basis for this was given in the Law itself by its teaching of the ideal priesthood, which was to find its realization in the whole people, comp. Ex. xix. 6: "Ye shall be to me a kingdom of priests." Like Moses, who during the seven days of the consecration of the ordinary priests, acted as priest (Lev. viii.), and with priestly petition interceded for the people with the Lord (Ex. xvii.; xxxii. 31, 32; Ps. cvi. 23), so Samuel also, on the ground of this ideal priesthood, whose essential elements were sincere union and communion with God, the might of faith, and the gift of the Holy Spirit and the power of prayer, had the divinely-given right, under existing circumstances, when the institution of the priesthood had sunk and left a terrible gap, to discharge the duties of the ordinary priesthood in sacrifice and prayer; and the first exercise of this priestly calling, to represent the people before God with intercession and prayer, was at the request of the people themselves who through him had been turned to God. See the two-fold testimony of the Scripture to Samuel's power in prayer, Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1, and comp. Sir. xlv. 19 sqq. As to his subsequent praying, see viii. 6; xii. 16-23; xv. 18.

4. The monument between Mizpah and Shen represents an important epoch in the history of Samuel. What he, and through him the Lord, had hitherto done for Israel stamped him as the great reformer of the Theocracy, and secured the restoration of a united national and theocratic life in its fundamental characteristics, and on the most essential foundations. The victory over the Philistines supplied the capstone. In all that happened up to this victory and the consequent freer position of the people over against the world without, he recognizes the Lord's help, setting forth this recognition in the humble acknowledgment "hitherto," etc., while he at the same time points to the future, and shows the need for further help from the Lord in respect to what is still to be done. The stone Ebenezer is a monument of those revelations of the might and the grace of the living God, occasioned by sin and penitence, wandering and return, which are the impelling power in the whole political history of the Old Covenant.

[Wordsworth: What a contrast between the event now recorded at Ebenezer, and that recorded as having occurred a few years before at the same place (1 Sam. iv. 1)! At that time Israel had the ark with them, the visible sign of God's presence; but the Lord Himself had forsaken them on account of their sins; . . . the priests were slain, and the ark was taken. Now they have not the ark, but they have repented of their sins, and Samuel is with them, and the Lord hearkens to His prayers, and the Philistines are smitten. . . . Hence it appears that outward ordinances are of no avail without holiness, and that God can raise up Samuels, and endue them with extraordinary graces, and enable them to do great acts, and give comfort and victory to the Church of God by their means.—Tr.]

5. On the total significance of Samuel's position and work at this epoch of the development of the Old Testament history, see the remarks in the preceding exegetical elucidations.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 7-14. Need teaches to pray: 1) Whom? Only him who (a) lets himself be drawn by need with penitent heart and believing mind unto God, in order to seek help from Him, and (b) despairs of helping himself by his own power, and relies only on God's hand; 2) How? (a) heartily, (b) unceasingly; 3) With what result? (a) God hears, (b) God delivers from the need.

[Ver. 7. HENRY: 1) How evil sometimes seems to come out of good. The religious meeting of the Israelites at Mizpah brought trouble upon them from the Philistines, which, perhaps, tempted them to wish they had staid at home. . . . So when sinners begin to repent and reform, they must expect that Satan will muster all his force against them. 2) How good is at length brought out of that evil. Israel could never be threatened more seasonably than at this time, when they were repenting and praying . . . bad policy for the Philistines to make war upon Israel at a time when they were making their peace with God. . . . Thus He makes man's wrath to praise Him.—Tr.]

Vers. 8-10. The power of believing prayer in threatening peril: 1) As an earnest pressing to the heart of God in view of the greatness of the peril; 2) As a constant supplication for His help in view of the tardiness of help in the midst of peril; 3) As a perfect self-devotion to the Lord in view of the ever-increasing peril.

Vers. 7-12. The life of prayer in communion with God: 1) Calling on the Lord; 2) Answer from the Lord; 3) Thanksgiving to the Lord.

[Ver. 9. ("And Samuel cried . . . and the Lord answered him"). Samuel's power in prayer. 1) Asking such great things; 2) Answered so promptly. Note that Samuel was himself the child of prayer. Also that "the forty years' domination of the Philistines over Israel (Judg. xiii. 1) could not be overthrown by the supernatural strength of Samson, but was terminated by the prayers of Samuel" (Wordsworth). As Abraham was the great pattern of faith and Job of patience, so Samuel appears to have been always afterwards regarded as a grand example of power in prayer, Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1.—Tr.]

Ver. 12. The cry, Ebenezer, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us, a cry 1) Of thankful recollection of past experiences of the Lord's help (hitherto!); 2) Of humble testimony before the Lord, that nothing has been done by our power, and that His help alone has maintained and preserved our life; 3) Of confident hope, in view of further need of help to the same end.

"Here I raise my Ebenezer, Hither by Thy help I'm come;
And I hope, by Thy good pleasure, Safely to arrive at home."

[These well-known lines are given as equivalent to a German hymn which Erdmann refers to but does not quote.—Tr.]

[Samuel a pattern to religious Reformers: (1) In early life, amid evils he could not cure, he yet gained the confidence of all (chap. iii. 19-21; iv. 1; xii. 2-4). (2) After long waiting he saw and seized the opportunity of effecting a reformation (vii. 2, 3). (3) He put the inward first, but insisted also on outward reform (vers. 3, 4). (4) He did not rely on preaching alone, but was much in prayer (vers. 5, 8, 9). (5) He gave all the glory to God (ver. 12). (6) He strove by wise and faithful administration to make the reformation permanent.—Tr.]

SECOND PART. SAUL.

CHS. VIII.—XXXI.

FIRST DIVISION.

ESTABLISHMENT BY SAMUEL OF THE ISRAELITISH KINGDOM
UNDER THE RULE OF SAUL. CHAPS. VIII.—XII.

FIRST SECTION.

The Preparations. CHAPTERS VIII. IX.

I. The Persistent Desire of the People after a King conveyed through their Elders to Samuel.

CHAP. VIII. 1-22.

- 1 And it came to pass, when Samuel was old, that he made his sons judges over
- 2 Israel. Now [And] the name of his first-born was Joel,¹ and the name of his [the]
- 3 second Abiah²; they were judges in Beersheba. And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre,³ and took bribes, and perverted judgment.
- 4 Then [And] all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to
- 5 Samuel to Ramah, And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk
- 6 not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations. But [And]
- 7 the thing displeased Samuel when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the Lord [Jehovah]. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Samuel,
- 8 Harken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee; for they have not rejected thee,⁴ but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.
- 8 According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken [forsaking]⁵ me

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 2. That is "Jehovah is God"—the only God (יְהוָה — יְהוָה — יְהוָה for יְהוָה, Jahveh), a name borne by several persons in O. T., and said by Schrader to occur on the Assyrian inscriptions as name of a king of Hamath, Jahu, borrowed, no doubt, from the Israelites.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 2. That is, "my father (or, simply, father) is Jah, Jahu, Jahveh, Jehovah." The word יְהוָה means the "second," not of Samuel, but of Joel.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 3. נָפֶלֶט is sometimes "profit" in general, as in Gen. xxxvii. 26, but usually "unjust gain," as here. The Targ. renders "mammon (mammon) of deceit," see Luke xvi. 9. In Talmud and Targ. mammon means "money," "riches," and Augustine (Quest. Evan. 34) says that it was the Punic word for "money." It is not found in Heb., and its origin is obscure.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 7. Better: "not thee have they rejected, but me have, etc."—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 8. Literally: "according to all . . . they have done . . . and have forsaken me and served, etc." The 1st consec., according to Heb. usage, introduces an appositional explanatory phrase, properly rendered by Eng. particip. On the Sept. insertion of "to me" after "have done," see Exeg. Notes in loco.—Tr.]

- and served [serving] other gods, so do they also [om. also] unto thee [ins. also].
- 9 Now therefore [And now] hearken unto their voice; howbeit [om. howbeit] yet protest solemnly unto [solemnly warn]⁶ them, and show them the manner⁷ of the king that shall reign over them.
- 10 And Samuel told all the words of the Lord [Jehovah] to the people that asked
- 11 of him a king. And he said, This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you: He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen [put them in his chariot and on his horses⁸], and some [they]
- 12 shall run before his chariots [chariot]. And he will appoint⁹ him captains over thousands and captains over fifties, and will set them [some he will set] to ear [plough] his ground, and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war and [ins.
- 13 the] instruments [equipment] of his chariots. And he will take your daughters to be confectionaries [perfumers],¹⁰ and to be [om. to be] cooks, and to be [om. to be]
- 14 bakers. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, 15 even [om. even] the best of them, and give them to his servants. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his
- 16 servants. And he will take your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and your 17 goodliest young men [oxen],¹¹ and your asses, and put them to his work. He will take the tenth of your sheep; and ye shall be his servants. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which [whom] ye shall have chosen you, and the Lord [Jehovah] will not hear you in that day.
- 19 Nevertheless [And] the people refused to obey [hearken to] the voice of Samuel.
- 20 And they said, Nay, but we will have a king over us; That [And] we also may [will] be like all the nations, and that [om. that] our king may [shall] judge us,
- 21 and go out before us, and fight our battles. And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and he rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord [Jehovah]. And the
- 22 Lord [Jehovah] said to Samuel, Harken unto their voice, and make them a king. And Samuel said unto the men of Israel, Go ye every man unto his city.

⁶ [Ver. 9. וְעַתָּה is restrictive-adversative, "yet," "nevertheless;" $\text{וְ$ is the subst. conjunct "that," introducing the following affirmation. The verb means literally "testify to them," the word "solemnly" well expresses the force of the Inf. Abs.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 9. מִשְׁפָּט is "judgment," then "law," then "right, privilege," but also "manner," and this last is preferable here, because Samuel states what the king will do, not what he will have the right to do. His "manner" will be the "law" as determined by himself.—Tr.]

⁸ [Ver. 11. The word signifies either "horses" or "horsemen;" the former better suits construction and context.—Tr.]

⁹ [Ver. 12. Lit. "and to appoint," Inf. dependent on the verb "take" in ver. 11. The vss. vary greatly in the designation of the officers here mentioned, and some critics would read (with Sept.) "hundreds" instead of "fifties," as being the more usual and natural. This is, however, a ground of objection to the change (from the harder to the easier), and there is no sufficient reason for abandoning the Heb. text.—Tr.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 13. The word רוֹקֵחַ is used to express the preparing of fragrant ointments (Ex. xxx. 22-35), and the noun is here best rendered "ointment-makers," so Sept., Vulg., Erdmann, Philipsson, and others. The Syriac renders "weavers" (websters) as if it read רוֹקְמָ , and the Chald. has the general designation "servants" (comp.

Arah. ragaka, "provide for"). The Heb. text is to be maintained. The Eng. word "confectionary" (=confectioner) formerly included the making of ointments and spiced preparations, see Ex. xxx. 35, Eng. A. V., but would now convey an incorrect idea here.—Tr.]

¹¹ [Ver. 16. The reading "oxen" instead of "young men" (בָּקָר for נְעָרִים) seems required by context, and is given by Sept., and adopted by Erdmann and others. Maurer admits the bearing of the context, but keeps the text on the ground of the טָלִיִּם ; but טָלִיִּם is applied to oxen in Gen. xii. 26, and to flesh of beasts in Ex. xxiv. 4 (in ver. 5 Ezek. uses בָּקָר of the flock), and may be here understood of oxen.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

VER. 1-3. Samuel's sons, Joel and Abiah, associated with him as judges over Israel.—The reason here given, why Samuel made his two sons judges, is his age, for which his work, as sketched in vii. 15-17, had become too hard. The two sons, Joel and Abiah, are also mentioned in 1 Chr. vi. 13 [Eng. A. V. ver. 28], where, however, in the masoretic text, the name of the first has fallen out.* [These names may be taken as indications of the father's pious feeling. The first, Joel, "Jehovah is God," was, not improbably, a protest against the idolatry of the Israelites. Hebrew names thus frequently serve as historical finger-signs, pointing out prevailing tendencies or modes of feeling at certain times. Comp. Ichabod (1 Sam. iv. 21, 22), Saul's sons Meribbaal (Mephibosheth) and Ishbaal (Ishbosheth), David's sons (2 Sam. iii. 2-5), Manasseh the King, Mulachi. The name of Samuel's second son, Abiah, "Jehovah is father," expresses trust in the fatherhood of God, an idea which hardly appears in O. T. except in proper names. "It records, doubtless, the fervent aspiration of him who first devised it as a name, and, we may hope, of many who subsequently adopted it, after that endearing and intimate relationship between God and the soul of man, which is truly expressed by the words 'father' and 'child.' It may be accepted as proof that believers in ancient days, though they had not possession of the perfect knowledge of 'the mystery of God and of the Father and of Christ,' or of the doctrine of the Holy Ghost, nevertheless 'received the Spirit of adoption,' that God 'sent forth the Spirit of His Son into their hearts, whereby they cried, Abba, Father'" (Wilkinson, Personal Names in the Bible, page 169 sq.).—Tr.—They acted as judges in Beersheba, "Well of the seven (that is, lambs), or of the oath" (Gen. xxi. 28-33), the spot consecrated by the Patriarchal history (Gen. xxii. 19; xxvi. 23; xxviii. 10), in the extreme south of the country, on the border of Edom, now Bir-es-seba ["Well of the seven, or of the lion"] (Robins. I. 337 [Amer. Ed. I., 204 sq.]).* Josephus (Ant. VI., 3, 2) adds, "in Bethel" after "judges," thus intimating that one son acted in the North, the other in the South, both together comprising the whole country in their judicial work, according to which Samuel had wholly retired; but against this is the previous statement that Samuel exercised his office "all the days of his life," and therefore his sons could only have been appointed by him assistants in the performance of duties which his old age rendered too arduous for him. Ewald's opinion that this addition of Josephus "suits so well," that "he must have gotten it from a still better account in the histories of the Kings," is a mere surmise, over against which we may put with equal right the opinion that Josephus was indebted for this addition (Nägelsb.) to his "very lively fancy" (Then.), and that the Masoretic text fits in so well with the whole historical situation, that the integrity of the passage cannot be assailed. Since, on the one hand, our attention is directed to Samuel's age,† which compelled him to make his sons judges, while yet he did not lay down his office, and, on the other hand, the desire after a firm and energetic royal power was based on the dangerous condition of the country by reason of foreign enemies, it appears that Samuel, in order to lighten the burden, set his sons as judges in a part of the land, and in the part which occasioned the greatest difficulties and exertions, that is, the southern. Ver. 3 affirms that this measure was a failure. In consequence of the division of the judicial power between the father and the sons, the authority of the office was so debased in the eyes of the people by the crimes of the latter, as the sacerdotal dignity was by the sons of Eli, that the desire for a higher authority to guide the people found utterance.—They took bribes and perverted judgment.—They thus transgressed the law of the Lord (Ex. xxiii. 6, 8; comp. Deut. xvi. 19), and destroyed the foundation of the judicial office as the office for the administration of right and justice. Their official unfaithfulness is contrasted with their father's walk: they walked not in his ways.—This fact or judgment alone is given, and Samuel is not, like Eli, charged with the blame of his sons' misconduct. The words: they inclined or turned aside (namely, from the ways of their father*) after lucre, exhibit the roots of their wicked official procedure in a mind directed to gain. Luther gives the correct sense: "they turned aside to covetousness."

* [The Vashti in 1 Chr. vi. 13 (28) is the same word as that rendered "second" in this passage.—Tr.]

Vers. 4-9. The demand for a king—vers. 4, 5, how it was made, ver. 6, how it was received by Samuel and carried before the Lord, vers. 7-9, how he, and through him the people, was instructed concerning it by the Lord.

Vers. 4, 5. "All the elders of Israel" assemble in Ramah, Samuel's judicial seat. Thus the whole nation is in motion against the existing condition of things; it appears before Samuel officially and formally in the body of its representatives. Two things they adduce as ground of the demand which they wish to make: 1) Samuel's age, that is, the lack of vigor and energy in the government, which, with his advancing age, made itself perceptible to the whole nation, and was not supplied by the assistance of his sons, which he had for that reason (ver. 1) called in; 2) the evil walk, the misgovernment of his sons, the moral and legal depravation which they produced. The demand is: Make us a king (Acts xiii. 21); and two things are added: 1) in reference to his judicial work: he was to judge; the royal office was to take the place of the judicial, and so the meaning of the demand is a complete abrogation of the hitherto existing form of government under judges; 2) in reference to the royal-monarchical constitution of the surrounding nations: the Israelitish constitution is to be like that (פֶּן). After the words "as all the nations," we must supply "have such a one." Israel will not be behind other nations in respect to the splendor and power of royal rule. The accordance of the last words: "like all the nations" with Deut. xvii. 14 is to be noted.—In ver. 6 two things are said of Samuel's conduct in reference to this demand. First, that he received it with displeasure (נִכְזַּר), properly: "the thing was evil in the eyes of Samuel"). But the cause of his displeasure is expressly said to be, that they made the demand: "Give us a king to judge us." He did not, therefore, take it amiss that they blamed the wrong-doing of his sons, nor that they referred to his age, and thus intimated that he was no longer able to bear the whole burden of the office, while his sons did evilly. What displeased him was the expression of desire for a king as ruler. How far and why this demand was the occasion of his displeasure appears from the connection. From the words of Samuel (xii. 12) we see 1) that the people, pressed anew by the Ammonites, demanded a king who should give them the protection against enemies, which was not expected

* [Beersheba (a mere watering-place in the Patriarchal time) was probably at this time a place of some importance from the trade between Egypt and Asia. It was re-settled after the exile, was a large village with a Roman garrison in Jerome's time, and now exhibits only scattered ruins. Two large, and five small wells are still to be seen. The name does not occur in the New Test. See Robins. ubi sup., Smith's Bib. Dict., s. v.—Tr.]
† [If Samuel was born B. C. 1146, he would be sixty years old at the third battle of Ebenezer, 1066, and now, say ten years later, seventy years old. This would leave twenty years for Saul's reign up to B. C. 1066, when David was made king in Hebron.—But it is possible that these dates may have to be put forward some years.—Tr.]

* [Or, from the ways of truth.—Tr.]

from the aging Samuel; 2) that, in this demand, they left out of view the kingdom of God in their midst, turned away their heart from the God who had hitherto as their almighty king so often saved them from the power of the enemy, and put their trust in an external, visible kingdom as means of safety and protection against their enemies, over against the invisible royal rule of their God, whose instrument, Samuel, they rejected. The same thing is expressed in the words of Samuel, ch. x. 18, 19. In both passages, however, Samuel's discourse is an echo of the word of God Himself, imparted to him in answer to the question which he had asked God in prayer. This, namely, is the second important factor in Samuel's procedure: He prayed to the Lord. Deeply moved by the sin which, in this demand, the people committed against the Lord as their king (and this was the real occasion of his displeasure and unwillingness in reference to the desired revolution in the political constitution, which was connected with the rejection of himself as representative and instrument of the divine government), he carried the whole matter before the Lord in prayer, and, in this important crisis also of the history of his people, who would no longer be guided by him, showed himself the humble, consecrated man and hero of prayer.—In vers. 7-9 we have the declaration, in which the Lord instructs Samuel as to the question of his prayer, and at the same time decides on the demand of the people. Prayer was the best means by which Samuel could learn the purpose and will of God in reference to this demand of the nation. The words: Hearken to the voice of the people, express the divine fulfillment of the people's request. Here a discrepancy might be supposed to exist between this statement and Samuel's reception of the request in ver. 6. But the appearance of such a discrepancy vanishes before the following considerations. An earthly-human kingdom could not at all, merely as such, stand in opposition with the revealed theocratic relation of the covenant-God with His people, in which the latter (Ex. xix. 5 sq.) were to be His property and a "kingdom" of priests, and He was to be their king (comp. Ex. xv. 18: "Jehovah is king forever," with Ps. xlv. 5; lxviii. 25; lxxiv. 12; x. 16). For, if hitherto under the Theocracy chosen instruments of the Lord, like Moses, Joshua and the Judges, were the leaders of the people, governing them by His law, in His name and according to His will, then also a leader and governor of the people, depending solely on God's will, governing solely in His name, and devoted to His law, intended and desiring to be nothing but the instrument of the invisible king in respect to His people, might rule over them with the power and dignity of a king. A king, as God's instrument, chosen by God the royal ruler of His people out of their midst, could no more stand opposed to the fundamental idea of the theocracy, than all the former great leaders and guides of the people, who were chosen by Him for the realization of His will. This conception of the absolute dependence of an earthly-human kingdom in Israel on the invisible King of the nation is expressed in the so-called law of the king in Deut. xvii. 14-20. As to the theocratical idea of a king, comp. Gen. xvii. 6, 16; xxxv. 11; Num. xxiv. 17. There is little occasion to suppose a contradiction between this idea of a theocratically-conditioned Israelitish kingdom and the Theocracy in Israel, when we consider the need of a unifying power for the whole national life within and without, as in Gideon's time against the Midianites (Judg. viii. 22, 23), and now, in the time of the aged Samuel, both against the arbitrary rule and legal disorder of his sons, and against the Ammonites (xii. 12) and the Philistines (ix. 16). If Israel's desire for a king had been in itself opposed to the theocratic principle, Samuel would not have carried the matter to the Lord in prayer, but would have given a decided refusal to the Elders, and the divine decision would not have been: "Hearken to the voice of the people, make them a king" (ver. 22). But the reason of Samuel's necessary displeasure at this desire clearly appears from the judgment passed on it in the divine response: they have not rejected thee; but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.—In their request for a king, they did not assume the attitude of heart and of mind to the Lord, which was proper for them as His people, towards Him as their sole and exclusive ruler. They put out of sight the divine rule, to which, in view of its mighty deeds in their history, they ought to have trusted implicitly, that it would extend to them the oft-verified protection against external enemies and maladministration of the office of Judge; this protection they expect from the earthly-human kingly rule, instead of from God; instead of crying to God to give them a ruler according to His will, they demand from Samuel that a king be made according to their will and pleasure; instead of their holy civil constitution under the royal rule of their covenant-God, they desire a constitution under a visible kingdom, as they see it in the heathen nations. This was a denial of that highest truth which Gideon once (Judg. viii. 23), in declining the royal authority offered him, held up before the people: "The Lord is your king." In rejecting Samuel's government, they rejected the rule of God, and, straying from the foundation of covenant-revelation to the standpoint of the heathen nations, they put themselves in opposition to the royal majesty of God revealed among them, and to the high calling which they had to maintain and fulfil in fidelity and obedience towards the holy and almighty God as their king and ruler. In ver. 8 is shown how this disposition and conduct had been exhibited in the history of the people from God's first great royal deed, the deliverance out of Egypt, till now, and how this new demand addressed to Samuel was only the old sin showing itself, the faithless and apostate disposition which had exhibited itself again and again up to this time. "With such a disposition the desire for a kingdom was a despising and rejecting of Jehovah's kingdom, and no better than forsaking Jehovah to serve other gods" (Keil, in loco). (It is not necessary to insert a Pron. "to me" after "they have done" (Thenius), since this is involved in the following words: "they have forsaken me"). In ver. 9 Samuel is again expressly instructed to yield to the desire of the people; but there is added the twofold injunction: 1) bear witness against them, that is, attest and set before them their sin and guilt against me, and 2) announce to them what kind of right the king, who according to their desire shall rule over them like the kings of the heathen nations, will claim in the exercise of unlimited and arbitrary power, after the manner of those rulers. By the first the people are to be made to see how, in the disposition of heart in which they demand a king, they stand in opposition to the absolute, holy royal rule of their God, and to their own theocratic calling. The fulfilment of the people's desire after a king which had its root in an apostate and carnally proud temper, is in accordance with the same fundamental law of the Old Covenant, by which the holy God, on the one hand, judges Israel's sin as a contradiction of His holy will, but at the same time, on the other hand, uses it as a means for the realization of the ends of His kingdom, as an occasion for a new development of His revealed glory. The other injunction, to set before the people the right [or, manner] of the king they demanded, is intended to exhibit to them the human kingdom apart from the divine rule, as it exists among the other nations, with all its usual and established despotism, as the source of great misfortune and shameful servitude, in contrast with the freedom and happiness offered to the people under the despised Theocracy. Comp. ver. 18.

Vers. 10-18. The right of the king.

Ver. 10. And Samuel told all the words of the Lord to the people.—This declaration of Samuel was therefore essentially an exhortation to repentance, which set before the people that, by their desire for a king, they had principally rejected God's sole rule over them. Clericus: "Therefore God declares that He was despised by the Israelites, inasmuch as they were not content with the theocracy, which had heretofore existed."—The mishtat (מִשְׁטַח, "right," "manner") is here what pertains to the king in the maintenance of courtly state, and what he claims from his subjects, according to the custom of heathen rulers and to kingly usage; for it was with their eyes on the kings of other nations that the people had demanded a king. Joseph.: τὰ παρὰ τοῦ βασιλέως ἐσόμενα, morem regis et agendi rationem ["the manner of the king"]. Maurer: id quod rex suo arbitrio vivens impune faciet ["what the king, following his own will, would do with impunity"]. Clericus: "It signifies the manner of his life (ii. 13; Gen. xl. 13; Judg. xiii. 12),—not legal right (jus), for several unjust things are afterwards mentioned, such as were practiced by the neighboring kings, whom in fact the Hebrew kings afterwards imitated." Sept. δικαίωμα ["legal right or ordinance"]. The words: he will take your sons . . . his chariot, present a single comprehensive statement of the employment of the young men of the people in the royal court. The first sing. of the text "in his chariot" is to be retained (against Then., who, after Sept., Chald., and Syr., reads the Plu., and refers it to war-chariots), and the chariot is in both cases to be understood as the court and state-chariot, the service of which is described in accordance with the actual manner of oriental courts. In this there were 1) Chariot-drivers, who are referred to in the words "he will put them in his chariot," 2) Riders, indicated by the phrase "on his horses" (עָלֵיהֶם is here "saddle-horse," as in 1 Kings v. 6 [Eng. A. V. iv. 26*])—"he will put them on his saddle-horses," and 3) Runners—"and they will run before his chariot." It is a description of the usual royal equipage of chariots and horses. Comp. 1 Kings v. 6 [iv. 26], 2 Sam. xv. 1.—Ver. 12 refers partly to military service, partly to agricultural service. "And to set"† depends on "he will take;" the twice-used לָּ ["for himself"] indicates his purely selfish aim. The "captains over thousands and fifties"‡ represent the whole army in all its grades between these highest and lowest positions. For the charge of the "captain over fifty" comp. 2 Kings i. 9-14.—All the tillage of the royal possessions must be performed by them; it is described by its beginning and end (ploughing and reaping). To this is added the work of the royal artificers for war and peace.—Ver. 13. The daughters of the people will be employed in the service of the royal household. [Women were, in ancient times, cooks, bakers, and preparers of ointments and spices. This last work embraced the preparation of highly-seasoned food, meats and drinks, and of perfumed oils for anointing the body. The household of oriental princes is even now organized on a gigantic scale, and there are indications that a similar luxury was practiced by the nations who lived about the Israelites. All this, as well as the use of horses and chariots, though not absolutely forbidden in the Law, was contrary to its spirit.—Tr.] Vers. 14 sqq. describe the arbitrary dealing of the king with the property of the people in order to enrich his courtiers. עֲבָדֵי is properly "a eunuch," then any court-officer.—Vers. 16 sqq. The king will use the serving-classes also, men-servants, maid-servants, and cattle, for himself, and will take the tenth of the small cattle [sheep, etc.]. For "young men" (נָעָרִים) we must read "cattle" (בָּקָר) with Sept. (τὰ βοῦκόλια), since the young men are already included in the sons in ver. 11 [and the men-servants in ver. 16.—Tr.], and here both the juxtaposition of servants and animals and the correspondence between the two clauses, men, maids—oxen, asses (comp. Ex. xx. 17) would be destroyed by this inappropriate word. Small cattle are here named in addition to large cattle, to show how completely the king would claim their property for his own uses.—And you shall be his servants. These words include all that is said before; the loss of political and social freedom is connected with the kingdom which the people demand "as among the heathen nations." Thus the folly of their reference to the example of other nations is held up before them in contrast with the freedom and blessing, which they enjoyed under the rule of their invisible king, the living God.—Ver. 18. Their painful condition under such a government will be matter of un-availing lamentation before the Lord. כִּלְפִי is not "because of your king," but properly "from your king," that is, to the Lord. It is herein

* [Eng. A. V. has here, not so well, "horsemen."—Tr.]

† [This is the literal translation. Eng. A. V. gives the sense more freely.—Tr.]

‡ [On the variations in the vs. as to these numbers, see "Text. and Gram." in loco.—Tr.]

hinted that they will wish to be delivered from the oppressive royal government. But the Lord will continue to shut His ears. Clericus: "God will not for your sake change the government of a master into the free commonwealth which you have hitherto enjoyed. The yoke once assumed you must bear forever." The evil which their own sin has brought on them they must bear—so divine justice ordains.

Vers. 19-22. The result of the transactions between Samuel and the people.—Vers. 19, 20. The reply of the people (through the elders). They "refused to hearken to Samuel's voice." The voice or address of Samuel contained enough to detach the people from their desire. Instead of this there follows, with a decided "no,"* the repetition of the demand: "There shall be a king over us." The dehortatory description of the royal privilege and custom among the surrounding nations is met with the declaration: "And we also will be as all the nations." In this there is an ignoring and denying the lofty position which God the Lord had given His people above all nations by choosing them as His people, and establishing His royal rule among them. The demand for a kingdom like that of other nations was an act of sin against the Lord, who wished to be sole king over His people, and had sufficiently revealed Himself as such in their former history. "Judging" and "leading in war" are summarily mentioned as representing the duties of the king to be chosen. Without and within, in war and in peace, he was to be leader and governor of the people.—Ver. 21 sqq. Samuel's intermediation. As mediator between God and the people he had hitherto striven with God in prayer, and with the elders of the people in earnest dealings and warnings concerning this important and eventful question. We see him wrestling anew with God in prayer; again he carries before the Lord in prayer the whole matter, as it now stands after the unsuccessful dealing with the people. God's answer is: Make them a king. The demand, made in sin, from a disposition not well-pleasing to God, is fulfilled. The element of sin and error must, in the history of the kingdom of God, aid in the preparation and realization of the divine plans and ends. Samuel dismisses the men of Israel to their homes. We must here read between the lines, that Samuel communicated the divine decision to the people, and, dismissing the elders of the people, took into consideration, in accordance with the Lord's command, the necessary steps for the election of a king. Following the sense, Josephus adds to the words of dismissal the following: "And I will send for you at the proper time, when I learn from the Lord whom he will give you as king" [Ant. VI. 3, 6].

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The demand for a human kingdom like the kingdom in other nations, and its fulfilment, is one of the most important turning-points in the development of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant. Historically occasioned by constant danger from without, against which there was no one sufficient leader, and by the arbitrary and illegal procedure of the judges, it was more deeply grounded in the need (felt by the people and supported by public opinion) of a sole, continuous, and externally and internally firm and energetic rule. And this rule, even if it took the shape of royalty, needed not to be in conflict with the monarchical rule of God over His people (Ex. xix. 5 sq.; Judg. viii. 23; 1 Sam. xii. 12); for 1) the human king, if his relation to God's kingdom were rightly apprehended, need be nothing more than the instrument and representative of the theocratic kingdom; 2) from the Patriarchal time on, through the Mosaic period and that of the Judges till now, there had been defined hopes of and allusions to the rise of a mighty and glorious kingdom within the nation under the lead of the Divine Spirit Himself (Gen. xvii. 6, 16; xxxv. 11; Numb. xxiv. 17; comp. Deut. xvii. 14-20; Judg. viii. 23, ix. 22; 1 Sam. ii. 10, iii. 35); and 3) the existing government was no longer able to perform the duties incumbent on it. Ew. Geach. [History of Israel, 2, 606 sq.]: "As, then, even under Samuel, in his latter years, the judicial office showed itself without and within too weak and unable to give permanent security, the time was at last come when the people must either submit to a more perfect human government, or perish irretrievably." The unfavorable decision on the demand given nevertheless by Samuel and in the divine declaration, refers to the sinful disposition of mind out of which the demand sprang—a disposition not trusting unconditionally in God's power, anticipating the plans of His wisdom and His chosen time, controlled by vain and proud desire to imitate the royal magnificences of the heathen peoples. "In this there was a two-fold ungodly element. 1) They desired a king instead of the God-established and nobly attested Judge Samuel. . . . The scheme is characterized as an injustice against Samuel, and therefore a sin against the Lord, who sent him, vers. 7, 8. 2) At the bottom of the people's desire for a king lay the delusion, that God was powerless to help them, that the reason of their subjection was not their sin, but a fault in the constitution, that the kingdom would be an aid in addition to God. This point of view appears oftener in the narrative than the first. Is. x. 18, 19; xii. The kingdom desired in such a mind was not a form of God's kingdom in accordance with revelation, but opposed to His kingdom." (Hengst. Beit. 3, p. 256 sq.) Calvin: "They ought to have waited patiently for the time predetermined by God, and not have given place to their own designs and methods apart from God's word. They ought not, therefore, to have anticipated God's purpose, but ought to have waited till the Lord Himself should show by indubitable signs that the foreordained time had come, and should direct their counsels. Moreover, though they recognized Samuel as a prophet, they not only did not inquire of him whether they were to have a king or not, but wanted him to aid in carrying out their design. They do not think of invoking God; they demand that a king be given them; they adduce the customs and institutions of other nations." Nevertheless, Samuel yields to the desire of the people, "because he knows that now God's time has come; but, at the same time, he does all that he can to bring the people to a consciousness of their sin." (Hengst. ib. 258.) The fulfilment of the demand for a human kingdom is distinctly granted by God, because, though as a human factor in the movement it is rooted in sin, yet, foreseen by God, it fits into His plan, and is to be the means of elevating and confirming the Theocracy in His people, and of laying the foundation for the further development of the nation's history, till the preparation should be complete for salvation in the person of Him, of whom the kingdom of Israel in David was to be the prefiguration and type. "Herein the law, which runs through the whole history of the development of revelation, repeats itself: by the guilt of the covenant-people God's arrangements for salvation reach a point where they no longer serve; then their guilt is revealed most strongly in open disobedience to God; but, in permitting what the people sinfully wish, God grasps the reins and directs events to a point, of which the people in their sinful blindness had thought nothing, so that He only the more glorifies Himself by the elevation of His revelation to a higher place." (O. v. Gerlach.)

* On the doubling of the γ in $\kappa\gamma$ see Ew. Gr., § 91 d.

2. We are not to think of the relation between the theocracy and the kingdom established through Samuel, as if the latter were an addition to the former "to aid it in accomplishing its task, and to supply what was lacking to the times," as if a "mixed constitution and rule" had arisen, and "out of a divine government" had come a "royal-divine government," a Basileo-Theocracy. Ew. Gesch. [Hist.] 3, 8. This conception of a co-ordinate relation does not agree with the governing principle of the theocracy, that God is and remains king of His people, that God's law and truth is the authority to which the kingdom must unconditionally submit, in dependence on which it is to govern as visible instrument of the theocracy in the name and place of the invisible king. The rejection of Saul, who would not pay unconditional obedience to God's rule, and the divine recognition of David's government as one which was thoroughly in unison with the rule of Israel's true king, their God and Lord, and which continued to prepare the way for its realization in the people, laying the historical basis for the future manifestation of the Messianic kingdom, confirm the view that the relation of the Israelitish kingdom to the Theocracy (as Samuel, under God's direction, founded it) was one of unconditional subordination; it was to be the instrument of the latter. The statement that there was an encroachment on the pure Theocracy in the fact "that Jehovah could no longer be the sole Lawgiver, that the earthly king must execute his will with unrestrained authority" (Diestel, Jahrb. für deutsche Theol., 1863, p. 554) rests on an incorrect presupposition, since, according to the principle of the Theocracy, even the established monarchy was expressly subject to the legislative authority of the covenant-God, and both king and people must unconditionally conform their will to the will and law of God.

3. This history of the people's desire for a king and its fulfilment by God exhibits the relation of the divine will to the human will, when the latter stands sinfully opposed to the former. God never destroys the freedom of the human will. He leaves it to its free self-determination, but when it has turned away from His will, seeks to bring it back by the revelation in His word. If this does not succeed, human perversity must nevertheless minister to the realization of the plans of His kingdom and salvation, and also, in its evil consequences, bring punishment, according to His righteous law, on the sin which man thus freely commits.

4. Samuel appears, in this crisis of Old Testament history, among the men of God whom the Bible represents as heroes in prayer, as Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, Elijah. Speaking to the people, he represented God as his prophet; praying to God, he represented the people as their priestly mediator. Comp. Schröding, Samuel als Beter ("Samuel as a praying man"), in the Zeitschr. für luth. Theol. u. Krü., 1856, p. 414 sq.

5. [The relation between this narrative of the demand for a king and the "law of the king," Deut. xvii. 14-20, requires a brief notice. It seems strange that Samuel, if he was acquainted with this law, makes no mention of it. There is no difficulty in his characterization of the demand as a rejection of the divine rule over them (Jehovah Himself (vers. 7, 8) does the same thing), for the sin was in their feeling and purpose, not in the demand per se, as Dr. Erdmann well brings out; and Samuel might have so spoken, if he had known that the Law contemplated the possibility of a regal government. The real difficulty lies in the fact that the narrative in 1 Sam. viii.—xii. seems to be unconscious of the law in Deuteronomy. Allowing much, it might be said, for the simple, unscientific, historical method of the times, in which quotations are rare, and things omitted which are commonly known, it would yet seem that there should be in the addresses of the people, of Samuel, and of Jehovah, some recognition of the fact that this was a thing which did not make its first appearance now, and some reference to the obligations imposed on the king in the Mosaic Law. But, is there no recognition in the later transaction of the earlier law? If we compare the two, we shall find the relation between them to be the following: the form of demand in Deut. xvii. 14 is given almost verbatim in 1 Sam. viii. 5, but the former adds "about me," while the latter adds the ground of the desire, "that he may be judicial and military head," for choice by Jehovah in Deut. (ver. 15), we have choice by the people in 1 Sam. (ver. 18); and by Jehovah (x. 24); the reference to horses is nearly the same in form in both, but in tone quite different, Deut. ver. 16; 1 Sam. viii. 11; on the other hand, the mention of returning to Egypt, of wives, silver and gold, and the study of the law (Deut. vers. 17-20) is not found in Samuel. It will be seen from this comparison, and still more from a comparison of the whole tone and drift in the two, that the act described here was probably performed without reference to the statute in Deut.; that the desire of the people was a natural, historical growth, and the course of events was determined by the circumstances of the time. So in the history of Gideon we see a similar unconsciousness of the Deuteronomic statute (though there is recognition of the theocracy), and a similar determination of action by existing circumstances. Where, then, was the Mosaic law all this time? and was Samuel ignorant of it? The answer to these questions seems to be suggested by the statement in 1 Sam. x. 25, in which there are three distinct affirmations: 1) "that Samucl told the people the law or manner of the kingdom, which is plainly different from the law of the king in chap. viii., and is most naturally to be identified with Deut. xvii. 14-17; 2) that he wrote this law in a book; and 3) that he put it somewhere in safe keeping. It seems probable, therefore, that we have here the political adoption of the essence of the Mosaic "law of the king" (which, in its prohibition of a return to Egypt, for example, has the stamp of Mosaic times). The law had been announced by Moses, transmitted through the priests, and was known to Samuel (though perhaps not generally known among the people). But it was a permission of royalty merely, not an injunction, and its existence did not diminish the people's sin of superficial, unspiritual longing for outward guidance, nor prove at first to Samuel that the time for its application had come. He therefore says nothing about it. But when the transaction is concluded, the king actually chosen, then he announces the law, and with obvious propriety commits it in its constitutional form to writing, and deposits it before Jehovah as a part of the theocratic constitution. Thus the history seems to become natural and intelligible when regarded as exhibiting Samuel's doubts as to whether the proper time had come for the historical realization of what Moses puts merely as a possibility. Apparently Samuel was not in sympathy with the movement, and seems to have felt after this that he had outlived his time.—TR.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-3. STARKE: Even good intentions do not always turn out well, but often fall through.—Upright parents cannot always be blamed for it, if their children turn out badly.—Avarice is a root of all evils, 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10; earnestly to avoid it is a great part of the wisdom of the righteous.—CALVIN: Parents should feel the duty laid upon them, amid great anxiety and sorrow, to pray to God for the prosperity of their children, and with earnest admonitions diligently to hold them to the task of making their life holy. They should earnestly beg God to lead and govern by His Holy Spirit the children whom He has given them, and to let the mercy which has been their own portion pass over to their children also, and to grant them the gift of perseverance and constancy. For if so holy and exalted a prophet was not spared the having such wicked and corrupt sons, how will it be with those who are far removed from his piety.

Vers. 4-6. STARKE: Even good things may sometimes be ill desired. A pious government is greatly pained when it traces among its subjects nothing but mere ingratitude.—CRAMER: When something disagreeable and repugnant befalls us, we can better bring it home to no one than to God; for He consoles the lowly, 2 Cor. vii. 6.—CALVIN: We ought, when anything is done or said against the honor of God, to be aroused and zealous, but not to suffer ourselves to be provoked when in regard to ourselves or ours an injustice is done us.

Vers. 7-9. STARKE: What is done to servants of God, God accepts as done to Himself, Acts ix. 5.—BERLEB. BIBLE: God hears in manifold ways when we cry to Him for human guidance, and then we imagine we have obtained a great favor. But what a great misfortune it is when one draws himself off from the richly instructive guidance of the Lord, to allow Himself to be led by creatures which withdraw us from the guidance of God! Then from freemen, which we formerly were, we become mere bondmen, and can also rightly say, if only we are so happy as to forsake the human guidance: "O Lord our God, other lords beside thee have had dominion over us; but by thee only will we make mention of thy name" (Isa. xvi. 13). An upright guide like Samuel does not appropriate to himself the souls of men, but guides them to God, and serves only the purpose of bringing them to Him.—WUERTEMB. BIBLE: Old sins are not forgotten with God, if they are all the time kept up, and not repented of (Ex. xxxii. 34).—SCHMID: The fountain of all sins is in not fearing God; and he who fears not to sin against God, also fears not to sin against men.—Ver. 9. SCHMID: If God has cause enough to punish, yet out of His long-suffering He will also have cause enough merely to chide and admonish (Hos. xi. 8, 9).

Vers. 15, 16. BERLEB. BIBLE: If we owe so much to the earthly king, what do we not owe to the heavenly king? O Thou King of Glory, do but come and reign over us! Let Thy kingdom come to us! Lift up your heads, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in.—[Ver. 18. Cries that will not be heard: 1) Self-will often brings us into distress. 2) This distress makes us cry to the Lord. 3) Such cries the Lord does not promise to hear.—TR.]—Ver. 19. SCHMID: Among wretched men there is no constancy save in wickedness (Isa. v. 18).—CALVIN: We learn here how God, according to His righteous judgment, blinds men and gives them up to error, when they persistently go after their foolish and perverse desires. Therefore we ought to learn from this example to be wise, that when we are entangled in sore temptations, we may not give too much room to our own plans and thoughts, as if they rested on a firm foundation and were wholesome. We will beg God to rule us by His Spirit, and not to give us over to ourselves, and not even in the least to suffer us to depart from His Word, but rather work in us that that Word may maintain its dominion over us, and we may rejoice in its guidance.—Ver. 21. STARKE: A Christian should bewail and tell his need to no one rather than to the faithful God, and learn from Him how he shall rightly behave himself.—Ver. 22. S. SCHMID: God's forbearance should not confirm men in wickedness, as if it were well done, but should lead them to repentance, that they may at last recognize their unrighteousness (Ps. l. 21).

II. Samuel meets Saul and Learns that he is Destined by God to be King over Israel.

CHAPTER IX. 1-27.

- 1 Now [AND] there was a man of Benjamin, whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zeror, the son of Bechorath, the son of Aphiah,¹ [i.e. the son of]²
 2 a Benjamite, a mighty man of power.³ And he had a son whose name was Saul, a choice young man and a goodly [young and goodly⁴]; and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he; from the shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.
 3 And the asses⁵ of Kish, Saul's father, were lost. And Kish said to Saul, his 4 son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go seek the asses. And he passed through⁶ mount Ephraim [the hill-country of Ephraim], and passed through the land of Shalisha, but [and] they found them not, then [and] they passed through the land of Shalim [Shaalim], and there they were not, and he passed through the
 5 land of the Benjamites,⁷ but [and] they found them not. And [om. and.] when they⁸ were come to the land of Zuph, Saul said to his servant that was with him, Come and let us return, lest my father leave caring for the asses and take thought
 6 for [be anxious about⁹] us. And he said unto [to] him, Behold, now, there is in this city a man of God,¹⁰ and he is an honorable¹¹ man [the man is honorable]; all that he saith cometh surely to pass; now let us go thither; peradventure he can 7 [will] show us our way that we should go.¹² Then said Saul [And Saul said] to his servant, But, [And] behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man? for the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God; what have
 8 we? And the servant answered Saul again and said, Behold, I have here at hand the fourth part of a shekel of silver, that will I give [and I¹³ will give it] to the 9 man of God to tell [that he may show] us our way. (Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake, Come and let us go to the seer; for he 10 that is now¹⁴ called a prophet was beforetime called a seer.) Then said Saul [And Saul said] to his servant, Well said; come, let us go. So [And] they went unto the city where the man of God was.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ [Ver. 1. These names are given differently in the Sept. See Exegesis, in loco.—Ta.]
² [Ver. 1. This phrase is a somewhat strange one. The word "son" is found in Heb., Gr., Lat., Chald., omitted in Syr., Arab., and is probably a part of the text; but it is strange that it is not followed by a proper name, and suggests an omission or error in the following words, which, however, cannot now be determined. Before the first "Benjamin" Wellhausen suggests the insertion of "Gibeah of."—Ta.]
³ [Ver. 1. By Erdmann and others rendered "wealth," but not so well. See Exposition.—Ta.]
⁴ [Ver. 2. The word בָּרָא is often used of youth merely, so that the rendering: "choice young man" (Erdmann, ausgerlesen), is hardly warranted. But, as it seems to differ from נָעַר (which is the word here used of the servant) in designating the vigorous time of youth, the phrase might be translated: "in the prime of youth and goodly."—Ta.]
⁵ [Ver. 3. Properly "she-asses."—Ta.]
⁶ [Ver. 4. Or: "he passed over into," and so in the other cases.—Ta.]
⁷ [Ver. 4. "The land of Jemini or the Jeminites," no doubt for "Benjaminites," the compound being resolved.—Ta.]
⁸ [Ver. 5. The remarkable variation of grammatical Number here and in ver. 4 has produced various readings in the VSS. and in a few MSS. The Sept. and Vulg. write plural throughout, while Chald., Syr. and Arab. make all the verbs "passed through" Sing., both apparently assimilations for the sake of simplicity. The harder reading of the Heb. is better retained.—Ta.]
⁹ [Ver. 6. The English phrase: "take thought for" (as in Matt. vi. 34), has now lost its sense of trouble and anxiety.—Ta.]
¹⁰ [Ver. 6. Elohim, without the Art., but here evidently for the true God of Israel. On the supposed difference between the arthous and anarthous use of the word, see Quarry on Genesis, and Bib. Comm. in loco.—Ta.]
¹¹ [Ver. 6. Properly, "honored," "esteemed."—Ta.]
¹² [Ver. 6. Perhaps, better: "on which we are going," or: "in respect to which we are going." To "go away" is usually הָלַךְ דָּרֶךְ, and הָלַךְ דֶּרֶךְ is "on the side of the way;" in any case, however, the verb (which is a Perf.) is better taken as Pres. or Fut., and not as Past, as Erdmann renders. The VSS. also translate it past.—Ta.]
¹³ [Ver. 8. Sept.: "thou shalt give," which Wellhausen prefers; Chald., Syr., Vulg., Arab.: "we will give." These are probably variations for the sake of propriety.—Ta.]
¹⁴ [Ver. 9. Sept.: "for the people (הָעָם) formerly called the prophet the seer," an obvious and unfortunate misreading.—Ta.]

11 And [om. and] as they went up [were going up¹⁵] the hill to [on which was¹⁶] the city, they found [came upon] young maidens going out to draw water, and said
 12 unto them, Is the seer here? And they answered them and said, He is; behold, he is before you [thee]; make haste,¹⁷ now, for he came to-day¹⁸ to the city, for 13 there is a sacrifice of the people to-day in [on] the high place; As soon as ye be come into the city, ye shall straightway find him, before he go up to the high place to eat; for the people will not eat until he come, because he doth bless the sacrifice; and [om. and] afterwards they eat that be bidden. Now therefore [And now] get
 14 you up, for [ins. he¹⁹], about this time ye shall find him. And they went up into [to] the city; and [om. and] when they were come [As they were going] into the city, behold, Samuel came out [was coming out] against [towards] them, for [om. for] to go up to the high place. Now [And] the Lord [Jehovah] had told Samuel
 15 in his ear [had informed Samuel¹⁹] a day before Saul came, saying, To-morrow, about this time [About this time to-morrow] I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain [prince] over my people Israel, that he may [and he shall] save my people out of the hand of the Philistines; for I have looked upon my people,²⁰ because their cry is come unto me.
 17 And when [om. when] Samuel saw Saul, [ins. and] the Lord [Jehovah] said unto [answered] him, Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! this same [the man of whom I said to thee, he] shall reign over my people.
 18 Then [And] Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate,²¹ and said, Tell me, I pray
 19 thee, where the seer's house is. And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer; go up before me unto the high place, for [and] ye shall eat with me to-day, and to-morrow I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thine heart [and I
 20 will let thee go in the morning, and all that is in thy heart I will tell thee]. And as for thine asses, that were lost three days ago, set not thy mind on them; for they are found. And on whom is all the desire of Israel [And to whom belongs all that is desirable²² in Israel]? is it not on [does it not belong to] thee, and on [to]
 21 all thy father's house? And Saul answered and said, Am not I a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe²³ of Benjamin? [ins. and] wherefore then [om. then] speakest thou so to 22 me? And Samuel took Saul and his servant, and brought them into the parlor [eating-room], and made them sit in the chiefest place among [and gave them a place at the head of] them that were bidden, which [and they] were about thirty²⁴
 23 persons. And Samuel said unto [to] the cook, Bring the portion which I gave 24 thee, of which I said unto thee, Set it by thee. And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it, and set it before Saul, and Samuel [om. Samuel, ins. he²⁵] said, Behold that which is left! set it before thee [what was reserved is

* [Ver. 11. A peculiar construction (הִנֵּנִי) with Partop., which occurs no less than six times in this chapter.

-Ta.]

* [Ver. 11. Literally: "the ascent of the city."-Ta.]

* [Ver. 12. Sept.: "Behold, he is before you, now on account of the day he is come to the city." They therefore attached the first letter of הָיָא to the preceding word, and omitted the rest, and instead of הָיָא read הָיָא as in the latter part of the verse. Wellhausen urges the adoption of this second reading on the ground that we thus avoid the statement that Samuel had that very day come to the city from abroad, which seems inconsistent with vers. 23, 24, and says that the "hasten" of the maidens is unintelligible, based, as it is, on the fact that Samuel had just come. The "for," however, must not be pressed; it simply introduces the explanation of the eager maidens, and such usage is frequent in Heb. The other variation of the Sept. commends itself as natural and appropriate: "he has just gone into the city." The Sing. of the address in ver. 12 need not surprise us; the maidens direct their discourse chiefly to Saul, who was evidently the master (the Midrash says, because they were attracted by his beauty).-Ta.]

* [Ver. 13. The Heb. inserts an emphatic Accus., which it is desirable to retain in the translation, Eng. idiom, however, requiring the Nom.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 15. Literally: "uncovered the ear of Samuel," made a disclosure to him.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 16. Sept.: "the affliction of my people," a natural but unnecessary insertion.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 18. Instead of "gate" (שַׁעַר), Sept. and one MS. of De Rossi read "city" (עִיר), which suits the connection better.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 20. So all ancient VSS. and modern interpreters; Philippson, Wünscheuwerth, Erdmann, begchrensuwerth, Caban, objet désirable.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 21. In the Heb. "tribes," which is generally regarded as an error of copyist, though it might be understood as referring to families, see Num. iv. 13; Judg. ix. 12.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 22. Sept. has 70, instead of 80.-Ta.]

* [Ver. 24. The subject of the verb may be Samuel or the cook, and, on grammatical grounds, is more probably the latter, into whose mouth the words may be very well put, the "since I said" below not being in the Heb. text. Erdmann holds a different opinion; see Exposition, in loco.-Ta.]

- set²⁶ before thee]; and [om. and] eat, for unto this time hath it been kept for thee since I said,²⁷ I have invited the people. So [And] Saul did eat with Samuel that day.
- 25 And when they were come [And they came] down from the high place unto [to] the city, Samuel [om. Samuel, ins. and he] communed [spake] with Saul upon the
- 26 top of the house [the roof]. And they arose early;²⁸ and it came to pass about the spring of the day [at day-dawn] that Samuel called [ins. to] Saul to [on] the top of the house [roof], saying, Up [Rise], that I may [and I will] send thee away. And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad [on the
- 27 street]. And [om. and] as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid the servant pass on before us (and he passed on²⁹), but [and] stand thou still a while, that I may [and I will] show [tell] thee the word of God.

²⁶ [Ver. 24. This word (נִשְׁבַּח) is taken by the ancient VSS. and Eng. A. V. as Impv., but better, with Erdmann, as Particp.—Tr.]

²⁷ [Ver. 24. On the text of this obscure passage see Exposition in loco.—Tr.]

²⁸ [Ver. 26. The Sept. text of vers. 25, 26, commends itself by its simplicity and concinnity: "into the city, and they spread (a bed) for Saul on the roof, and he lay down. And it came to pass," etc. See discussion in Exposition.—Tr.]

²⁹ [Ver. 27. This remark is lacking in Sept. Vat. (but not Alex.), Syr. and Arab., and is probably a gloss. The Syriac (as Wellhausen points out) adds a similar remark at end of ver. 3: "and Saul arose and departed, and took with him one of the servants, and departed to seek the asses of his father."—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. Saul's family and person.—The statement that Kish was the son of Abiel is opposed to that of 1 Chr. viii. 33; ix. 39, according to which Ner was the father of Kish, but agrees with 1 Sam. xiv. 51, according to which Ner was the father of Abner and the son of Abiel, and therefore the brother of Kish. This difference is not to be set aside by the arbitrary assumption that Ner in Chron. is not the father, but the grandfather, or a still remoter ancestor of Kish (Keil), but the statement in Chron. is to be corrected by this and xiv. 51. [Keil's supposition of an omitted name in the list is scarcely "arbitrary," since such omissions are elsewhere found in genealogical records. To construct Saul's genealogy it is natural to compare the various statements in the Scriptures, and attempt to make them accord. Bringing together Gen. xli. 2; 1 Sam. ix. 1; xiv. 51; 1 Chr. vii. 6-8; viii. 29-33; ix. 35-39, the following line may be made out: 1. Benjamin. 2. Becher. 3. Aphiah—perhaps same with Abiah. 4. Bechorath. 5. Zeror or Zur. 6. Abiel or Jehiel. 7. Ner. 8. Kish. 9. Saul, in which, however, some links may be omitted, as Matri, mentioned 1 Sam. chap. x. 21. Abner is thus Saul's uncle, as in xiv. 50. If Ehud in 1 Chr. vii. 10 be the judge of that name (Judg. iii.), he was not of the same family with Saul. In 1 Chr. ix. 35 Jehiel, the ancestor of Saul, is said to have been the father, that is, the first settler of Gibeon; but it is uncertain how far back we have to put him. The name "Saul" was borne by others, see Gen. xxxvi. 37, 38, xli. 10; 1 Chr. vi. 24; Acts vii. 58. See Bib. Dicts., s. v. Ner and Saul, and Comms. on "Chronicles."—Tr.]. The phrase נָבוֹר חָיִל [Eng. A. V. "a mighty man of power"] here means a rich well-to-do man (Ges., De Wette) and not as in xvi. 18, a strong, valiant man (Vulgate, Cler., Then.); for it undoubtedly refers to Kish, who is, indeed, "not represented in the history as specially wealthy" (Then.), but is all the more distinctly described as in easy circumstances and prosperous. It is intended to state that Saul came from a substantial family. This accords much better with the connection than the representation of him as a man of vigor and strength by the statement that his father was a valiant man. —The genealogical statement about Saul's descent is followed (ver. 2) by a short description of his person. The name Saul means the "asked" (comp. Gen. xli. 10); "it occurs frequently, and was, probably, usually the name of the desired (asked) first-born" (Then.). Saul was a choice and handsome man. נָבוֹר is to be rendered electus (Vulg.),* not only because he had a grown son (xiii. 1-3), but also because it is expressly said (x. 24) that the Lord elected and chose him, because his like was not to be found in all the people, that is, in respect to his distinguished personal appearance; in spite of the first-mentioned fact, he might else still have ranked as a young man. He excelled all other Israelites both in warlike beauty and in height, according to the vivid description "from the shoulder upward;" his person was in keeping with the lofty position to which, as ruler over Israel, he was chosen by God, as is expressly said in x. 24.†

Vers. 3-10. The occasion of Saul's meeting with Samuel: The loss of and search for the asses of Kish.—Ver. 3. Kish's preparations for recovering the lost asses show him to be a substantial and propertied man. His command to his son "take a servant, arise, go, seek," gives a vivid description of what occurred. Vers. 4 sqq. contain a similarly fresh and animated description of Saul's wandering search with his servant. The mention of the hill-country of Ephraim first as scene of the search is explained by the fact that these hills stretched from the north down into the territory of Benjamin, and Gibeah, Saul's home and start-

* [The rendering "in the prime of youth" (which might be forty years) suits the first of these two facts, and the second cannot be pressed, because the word is often used where this fact does not exist. See Text and Gram.—Tr.]

† [On the ancient regard for physical greatness, see Synopsis Crit.; Kitto, Daily Bib. III.—Tr.]

ing-point (comp. x. 26; xi. 4; xv. 34; xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1) lay on their slope. The land of Shalisha, which they next traversed, probably takes its name from שָׁלֹשׁ ["three"], because there three valleys united in one, or one divided into three = Three-land (see Then. in Käufler's Stud. d. äsch. Geogr. II., 142); it is the region in which, according to 2 Kings iv. 42, Baalshalisha lay [15 miles north of Diospolis or Lydda.—Tr.]. Thereupon they traversed the land of Shaalim, according to Then., "perhaps a very deep valley (comp. שְׁעַל

'the hollow of the hand,' and שְׁעָלָה 'a hollow or narrow way'"), probably the region which lay eastward from Shalisha, where on the maps of Robinson and Vandeveldt the Beni Mussah and Beni Salem are marked (comp. Keil in loco).^{*} The next statement that they traversed the land of Benjamin, indicates that from Shaalim they go from north-east to south-west. Thence they came into the land of Zuph, which, as Keil supposes, lay on the south-west of the tribe-territory of Benjamin, since "Saul and his follower on the return home pass first (x. 2) by the tomb of Rachel, and then come to the border of Benjamin."—[Kitto remarks that Saul's tender regard for his father's feelings (ver. 5) is a favorable indication of character.—Tr.].—Ver. 6. The servant prevents Saul from returning home immediately, pointing out to him the city before him standing on an eminence, where they would find the man of God, who would perhaps tell them how they might attain the object of their search. The way, on which they came,† is the way on which they now are, that they may find what they are seeking; the seer will now perhaps tell them the direction in which they must go on this way, in order to find the asses. From the connection of the whole history of Samuel the city can be no other than his residence, Ramathaim (or, Ramah) Zophim (ch. i. 1), that is, in the district of Zuph, in the Tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 25). Keil is wrong in pressing against this general assumption the fact that the servant does not say "here dwells," but "here is" a man of God, which is plainly far-fetched. Equally forced is his explanation of the answer of the maidens (ver. 12): "He came today to the city, for there is a great sacrifice of the people on the high-place," from which he infers that the seer's house was not in the city, but that he had only come thither to the sacrificial feast; their answer rather confirms the former view, since the question "is the seer here?" referred to the city, while the place of offering was on the eminence behind the city, where Samuel in those days worked and dwelt. Samuel has his residence in this city (comp. ver. 25 with ver. 18); Keil's supposition of a temporary residence, which he occupied during his presence at the festival, is wholly untenable. As Samuel had built an altar to the Lord at Ramah (vii. 17), it is more natural to think of this residence of Samuel than of any other place, the name of which would no doubt otherwise have been given. Finally, it is to be added that Samuel is known to the servant, and the latter knows that he is here. On the other supposition, how should he know that Samuel was here precisely at this time, if it was not his residence? [These arguments are replied to in various ways by expositors who hold that this city was not Ramah. But Erdmann is undoubtedly right in saying that the impression made by this narrative is that it was Samuel's residence to which Saul came. The difficulty lies in reconciling this statement with the itinerary in ch. x. 2-5. See the exposition and translator's note on ch. i. 1. As Rachel's tomb was near Bethlehem, and Saul was going towards Bethel, one would suppose the city in ch. ix. to be south or south-west from Bethlehem, that is, not in the territory of Benjamin at all. And if it was not Ramah it is impossible to say what it was.—It is worthy of note that Saul seems to know nothing about Samuel; it is the servant that knows and does everything. Saul rather appears as a simple-minded rustic youth, who has rarely left his pastoral occupations, and knows little of the political and religious elements of the time.—Tr.].—From this passage it appears (comp. ver. 9) that the earliest prophets were consulted by the people about ordinary matters of life, of which they were looked on as having superior knowledge. It is, however, undetermined, whether Samuel would have answered the question about the asses, if the loss of and search for them had not been, according to the revelation made him from above, the divinely-appointed means for bringing him into connection with the person of the designated king.

Vers. 7, 8. Those who went to question the prophets carried them presents (comp. 1 Kings xiv. 3). These are in the first place to be regarded as honorary gifts, intended to show respect. But this does not exclude the supposition that they depended for support on these voluntary gifts offered in return for information desired. Saul fears that he has no gift worthy of the man, but the servant, who is drawn to the life, is ready with the reply: "There is in my hand (I have here at hand) the fourth of a shekel of silver" (called suz (שֶׁז) by the later Jews, see Targ. Jon. in loco). The silver-shekel and its parts ($\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{1}{3}$, $\frac{1}{4}$), are not pieces weighed in transference, but already of determined weight and value, coins "current with the merchant" (Gen. xxiii. 16), which were "counted." The Shekel was in German money about 26 silbergroschen, the quarter, therefore, about 6½ silbergroschen. [There is no means of determining precisely the value of the shekel in Samuel's time. In our Lord's time a stater = shekel seems to have been about 70 cents United States currency, and a quarter about 18 (equivalent perhaps to two dollars now). A German Silbergroschen is about 2½ cents in our currency. There is no evidence that coined money existed in Israel before the captivity, and the first native coins were probably struck some centuries after the Return.—Tr.]. The Præterites give an admirably true picture of the animated manner of the servant, who is intent only on the object of their search, and willingly makes the sacrifice of the money for the asses.—Ver. 9. "The man" (הַנָּשִׁי) is the indef. subject (Germ. man [Eng. one]), though the Art. makes the individual personality more prominent. Ew. Gr. § 294 d. An express difference is made here between the ancient designation of the prophet Roeh (רוֹחַ), for which later in the solemn, poetic language the synonymous Chozeh (חֹזֶה "gazer") was used, and the term in use in the author's time Nabi (נָבִי). The former (Roeh, seer), points only to the form in which "the insight" into what was hidden came to them, the latter (Nabi), on the contrary, "to the source of the divinatory insight, to God" (Tholuck, Die Propheten, p. 21). The remark in ver. 9 belongs according to its content to ver. 11.

* [Others render "jackal-land," and refer to Shual (1 Sam. xlii. 17), or Shaalbin (Judg. i. 35) in the territory of Dan. The geography is altogether uncertain.—Tr.]

† [On the rendering see Textual and Grammat.—Tr.]

[Note on Roeh.—The statement in ver. 9 has special interest in connection with the history of prophetic work in Israel. The three terms named above have each its peculiar meaning and its special use, though to a certain extent employed interchangeably. Besides in this chapter, Roeh occurs three times of Samuel (1 Chron. ix. 22; xxvi. 28; xxix. 29), twice of Hanani (2 Chron. xvi. 9, 10), once with a general application (Isa. xxx. 10), and once apparently of Zadok the priest in a passage (2 Sam. xv. 27) where the text is somewhat involved in suspicion; it is used, that is, c. B. C. 1100–700. Chozeh is found in 2 Sam., in the prophets, and in Chron., about B. C. 800–400. Nabi occurs from Gen. to Mal., in nearly every book of the Old Testament. As to the meaning, Nabi is clearly one who speaks for God (see the general meaning in Ex. vii. 1), announcing or representing His will by His command. Chozeh, the "gazer," is one who sees visions of God; the verb, where it means "behold," is used only in poetry, and always of divine visions, and the noun was employed as synonymous with Nabi, meaning prophet in the fullest sense. So, too, Roeh the "seer," in the one passage (Isa. xxx. 10) where it occurs with a general application, is used as synonymous with Chozeh, while our verse here affirms the substantial identity of Roeh and Nabi. But, as the Nabi always claims inspiration, whether he be true or false, we must regard the Roeh also as an inspired person. Dr. R. Payne Smith ("Prophecy a prep. for Christ," Lect. II.) holds that the Roeh was simply a man of acute understanding, uninspired, to whom the people were in the habit of resorting for advice in difficult matters. He bases his view chiefly on this chapter, and especially on the Sept. reading of ver. 9: "the people called Roeh him," etc., a reading which can hardly be sustained; and, for the reasons given above, it seems necessary to regard the Roeh as inspired. The change of name from Roeh to Nabi and Chozeh had its ground probably in the development of the religious constitution. Up to some time before the author of "Samuel" wrote, the non-sacerdotal, non-Levitical religious teacher was one distinguished by seeing visions, or by seeing into the will of God. This is God's definition of the prophet in Num. xii. 6; it is involved in 1 Sam. iii. 1, 15, and in the visions of the patriarchs. The Law of Moses was the complete and sufficient guide for life and worship, and it was only in special individual matters that the divine direction was given, and then it was through the medium of a vision. He who saw the vision was a Roeh, and it was natural enough that he should be consulted by the people about many matters. But in process of time the mechanicalness and deadness to which the legal ritual constantly tended called forth an order of men who expounded and enforced the spirituality of the Law, speaking as God bade them, speaking for God, entering as a prominent element into the religious life of the nation. He who thus spake was a Nabi, and, as he too might have visions, he was sometimes called Chozeh "the gazer" (the verb חֹזֶה is not necessarily always to "gaze" as Dr. Smith maintains (ubi sup.), as, for ex., in Prov. xxii. 29, but is the poetic conception "behold" as distinguished from "see," though in the visual use it is appropriately rendered "gaze"). As this speaker for God gradually took the place of the old seer of visions, the word Nabi replaced Roeh in popular usage. It seems that the change began in or about Samuel's time, and was completed about three centuries later, Roeh still maintaining itself in the language, though rarely used. On the other hand, Nabi may have been used infrequently in early times, in reference to Abraham and Moses, and have become afterwards the common term, or the occurrence of the word in the Pentateuch may be the transference of a late word to earlier scenes.—Tr.]

Vers. 11–14. The announcement of the "Seer" (הַנִּבִּי, הַזֶּה, Just as they were going up . . . then (הַזֶּה); the Partcp. with preceding subject denotes a circumstance or fact, synchronously with which or at the occurrence of which another fact or circumstance takes place, which is introduced by י before the subject (Ew., Gr., § 341 d). A similar construction with הַזֶּה . . . הַזֶּה follows in ver. 14 and ver. 27).—The word "here" (הֵנָּה) refers to the city, which was on an eminence, since they met the water-drawers as they were going up. The answer of the maidens (ver. 12) "before thee" is a "direction to go simply straightforward" (Bunsen). Here too the description is very lively, answering perfectly to the peculiarities of the persons. "He came into the city" presupposes either that his residence was without it, or that he had been absent from it some time (Then.). The "height" on which the offering took place must be distinguished from the height on which the city stood. The name *Ramathaim [= the two Ramahs, or heights] refers to those two heights. The Bamah, high-place (comp. Mic. iii. 12, where it is synonymous with הָר, "mountain," and Mic. i. 3, 4; Jer. xxvi. 18 with Am. iv. 1) is the sacred place of sacrifice on the mountain which rose still higher than the city (comp. ver. 11 with vers. 13, 25, 27). Of such "Bamoth," holy places on heights, where the people assembled for sacrifice and prayer, there were several during the unquiet times of the Judges, especially after the central Sanctuary at Shiloh ceased to exist, till the building of the Temple (comp. vii. 9; x. 8; xiii. 8 sq.; xvi. 2, 3; 1 Kings iii. 2 sq.), as indeed the Patriarchs sacrificed on high places (Gen. xii. 8). It was not till after the building of the Temple that the high-place-worship, which easily degenerated into idolatry (wherefore the Law forbade sacrifice except in Jehovah's dwelling, the Sanctuary) was completely done away with (2 Kings xxiii. 4–23).—In ver. 13 הֵנָּה corresponds to הֵנָּה, both expressing identity of time, or the concurrence of the acts of coming and finding = "as . . . forthwith," or "when . . . straightway." Ew. Gram. § 360 b. —The seer is just going to a sacrificial meal on the high-place. The "people" await him there. A large assembly is therefore gathered to-day on the high-place for a thank-offering. לָלוּ here = לוֹלוּעִין, לְחַמֻּסֵּינִי ["bless," "give thanks"]. The "him" is repeated in this animated discourse, because the somewhat garrulous and circumstantial women wish to bring the chief person prominently before the inquirer.* "They that are bidden" are those whom Samuel had invited to this sacrificial meal, comp. ver. 24.—Ver. 14. The course of events now, according to the very precise and detailed account of the narrator, is as follows: First Saul and his servant go up to the city. Pursuant to the directions of the maidens they pass quickly in. The curt, rapid character of the narration corresponds to the movement. Next, they are already in the midst of the city, when, this is the third fact, Samuel, going out of the city, meets them; they meet in the middle of the city, he going outward toward the high-place, they going inward. That they had gone through the gate was a matter of course and did not require mention. And the statement of ver. 18: "And Saul drew near to Samuel in the midst of the gate," or, stepped up to him, the fourth fact, need not be regarded as contradictory to the preceding statement: "in the midst of the city," for, from these two statements it is clear that Saul did not go up to Samuel as soon as he met him, as appears also from ver. 17, where it is expressly said what intervened: Samuel saw Saul, and received from God the disclosure that this was the man in reference to whom He had before made a revelation to him. We must therefore suppose a pause between the meeting in the city and the talk in the gate, during which Saul followed Samuel till he approached him in the gate. Thus there is no need for the conjecture that the verse read originally "gate" instead of "city" (Then.), nor the supposition that the narrator was guilty of carelessness (Reuss), nor the artificial, unclear explanation that the words mean "to go into the city, enter, and the entrance was through the gate" (Keil). Ewald's remark that, since Ramah, Samuel's city, was certainly not large, "in the midst of the city" (ver. 4) is not very different from "in the midst of the gate" (ver. 18), comes in excellently, in the sense that the distance between the middle of the city and the middle of the gate was small, to explain satisfactorily why Saul, after the meeting in the city, did not approach Samuel to speak to him till he was in the middle of the gate. Further it is to be noted that conversation and consultation were usually held "in the gate," not on the street, and the pause which Saul's question supposes Samuel to have made could properly occur only in the place set aside for public interviews.

* [As to the city see Exposition on ver. 6 and Translator's note.—Tr.]

Vers. 15-17. The revelation which Samuel received the day before Saul's arrival, that a man of Benjamin would come to him, whom he was to anoint prince over Israel, was psychologically based on his constant prayerful expectant reflection as to how God would establish the monarchy promised to the people. "To uncover the ear" when said of God, signifies, as in 2 Sam. vii. 27,

* [On this verse see "Text. and Grammat."—Ta.]

the divine Spirit's announcement to the human spirit, the inbreathing of divine thoughts from above through the word.—I will send to thee, (ver. 16): The "I will send" sets forth the divine providence, which so guides the ways of Saul, the chosen king, that he must come to Samuel, the head of Israel and mediator between God and his people. Clericus: "I will take care that he come to thee. For Saul was ignorant of the whole matter, and, while vainly seeking asses, found an unexpected kingdom." The future king came from the most warlike tribe, and this revelation to Samuel declares that his mission was a warlike one, the deliverance, namely, of Israel from the domination of the Philistines. Israel's victory over the Philistines (vii. 13) was not followed by a complete liberation of land and people from these enemies; rather the words: "The hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel" point to repeated successful battles against them. It was these that Saul fought, and Samuel survived during the greater part of his reign. Comp. the remarks on vii. 13. "I have looked upon my people" means not "I have had regard to their prayers" (Cleric.), but, as in Ex. ii. 25, in reference to the Egyptian bondage, which was the type of every oppression of Israel by external means, that God, ever present to help His people, had a compassionate knowledge of their needs and misery. The insertion of the Sept. of the words "affliction of," before "my people," is a correct explanation, but not necessary as a part of the original text; for the following words: "their cry is come to me" explain sufficiently in what sense God's seeing, to which the hearing of the people's cry corresponds, is to be understood.—Ver. 17. At the moment when Samuel saw Saul, he received by divine revelation the inward assurance that this man was the king chosen by God. The phrase "answered" refers to the question which Samuel internally asked God when he saw Saul, whether this was the Benjamite of whom he had been divinely told the day before. The word

"bind, restrain" (לָכַךְ) characterizes his government as a sharp and strict one, as a coercere imperio. To this mental experience of Samuel's corresponded the short interval between his passage to the gate and Saul's approach to him in the gate with the question about the seer.

Vers. 18-27. Saul Samuel's guest, and the latter's talk with him. Vers. 18 takes up the thread from ver. 14, after the parenthesis, ver. 17. In reply to Saul's question as to the seer's house, Samuel announces himself (ver. 19) as the "seer." The direction: "go up before me" is a mark of respect, like the invitation to take the chief place (ver. 22), and the selection of the best portion at the meal (ver. 24). Ye shall eat with me to-day includes the servant, while the courtesy could only be meant for Saul as the master. All that is in thy heart I will tell thee—not: "whatsoever thou shalt desire" (Cleric.) in reference to the object of his coming; for in respect to the asses he gives him information immediately (ver. 20), but Samuel will reveal to him his innermost thoughts (Bunsen). He speaks to him as prophet, and prepares him for what he has to communicate to him as prophet. Thenius' reference of the words to what Saul does in chap. xiii., as if he had "long had it in mind," seems too particular for the general connection here. The reference is rather to the powers and impulses of an aspiring soul, which lay latent in Saul, and fitted him for his destined calling, as well as to his sinful nature, which, by opposing God, might prove a hindrance. In ver. 20 Samuel says two things, by which he showed Saul that he was a prophet. First, he announces to him that the ground of anxiety for the asses is already removed.—Which were lost to-day three days, that is, "to-day is the third day," day before yesterday, see Ew., Gr., § 287, k [Ges., Gr., § 118, 2].—Set not thy mind on them stands over against the preceding "what is in thy heart." From now on his heart is to claim and accomplish something higher. To this Samuel's second expression refers, which hints indistinctly at the great and noble destiny to which God has elected him, in order to awaken and call out what was hidden in his heart. All the desire (כָּל-הַחֲמָה), omnis cupiditas, omne desiderium Israelis, but in the objective sense: everything worthy of desire, valuable, optima quæque (Vulg.). This signifies, in contrast with the sought and found asses, that noblest possession, which pertained to all Israel, and was destined for him and his father's house, was to be his, unsought and undesired: the royal dignity. Samuel "draws him away from caring about the asses, and first lifts him up to high thoughts and hopes" (O. v. Gerlach). Samuel's obscure, enigmatic words only give him a glimpse of something great and lofty pertaining to himself and his house, and give occasion (ver. 21) to a disclamatory reply, which exhibits that which is now in his heart, namely, humility and modesty. The supposition that Saul "well understood that Samuel spoke of the honor of the kingdom" (Dächsel) does not accord with the purposely general and indefinite character of Samuel's words. It is without support from the connection and inconsistent with x. 20, 21, to explain Saul's answer—that the best thing in Israel could not belong to him and his house, because his tribe was the smallest in Israel, and his family the least in this tribe—in reference to his later very different bearing, as "pretended modesty" (Then.). Saul came only afterwards to be untrue to this disposition of mind, which was the condition of his election. (Instead of the obviously erroneous plural, שָׁבֵט, "tribes," read sing., "tribe"). The warlike tribe of Benjamin, one of the smallest already in the census of Num. i. 36 sq., had been reduced by the frightful execution recorded in Judg. xx. 20 to an inconsiderable power. The consciousness of this fact is expressed in Saul's words. Looking at his tribe and family, he will not presume to claim so high a consideration as the seer has intimated. Samuel makes him no answer. "He wishes to awaken in him astonishment, expectation, hope" (O. v. Gerlach).—Vers. 22–24 now relate how Samuel entertains him as an honored guest at the sacrificial meal.—Ver. 22. A select number of thirty men of note were invited to this festival, and had taken their places in the room (לְשֹׁנָה) provided for the purpose. The uppermost place, as the place of honor, is assigned to Saul and his companion.

All the people could not be in the room, but held the feast in the open air. Samuel (ver. 23) orders the reserved piece of the meat, as the best, to be set before them. This is more exactly described in ver. 24 as the thigh or shoulder, and "what was on it" [attached to it] (הַחֵלֶלֶת, Art. with Rel. force), not "what was over it" the broth with which the meat was eaten (Maur.). That which was attached to it was the best of the flesh of the offered animals; whether the fat on it, not used in the offering, or the flesh near the shoulder, cannot be determined; it could not be the kidneys (Then., Bunsen), for they, with the attached fat (אֶשֶׁר עָלָיו), were burned in the slain-offering (Lev. iii. 4). It was probably the right* leg, which Samuel, as priest, had ordered to be reserved; for it belonged to the priest, according to the Law, Lev. vii. 32 sqq.—"The resemblance to Gen. xlii. 34 is rather from the facts themselves, not from an imitation of one passage by the other." Ew. Gesch. III. 29, Rem. 3.—The minute description of the cook's procedure is worthy of note: "and the cook took up," etc., corresponding to the precise account of Samuel's conduct as host. The insertion of "Samuel to Saul" (Sept.), or "Samuel" (Vulg.), after "and he said," is not necessary (Then.), for, considering ver. 23 and the first sentence of ver. 24 as a parenthesis (like vers. 15–17), the "and he said" continues the principal matter, the speech of Samuel. The following words so obviously suit Samuel and not the cook, that a misunderstanding was impossible.† Here also the translation of the Sept. is explicative. שֵׁט [Eng. A. V. "set"] is not Imper., but Pas. Partic. (as in Obad. 4; Num. xxiv. 21). For the construction see Ew., Gr., § 149 sq., Böttcher, Neue Ehrenlese in loco. As to the occurrence, the latter properly remarks that Saul could not be bidden to do what the cook had already just done (שָׁט). Render: "behold, the reserved piece is set before thee." The following words, in which Samuel invites Saul to eat, present great difficulties in the text.—[The literal rendering is: "eat, for at (or unto) the time (or festival) it was preserved for thee, saying (this is the word which makes the grammatical difficulty), the people I have invited."—Tr.] The translation: "for it is kept for thee for the time when I said, I have invited the people," is unclear (De Wette, Keil), and labors under the rendering "when I said" for לֵאמֹר ["saying"]. Thenius (following the Sept., and reading לֵאמֹר for לֵאמֹר, and קָרָאתִי for קָרָאתִי) renders: "it has been kept for thee for a sign with (or, in reference to) the people (namely, that thou from now on will be the first), fall to (that is, begin)," against which Böttcher shows that מוֹעֵד cannot mean sign, and that this conjectured text is untenable (p. 114 in loco). But Böttcher's own view is equally untenable: he holds that an Accus. Pron. has fallen out (for קָרָאתִי stood originally

* [Others suppose that it was not the right shoulder, because Samuel was not a priest.—Tr.]

† [Others think it equally clear that these words were spoken by the cook.—Tr.]

אֶת־ or לְהַ), and renders: "eat, for to the end (or for the time) it has been kept for thee, that the people might say (think), I have invited thee (or him)." But the people knew without this that he had invited this guest; no special indication of the invitation was needed, and the reserved portion would rather suggest a reference to the distinction thus conferred on Saul, as Themius rightly remarks. Themius further supposes that the original reading may have been "invited him" (אֶת־קָרָאָה), and renders: "to this end it is kept for thee, in order (thereby) to say, the people have invited him," that is, he came in accordance with the general desire as honored guest, as chief person. But for this sense there is no historical authority; for the reservation of the portion of honor had nothing to do with an invitation of Saul by the people, and this invitation was in fact given by Samuel alone. Ewald (ubi sup., p. 29, Rem. 3)* renders: "for a sign that thou wast invited before the rest of the people (ver. 22), or that thou art marked out from the rest of the people," which gives no clear sense. Bunsen retains the masoretic text, and translates: "the chief portion was kept for thee to this time; the meal was in fact arranged in honor of thee, as chief person, though I said, the people of the place shall be guests," but himself admits that this is somewhat forced. "Though I said" is still less possible as translation of לֵאמֹר than "when I said." All the difficulties centre in this word. If a corruption of the text is to be supposed, it seems best to adopt Haug's reading (see in Bunsen) לֵאמֹר, and translate: "it was kept for thee for the feast, or festive gathering, to which I invited the people." Luther: "for it was reserved for thee just at this time when I invited the people." The sense of Samuel's words is, that he knew by divine revelation (vers. 15, 16) that he would come. He sees a divine providence in Saul's coming just at this time. In accordance with the intimation which he had received from above, he showed honor not merely to the guest as such, but to him whom God had chosen king of Israel, for such Samuel by the divine instruction had recognized him to be (ver. 17). [As it stands, the Heb. of this clause does not admit of translation, the vas. do not suggest a satisfactory reading (Chald. follows Heb. literally, and Syr. omits the words "saying, I have invited the people"), and the emendations proposed are all unsatisfactory. Yet the purpose seems clearly to be to inform Saul that this was not a chance-piece that was offered him, but one that had been set aside for him when the feast was prepared. This at once showed the intention to confer honor on Saul, and exhibited the prophetic foresight of Samuel.—Tr.]

Vers. 25-27. Samuel's secret conversation with Saul. This took place, according to the narrative, on two occasions, and its purpose was, as the context shows, to prepare Saul for the important announcement that God had chosen him to be king, and for its confirmation by the act of anointing. Ver. 25. After the return from the feast on the height, Samuel receives Saul into his house. He spoke with Saul on the roof.—

There is no ground for adopting (with Then. and Ew.) the text of the Sept.* "and they prepared (indef. subj.) Saul a bed on the roof, and he lay down." To the Heb. text (which is supported by Chald., Syr., Arab., and Jerome) the Vulgate makes an addition "probably from the Itala" (Keil): "Saul spread a bed on the roof and slept." This is a circumstantial description of what was self-evident from the connection (see ver. 26). Our text, on the contrary, furnishes simply the fact, the mention of which is of great importance for the pragmatical connection of the events related. The unmentioned subject-matter of the talk is not the election of Saul to be king (according to ver. 27). Themius, wrongly assuming this to be the subject-matter, regards this talk as premature. Samuel prepared Saul for the important communication which he had to make to him, having already before the feast given him an indefinite hint (ver. 20) of the honor that awaited him. This conversation (ver. 25) is the connecting link between that on the height and the communication which Samuel made to Saul the following morning. The flat roof, arranged so that stay on it was safe (Deut. xxii. 8), was the place to which people withdrew for quiet contemplation, prayer, undisturbed conversation and rest, and where also a guest-chamber was arranged, the place of honor of the house, comp. 1 Kings xvii. 19 with 2 Kings iv. 10. There Saul slept (ver. 26). The conversation which Samuel there held with Saul, probably at the close of the day, referred, as Otto von Gerlach well remarks, "not to the royal dignity, but surely to the deep religious and political decline of the people of God, the opposition of the heathen, the causes of the impotency to oppose these enemies, the necessity of a religious change in the people, and of a leader thoroughly obedient to the Lord."—Ver. 26. And they arose early—each from his bed. What follows is a different thing from this—for the words: And when the morning dawned, etc. state not the rising from sleep, but the getting up and getting ready to depart; they are neither an exacter definition of "and they rose early," as Keil thinks, who renders: "And they arose early in the morning—namely, at day-dawn," nor is it a "singular mode of narration" (as Themius says) to write first "they arose early," and then "when the day dawned," as if we could not suppose that they rose before the dawn, especially after so exciting a conversation the preceding evening and night, and as if Samuel's call to Saul, "rise," were not more naturally to be understood of preparation for the journey than of rising from sleep. That they are to be so taken is evident from the following words, "that I may send thee away," from Samuel's calling to Saul up on the roof, and from the words, "and he arose, and they both went out" (on the street).† [In spite of Dr. Erdmann's ingenious

* Writing וַיַּעַל שְׂאֵל לְשָׁכְנוֹ Instead of וַיַּעַל שְׂאֵל, and closing ver. 25 with וַיֵּשְׁכֶּב [instead of וַיֵּשְׁכְמוּ in ver. 26.—Tr.]

† There is no need to substitute the Qeri הִנֵּה for the Kethib הִנֵּה. Böttcher: "The Accusative-vowel א, like the case-vowel י, is often without any literal sign." [mater lectionis].

* קָרָאָה or קָרָאָה, and renders: "eat, for to the end (or for the time) it has been kept for thee, that the people might say (think), I have invited thee (or him)." But the people knew without this that he had invited this guest; no special indication of the invitation was needed, and the reserved portion would rather suggest a reference to the distinction thus conferred on Saul, as Themius rightly remarks. Themius further supposes that the original reading may have been "invited him" (אֶת־קָרָאָה), and renders: "to this end it is kept for thee, in order (thereby) to say, the people have invited him," that is, he came in accordance with the general desire as honored guest, as chief person. But for this sense there is no historical authority; for the reservation of the portion of honor had nothing to do with an invitation of Saul by the people, and this invitation was in fact given by Samuel alone. Ewald (ubi sup., p. 29, Rem. 3)* renders: "for a sign that thou wast invited before the rest of the people (ver. 22), or that thou art marked out from the rest of the people," which gives no clear sense. Bunsen retains the masoretic text, and translates: "the chief portion was kept for thee to this time; the meal was in fact arranged in honor of thee, as chief person, though I said, the people of the place shall be guests," but himself admits that this is somewhat forced. "Though I said" is still less possible as translation of לֵאמֹר than "when I said." All the difficulties centre in this word. If a corruption of the text is to be supposed, it seems best to adopt Haug's reading (see in Bunsen) לֵאמֹר, and translate: "it was kept for thee for the feast, or festive gathering, to which I invited the people." Luther: "for it was reserved for thee just at this time when I invited the people." The sense of Samuel's words is, that he knew by divine revelation (vers. 15, 16) that he would come. He sees a divine providence in Saul's coming just at this time. In accordance with the intimation which he had received from above, he showed honor not merely to the guest as such, but to him whom God had chosen king of Israel, for such Samuel by the divine instruction had recognized him to be (ver. 17). [As it stands, the Heb. of this clause does not admit of translation, the vas. do not suggest a satisfactory reading (Chald. follows Heb. literally, and Syr. omits the words "saying, I have invited the people"), and the emendations proposed are all unsatisfactory. Yet the purpose seems clearly to be to inform Saul that this was not a chance-piece that was offered him, but one that had been set aside for him when the feast was prepared. This at once showed the intention to confer honor on Saul, and exhibited the prophetic foresight of Samuel.—Tr.]

defence of the Heb. text, the reading of the Sept. has much to recommend it. It accords better with the character of Hebrew historical narration (which delights in detailing self-evident circumstances), agrees better with the simple, objective nature of the transaction between Samuel and Saul (a protracted political and religious conversation between the two men hardly suits Saul's character, as far as we know it), and removes the somewhat difficult necessity of supposing that they rose before the dawn. (If this had occurred, the Heb. would hardly have failed to mention it; nor is it quite natural to think of the rustic youth Saul, wearied with the walk and the ceremony of the day, as so excited by a general conversation (in which, according to Erdmann and ver. 27, nothing was said of his elevation to the throne) as to be unable to sleep his accustomed time, and so rising before the dawn—some time before, it would seem—and remaining on the roof till he is called, how employed, it is not said). On the other hand, the reading of the Sept. gives a simple and natural narrative: "and a bed was spread for Saul on the roof, and he lay down, and it came to pass when the morning dawned," etc.; and whatever conversation was proper under the circumstances may be understood. Throughout the narrative is occupied with objective facts, and not with interior psychological descriptions, as we should expect in a modern work. Thus not a word is said of Samuel's labors among the people preceding the great popular movement in chap. vii.; nor is he elsewhere ever said to have had private conversations with his sons, with Saul, or with David. He may have had these, but it is not the manner of the narrative to mention them.—TR.]—Ver. 27. As a mark of honor, Samuel accompanies Saul, and, when they reached the extremity of the city, directs him to send the servant on, in order that he might be alone with him, and impart to him in confidential conversation what the Lord had revealed concerning his appointment to be king of Israel. That I may show thee the word of God.—Up to this time he had said nothing to him of his choice as king. The declaration "I will show thee" is not to be understood (with Dächsel) as the "factual fulfilment" of that word, but as the introduction and announcement of its content. It is not related what Samuel said to Saul, since that is evident from the immediately following fact, the anointing of Saul. The whole ninth chapter sets forth the preparation of Saul for this communication and anointing, which were at first meant for him alone, and confirmed to him his call to be king of Israel. In regard to the preceding conversations, Calvin remarks: God is said to have instructed Saul in good time, so that when he came to the throne he might not be ignorant of his duties, but yet to have trained him gradually, and indeed (a point worthy of attention) not openly, but, as it were, in secret."

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The preparations (in ch. ix.) for carrying out the divine decision in reference to the kingdom of Israel to be established exhibit the prophetic office, represented by Samuel, as here also the immediate organ of God, to execute God's positive command:

"make them a king." In Samuel's person and in his conduct and discourse towards Saul is concentrated the combination of two factors: divine revelation, which lays hold immediately of the general history of Israel as well as of the little affairs of an unknown family, and the earthly-human factor, which shows itself in apparently accidental and trivial occurrences; but at the same time is exhibited the absolute control of the divine providence, which, independently of human-earthly views and relations, employing apparently unimportant human accidents and trivial occurrences, yet, to secure the highest ends of God's kingdom, advances firmly and securely, though by circuitous ways, to the appointed goal. And this goal is the realization of the theocracy in a new form, in the form of the kingdom, which was based on the essential character of the theocracy and the character of the times, though it was sinfully demanded by the people out of envy of the splendor of royalty among the heathen, and dissatisfaction with the invisible glory of Jehovah's kingdom.

2. The choice of Saul to be king, and the circumstances which prepared the way for his consecration and anointing, as well as his meeting with Samuel, constitute a divine act which enters immediately into the history of Israel, in which we must recognize: 1) The condescension of God, both to human weakness and sin (which, as in the sinful longing after a king, must subserve the plans of His providence), and also to the seemingly smallest and most unimportant events of human life, which, as here the lost asses and Saul's search after them, must be the foil to set off His providential government and the accomplishment of His purposes. Without meaning to set forth a mechanical theory of inspiration, we may exclaim with Hamann: "How has God the Holy Ghost stooped, to become a historian of the smallest, most contemptible affairs on earth, in order to reveal to man, in his own language, in his own business, in his own ways, the purposes, the secrets, and the ways of the Deity?" 2) The independence of earthly and human relations in God's counsel and deed, shown in the fact that not a notable man of a prominent family was chosen for this high calling, but an unknown man, "from the smallest family of the smallest of the tribes" (ix. 21) without His knowledge or desire. 3) God's free grace is not conditioned on human conduct. Calvin: "Only by a special exhibition of divine grace did Saul come to this high dignity. By choosing him from the smallest and most insignificant tribe, God purposed to glorify His grace, and exclude all appearance of human coöperation." Ewald: "Qualified for the royal office, he does not seek to obtain it; for a great good, gained by artful effort of one-sided human grasping, can never become a true one. And so it is a charming history—how Saul, sent to seek the lost asses, after a long and vain search, comes, on the third day, almost against his will, to Samuel, whom he scarcely knew, to ask him about them, and instead of them to receive from him a kingdom. For He, who purposes just at this time to establish the kingdom in Israel, has already chosen him before he knows it." (Gesch. III. 27, 28.) 4) The wisdom of the divine providence, which so guides and orders what seems to be accidental and trivial, that it is subservient to His ends, and procures their accomplishment. Calvin: "What seems to our reason accident, God makes into a sign that the seemingly fortuitous is to be referred to the admirable plans of His providence, and is ruled and guided by God's hand, though against this our thoughts protest. Saul wanders uncertainly around, and thinks only how he shall find the asses; meantime, Divine Providence, which had already determined and revealed to Samuel his lot, does not sleep. So all these incidents and wanderings were only preparations and mediate causes by which God accomplished His design concerning Saul. By God's ordainment the asses were lost, that Saul, in seeking them, might find Samuel; God guided the tongue of his father when He commanded him to go in search of the asses; it was God's providence that directed the steps of Saul and his servants, as they went from one place to another, in order to bring them to Samuel."

3. The conditions under which alone the theocratic king as such could hold and exercise his office in Israel, as typically set forth in Saul's elevation to the throne, were: 1) natural, in respect to his person, which must be such, in body and soul, as worthily to sustain the royal office; 2) supernatural, namely, divine choice and equipment; "to the man, feeble in himself, the grace and predestination of God comes to help him with its complete strength for this highest of all callings, to complete him, with the required divine power and holy consecration of mind, into that for which he was naturally endowed" (Ewald); 3) historical, confirmatory signs; these are partly signs given by God in definite occurrences, which attest the royal call to the people, partly the man's own deeds, which accord with and confirm the royal call; 4) ethical, absolute dependence on the divine will in all thought, word and action; the king must "never forget the beginning from which he sprang, and so must always remember that another, the Eternal King, is still above him,—and that any earthly king can be a king after the heart of the King of all kings only so far as he works together with God, and therefore with all spiritual truths." (Ew. Gesch. III. 25.) To this fourth condition Samuel's words referred: "All that is in thy heart I will show thee." See Exposition.

4. The account of Samuel's conduct in this stadium of the preparation for the establishment of the kingdom in the person of Saul characterizes the prophet: 1) in his position towards God in respect to this beginning of a new phase of development of the theocracy: by direct enlightenment of the divine Spirit it is revealed to him that the king of Israel has already been chosen by God (vers. 15, 16), who is chosen (ver. 17), and what he has to announce to him in God's name (ver. 27); 2) in his conduct as organ of God towards the designated king, Saul, and in him towards the kingdom: he gradually prepares his mind for the revelation concerning his future calling which he has to make to him in God's name; through the divine enlightenment he is able not only to instruct him as to his lofty mission and position in Israel, but also, by means of his intensified presaging-faculty, to deliver him from the lower earthly care which filled his heart; this declaration about the recovered asses is not merely an example "of accidental predictions, where the presaging-faculty, disjoined from its ethical aim, becomes subservient to the subjective interest" (Tholuck, Die Propheten, 2d ed., p. 14), but is an element in the whole organism of this first prophetic history of the Old Testament—an element which is determined by the divine purpose in Samuel's communication to Saul respecting "the most precious in Israel" which was to be his; by this communication Saul's soul was to be lifted up into the presence of his God, that in His light he might see the glory of his theocratic calling; to lead him to this point, Samuel must free his soul from the burden of care for the beasts, and release him from his duty in respect to them; the certainty that the asses were found (divinely revealed to Samuel) gave Saul the inward freeness and receptivity which he needed in order to advance step by step to the height to which Samuel's words (ver. 27) lead. Thus this prophetic prediction concerning something altogether external and trivial has in this connection a high ethical and psychological importance, and is subservient to the objective theocratic interest. It belonged to the pedagogic moments in the conduct of the prophet towards the future king, among which also we must reckon that which is indicated in the words: "All that is in thy heart I will show thee." Samuel searched into Saul's inner being in its good and bad sides.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. OSLANDER: That which is despised before the world, God chooses and brings forward, 1 Cor. i. 26 sq.—Ver. 3 sq. CRAMER: God makes in His great matters an insignificant beginning.—Ver. 4. CALVIN: How wonderful are the ways of God's wisdom, which lie far remote from human expectation. We see here how winding go the ways of God, so that it seems as if there were only an uncertain swaying to and fro; but yet with Him there is always a clear light away into the infinite, and what proceeds from Him is never confused and fortuitous. We draw from this the wholesome lesson that God leads us by His hand like blind men, and that we should ascribe nothing to our own prudence and exertion when anything great becomes our portion. Our thoughts were not only far removed from that which finally happens, but exactly opposed to it.—Ver. 6. STARKE: Man's doing is not in his own power, and no one can mark out his own going.—Even insignificant people can often give wholesome counsels, 2 Kings v. 13; vii. 13. [The servant teaching the master. In like manner many an eminent minister has learned true religion from some servant or humble acquaintance. The lowly are often unconsciously training others for lofty station.—Tr.]—Ver. 9. CRAMER: Teachers are seers, for through preaching they open our eyes, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, 2 Cor. iv. 6.—S. SCHMID: Even the meeting of men, whether for good or evil, is not a matter of chance, but is directed by divine Providence, Acts viii. 29 sq. [Vers. 3-8. MATT. HENRY: Here is: I. A great man rising from small beginnings. II. A great event rising from small occurrences. "Peradventure he can show us." To make prophecy, the glory of Israel, serve so mean a turn as this, discovered too plainly what manner of spirit they were of. Note, most people would rather be told their fortune than told their duty; how to be rich than how to be saved. If it were the business of the men of God to direct for the recovery of lost asses, they would be consulted much more than they are, now that it is their business to direct for the recovery of lost souls.—TR.]

Vers. 1-14. J. DISSELHOFF: The first test to which God subjects His servant. It embraces two main points: 1) Whether with certain natural talents and advantages which God has given him he will in humility and quiet obedience do the work enjoined upon him; 2) Whether when his work proves useless he will seek help from the seer of God.—The Most High God appoints a testing for His servant Saul; and so whoever is summoned to the service of God knows that for him also there must be a testing.—“Seek the asses,” said Kish to his son Saul. “And he went!”—went silently, joyously, humbly, obediently, faithfully, to the work which was enjoined upon him, from Ephraim to Shalisha—unwearied, unreluctant, without grumbling, although it was a work in which no greater credit was to be won than that of fidelity in trifles.—Out of such people God can make something.—Go, friend, if you wish to be the Lord’s servant, even though you should have to walk in unknown ways. Saul did not shrink from them.—Ver. 5. Why was Saul’s labor in vain? He had to find the seer, the man experienced in the ways of God. The vain seeking, the servant who first spoke of the seer, the maidens who showed the way, all must contribute towards bringing Saul to seek help in the revelation of God. If now it should occur to these also that every thing here miscarries, that you are nothing, and you already feel like saying to your heart, “Come, let us go home again,” then to these also there will doubtless some one cry out, “Well, to revelation, that you may know the wonderful ways of God, on which God leads His saints.”—Wait not till God Himself steps into thy way. Even to Saul God did not Himself speak. A servant began it; maidens drawing water showed the way. See how smoothly and simply God causes all that to occur, as it were, without noise and uproar. The God of the lowly and quiet chooses also for his feet quiet, lowly, shady ways. [Vers. 1-10. The youth of Saul: 1) He was reared in good circumstances (ver. 1); 2) He was remarkable for his great stature and manly beauty (ver. 2; x. 24); 3) A quiet rustic, little acquainted with matters away from home (ver. 6); 4) Tenderly considerate of his father’s feelings (ver. 5); 5) Ready to take advice (ver. 10) [HALL: The chief praise is to be able to give good advice; the next is to take it]; 6) Very modest and courteous (ver. 21). With these pleasing traits might be compared the character corrupted in his later years by unbelieving disobedience towards God, by jealousy, by the exercise of despotic power, etc., and at every point there would be useful lessons.—TR.]

Ver. 16. STARKE: Even those things which arise from the free will of man, and appear as if they happened by chance, lie under the secret providence and government of God. Well is it then for those who in faith and tranquillity give themselves up to God’s guidance (Pa. cxxxix. 5).

—HALL: The eye of God’s providence sees not only all our deeds, but also all our movements; we can go nowhere without Him; He numbers all our steps (Psa. cxxxix. 1 sq.).—[Vers. 11-17. The supernatural coöperating with the natural. Saul, by natural means, through the control of Providence, is brought to Samuel, who has been supernaturally prepared to receive and instruct him. So now the teachings of Providence unite with the teachings of revelation and of the Holy Spirit, to show men their duty and their destiny.—TR.]
—Ver. 21. CRAMER: Humility is a beautiful virtue; and he whom God exalts to honors should think often of the dust in which he before lay, and from which he has been exalted (Psalm cxlii. 7, 8). [HALL: How kindly doth Samuel entertain and invite Saul, yet it was he only that should receive wrong by the future royalty of Saul. Who would not have looked that aged Samuel should have emulated rather the glory of his young rival, and have looked churlishly upon the man that should rob him of his authority?—TR.]

BERLEB. BIBLE: When God has chosen a man to help others, and he rightly knows himself, nothing causes him such wonder and amazement as a revelation of God’s purpose concerning him. This distrust, however, does not put an end to his obedience to the will of God. For the more a man is convinced of his own nothingness, so much the more is he also convinced of the power of God, as the One who makes every thing out of nothing.—Vers. 26, 27. Saul must wait patiently till God should bring him out of concealment and make it manifest who he was. So should we also, if God has lent us gifts and wishes them to remain concealed with us, not be displeased at the fact that they are not recognized, and that we get no recognition and admiration for them, but quietly wait until the Lord Himself, as it seemeth Him good, carries further the matter He has begun, and Himself secures for it recompense and recognition.—Thus God often deals wonderfully with us, when He so tests our humility and modesty, and so leads us on His ways, that our reason cannot comprehend them. The beginnings of His matters are often so insignificant and little, that outwardly nothing appears but great weakness, and absolutely nothing great and wonderful comes forward, in order that we may learn to hope against hope.

Vers. 15-27 sq. DISSELHOFF: The call to the service of God. The history of Saul’s call brings before our eyes three points: 1) What an abundant blessing there is for obedience—the call to the service of God; 2) What a great danger lies hid in this blessing—idle self-exaltation because of this call; 3) To what a blessed stillness the danger leads when overcome—to preparation for the calling. [Contrast Saul the king and Saul the apostle. WORDSWORTH: Saul the king is our warning; Saul the apostle is our example. The former shows how wretched man is if he labors for his own glory, and if he is without God’s grace; the latter, how blessed he is if he relies on God’s grace, and lives and dies for His glory.—Good trains of thought for sermons are indicated above in HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL, No. 2 and No. 3.—TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

Saul's Introduction into the Royal Office.

CHAPTER X. 1-27.

I. Saul anointed by Samuel. Ver. 1.

- 1 THEN [AND] Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured¹ it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not² because the Lord [Jehovah] hath anointed thee to be captain [prince] over his inheritance?

II. The Signs of the Divine Confirmation given to Saul. Vers. 2-16.

- 2 When thou art departed [goest] from me to-day, then [om. then] thou shalt [wilt] find two men by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah; and they will say unto [to] thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found; and lo, thy father hath left the care³ of the asses, and sorroweth for you, saying,
3 What shall I do for my son? Then [And] thou shalt go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain [oak]⁴ of Tabor, and there [ins. three men] shall meet thee three men [om. three men] going up to God to Bethel, one carrying three kids, and another carrying three⁵ loaves of bread, and another carrying a bottle of 4 wine. And they will salute thee,⁶ and give thee two loaves of bread, which thou
5 shalt receive of their hands. After that thou shalt [wilt] come to the hill of God,⁷ where is the garrison of the Philistines;⁸ and it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt [wilt] meet a company of prophets⁹ coming down from the high place, with [ins. and before them, om. with] a psaltery and a tabret and a pipe and a harp before them [om. before them], and they shall prophesy [prophesying]; And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] will come upon thee, and thou shalt [wilt] prophesy with them, and shalt [wilt] be turned into another
6 man. And let it be [om. let it be], when these signs are come unto thee, that [om. that] thou do [do thou] as occasion serve thee [what thy hand findeth]; for God¹⁰
7 is with thee. And thou shalt go¹¹ down before me to Gilgal, and behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings; seven days shalt thou tarry till I come to thee, and show thee what thou shalt do.
8
9 And it was so [came to pass] that, when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart; and all these signs came to pass that day. And

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. פָּשַׁק. Qal. Impf. of פָּשַׁק.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 1. On the Sept. insertion here see Expos.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 2. Lit. "hath put aside the affair."—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. אֵלֶּךָ, rendered "oak" by all the ancient versions except Chald. The Eng. A. V. always translates it "plain" (though it gives the similar words אֵלֶּךָ, אֵלֶּךָ, אֵלֶּךָ always by "oak" or some other name of a tree), apparently following Targ., Raschi, Kimchi. The origin of this Jewish rendering is perhaps to be sought in or connected with the Syriac—alung—"places abounding in gardens"—a "plain" or "place abounding in trees" being regarded as more appropriate than an "oak." Others make it here a proper name, Elon-Tabor.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. Note the form of the Heb. numeral, masc. though the subst. is fem. (Wellh.).—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 4. Lit. "ask after thy peace (or welfare)."—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 5. Chald.: "the hill on which is the ark of Jehovah."—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 5. Wellhausen takes this clause as subst., not adj.; that is, not as describing the hill (or, as some read, Gibeah) of God, but as indicating a particular spot on or near the hill. The rendering "Gibeah of God" (Bib. Comm.) is very unusual and hard, and it is no objection to the appellative rendering here that the same word (Gibeah) is a proper name elsewhere in this chapter (vers. 10, 26).—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 5. Chald.: Sopherim "scribes."—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 7. The Chald. renders: "the word of Jehovah"—an appellation which is usually compared with the Logos of the New Test.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 8. Erdmann makes this a general relative clause: "and when thou goest." See his discussion in the Expos. and Introd.—Ta.]

- 10 when they came thither to the hill [to Gibeah],¹² behold a company of prophets met him, and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them.
 11 And it came to pass, when all that knew him beforetime saw that behold [and behold] he prophesied among the prophets,¹³ then the people said one to another, What is this that is come [What has happened] unto [to] the son of Kish? Is 12 Saul also among the prophets? And one of the same place answered and said, But [And] who is their¹⁴ father? Therefore it became a proverb, Is Saul also among 13 the prophets? And when he had made an end of prophesying, he came to the 14 high place.¹⁵ And Saul's uncle said unto [to] him and to his servant, Whither went ye? And he said, To seek the asses; and when we saw that they were no 15 where,¹⁶ we came [went] to Samuel. And Saul's uncle said, Tell me, I pray thee, 16 what Samuel said unto [to] you. And Saul said unto [to] his uncle, He told us plainly [om. plainly]¹⁷ that the asses were found. But of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spake, he told him not.

III. The Choice by Lot. Vers. 17-21.

- 17 And Samuel called the people together unto the Lord [to Jehovah] to Mizpeh 18 [Mizpah]. And [ins. he] said unto [to] the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians,¹⁸ and out of the hand of all [ins. the] kingdoms and 19 of them [om. and of them] that oppressed¹⁹ you. And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations, and ye [om. ye] have said unto him [om. unto him], Nay [Nay],²⁰ but [ins. a king thou shalt] set a king [om. a king] over us. Now, therefore [And now], present
 20 yourselves before the Lord [Jehovah] by your tribes and by your thousands. And when [om. when] Samuel had [om. had] caused all the tribes of Israel to come 21 near, [ins. and] the tribe of Benjamin was taken. [Ins. And] When [om. when] he had [om. had] caused the tribe of Benjamin to come near by their families [ins. and] the family of Matri [the Matrites] was taken.²¹ And Saul, the son of Kish, was taken; and when [om. when] they sought him, [ins. and] he could not be found.

IV. The Installation into the Royal Office. Proclamation. Greeting. Royal Right. Return to Quiet Life. Vers. 22-27.

- 22 Therefore [And] they inquired of the Lord [Jehovah] further, if the man should [would] yet come thither.²² And the Lord answered [Jehovah said], Behold, he 23 hath hid himself [is hidden] among the stuff [baggage]. And they ran and fetched him thence; and when [om. when] he stood²³ among the people [ins. and] he was 24 higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward. And Samuel said to all the people, See ye him whom the Lord [Jehovah] hath chosen, that there is

¹² [Ver. 10. The place here mentioned is almost certainly Gibeah, Saul's place of residence, and may or may not be the same with the "hill of God" in ver. 5.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 11. Erdmann takes this clause to be a quotation, but the Heb. does not favor this. Here the verb rendered "prophecy" is Niphal, while in ver. 10, 5, 6 it is Hithpael. According to Dr. R. Payne Smith, the former indicates true prophetic utterance, the latter merely acting the part of a prophet (Bampton Lectures for 1869, pp. 53-58); but this distinction must not be pressed too far.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 12. Sept., Syr., Arab. have "his father;" see Erdmann's discussion in Expos. Chald. has "their master (Kib)."—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 13. For "high place" (בִּמְדָּה) Wellhausen would read unnecessarily "house" (בֵּית) (הֵבֵר).—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 14. "That they were not" (comp. Gen. xlii. 36); that is, not to be found.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 16. The Inf. Absol., for which this adverb is too definite.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 18. Sept.: "The hand of Pharaoh, king of Egypt,"—a variation for the sake of distinctness or accuracy.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 18. Constructio ad sensum: the kingdoms representing their inhabitants. The Partec. is made masc.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 19. The text has יָלֵךְ, "to him," and so Erdmann reads. Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab. read נָא, "nay,"—and this is required by the following יָלֵךְ. Eng. A. V. reads "to him," and then inserts the "nay,"—thus combining the two readings. So, too, the Chald., which, however, here paraphrases: instead of "rejected God," it has "rejected the service of God" (to avoid apparent irreverence), and makes the people say: "We are not saved, but thou shalt set," etc.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 21. On the insertion of the Sept.: "and they cause the family of Mattari to come near by individuals," see Erdmann in the Expos.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 22. The Heb. reads literally: "has any other man come hither?" and so Erdmann translates; but it was unnecessary to ask Jehovah this, nor does Jehovah's answer correspond to it. The Syr., conforming the question to the answer, reads "where is this man?" which, however, cannot be gotten from the Heb. The Eng. A. V. represents the text of the Sept. and Vulg., the word "man" having the Article, and this reading is approved by Thénius, Bib. Comm., and others, and opposed by Kell and Erdmann. See the Expos.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 23. Lit. "placed or presented himself."—Ta.]

none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, God save [Long live]²⁴ the king.

25 And Samuel told the people the manner²⁵ of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book,²⁶ and laid it up before the Lord [Jehovah]. And Samuel sent all the people away, 26 every man to his house. And Saul also went home to Gibeah; and there w. nt 27 with him a band of men,²⁷ whose hearts God had touched. But [And] the children of Belial [certain wicked men] said, How shall this man save us? And they despised him, and brought him no presents. But he held his peace [And he was as though he were deaf].²⁷

²⁴ [Ver. 24. Lit. "may the king live."—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 25. מִשְׁפָּט is rendered by Erdmann "right or privilege" (recht); see on viii. 11. The Heb. Art. in מִשְׁפָּט ("the book") is correctly represented in Eng. by the Indef. Art., since the defining circumstances are left wholly unmentioned.—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 26. Erdmann: "the band of valiant (or honest, braver männer) men." Philippeon: des tapferen, "the valiant men." Cahen: les gens de guerre, "the men of war." The Heb. word (לְבָרִים) is a military one, "the host."

But it can hardly mean that the army went with Saul, and so the Vulg. renders "a part of the army." The Chald. paraphrase does not help us: "a part of the people who feared sin;" the Syriac renders literally by the same word as the Heb. The Sept. reading, "sons of might," that is, "the better class of men," "the men of honor and reputation," is more satisfactory, on which see Expos.—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 27. Heb. "as a deaf man," or, "as one that did not observe." The Eng. A. V. omits the particle "as."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

I. Ver. 1. The anointing. It is performed without witnesses in secret (ix. 27), and is the factual confirmation to Saul of what Samuel had before told him in God's name of his call to the kingdom. The vial (יָד, from יָדַד, "to drop, flow," in Pi. only Ex. xlvii. 2) is a narrow-necked vessel, from which the oil flowed in drops. The oil, we must suppose, was not of the ordinary sort, but the holy anointing-oil (Ex. xxix. 7, xxx. 23-33, xxvii. 29) which, according to the Law, was used in the consecration of the sacred vessels and the priests. To this refers the expression "the vial of oil;" and it is supported by the analogy of the priest's consecration with the consecrated oil (Lev. viii. 12), which, according to Ex. xxx. 31, was to be a holy oil throughout all generations, and by the use here and 2 Kings ix. 8 of the word (פֶּיֶר), which is proper to the anointing of the high-priest. Besides, on account of the significance of the oil of priestly consecration, Samuel would have used no other in the consecration of the sacred person of the theocratic king. Anointing as a solemn usage in the consecration of a king is referred to as early as Judg. ix. 8, 15, and, besides Saul here, is expressly mentioned as performed on other kings, on David (xvi. 3; 2 Sam. ii. 4; v. 3), Absalom (2 Sam. xix. 11), Solomon (1 Kings i. 39), Joash (2 Kings xi. 12), Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii. 30), and Jehu (2 Kings ix. 3). In case of regular succession the anointing was supposed to continue its effect [that is, the regular successor needed no new anointing—such is the view of the Rabbis—Ta.]; whence is explained the fact that only the above kings are mentioned as having been anointed [they being all founders of dynasties, or irregularly advanced to the throne.—Ta.] (Oehl., Herz. R.-E. VIII. 10 sq.). On account of this anointing the theocratic king was called "the Anointed of the Lord." Whence we see the general significance of the act: The Anointed was consecrated, sanctified to God; by the anointing the king is holy and unassailable (1 Sam. xxiv. 7; xxvi. 9; 2 Sam. xix. 22). It signifies, however, further in especial the equipment with the powers and gifts of the Spirit of God and the blessing of the salvation which is bestowed in them (comp. xvi. 13). In accordance with the significance of the act of anointing it is narrated in vers. 9, 10 how the Spirit of God came upon Saul. While the anointing thus set forth the divine consecration from above, the kiss, which Samuel then gave Saul, was the sign of the human recognition of his royal dignity, the expression of reverence and homage, as in Ps. ii. 12. The kiss, seldom on the mouth, generally on the hand, knee, or garment [among modern Beduins on the forehead—Ta.], has always been in the East the universal sign of subordination and subjection, and is so yet, as also among the Slavic nations. The kissing of idols (their feet) is mentioned as a religious usage (1 Kings xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2; Job xxxi. 27). The word with which Samuel turns to Saul after the anointing: Is it not that the Lord hath anointed thee? is witness and confirmation to him that Samuel is only the instrument in God's hand in the consecration, that it is God's act.

(The וְהָיָה, with the following '3, signifies "yes, surely." Clericus: an interrogation, instead of an affirmation"). Prince over his inheritance. מֶלֶךְ, "leader, prince." "His inheritance" is Israel, not only because of the great deliverance out of Egypt, Deut. iv. 20 (Keil), but also on the ground of the divine choice of Israel out of the mass of the heathen nations to be His own people (Ex. xix. 5). The Sept. rendering in vers. 1, 2 is as follows: "hath not the Lord anointed thee ruler over his people, over Israel? And thou shalt rule over the people of the Lord, and thou shalt save them out of the hand of their enemies. And this be to thee the sign that the Lord hath anointed thee ruler over his inheritance." This last clause "that . . . inheritance" is the literal translation of the Masoretic text. The Vulg. has these words in the first sentence: "behold, the Lord hath anointed thee prince over his inheritance;" then follows the addition: "and thou shalt deliver his people out of the hands of their enemies round about. And this is the sign to thee that the Lord hath anointed thee prince." These words of the Sept. and Vulg. are, however, not (with Then.) to be used to fill up a supposed gap in the text: We are rather to adopt Keil's remark that the Alex. text is merely a gloss from ix. 16, 17, introduced because the translator did not understand the "is it not that?", and especially because he did not see how Samuel could speak to Saul of signs [ver. 7] without having before announced them as such. The gloss assumes that Samuel wished merely to give Saul a sign that the Lord had anointed him prince. On the contrary, as Keil points out, Samuel gave Saul not a sign (σημεῖον, אֵימָן), but three signs, and declares (ver. 7) their purpose to be, that, on their occurrence, Saul should know what he had to do, Jehovah being with him.

II. Vers. 2-16. The divine signs. Three signs are given Saul by Samuel in his capacity of prophet, as a confirmation to him that he is now, according to the divine consecration, also really the king of Israel, and under the immediate guidance of the Lord (vers. 2; 3, 4; 5, 6).

The first sign, ver. 2: The meeting with two men of his native place, who will inform him that the asses are found, and his father anxious about him. According to these words, the sepulchre of Rachel must have been not far from Ramah, whence Saul started. With this agrees Jer. xxxi. 15: "a voice is heard in Ramah,—Rachel weeping for her children." The declaration in Matt. ii. 18, that the mourning of the women of Bethlehem for their slaughtered children is the fulfilment of this word of Jeremiah, does not affirm or suppose that Rachel's grave was near Bethlehem, and therefore far from Ramah south of Jerusalem, for it is not a local, but a personal-real similarity, namely, between the mournings in the two cases, that is intended to be set forth. According to our passage, Rachel's grave must have been north of Jerusalem on the road between Ramah and Gibeah; and thus the view prevalent since the Middle Ages, that Rachel's tomb was near Bethlehem, and somewhat north of it, is shown to be incorrect. In support of this view are cited the passages Gen. xxxv. 16-20 and xlviii. 7, where Rachel's sepulchre is said to have been a kibrah of land "as one goes to Ephrah," and "on the road to Ephrah," and in respect to Ephrah the explanation is added: "which is now called Bethlehem" (comp. 1 Sam. xvii. 12; Mic. v. 2); but these indefinite expressions (kibrah is merely tract, see 2 Kings v. 19 sq.) may, as Winer correctly remarks (Bibl. R.-W. s. v. Rachel, II., 299), be so understood as to extend to Ramah. So Ewald: "Here, as in Genesis, we may very well understand the northern boundary of Benjamin, beginning somewhat southeast from Ramallah" (III. 31, Rem.). If, however, in Genesis Rachel's grave be taken to be (as the narrator intends) not far from Ephrah, then, on account of the indubitable proximity of the grave to Ramah, this Ephrah cannot be the Bethlehem which lay in Judah six Roman miles south of Jerusalem, and the explanatory remark, "which is now called Bethlehem," must be regarded as a late, erroneous addition. Ephrah is, then, to be looked on as an otherwise unknown place, in the region in which Bethel, Ramah and Gibeah lay, perhaps the same with the city Ephraim, named in connection with Bethel in 2 Chron. xiii. 19 (Qeri עֶפְרַיִם Ephraim, Kethib עֶפְרָיִם Ephron) and Jos. B. J. 4, 9, 9, and mentioned in Jno. xi. 54, according to Jerome twenty Roman miles (Onom. s. v. Ephron) north of Jerusalem (comp. Josh. xv. 9), named Ephron, according to von Raumer's conjecture (p. 216 A. 235 e) identical with Ophrah (comp. 1 Sam. xiii. 17).^{*} On this supposition the grave of Rachel was, according to Graf, "very near Rama (1 Sam. x. 2), at the intersection of the road from Bethel to the neighboring Ephrah (2 Sam. xiii. 23; 2 Chron. xiii. 19; see Then. and Bertheau in loco, Gen. xxxv. 16 sq.; xlviii. 7), and the road from Ramah to Gibeah" (Der Proph. Jer., p. 384, and Stud. u. Krit. 1854, p. 868, on the site of Bethel and Ramah). On the border of Benjamin. This agrees with the supposition that Rachel's grave was near Bethel (so Kurtz, Geogr. d. A. B. I., 270 [Hist. of the Old Covenant]), which was on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin. At Zela. This word must at an early time have been uncertain, to judge from the variations of the versions (Sept.: ἀνδρας ἀλλομένους μεγάλη, whence Ewald renders "in great haste," and Vulg.: in meridio). If we do not regard it as an unknown place, we may adopt Thenius' conjecture, that the original text was: "at Zela" (עֶזְלָא, עֶזְלָא with ה local); Zela was the place of the sepulchre of Saul's father (2 Sam. xxi. 14).—The statement of the two men that the asses were found was not only to be to Saul a confirmation of Samuel's prophetic declarations, but also to detach his thoughts from lower earthly things, and direct his inner life to the higher calling, to which he had been privately elected and consecrated. Ewald: "Thus happily disappears the burden of former lower cares, because henceforth something more important is to be thought of and cared for" (III. 31).

Vers. 3, 4. The second sign. Three men on the way to the holy place at Bethel, to sacrifice there, will bestow on him two loaves of bread from their sacrificial gifts. The direction of the road, and the whole geographical situation here correspond very well with the statement in Genesis xxxv. 8 as to the oak (אֵילָן, Allon) near which, "beneath Bethel," Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, was buried, and with the statement in Judg. iv. 5, that Deborah dispensed judgment "between Ramah and Bethel in Mount Ephraim" under the palm-tree of Deborah. It is therefore a natural supposition (Then.) that, by error of hearing, Tabor was written instead of Deborah. But this hypothesis is somewhat bold, and against it is the fact that all the ancient translations have "Tabor." That this is "certainly a mere dialectic variation of Deborah" (Ew. III., 31 Rem. 2) is an equally bold opinion. Besides, Judg. iv. 5 speaks of "the palm-tree of Deborah," named, according to the narrator, from the Judge Deborah, and known in his time, therefore, to be distinguished from the oak of Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah, Gen. xxxv. 8. The place of the terebinth of Tabor, therefore, otherwise unknown, must be in any case on the road to Bethel, not far from Ramah. The three men are "going up to God to Bethel." The things that they carry (three kids, three loaves of bread, and a vessel of wine) show that their purpose is to make an offering to God in Bethel. Bethel had been a consecrated place for the worship of God since the days of the Patriarchs, in consequence of the revelations which He had made to Abraham and Jacob; as to the former see Gen. xii. 8; xiii. 3, 4, as to the latter Gen. xxviii. 18; xix. 35; vi. 7, 14, 15. In Bethel, therefore, there was an altar; it was one of the places where the people sacrificed to the Lord, and where Samuel at this time held court. The "asking after welfare" signifies friendly salutation (1 Sam. xvii. 22; 2 Kings x. 13; Ex. xviii. 7; Judg. xviii. 15). The men will give him, an unknown person, two of their loaves. This divinely-ordained occurrence betokens the homage, which by the presentation of gifts pertains to him as the king of the people. "And that this surprising prelude to all future royal gifts is taken from bread of offering points to the fact, that in future some of the wealth of the land, which has hitherto gone undivided to the Sanctuary, will go to the king." (Ew., Geach. III., 32 [Hist. of Israel]).

^{*} [This is to cut the knot rather than to solve the geographical difficulties connected with Saul's journey. See I. 1 and ix. 6, Expos. and Translator's notes.—T.]

Vers. 5, 6. The third sign. Going thence to Gibeah he will meet a company of prophets, will, under the influence of prophetic inspiration, also prophesy, and be changed into another man. Gibeah Ha-Elohim is in the immediate context distinguished from the "city." What city is here meant is clear from the fact that all the people know him (ver. 10sq.); it can, therefore, only be Gibeah of Benjamin, Saul's native city. The "Gibeah of God" is thus, and especially because of the definition "of God," to be taken not as a proper name, but as an appellative, "the hill of God," that is, the height, Bamah [high-place] near the city, which was used as a place of sacrifice, and after which the city was called; afterwards, when Saul made it his royal residence, it was called Gibeah of Saul (xi. 4; xv. 34; 2 Sam. xxi. 6). According to Josephus (B. J. 5, 2, 1) it was one hour [somewhat more than two Eng. miles; according to Mr. Grove, in Smith's Dict. of Bib., four miles—Tr.] on the direct road north from Jerusalem, and, as appears from what follows, was probably the seat of a community of prophets, and, on that account, perhaps specially distinguished, along with Bethel, among the sacrificial places. The צבאות ["garrison" in Eng. A. V.] are the military posts or camps established by the Philistines to keep the country under their sway, even though there were no more devastating incursions (see on vii. 14). For a similar procedure see 2 Sam. viii. 6, 14. The substitution of the Sing. (צבא) for the Plu. is supported by the Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab.; but it is going too far to suppose, on the authority of the Sept., that here, as well as in xiii. 3, 4, this Sing. denotes a pillar set up by the Philistines as a sign of their authority (Then. and Böttcher)*. Ewald's opinion (Geach. III., 43) that it refers to an officer who collected the tribute, is still less probable. Instead of a monument, we must regard it, according to xiii. 3, 4, and as in 2 Sam. viii.

* On צבא Böttcher remarks: "as Jussive it can only mean 'and be it — and when,' so that צבאות belongs to the protasis, and the apodosis begins with ואלרורן [ver. 6]." So 1 Kings xiv. 5, where צבא, "and be it" — "even if"

6, 14, as a military colony stationed there.— A company of prophets (חֲזָנִים, "cord, line," then like our "band, company"). From this description, and from the fact that they approach with music, it appears that they formed a society, an organized company. That they descended from the Bamah [high-place] is no proof that they dwelt on it, against which is the fact that the Bamah was especially consecrated to the service of Jehovah, and for this reason was called the "hill of God," not "because it was the abode of men of God" (Cleric.). Since it is clear, from what follows, that this was a private solemn procession, it is probable that their residence was not far off, most likely in the city of Gibeah, whence they may have proceeded to the sacrifice and prayer on the high-place. This company of prophets belongs, no doubt, to the so-called Schools of the Prophets, which, however, would be better named prophetic Unions. They were founded by Samuel, and were under his direction, comp. xix. 20. The origin of these unions lies in the tendency to association given by the Spirit of God and by the new life which Samuel awakened, and their aim was to cherish and develop prophetic inspiration and the new life of faith by common holy exercises. In our passage we must distinguish the following facts: 1) The descent from the high-place in this solemn procession suggests that they had gathered there for common religious exercises, sacrifice, and prayer. 2) The music which went before them shows that, in these societies, religious feeling was nourished and heightened by sacred music, though music was also elsewhere cultivated. The four instruments which accompanied them indicate the rich variety and advanced culture of the music of that day. The psaltery (נבל, nebel) is a cithern-like stringed instrument, which, according to Jerome, Isidorus and Cassiodorus, had the form of an inverted Delta, and, according to Ps. xxxiii. 2; cxliv. 9, had ten strings (Jos. Ant. 7, 10 says twelve strings), called by the Greeks ψαλτα, nablium, psalterium; it was commonly used, as here, in sacred songs of praise (1 Kings x. 12; 1 Chron. xv. 16), but also on secular festive occasions (2 Chron. xx. 28). The kinnor (קנור [Eng. A. V. harp]) was another stringed instrument, apparently different from our harp (Luther), since it was played on in walking (comp. 2 Sam. vi. 5), rather a sort of guitar, and with the nebel indicates complete string music (Psalm lxxi. 22; cviii. 3 [2]; cl. 3). According to Josephus (Ant. 7, 12, 3) the kinnor was struck with the plectrum, the nablium with the finger. But David played the kinnor (xvi. 23; xviii. 10; xix. 9) with the hand. The tabret (טבֿל, toph) is the hand-drum, the tambourine; used by Miriam, Ex. xv. 20. The fourth instrument is the flute (חֲלִיל), which was made of reed, wood, or horn, and was a favorite instrument in festive and mournful music. 3) The emphasis rests on the words "and they were prophesying;" they were in a condition of ecstatic inspiration, in which, singing or speaking, with accompaniment of music, they gave expression to the overflowing feeling with which their hearts were filled from above by the controlling Spirit. Cleric: "they will sing songs, which assuredly were composed to the honor of God." The strains of the music were intended not only to awaken the heart to inspired praise of God, or to intensify the religious inspiration, but also to regulate the feeling. According to Pindar, it was "peacefully to bring law into the heart" that Apollo invented the cithern, which was played in the Delphic Apollo-worship (O. Müller, Dorier I, 346 [Dorians]). There was a similar outflow of religious inspiration to the praise of God in the case of the seventy elders, Num. xi. 25.—Ver. 6. Saul will not be able to withstand the mighty influence of this sight. Three things will happen to him: 1) the Spirit of the Lord, a divine power external to himself, will "come upon him," that is, suddenly, immediately take possession of his soul. The words "Spirit of Jehovah" exclude every earthly, internal cause of inspiration. It is, however, in this presupposed that the Spirit of the Lord must descend to produce this excitation and elevation, and does not dwell continually in him; 2) he will prophecy. (On the form נִבֵּן see Ew. § 198, 6.)

He will, therefore, have a part in the religious inspiration and the prophetic utterance of the prophets. It is taken for granted that the fire of inspiration will pass immediately from them to him; 3) he will be turned into another man. The change relates to the inner life, which is renewed by the Spirit of God, and consists in the sanctification of heart and subordination of the will to the law of the Lord which the Spirit works. The prophecy [of Samuel], therefore, is: Thou wilt, through the Spirit of God which shall come upon thee, not only prophecy in inspired words, but also experience a change of the inner man, as accords with thy divine call to be king.

Ver. 7. The general significance of the occurrence of these signs. When these signs come to thee (read נִבֵּן, Ps. xlv. 16, "when all this happens to thee"), do what thy hand findeth—the same formula in xxv. 8 and Judg. ix. 33, not, what thou likest, what seems most proper, "what seems good to thee," (Cler.), but, what presents itself, "that to which this action leads" (Ew. III., 41), do what circumstances suggest; for God is with thee, "thou needst not consult any one, for God will second thy counsels" (Cler.). These signs are to signify to him that, so surely as they happen to him will he happily, with God's help, carry out his undertakings.—These words refer to Saul's immediate task in his royal calling (of which these God-given signs were to assure him), namely, the deliverance of the people from the oppression of the Philistines.

Ver. 8. Saul next receives from the prophet a command in God's name, which limits the unrestricted royal authority conferred on him under support of God; he is forbidden, in the exercise of the royal office, to perform independently priestly functions. Gilgal, situated between the Jordan and Jericho, formerly the camp of the people after the crossing of the Jordan, where were undertaken the wars against the Canaanites for the conquest of the land, the central point of Israel consecrated by the tabernacle and the sacrificial worship (Josh. v.) was now "one of the holiest places in Israel, and the true middle-point of the whole people,—because the control of the Philistines extended so far westward [eastward?] that the centre of gravity of the realm was necessarily pushed back to the bank of the Jordan" (Ew. III., 42). Hither must Saul as king betake himself, when he would enter on the deliverance of Israel from the dominion of the Philistines. "This place seems to have been chosen, because it was remotest from the Philistine border" (Cler.). "There the people assembled in general political questions, and thence, after sacrifice and prayer, marched armed to war. Here, then, especially, in the nature of the case, would the mutual relation of the two independent powers of the realm come into question, be announced, and somehow permanently decided" (Ew. as above). Samuel, therefore, bids Saul wait seven days, when he goes to Gilgal, in order that he, Samuel, may direct the sacrifice, and impart to him the Lord's commands as to what he shall do. Saul is not to make the offering in his own power—this pertains only to Samuel as priestly mediator between God and the people—nor is he to undertake independently anything in connection with the past struggle for freedom, but he must await the instructions which the prophet is to give him. The king must act only in dependence on the invisible King of his people. See further, on ver. 8 and its relation to xiii. 8, the Introduction, pp. 11, 12.

Vers. 9–12. The occurrence of the signs announced to Saul. Ver. 9 refers to the fulfilment of the last, most important element of the third prophecy (ver. 6): the change into another man. Not only the fact of this renewal, but also its innermost source is indicated in the words: God gave [lit. turned, changed] him another heart, two assertions being involved in this pregnant phrase: God turned him about, and gave him another heart. His departure from Samuel and turning to go back home, and his conversion are expressed, not without design, by the same word turn; for the place, from which he turned, was the means of this conversion; Samuel's person and word was the instrument by which God began in him the process of inward renewal; the Spirit of God, that wrought and completed it, came in part mediately through Samuel, in part immediately to his heart from above. According to the Biblical representation the heart denotes the centre of the whole inward life, the uniting-point of all the elements of the inner man. The thorough and complete change to another man can proceed only from the heart, which alone God in His judgments on man looks at (xvi. 7). The essential element, therefore, in the renewal of the heart is not only the production of a, as it were, new, hitherto latent side of his spiritual being—this is only its symptom—but in a real religious-ethical change and renewal of the innermost foundation of life. In this all special revelations of the divine spirit and will to Saul must culminate; all that has happened from ch. ix. on tends to this highest and innermost end, to the proper establishment of this religious-ethical relation of the innermost foundation of life to God, as the most essential condition of an administration of the theocratic office which should be well-pleasing to God.—And all these signs came to pass that day. From Ramah Saul could easily come to Gibeah the same day through the stations indicated. It is not mentioned in what order the signs occurred, but it is first summarily stated that they were all fulfilled, and then related how the third happened. If the summary statement did not precede, and the third sign were related immediately, one might suppose with Thenius "a possible omission by the redactor;" but, the context of vers. 2-4 being thus [summarily] dispatched, the narrator hastens to the third sign as the most important, in order to show how and under what circumstances it occurred, after having made the remark, which was sufficient for his purpose, that the first and second had been fulfilled according to Samuel's words. It is worthy of note that none of the ancient translators has attempted to fill out the supposed gap. Thenius adopts the reading of the Sept. "from thence" (καὶ ἐπεὶ ἐκεῖθεν), from which he infers the previous mention of another place; but even this reading would not prove an omission, but would refer to the place where Saul separated from Samuel, the journey being thus summarily described with omission of two stations. Further, the words "from thence" would be quite superfluous.—The DS of the text [Eng. A. V. "thither"] is not to be translated whither (Bunsen: to Gibeah), but expresses local rest: "they come there to Gibeah."—The mention of the third sign only (there being nothing in narrative or language, as shown above, to necessitate the assumption of a historical or anctorial gap) is not to give importance to Gibeah, Saul's home (Keil); rather this sign was the most important for Saul's inner life, and for that on which depended the right exercise of the theocratic royal office, namely, the new heart and life called forth by the prophetic spirit, and it stands in causal connection with the preceding testimony (which is the principal thing) to the actual renewal of Saul's heart, narrating how Saul was equipped with the Spirit of the Lord, and filled with the prophetic Spirit, which changed his heart.—Ver. 10. From the local statements here made, it is tolerably clear that this company of prophets dwelt in Gibeah. In order to understand the effect of their appearance on Saul, we must think of it as it is described in ver. 5. Suddenly, unannounced, overpoweringly the Spirit comes upon him, "falls upon" him. Involuntarily, therefore, he is seized by it, and drawn along into the lofty inspiration of the prophets. By the influence of the Lord's Spirit, which Saul has hitherto experienced through Samuel, he is made capable of receiving the fullness of the prophetic Spirit, and of this sudden seizure by the prophetic inspiration, which thus manifested itself in music and song. He prophesied, that is, he united in their inspired song, or in the discourse in which their new life poured itself forth—in their midst, he attached himself to them, joined their solemn procession; meeting leads to uniting (the phrase, "in the midst," answers to the "towards him").—Ver. 11. Before time [lit. "from yesterday and the day before," and so Erdmann has it.—Tr.]. This universal previous acquaintance with Saul and the talk of the people among themselves is proof that he was here at home. The surprise produced by Saul's participation in the prophetic utterance is described with incomparable fidelity and liveliness. The two questions, which testify to surprise and amazement, presuppose two things: 1) the power and significance of the prophetic community in the public opinion, and 2) the fact that Saul's life had hitherto been far therefrom, that it had not been in harmony, either externally or internally, with this society; we see him suddenly introduced into a sphere which had hitherto been outwardly and inwardly strange to him. Clericus: "This seems to show that Saul had led a life very different from those who associated with the prophets."—Ver. 12. To the questions: "What has happened to the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?" answer is given by "a man from there" (from Gibeah) in a counter-question, which, by its form (the "who is their father?" referring to the "son of Kish"), ingeniously and decisively repels the false conception of the nature of this prophetic inspiration which lay in these questions. The explanation: "who is their president?" has no support in the connection, and no bearing on the matter. The Sept. has "who is his father?" (adding also [Alex.]: "is it not Kish?"): but this is arbitrary and obviously adopted to get rid of the difficulty in the text. And to suppose that the words: "Who is their father? Is it not Kish?" indicate that recognition as a prophet was denied Saul because of his descent from so insignificant a man as Kish (Then.), or that they merely express the surprise of the people (Ew.), would introduce an intolerable tautology into the lively, pregnant description. As a simple question, these words would mean nothing in the mouth of the man of Gibeah, who necessarily knew the answer, and could learn it from the connection in which the question was asked. The question "who is then their father?" rather refers to the prophets, in whose midst was even now the object of the question of surprise: Is the son of Kish a prophet? As Bunsen rightly remarks, the their is to be emphasized: "And who is their father?" We may suppose (in accordance with the situation) that the words were accompanied by an indicative gesture, and with Oehler (Herz. R. E. XII. 612) explain: "Have these then the prophetic spirit by a privilege of birth?" Bodily paternity is here of no importance; the son of Kish may as well be a prophet as these sons of fathers, who are wholly unknown to us, or of whom we should not, according to human reckoning, suppose that their sons would be filled with the prophetic Spirit. So Bunsen's admirable explanation: "The speaker declares, against the contemptuous remark about the son of Kish, that the prophets too owed their gift to no peculiarly lofty lineage. Saul also might, therefore, receive this gift, as a gift from God, not as a patrimony." In this counter-question lies this truth: the impartation of the prophetic Spirit, as of its gifts and powers, pertains to the free, gracious will of God, and is altogether independent of natural-human relations. The expression of surprise at the unexpected change in Saul gives occasion to the proverb: Is Saul also among the prophets? According to its origin here given, this proverb does not merely express surprise at the sudden unexpected transition of a man to another calling in life (Then., Cler.: "another manner of life"), or to a high and honorable position (Münster). The personal and moral qualities of Saul, perhaps the religious-moral character of his family, or at least the mean opinion that was entertained of Saul's qualities and capacities, intellectually, religiously and morally, formed the ground of surprise at his sudden assumption of the prophetic character. The proverb, therefore, expresses astonishment at the unexpected appearance of a high spiritual endowment, and, still more, of a high religious-moral tone of life and soul, which has hitherto been foreign to, even (as it seems) opposed to, the person in question.

Vers. 13-16. A family-scene: Saul and his uncle.

Ver. 13. The cessation of the prophesying was the result either of a sudden removal of the ecstatic inspiration which had come suddenly on him, or of a separation from the prophesying company. Saul came to the Bamah [high-place]. Instead of Bamah (בָּמָה), Then. (so Ew.) reads after the Sept. "to Gibeah" (εἰς τὸν βουνὸν, ΓΙΒְעָה). But this reading came from the supposed inability to reconcile Saul's going up to the high-place with the prophetic company's coming down thence, and Saul's return to his family in ver. 14, nor did it seem clear, why Saul went up thither. The last objection is removed by the simple suggestion, that Saul went up thither to pray and sacrifice in the holy place after his great experiences of the divine favor and goodness, and so after his return home first to give God the glory before he returned to his family-life. He joined the descending company of prophets in their solemn procession; but when his participation in the utterances of the prophetic inspiration was over, his look rested on the sacred height, whence the men had descended, and the impulse of the Spirit of the Lord forced him up thither, that, after the extraordinary offering he had made with the prophets, he might make the ordinary offering, and engage in worship. This was the aim, suggested by the connection of the whole history, of his ascent to the high-place.—Ver. 14. The uncle of Saul, here spoken of, was Ner (xiv. 51), who, like Kish (ix. 1), was a son of Abiel, not Abner, as Ewald, with Josephus, supposes. Either Saul's relations went up with him to the high-place, and the conversation with the uncle occurred there, or (as is natural in a summary statement, like this), we must suppose that Saul came down to his family. According to the narrative the former explanation is preferable. In the question and answer between Saul and his uncle, the history of the search after the asses is briefly recapitulated, vers. 14-16. Saul's laconic answer to the question of his uncle, who very properly speaks of so important a domestic matter, shows that his heart is fixed on higher things than the asses of his father. To the curious and at the same time inquisitorial question: What said Samuel to you? which shows what importance was attached to knowing the man's words exactly and fully, Saul answers shortly and to the point: He said that they were found. Thus the uncle, to whom this fact was long since known, was disposed of, and the long conversation he had laid out sharply broken off; thus Saul had done his duty to family-affairs. The further express statement that he said nothing to his uncle of the kingdom, of which Samuel had spoken to him, is to be referred, not to Saul's unassuming humility (Keil), or modesty (Ewald), or prudence (Then.), or apprehension of his uncle's incredulity and envy, but to the fact that Samuel, by his manner of imparting the divine revelation, had clearly and expressly given him to understand (ix. 25-27) that it was meant in the first instance for him alone, and that it was not the divine will that he should share it with others. The public presentation of Saul as the king of Israel, whom God had chosen, was to take place only at the time appointed by God through Samuel, and at the place which the prophet should determine. Saul may have thought, too, that his uncle's ears were not entitled to be the first recipients of so holy a message, he having got his rights on the question concerning the asses.

III. The choice of Saul by lot as public confirmation of the divine election already made in secret. Vers. 17-21.

Ver. 17. The popular assembly, called by Samuel at Mizpah, because this sacred place was connected in the people's minds with the memory of the great victory, ch. vii., was intended, as is shown by the expression "to Jehovah" (see vii. 5), solemnly to confirm and ratify the divine choice of Saul to be king of Israel, and to consecrate him to this office. Nägelsbach (Herz. R.-E., XIII. 401), referring to ver. 8, objects that the next meeting was not in Gilgal, but in Mizpah, and that, according to xi. 14, Saul goes to Gilgal not before but with Samuel, and there could, therefore, be no question of waiting for him. The objection is, however, set aside by the remark that these two meetings in Mizpah and Gilgal have nothing to do with vers. 7, 8, but are designed, as is expressly said, to announce Saul as the chosen of the Lord, and again to confirm him as king (ver. 24 and xi. 14), in order that, as universally recognised king, he might, from Gilgal, that ancient classic ground, take in hand the great work of delivering Israel from the Philistines, which, as his primary task, lay ready to his hand (ver. 7: "whatsoever thy hand findeth").

Vers. 18, 19. Samuel's introductory discourse. The "thus saith the Lord," answers to the "to the Lord" of ver. 17. The people were called to assemble before the Lord to hear His word through the mouth of Samuel, as the latter had received it directly from the Lord. Samuel's discourse first sets before the people in curt, vigorous phrase the royal deeds of might which God the Lord had done for them: the conduction from Egypt, the deliverance out of the hand of the Egyptians (immediately after the exodus) and the deliverance out of the hand of all the kingdoms which had oppressed them. Cleric: "The history of which last deliverances is contained in the Book of Judges." * This third period of the history embraces the whole time from the conquest of Canaan to the present, including the victory at Mizpah (vii. 5), of which the stone before their eyes bore witness. The reference to the kingdoms, from which God had delivered Israel is noteworthy, because, after the pattern of these very kingdoms, the Israelites wished to have a king and an outward kingdom. There is in this a factual irony.—Ver. 19. The second part of the discourse: the charge of ingratitude and unfaithfulness, expressed in the demand of a king. Their fault consisted not in the simple desire for a king, but in the fact that, forgetting God's royal achievements, they wished to have a visible mighty king like the heathen nations, and, not seeking help from oppressive enemies from the Lord, they desired a human king along with God, or instead of their invisible King as helper out of all need and oppression.—It is to be noted that the "and ye" at the beginning of the second part [ver. 19] answers to the "I" at the beginning of the first part [ver. 18], marking emphatically the contrast between the Lord's powerful help and the people's sinful conduct in this question of a king.—The contempt or rejection of Jehovah (comp. Expos. on viii. 7 sq.) consisted, in respect to God's gracious and mighty deliverances, in the demand: *set a king over us. After this sharp rebuke, in which (as before in chap. viii.) the full significance of their desire from the religious-ethical point of view is held up before the people, follows thirdly the factual granting of the desire, according to the divine command, viii. 22, by ordering a choice by the sacred lot. The "and now," in respect to the "I—ye" contrasted above, marks a division in the address. The manner of choice is enjoined with precision by Samuel. They are to appear "before Jehovah," this refers not merely to the conception of God as everywhere present (Cleric.: "when invoked, He was present with the assembly"), but also to the holy place in which the Lord's altar was erected (vii. 9). They were to appear by tribes and thousands, the latter here meaning the same thing as families (משפחות). To facilitate legal transactions Moses had divided the people into thousands, hundreds, etc., and appointed captains over all these divisions (Ex. xviii. 25). This division probably followed as closely as possible the natural one, and so the designation thousands was used as synonymous with families (Num. i. 16; x. 4; Josh. xxii. 14, etc.), because the number of heads of houses in the several families of a tribe might easily reach a thousand (comp. ver. 21).—Ver. 20 sq. Execution and result of this mode of election. The representatives of the tribes being called, the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin, (properly the tribe "was taken"). How the lots were cast is not said; commonly it was by throwing tablets (Josh. xviii. 6, 8; Jon. i. 7; Ezek. xxiv. 7), but sometimes by drawing from a vessel (Num. xxxiii. 54; Lev. vi. 9). The latter seems to have been the method here employed. There is not the slightest ground for connecting this with the lot of the high-priestly Urim and Thummim (Vaihinger in Herz. R.-E. IV. 85).—Ver. 21. When the families of the tribe of Benjamin were called, the lot fell on the family of Matri,† an otherwise unknown name (Ew. III. 33 conjectures that it is corrupted from Bikrit). In the families the lot was usually so conducted that the houses (בָּתֵּי) were next called (Josh. vii. 14), then from the patroce or father-house (אֲבוֹתֵי).

* The masc. Partep. הַלְחִיצוּם ["which oppressed"] forms with the fem. subst. הַמְּמַלְכוֹת ["the kingdoms"] a constructio ad sensum, the warriors of the heathen nations being had in mind.

* The ׀ is "used to introduce direct discourse, even in a contradictory clause, like our 'no, but,' as in Ruth i. 10" (Keil). It is therefore not necessary to read ׀ with the ancient vers. for י, which reading is obviously imitated from viii. 19 and xii. 12.

† Properly: Matrites and Bikrites.—Ta.]

thus chosen the individual heads of families (בְּרָכִי) came forward, that the family and the individual chosen by the Lord might be indicated (see Keil in loco, Rem. 1). Here the description of the election is abridged, the last steps being passed over (comp. what is said above on the three signs). The result is given at once: And Saul was taken. The insertion of the Sept. "and they present the family of Matri by men" is to be regarded (with Keil, against Then.) as an interpretation of the Alexandrian translators. According to the order above-stated (from Josh. vii. 14) it fills out the supposed gap in the text not completely, but only partially and erroneously.—They sought Saul, but found him not. The ground was his diffidence and shyness in respect to appearing publicly before the whole people. Nägelsbach rightly remarks (Herz., "Saul" p. 433), that his hiding behind the baggage during the election is not in conflict with the account of his change of mind. "At so decisive a moment, which turns the eyes of all on one with the most diverse feelings, the heart of the most courageous man may well beat." The situation, along with an element bordering on the comic, has a serious significance and a deep psychological truth.

IV. Saul declared king; the partial homage. Vers. 22-27.

Ver. 22. Inquiry of the Lord and divine answer in respect to the failure to find Saul. To inquire of the Lord (xxii. 10; xxiii. 9 sq.; xxviii. 6; xxx. 7 sq.; 2 Sam. ii. 1; Num. xxvii. 21; Judg. i. 1; xx. 27) is to ask for the divine decision in individual matters of private or (as here) public importance for the theocratic congregation, by Urim and Thummim. [For a case of personal inquiry in premonastic times, see Gen. xxv. 22.—Ta.] Though the latter is not here expressly mentioned, its presence must be assumed according to Ex. xxviii. 30, it being inseparably connected with the high-priestly Ephod, in the Choshen of which (breastplate with twelve precious stones and the name of the twelve tribes) it was placed. The inquiry of Jehovah by this means was, it is true, according to Ex. xxviii. and Num. xxvii., to be made by the high-priest. We cannot, however, suppose that this was done here, for the high-priest's office was vacant; some other, not Samuel, who presided over the assembly and the election, but a priest, in the high-priestly robes, conducted the solemn inquiry, which was exclusively the privilege of the priests. It must be looked on as a different act from the preceding casting of lots.—The question was: Has any one else come hither? that is, besides those here present, among whom Saul was not to be found. The "one" (lit. "man") refers to the one who could not be found; the oracle is to give information as to his presence or absence. The Sept. and Vulg. have: "will the man yet come hither?" and Then. alters the text accordingly, against which Keil rightly remarks: "it was unnecessary to inquire of God whether Saul would yet come; he might have been sent for without more ado."—The answer is: Behold, he is there, hid among the baggage. The Pron. "he" (הוא) does not require a preceding "the man" (Then.), but relates to the person referred to in, or giving occasion to the question, and to whom the procedure referred. "Stuff" (σκεῦη, vassa), baggage, which must have been extensive in such an assembly. As Saul had the assurance that he was the king chosen by God, his behavior here could not signify that he wished to evade the acceptance of the kingdom, but must be referred to overpowering diffidence, in view of the grand preparations of the election and the divine decision which had laid so mighty a grasp on his life, and to "anxious consideration of the awfully important consequences of his appearance" (Ew.).—With this view the remark of Clericus may be considered to accord: "Saul, informed beforehand by Samuel of what would be done, seems to have hidden himself, that he might not appear to have solicited the royal dignity, and to have come to Mizpah to gain the popular vote for himself."—In the beginning of ver. 23 the three consecutive verbs give a quick and lively coloring to the whole process of fetching Saul from his purposely sought-out hiding-place. His magnificent stature (ix. 2), as outward-physical qualification for the kingdom, very imposing to the people, is here again expressly mentioned (εἶδος δέων ὑπερναιδός, Eurip. in Grotius). In accordance with the people's receptivity for so imposing and kingly an appearance, Samuel closes the solemn election with the words (ver. 24): See ye him whom the Lord has chosen? by which he expressly declares the election by lot to be a confirmation of the previous divine choice, and completes the formal presentation of Saul as the divinely-appointed king, and then adds as proof: For there is none like him in all the people. There are two factors which, according to this account, co-operated to call forth the people's cry of salutation and homage: May the king live! The testimony of Samuel: "This is the king chosen by the Lord," granted in spite of the fact that their demand, proceeding from a vain, haughty, and unfaithful mind, was not well-pleasing to him, and the immediate impression made by Saul's person, which was in keeping with the kingly dignity.

Ver. 25. The manner of the kingdom. Samuel is said to have done three things in connection with this constitution: 1) he set it before the people; 2) he wrote it in a book; 3) he laid it up before the Lord.—The "law of the kingdom," which Samuel presented to the people, is, as appears from the context, one which has not yet been written. It is to be distinguished from the "manner of the king" (viii. 11 sqq.) in which Samuel set before the people the usurpation of an unrestricted arbitrary rule, such as existed among the heathen nations whose monarchical constitution Israel envied. In content it was no doubt essentially the same with the law of the king in Deut. xvii. 14–20, especially vers. 19, 20, and therefore related to the divinely established rights and duties of the theocratic king, the fulfilment of which the people were authorized to demand from him. God's purpose is to rule the people through Him as His organ. The "right [or manner] of the kingdom" is therefore, this being its theocratic ground and aim, not a capitulation (Michaelis) between the king (that is, here Samuel) and the people or the first example of a constitutional monarchy (Then.); for the restraints, which are here set on the kingly power, are not imposed by the demands of the people, or by a partition of power between king and people, and not by a contract or agreement between the two as parties, but are given in the divine Law, in the already existing theocratic right of the theocracy, in which the absolute monarchy of the divine will is to rule and reign over king and people, both together.—Samuel wrote this law of the kingdom in a book. We find here the first trace, after the written records of Moses, of writing among the prophets, long before the literary activity to which we owe what we now have, and essentially also the spoken prophecies with the historical notices pertaining to them—the beginning of a literature, which was exclusively in the service of the theocratic spirit, and, when it appeared soon after this in the so-called Schools of the Prophets, made its first task the theocratic writing of history.—He laid it up before the Lord. Where and how? The supposition that it was deposited in the Tabernacle at Shiloh contradicts the context, from which it appears that the deposition was made in the place where the announcement took place. The expression "before the Lord" leaves the manner undetermined, and indicates merely the solemn and formal deposition and preservation of the writing, as sacred original documentary record of the establishment and regulation of the theocratic kingdom, in a safe place before the Lord, whose presence was symbolically represented partly by the holy priestly vestment, partly by the altar to which the people approached, and in connection therewith had here its local representation even without tabernacle and ark, though we know not in what manner.—Notwithstanding this public and solemn investment of Saul with the royal dignity and authority, Samuel continues to be the highest director of the affairs of the people; the now established kingdom retires passively into the background before Samuel's Prophetic-Judicial Office, which retains its full activity and authority. This is indicated by the fact that it is not Saul, but Samuel that finally dismisses the people, an act which involves the formal closing by him of the assembly.

Vers. 26, 27. Saul's behavior after his installation as king, and the behavior of the people towards him. And Saul also went home to Gibeah. Clericus hence infers that the Philistines had no military post at Gibeah, since they would not have permitted Israel to have a king in opposition to their authority; but the objection vanishes when we reflect that, the Philistines being few in number and at a distance from the place of election, the meaning of the event might easily have been concealed from them, at least for the short time till the battle of ch. xi. during which Saul remained quietly at home, especially as such great religious assemblies at Samuel's instance were not infrequent and could not appear strange to the Philistines, and Saul had returned to his ordinary occupations in the field.—The conduct of the people towards Saul as king is twofold. On one side he receives friendly recognition with willingness to serve him [and there went with him the company of valiant men]. The Sept. and Then. read: "There went sons of strength, whose hearts God had touched, with Saul;" but this is suspicious as being apparently a conformity to the following "sons of wickedness," interpreting the somewhat strange word "valiant company" (לִּילִי) by the ordinary periphrasis "sons of strength" (לִּילִי־בָּנִים), as in 1 Kings i. 52.

The word (לִּילִי) is found alone with similar meaning "host" (in Pharaoh's retinue) in Ex. xiv. 28; here it means "valiant company," but with allusion to the "power" which Saul as king might build up from such valiant men as those who now formed the escort of honor. Whose hearts God had touched; that is, to show themselves so faithful and willing in service and obedience. This faithfulness and willingness to serve, shown in their escorting Saul, sprang from their hearts, the deepest base and centre of their inner life; but it was in this case an effect of the immediate influence of the Spirit of God, who sanctifies and rules the heart even in respect to moral deportment towards His constituted authorities. But not irresistibly. In ver. 27 we find an organized opposition to God's established kingdom, whose representative Saul was. Whether envy and jealousy produced it (Then.) is not said. The opposition are called "worthless people" (בְּלִיַּיִם, בְּלִיַּיִם).

They are people who 1) haughtily and contemptuously nullified beforehand the wholeness and utility of Saul's royal government for the people in their depressed condition,—the question "What will the man help us?" expresses hostility to and contempt for Saul's kingship as a completely aimless and useless institution; 2) they exhibited decided "contempt" for his fitness for the office, and attacked his personal honor; 3) they did not show submission to his rule, "brought him no present" as sign of reverence, obedience, and obligation to provide for his maintenance; for freewill-gifts from the people were a part of the regular revenue of princes.—Clericus: "Therefore others, who thought better of his election, brought him gifts, that he might maintain the royal dignity without disgrace." Saul's conduct towards these enemies: he was as a deaf man; that is, he acted as if he heard nothing; "he left those men's contempt unnoticed" (Cler.). This shows self-control and self-denial, but also great forethought and prudence; for though Saul had had the right, notwithstanding his and Samuel's purpose that he should remain in private life awhile, to proceed vigorously against this mean insult to his person and office, yet such a course might have prejudiced his position among and towards the people; and all the more, if the open opposers, as Nägelsbach conjectures (Herz. XIII., 433), belonged "to the princes of the larger and hitherto controlling tribes of Judah and Ephraim, who were dissatisfied with the election of an obscure Benjaminite," in which case, still more embittered by Saul's resolution to punish them, they could have made their influence still more widely felt against him.—As to the construction it is to be remarked with Keil on וַיִּלֶּכֶּי (ver. 26) and וַיִּדְּבָר (ver. 27) that in both cases "the Imperf. with Waw Consec. forms the apodosis to a preceding adjective-clause as protasis," and the sequence of clauses in German [and English, Tr.] would be: "When Saul also went home there went with him . . . , and when worthless people said he was as a deaf person."

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

See the remarks in the Exegetical exposition. In addition to these:

1. Anointing with oil as a sacred, theocratic usage is the symbol of introduction into the fellowship and service of the Spirit of God, as is clear from xvi. 13 sq.; Isa. lx. 1 sq. It was employed 1) in connection with the tabernacle and "all that was in it," that is, its furniture (Ex. xxix. 36; xxx. 26-30; xl. 9-13; Lev. viii. 10-12; Num. vii. 1), and in these lifeless objects (which are said to be "sanctified") denotes their separation from everything unclean and unholy, and their consecration to the holy end for which they were designed, namely, to be instruments of God's Holy Spirit for acting on His people. So it is said especially of the altar of burnt-offering, Ex. xl. 10: "and it shall be most holy," because as the place of expiation, it was the holiest object in the court; 2) in connection with persons, who are called to theocratical service and office, anointing is the symbol of the impartation of God's Spirit, and the equipment with His gifts and powers as indispensable condition of the right theocratic exercise of the office. Hitherto confined to sanctuary and priests, it now appears as the consecration to the theocratic office of king, and denotes here the impartation of the powers of light and life from the Spirit of God, as possessor of which the king is henceforth called by excellence the Anointed of the Lord, and is alone authorized to exercise the theocratic rule in the name of the Lord, the invisible King. The "coming of the Spirit of God" on Saul and David is the consequence of their anointing, or answers to the significance of its symbolism. The natural basis for this symbolism of oil is its power to dispense light and life, joy and healing, by which it sets forth the Spirit's dispensation of light and life and the therein-contained gifts and powers (Bähr, Symb. II., 173). And in the historical development of the theocracy and of the divine revelations which point to the perfecting and fulfilment of the theocracy in the New Covenant, the symbolic anointing of theocratic kings, priests, and prophets (comp. 1 Ki. xix. 15, 16) as sign of the impartation of the Spirit of God and its powers is the type, that is, the historical foretelling and prefiguring of the anointing with the Spirit without measure (John iii. 34) and with the spirit of might (Acts x. 38), by which Jesus was "the Christ," the Anointed of God for the New-Testamental kingdom of God, first as King of His kingdom, and then as chief Prophet and Priest. Samuel's word: "The Lord hath anointed thee," signifies that God Himself, of His free grace, dispenses the powers and gifts of His Spirit, when He calls to an office in His kingdom and service.

2. The greatness and glory of the royal office consisted essentially in the fact that he who filled it was "Prince over the inheritance or possession of Jehovah." The foundation for this view is the inward life-fellowship into which God has so entered with Israel by His self-revelation, that they have Him as their God, as their highest good and possession; Ex. xx. 2: "I am the Lord, thy God." God is thus the possession of His people, and of every individual godly man, Ps. xvi. 5; cxlii. 6; cxix. 57; Jer. x. 16; li. 19. Conversely the people of Israel is the property (חֵלֶק) of its God, or His inheritance (חֵלֶק), 1) by reason of its election out of all other peoples, Ex. xix. 5; 2) by reason of the wonderful deliverance out of Egypt, Ex. xix. 4; Deut. iv. 20; ix. 29; 3) by reason of the covenant at Sinai, Ex. xix. 5; 4) by reason of the constant manifestations of grace and salvation (Ps. xxviii. 9; 2 Sam. xiv. 16; xxi. 3), among which the forgiveness of sins is the greatest, Ex. xxxiv. 9. The New Covenant presents the fulfillment and completion of this relation in the λαός περιούσιος ["peculiar people," that is, God's own property] Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 9.

3. The three signs which, in accordance with Samuel's prophetic announcement, were given to Saul, signify in the first place in general the assurance given him (by events apparently accidental, yet ordered to this end by God) of His divine appointment to the royal office and his qualification for it, and of the fact that the Lord would therein be with him. In the lives of those who desire to serve God in faithful obedience, even the simplest and apparently most accidental events must go to confirm the assurance that all things work together for good to them that serve God, and to confirm their confidence in His providence that works in detached, seemingly insignificant circumstances, and His faithfulness that lasts through life.—Severally, however, these three signs indicate so many principal stations in the development of Saul's inner life, and in an advancing line from the ass-driver to the "prince of the inheritance of God." These are divinely-ordered facts, each of which has two meanings for Saul; first a factual revelation or instruction from God for the present moment, and then a prefigurative relation to the future administration of his royal office. The first occurrence, the meeting with two men who inform him that the asses are found, frees his heart from the pressure of little, earthly, everyday cares, and instructs him henceforth, free from the concerns of the lower, material life, to direct his inner life to the lofty aims and duties of his theocratic calling. Once for all the petty earthly is to find for him its quietus. Inwardly free and consecrated to the Lord alone, he is to pursue his way upward. The second sign: three men going up to Bethel offer him two of the three sacrificial loaves. This gift is the factual homage paid him by a royal offering, and betokens for the future his royal position in which to him, along with sanctuary and priests, the wealth of the land will be offered as tribute. The third event directs Saul's look from this kingly power to the highest conditions of a right theocratic administration, which he receives through impartation of the Spirit of God and His gifts. In the company of prophets by the Spirit which comes on him, he receives the gift of prophecy and that equipment of his inner life with the powers of the divine Spirit by which he becomes another man and receives a new heart. In this there is also for the future the warning that it is only under the guidance of God's Spirit, in the absolute obedience of his will to the divine will, rooted in a heart new-created, changed by the Holy Ghost and sanctified, that he can fulfil his calling so as to secure the welfare of God's inheritance and the approbation of the Lord. So, while outwardly wandering from place to place, and coming home at last, Saul rises inwardly from the cares of a lower earthly calling to the lofty tasks of the highest office of the theocracy in which he is to gain for his people the holiest possessions—from a low and common sphere of life to a free broad view that embraces all Israel—from a soul entangled in the natural and earthly to the experience of thorough renewal of heart and change of mind—from a low and narrow wealth, wherein he seeks satisfaction, to the possession of the highest and holiest gift, the Spirit of God—from a profane, godless life, to the most intimate fellowship with God through the mediation of the Spirit. This career and leading of Saul is a type of the Lord's leadings which all experience who give themselves up to His guidance that they may be called by Him for His kingdom and its service. The change of the natural man, the renewal of the inner life from the heart out showed itself, indeed, in the Old-Testamental point of view, partially and sporadically; but at the same time it was also only a thing postulated, desiderated, promised, and as such is most clearly expressed in Ps. li. 12-14; Jer. xxxi.; Ez. xxxvi.; the complete fulfillment was possible only in the New-Testamental kingdom of God through the new birth by the Spirit of God which in all its fulness was first imparted by Christ and went out from Christ, John iii. [Because of the difference in force and extent of the expression "new heart" in the Old and New Testaments, we must guard against supposing in Saul so radical a change as Dr. Erdmann seems disposed to assume. In the Old Test. conception any endowment, spiritual, mental or physical, which connects itself with faith in God, is regarded as the product of the Spirit of God (see the history of Samson and the Judges generally, and Balaam), and a divine influence which leads a man to sing the praises of God, as Saul did here, is not necessarily the creative touch which regenerates the soul. In an important sense Saul was a changed man, and received a new heart, in the elevation of his aims and his upward striving to God; but his after-life shows that this impulse towards the divine, given in mercy by the divine Spirit, was damped and finally destroyed by the opposing force of his worldliness and self-seeking. His heart, so we must conclude from the teachings of Scripture, was touched and roused, but not new-created.—Tr.]

4. It is noteworthy for the significance of this crisis in the life of Saul as well as in the history of the kingdom of God in Israel, that these three facts, so important for the establishment of the kingdom and the calling of Saul, occur at or not far from holy places, which were of great importance for the history of Israel. Rachel's grave must have reminded Saul how here, by the birth of Benjamin, which cost his ancestress her life, was laid the foundation of the greatness to which this smallest tribe was raised by his election as king. The ancient Bethel carried him back to the time when God's revelation to Jacob strengthened the foundation of the theocracy which was laid in Abraham's call and the promises given him, and renewed the promise made to the patriarchs; in the sanctuary there Saul sees the sign of the covenant-faithfulness of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Gibeah and its neighboring height was a place consecrated to sacrifice and prayer, and especially important because the dwelling-place or pilgrimage-shrine of a community of prophets. Here flourishes prophecy, which in Samuel prepares the way for the kingdom, and guides it on the way; here rules the mighty prophetic spirit, which lays hold on Saul, and which he receives with its gifts. The holy places, in and near which Saul receives the three signs, are, in respect to their significance for his calling to the royal office, the historically holy ground. "This is as little accidental as the belief, so often expressed in the Psalter, that help comes from the holy place; and the central country, the tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim, whither Saul's steps now lead him, is especially rich in such holy places" (Ew. III. 30).

5. For the development of prophecy in the time just before the rise of the theocratic kingdom the history in this section is important in several respects. We here meet for the first time a prophetic fraternity, which is not an accidental assemblage, but a connected, united community. Its members are called "prophets;" to their designation Nebiim (נְבִיִּים) ["prophets," taken to be from a verb meaning "to gush forth") answers the inspired outstreaming of praise to God in testimony of His deeds of grace; the bond that unites them is the Spirit of God, who fills them and impels them to such inspired utterances; their inner unity and fellowship shows itself, it is probable, already in a common abode and like manner of life. It is an association of prophetic men, representing both the prophetic calling and office (munus), and the prophetic gift (donum), that is, prophecy not of the nature of a calling and office. Whatever may have been the numerical strength of this prophetic element in the people, it is certain from this narrative that the Spirit of the Lord showed itself alive in individual circles of the national life, and freely and mightily unfolded its powers and gifts. A pre-indication of this is found in the incident recorded in Num. xi. 26 sq., where the Spirit of the Lord freely and independently of institutions exhibited its awakening and vitalizing power, outside of the circle of Elders gathered around Moses at the Tabernacle, in the camp of the people, and when Joshua contended that Moses' official authority was the only proper medium of the divine Spirit, Moses rebuked him with the words: "Enviest thou for my sake? I would that all Jehovah's people were prophets, that Jehovah would put his Spirit upon them!" In the rise of the prophets of Samuel's time we see a fulfillment of the promise contained in Moses' exclamation, a sign of the new spiritual life of faith aroused in the people, a type of the outpouring of the Spirit on all flesh, which is prophesied of in Joel iii. [ii. 28], and is set forth in the New Covenant as factual condition of the universal priesthood, limited only by the working of God's Spirit, and as final revelation of the living God. Further, in these prophetic communities, whether they were from the beginning firmly organized or free associations, we see the unifying, associative power of the prophetic spirit over against the disruption of the theocratic and religious life which was the legacy of the time of the Judges. The company descending from the high-place at Gibeah, which Saul joined, shows that in these bodies there were common religious exercises. However these associations arose through the associative impulse of the awakened higher life—whether Samuel founded them or not is uncertain, the latter is more probable; but after their establishment he took them under his care, and later gave them a firmer form and government (see ch. xix. and what is there said at greater length of the schools of the prophets)—they were, by their concentrated power of religious life, light and salt for the popular life, and diffused around them the influences of the Spirit that filled them. An indication of this is the power of the Spirit by which Saul was laid hold of (in his third sign) after his meeting with those men. But this new Spirit-born life has its contrast always in a lower, sensuous life, disinclined to the joyous abandon and the holy uprising towards God. The wondering question: "Is Saul also among the prophets?" points to such a contrast, in which the worldly-minded, strangers to the life in the Spirit of the Lord, stand opposed to the members of the prophetic Union, just as to-day the children of the world, despising the guidance of the Spirit from above, set themselves with contempt or reviling over against living Christians, the "pietists and godly."

The prophetic inspiration is characteristically delineated in these occurrences. Its essence consists in such an entrance of the Spirit of God into the inner life of the prophet, that the latter is thereby mightily laid hold of and lifted up into the condition of ecstatic ravishment. As a vehicle of this spiritual excitation appears here instrumental and vocal music which, on the physical-psychical side, gives freer play to the feelings aroused by the divine Spirit. The prophetic inspiration takes the musical art into its service. If ver. 5 says nothing special as to the relation of music to the prophetic utterance, it yet shows that music was practiced in the prophetic communities. In its origin the prophetic inspiration shows itself as a sudden thing which gets the mastery of the man's subjective state; the Spirit of God "comes upon" Saul; we trace it as a controlling power in vers. 6, 10; xix. 20; Mic. iii. 8. The utterance of this inspiration, the "prophesying," is impassioned address or inspired song, and has an enkindling, sweeping power. It is, however, only a momentary, not a continuous thing. As the seventy-two elders prophesied once, and not again, so also Saul here among the prophets. The spring of the Spirit is an intermitting one, because, according to the nature of the Old Covenant, though there might be various grades of individual powerful inworkings, there could not be a permanent indwelling of the Spirit of God in the heart of man.* The indispensable condition of the prophetic inspiration and of prophesying as a genuine life-utterance of the Spirit from above is a mind directed to the living God,

* [The author seems here to confound the special and the ordinary influence of the Holy Spirit. Then, as now, there were differences of spiritual power at different times; but there seems to be no good reason for not believing that the Holy Spirit dwelt just as really and permanently, though not so distinctly, in all God's people under the Old Covenant as under the New.—Ta.]

the religious-ethical disposition of heart well-pleasing to him, such as Saul had received by the Lord's leadings, he going obediently and humbly in the ways appointed him. Comp. ver. 9: "God gave him another heart," with ver. 10: "the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied in their midst."

6. "God gave him another heart," comp. ver. 9 with ver. 6 and Deut. v. 26 [29]: "O that they had such a heart to fear me." "Therefore the working of revelation is directed to renewing man from the heart, and its aim is, by a divine salvation, to destroy the unreceptiveness (the stupidity in which the soul's centre labors, as Roos expresses it, Fund. psychol. ex sacr. script., 1769, p. 153) and the opposition of the heart (the circumcision of the heart, Deut. xxx. 6), to put the fear of God into the heart (Jer. xxxii. 40), and so make the law an inward thing (Jer. xxxi. 33). This is effected by the divine Spirit which, even under the Old Covenant, making prophets by change of heart into other men (1 Sam. x. 6, 9), and causing the pious to experience His power, that purifies the heart and brings it into accord with God's law (Ps. li. 12-14), thus points to the new creation of the heart on the plane of completed salvation, Ezek. xxxvi. 26 sq.; xi. 19." Oehler s. v. Herz, Herzog, R. E.

7. The two elections of king; ix. 1-x. 16 and x. 17-27. Saul's call to the royal office consists in two consecutive acts: 1) in the section ix. 1-x. 16 is related how Saul is personally called in secret, consecrated by anointing, and by the three signs assured that he is the king of Israel called by the Lord. Here the divine factor, as the only effective one, appears in the foreground; 2) in x. 17-27 is related the public election of Saul by lot by a popular assembly called for that purpose by Samuel "to the Lord." Here the human factor appears in co-operation with the divine, and Samuel is their intermediary. There is no conflict between these two narratives. "Is then the divine instruction to Samuel to grant the people's demand and give them a king (ch. viii.) and the revelation that Saul was the man selected by Jehovah, together with the anointing of Saul (ix. 1-x. 16) irreconcilable with his choice by lot?—That a prophet carries out unconditionally the will of God, even when it does not accord with his own views, and leaves the decision of the lot to the control of God, involves neither a tempting of God nor a piece of jugglery" (Keil, Introd. I., 235; the latter part against Thenius). By the lot, as means of direct divine decision, Saul, already in secret called to be king, was as such openly before the whole people to receive solemn divine legitimation. Similarly in Aaron's case, Numb. xvii. Besides the two principal stations of the road on which Saul is led by God through Samuel into the kingdom, Ramah and Mizpah, between which Rachel's grave, Deborah's oak and Gibeah are important intermediate stations, there is yet a third, Gilgal, chap. xi. Here the kingdom is renewed to him, here he first finds undivided, universal recognition as king of Israel, having once more received the divine legitimation by a victory over the enemy. We find here a gradation in the occurrences, each of which contains a new moment, and none of which has anything that excludes or contradicts the others.

8. The twofold law of the king, viii. 11-18 and x. 25. These two are mutually exclusive. The former (viii.) is that which is historically necessary from the heathen point of view, the consequence of the demand to have a king like the kings of the nations; the latter (x.) is the ideal theocratic law of the king, which corresponds to the call of the covenant-people, and, as an outflow from the holy will of the covenant God, is the limit and norm of the royal government. The former sprang from the sinful self-will of men, the latter is the absolute dominion of the divine will. Saul's call and election was to be completed in his attestation after the norm of this law of the kingdom.

9. The position of prophecy towards the newly-established kingdom is a controlling, regulating, norm-giving one. Samuel's conduct towards Saul on his entrance upon the theocratic royal calling prefigures the position which prophecy was henceforth to occupy alongside of the kingdom. "That the law of the king should not be a dead letter, that royal self-will should be kept within bounds, was to be the care not of a representative popular assembly, but of prophecy, which stood as theocratic watchman by the side of royalty." Oehler, s. v. König in Herz. R. E. VI. 12.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. IX. 27; X. 1. How the Lord fits His chosen ones for the kingly calling in His kingdom: 1) By quiet instruction by means of His word He brings them into a right knowledge of the tasks He assigns; 2) By the anointing of His Spirit He imparts to them the needful power and strength therefor; 3) By the production of infallible signs He gives them a just certainty and joyous confidence. [Ver. 2, latter part, Scott: A superior care, in common life, swallows up an inferior one; and the tender parent ceases from anxiety about his property, when solicitous for the welfare of his son. . . . And so, a due concern about eternal things would moderate our care about the interests of this life.—TR.]

Vers. 2-9. The signs of divine guidance along the paths of human life on earth, how they 1) Pointing backwards, remind us of the manifestations of grace in past times (the holy places); 2) Pointing upwards, admonish us to lift up the heart from worthless, earthly things to higher good; 3) Pointing forwards, demand a new life in the Spirit, and 4) call on us to look into our own heart, while for the work of renewal of the whole man they promise the gifts and powers of the Spirit from above.

The appearance of special divine signs in human life: 1) Whence coming? a) Ordered in time by God's wise Providence, not springing from chance, not aimless; b) Decreed in his eternal purpose, not accidental, not groundless; c) Sent as messengers of His holy and gracious will, not meaningless. 2) To whom applying? a) To him who lets himself be guided by God; b) To him who holds still when God is guiding him, and c) To him who lets God speak to him by His word. 3) What signifying? a) Reminding of the saving and gracious presence of God (partly in the past, partly in the present: "God is with thee"); b) Pointing to our tasks, which under the guidance of the Lord are to be fulfilled (vers. 7, 8); c) Exhorting to a renewal of the whole inner life through the power of the Holy Ghost (comp. vers. 6, 9). [Ver. 6. Music as a means of religious exaltation. Comp. 2 Kings iii. 15; 1 Cor. xiv. 26-33; Eph. v. 18.—Tr.]

Vers. 6-9. The transforming effects of the Spirit of God. 1) Out of the old heart He creates a new man. 2) Out of dumb people He makes prophets. 3) To the weak He lends power and strength for a great work. 4) Remoteness from God He changes into the most intimate communion with God.—Vers. 6, 9. The Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee! 1) A great word of promise, which applies to every one that is called to the kingdom of God. 2) A wonderful event of the inner life, which occurs and is experienced only under definite conditions. 3) The beginning of a new life, which takes place by the change of the heart. [Ver. 6. Prophesying not a certain proof of piety. Comp. Balaam, Caiaphas (John xi. 51), and the "many" in Matt. vii. 22.—Tr.]

Ver. 7. The great word, "God is with thee!" 1) The infallible signs, which assure us of it. 2) The consoling strength, which the heart thereby receives. 3) The mighty impulse to do according to God's good pleasure, which lies therein. 4) The earnest exhortation which is thereby given, in all the occurrences of human life, to mark the will of the Lord therein made known.

Ver. 9. The new heart a gift of God. 1) Through human proclamations of the divine word the renewal of the heart is only prepared for. 2) But through the divine act of the Holy Spirit working through the word it is effected, and 3) It is accompanied by infallible signs of the manifestations of divine grace. [HENRY: He has no longer the heart of a husbandman, . . . concerned only about his corn and cattle; but the heart of a statesman, a general, a prince. Whom God calls to service He will make fit for it. If He advance to another station, He will give another heart, to those who sincerely desire to serve Him with their power.—Tr.]

Ver. 10. The power of communion in the Lord: 1) Inwardly it unites the members closely together, a) into an inward confederacy of love in the Lord, b) into harmonious praise of the Lord; 2) Outwardly it exercises a controlling and contagious influence: a) so that a way is made for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of others, and b) so that like effects of the Spirit are manifested in others also.

Vers. 7-12. The beginning of a new life in the Spirit: 1) Naturally prepared for and indicated beforehand through signs given by God (vers. 7, 9); 2) Supernaturally effected through the power of the Holy Spirit (ver. 10); 3) Inwardly consisting in the renewal of the heart (ver. 9); 4) Outwardly manifesting itself in the fruits (effects) of the Spirit (willing obedience to the Lord's command, patient waiting for the Lord's direction; joyful testimony to the Lord's grace). [It is not safe to treat this history as a case of true and thorough spiritual renewal, in any sense approaching the New Test. use of similar expressions. Comp. note of Tr. above in "Historical."—Tr.]

Vers. 11, 12. The question, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" 1) A cry of astonishment by the world estranged from God, in which it speaks its own sentence; 2) A reliable attestation and confirmation of the miracle of the awaking to a new life for him in whom it has occurred; 3) A factual proclamation of the honor of the Lord, who by His Spirit creates such a transformation in man. [HENRY: Let not the worst be despaired of, yet let not an external show of devotion, and a sudden change for the present, be too much relied on; for Saul among the prophets, was Saul still.—Tr.]

Vers. 13-16. The art of testifying and being silent at the right time about the things of the kingdom of God: 1) How it is to be learned in the school of the Holy Spirit (after Saul's example); 2) How it is to be exercised according to the company in which one finds himself (the inspired host of prophets—the profane uncle of Saul).

Vers. 17-19. The mightiest means employed by the word of God to awaken true repentance: 1) It humbles by reminding us of the manifestations of grace which without merit or worthiness we have experienced, in which the Lord has shown Himself our compassionate father (ver. 18). 2) It rebukes by setting before us our ingratitude and unfaithfulness, with which we have rewarded Him (ver. 19, "over us"), and 3) It shames us by pointing to the grace and faithfulness of God, which notwithstanding do not depart from us, in which He patiently condescends even to our sinful wishes and demands ("And now present yourselves before the Lord"). Vers. 21-2. [He could not be found—hidden among the baggage. HENRY: So little fond was he now of that power, which yet, when he was in possession of, he could not without the utmost indignation think of parting with. . . . We may suppose he was at this time really averse to take upon him the government, 1. Because he was conscious to himself of unfitness for so great a trust. He had not been bred up to books, or arms, or courts, and feared he should be guilty of some fatal blunder. 2. Because it would expose him to the envy of his neighbors that were ill-affected towards him. 3. Because he understood by what Samuel had said, that the people sinned in asking a king, and it was in anger that God granted their request. 4. Because the affairs of Israel were at this time in a bad posture: the Philistines were strong, the Ammonites threatening, and he must be bold indeed, that will set sail in a storm.—Tr.]

Vers. 20-27. True humility and modesty: 1) How it roots itself in a human heart touched by the Spirit of God; 2) How it shows itself, a) before God in the confession of unworthiness and unfitness for service in His kingdom, b) before men in reserve and silence; 3) How it is crowned, a) before God, with the calling to His service, b) before men, with the approbation of men's hearts which is wrought by God the Lord.

Vers. 24-27. The divine choice and calling of a man to service in God's kingdom: 1) It makes itself known in outward signs ("see ye," ver. 24); 2) It is conditional by the requisite natural gifts and properties ("that there is none like him," &c., ver. 24); 3) It carries itself forward by preparation from above, a) with the gifts and powers of the Spirit, b) through instruction in the will of God (ver. 25); 4) It rises up above the favor and disfavor of parties, in that it teaches us, a) to value human approbation as a gift of God (ver. 26), and

b) over against the hate and contempt of opposers to observe an humble silence before God.

J. DISSELHOFF, vers. 1-11. The anointing to the office of king: 1) On those who hold still before their God this anointing is wrought, really and truly, though at first in hope; 2) And although it is wrought only in hope, yet it is attested by divine signs following. THE SAME: vers. 7, 8, 13-27. What the royal anointing gives, and what it demands: 1) It makes the anointed one fit for all that his office lays upon him; 2) It demands that the anointed one should now do nothing more according to his own choice, but every thing according to the direction and will of God.

[Ver. 27. "And he was as though he were deaf." Notwithstanding they 1) questioned his capacity, 2) despised his power, 3) refused him homage and help (see Exegetical Notes), he was as though he were deaf, thereby showing 1) self-control, 2) prudence, 3) humility. Apply this to 1) public officers, 2) employers of servants or other subordinates, 3) persons in society, 4) church officials. There is a high sense in which God acts thus, and bad men imagine that He really is deaf (Ps. lxxiii. 11: xciv. 7; Job xxii. 13.—Tr.)

THIRD SECTION.

Confirmation and General Recognition of the Kingdom under Saul.

CHAPS. XI. XII.

I. Saul's Victory over the Ammonites. Chap. XI. 1-15.

- 1 THEN [And]¹ Nahash the Ammonite came up, and encamped against² Jabesh-Gilead; and all the men of Jabesh said unto [to] Nahash, Make a covenant with
- 2 us, and we will serve thee. And Nahash the Ammonite answered [said to] them, On this condition will I make a covenant³ with you, that I may thrust⁴ out
- 3 all your right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel. And the elders of Jabesh said unto [to] him, Give⁵ us seven days respite, that we may send messengers unto all the coasts⁶ of Israel, and then [om. then] if there be no man to save
- 4 us, we will come out to thee. Then came the messengers [And the messengers came] to Gibeah of Saul,⁷ and told the tidings⁸ in the ears of the people; and all people lifted up their voices and wept.
- 5 And behold, Saul came after the herd [oxen] out of [from] the field. And Saul said, What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of
- 6 the ruin of Jabesh. And the Spirit of God came upon Saul when he heard those
- 7 [these] tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly. And he took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them in pieces,⁹ and sent them¹⁰ throughout all the coasts of Israel by the hand of messengers, saying, Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto [to] his oxen. And the fear of the Lord [Jehovah] fell on the people, and they came out with one consent [as one man].
- 8 And when [om. when] he numbered them in Bezek, [ins. and] the children of
- 9 Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand.¹¹ And they said unto [to] the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say unto [to] the men

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ [Ver. 1. On reading of Sept. and Vulg. see Expos.—Tr.]
- ² [Ver. 1. Or, laid siege to.—Tr.]
- ³ [Ver. 2. The word "covenant" is not in the Heb. but is involved in the verb. The insertion of the word in the Heb. text is therefore unnecessary. Throughout this passage the Sept. has explanatory additions, which need be regarded only as the freedoms of a translator.—Tr.]
- ⁴ [Ver. 2. Rendered "pick out" by Eng. A. V. in Ps. xxx. 17.—Tr.]
- ⁵ [Ver. 3. קָרָא Hiph. Impv. Apoc. of קָרָא. Ges. Heb. Gr., § 76, Rem. 15.—Tr.]
- ⁶ [Ver. 3. Or, into every region.—Tr.]
- ⁷ [Ver. 4. Sept. has incorrectly "to Gibeah to Saul;" It is evident that the message was not brought to Saul. Syr. "the hill of Saul," Arab. "the city of Saul," but the word is a proper name.—Tr.]
- ⁸ [Ver. 4. Lit. "spoke the words (or things)." In ver. 5 it is: "related the words (or things)."—Tr.]
- ⁹ [Ver. 7. Comp. Ex. xxix. 17; Lev. i. 6; Judg. xx. 6.—Tr.]
- ¹⁰ [Ver. 7. Some render: "sent (word) etc., saying."—Tr.]
- ¹¹ [Ver. 8. The Sept. gives for Israel 800,000, and for Judah 70,000, about double the numbers in the Heb. text—an illustration of the tendency to magnify numbers.—Tr.]

- of Jabesh Gilead, To-morrow, by that [the] time the sun be hot,"¹² ye shall have help. And the messengers came and showed [announced] it to the men of Jabesh; and they were glad. Therefore [And] the men of Jabesh said, To-morrow we will come out unto [to] you, and ye shall do with [to] us all that seemeth good unto [to] you. And it was so [came to pass] on the morrow that Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning-watch, and slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day, and it came to pass that they which remained were scattered, so that two of them were not left together.
- 12 And the people said unto [to] Samuel, Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us?¹³ bring¹⁴ the men that we may put them to death. And Saul said, There shall not a man be put to death this day; for to-day the Lord [Jehovah] hath wrought salvation in Israel. Then said Samuel [and Samuel said] to the people, Come, and let us go to Gilgal, and renew the kingdom there. And all the people went to Gilgal, and there they [om. they] made¹⁵ Saul king before the Lord [Jehovah] in Gilgal, and there they [om. there they] sacrificed sacrifices of peace-offerings [ins. there] before the Lord [Jehovah]; and there Saul¹⁶ and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly.

¹² [Ver. 9. Lit. "in (Qeri, at) the heat of the sun;" see similar phrase in ver. 11.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 12. Sept., Chald., Syr., Arab., insert a negative: "Saul shall not reign over us;" Chald., "is not fit to reign," Vulg. as Heb. This neg. does not necessarily imply a different text, yet a לֹא may easily have fallen out of the Heb. the preceding word ending with ל . The sense is the same in both readings.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 12. This word is plu. in Heb., Chald., Vulg., Arab., but sing. in Sept. and Syr.; the former, as the more difficult reading (since the address was to Samuel), is to be preferred.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 15. Sept.: anointed—as interpretation.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 15. Sept.: Samuel (instead of Saul)—more probably error of transcription than attempt to make Samuel conspicuous.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-4. The siege of Jabesh by Nahash, king of the Ammonites.

Ver. 1. The need of a vigorous single leadership in war against the surrounding hostile peoples, especially in the first instance for the war threatened by the Ammonites (xii. 12), had occasioned the people's desire for a strong regal government like that of those nations. God had yielded to their desire, and through Samuel given them a king. But this king, after having been publicly presented and greeted as king, had withdrawn into seclusion. For a part of the people were unwilling to accept the new order of things under Saul's kingly authority, not believing that he could rescue the people from the threatening danger. It was, therefore, all-important that Saul should, by some deed of deliverance, show himself to be the king, who could lead Israel to victory over their enemies. Awaiting the moment when he could display his strength with the Lord's help as his Anointed, he had kept silence before the contempt of his enemies, and had retired to the quiet of his accustomed rural occupations. And not long after the day of Mizpah came the peril, in view of which the demand had been made for a king to lead the people to battle. Nahash, the Ammonite, advanced with an army, and began the war against Israel with the siege of Jabesh-Gilead. The Sept. inserts at the beginning of this verse from the preceding (x. 27) the words: "and it came to pass after a month,"* and is followed by Ew. and Then. though all other ancient translations agree with the mas. text, only the Vulg. adds to the translation of the text the words: et factum est quasi post mensem, an addition originating probably in the Itala, which follows the Sept. The statement of time is evidently an interpretation of the translation.* It is the less necessary for the connection by reason of the looseness of the chronology here. According to xii. 12 the threatened war with the Ammonites was the immediate occasion of the demand for a king. Naturally, therefore, Nahash, having before made his preparations, entered the Israelitish territory soon after the king was chosen and confirmed. If it had been intended to give this datum of time the word "one" must necessarily have been inserted. —On Nahash,† king of the Ammonites, see on 2 Sam. x. 2. We have here a renewal of the war with the Ammonites, which (according to Judg. x. 11) Israel had victoriously carried on under Jephthah. No doubt Nahash made the same charge against Israel—claiming the territory east of the Jordan which, it was alleged, Israel had taken from the Ammonites—which was then made by the king and repelled by Jeph. (Judg. xi. 13 sq.). Comp. Josh. xiii. 25. Jephthah's victory had not permanently broken the power of the Ammonites. Jabesh lay in northern Gilead, and belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh. According to Joseph. (Ant. 6, 5, 1), it was the capital of Gilead; according to the Onom., "six Roman miles from Pella on the way to Gerasa," and is conjectured by Robinson (III. 319) and van der Velde (Mem., p. 323) to be the same with the present ruins of Ed-Deir,‡ on the south side of the Wady Jabis, in which word is not improbably contained the name of the old Jabesh. Jabesh was the only city (Judg. xxi. 9) which did not take part in the war of

* [Not if he had a different text before him.—Ta.]

† [On the relation between this Nahash and the person mentioned in 2 Sam. xvii. 25 as father of Abigail, and for discussion of 1 Chr. ii. 16, see Arts. Abigail, Zeruah, Nahash, in Smith's Bib. Dict. and the Commentaries in loco, and comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 27.—Ta.]

‡ ["On the mountains in full view of Beisan." Thomson, Land and Book, 2, 174.—Ta.]

* [Reading בְּחֶמְדָּוֶשׁ instead of בְּחֶמְדָּוֶשׁ .—Ta.]

extermination against Benjamin; its virgins were carried off for the Benjamites (Judg. xxi. 6 sq.). For the important connection of Jabesh with Saul's end see xxxi. 11-13 and 2 Sam. 4, 5.—The inhabitants of Jabesh are willing to come to an agreement with Nahash, and submit on reasonable conditions. This shows their entire defencelessness against the enemy, and characterizes Israel's weakness in consequence of the lack of firm and permanent union among its parts. Instead of accepting their humble proposal, Nahash offers the Jabeshites the extremest insult by the threat that, unless they surrendered unconditionally,* he would put out the right eyes of all of them.† On cruel conduct towards conquered enemies see Rüetschi, Herz. R. E. VIII. 87 [also Arts. War in Dicts. of Smith and Fairbairn, and Saalschütz, Archäologie der Hebräer, II. 506.—Tr.]. Nahash will lay this as a reproach "on all Israel," not because they had not courage to help them (Bunsen), but with the intention of undertaking war against all Israel, and avenging the insult offered by Jephthah. Josephus' remark, that he threatened to do this "in order that, their left eyes being concealed by their shields, they might be wholly unserviceable," is correct only on this supposition, that he in fact designed to conquer first the city and then Gilead.—Ver. 3. Nahash grants the desired seven days, in which they are to send messengers into every part of Israel; in this time he thought to finish his preparations for the conquest of the city, in order, in the existing division of the Israelitish tribes and forces, the more surely to attain his end. The Jabeshites promised to yield themselves, if no one came to their rescue. The assumption of this as possible, and the fact that they sent to every region of Israel shows that in this transition-period from the Judges to the kingdom, in spite of what Samuel had done towards securing unity of action, the old division of powers in tribal isolation and the consequent weakness against enemies still continued. That the messengers (ver. 4) go nevertheless not separately to the various tribes, but all together first‡ to Gibeah of Saul, is doubtless according to instructions given them. And the reason could be only that this was the residence of the elected king, and the centre of the whole people. We are not to conclude (with Then.), from the fact of their going not to Saul, but to the people, that they knew nothing of his election as king; they presented their case before the people, and not Saul, because (as appears from what follows) he was not in Gibeah, and did not return from his ordinary occupation till after their statement was made.—The weeping of the people points to the greatness of the danger and the painful consciousness of helplessness. Perhaps Saul was held in least esteem in his native city.

Vers. 5-7. Saul's first royal deed. He gathers the people together, so that they rise as one man

* [This is not the exact expression of the text; rather the putting out of the eyes was the condition of surrender and treaty offered in savage pleasantry by Nahash.—Tr.]

† וְיָצַק, "in this," that is, on this condition. The suff. וְיָצַק is to be taken as neuter, referring to the putting out of the eyes.

‡ [It is not said, that they went first to Gibeah.—Tr.]

against the Ammonites, and the hitherto-existing disunion is at an end.—Ver. 5. When the messengers arrive, Saul is in the field engaged in agricultural labors. He is called from the plough, as Gideon from the threshing-floor (Judg. vi. 11 sq.), to do great deeds for his people. "After the oxen" refers to his walking behind the oxen, with which he had ploughed, and which are called in ver. 7 "a yoke of oxen."—Ver. 6. When he hears the cause of the people's lamenting and weeping, the Spirit of God lays hold of him mightily. The great moment had come when the fire of mighty wrath, inflamed by God's Spirit, kindled at the reproach inflicted by the enemy on his people, and he, in fulfillment of his royal calling to be the deliverer of his people, was to step forth according to the will of the Lord.—Ver. 7. The cutting up of the oxen alone would not have exhausted the meaning which (as appears from the context) this symbolical action was meant to have. There was necessary also the sending of the pieces into every region of Israel, that is, to every tribe, as in the similar procedure in Judg. xix. 29. The meaning of Saul's sharp words by the messengers: Whoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done to his oxen, is only fully expressed by the pieces which are sent along with them. Though the "pieces" are not expressly mentioned in the text, as in Judg. xix. 29 (Then.), yet they must be understood from the connection. As there the pieces of the shamefully murdered woman's body, so here the pieces of the hewed oxen are the factual summons of the individual parts of the people to a common warfare, which was to avenge the wrong done them. Along with this similarity, however, between the two actions and their aims, there is an essential difference between them. In the former case the pieces represented the crime of the violated rights of hospitality and the expiation which was demanded. Here Saul sets forth the punishment to be expected by every one who should not join the campaign against the enemy; he threatens the exercise of his judicial power, which is a function of his royal office. The subject [i. e. executer] of the threat is neither the people of the recusant person (Josephus), nor the invading enemy, but it is he, the king of Israel, who is thoroughly conscious of his authority to summon the whole people to war against the enemy, under the impulse of the Spirit of God, which has come upon him. Saul here steps forth, in the name of the Lord, who has chosen him to save His people from their foes, with an act of sovereign theocratic royal power. As possessor of this power he names himself first as leader of Israel, and then Samuel second. That, however, he does connect the latter's name with his, shows Samuel's high position as prophet and watchman of the kingdom and (with the retention of his judicial authority) as leader of the people along with Saul, and proves also Samuel's approval of this assumption of royal authority before the people. His symbolical action and the accompanying threat, which is to rouse the people from division to unity, and from lethargy to a common enterprise, is thus stamped with the prophetic and judicial authority of Samuel, under which Saul's royal authority stands.—Clericus excellently remarks: "This was a symbolical action which, by the exhibition of the pieces of the oxen, struck the mind more than words alone would have done." The action belongs to the category of symbolical acts, which set forth corporally and vigorously the content of the following words, in order to strengthen their impression. See 1 Kings xi. 30; xxii. 11; 2 Kings xiii. 18. Comp. the symbolical actions in the prophetic writings. —The powerful impression made by Saul's appearance and act is indicated in a two-fold way: 1) The fear of Jehovah fell on the people. Clericus: "Either fear sent or in some peculiar way infused into men's minds by God, or fear lest they should offend God, if they refused to obey the command of the king and the prophet." The second explanation is to be preferred; for Saul's appearance is theocratic; he speaks in the name and under the commission of the Lord, whose instrument he, as well as Samuel, is. The people, impressed by his act and his words, recognize the holy and mighty will of their God, and are seized by a wholesome fear before the Lord, which leads them to recognize the obligation to fulfil his command revealed through Saul. "The fear of the Lord" is here, therefore, not a "panic fear" (Thenius, Böttcher); for Jehovah is not = Elohim, as Keil well remarks;* the reference is to the relation of the people to their covenant-God, who anew reveals Himself; 2) And they came out as one man. The effect of Saul's appearance and message to the whole people was that they rose out of division into a firm unity of parts (tribes) and powers. The Spirit of the Lord, which impelled Saul to this noble and vigorous action, so strangely contrasted with his former quiet life behind the plough, laid hold at the same time on the whole nation, so that it was suddenly lifted up, as it were involuntarily, in the uniting and strengthening power of this Spirit from above, to a new life before God (in His fear) and within itself (in unity and union) against the enemies of the theocracy.

Vers. 8-11. Saul's deed of deliverance by victory over the Ammonites. The summoning of the people and the gathering of the hosts goes swiftly on. The latter is presupposed in the phrase "numbered or mustered them." This took place in Bezek, in the Tribe of Issachar, in the plain of Jezreel, not far from Bethshean, at about as great an elevation as Jabesh, according to the Onom. 17† Roman miles north of Neapolis (Nablis), on the road to Scythopolis. This place must not be confounded with the Bezek in the Tribe of Judah, where the Canaanites and Perizzites under their king Adonibezek were beaten by Judah and Simeon, Judg. i. 3, 4. In respect to the separate mention of Israel and Judah [ver. 8] Clericus remarks: "this smacks of the times that followed the division of the Israelites into two kingdoms." See the same distinction made in xvii. 52; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. ii. 9 sq.; iii. 10; v. 1-5; xix. 41 sq.; 1 Sam. xx. 24. That the large and powerful tribe of Judah has the relatively small number (30,000) of warriors over against the 300,000 of Israel, is due to the fact that a large part of its territory was in the possession of the Philistines, as to whose further advance more care had to be taken, now that the north-eastern frontier of the country was threatened by the Ammonites. The large numbers are explained by the general levy of the people (a sort of militia).—Ver. 9. The messengers from Jabesh are now dismissed with the answer that help would be brought them the next day by the time the sun was hottest. So confident is Saul with his army in the power of the prophetic spirit, that the Lord will through them bring help. Bold assurance of faith which, in a great undertaking, anticipates its success as an accomplished fact. The messengers from Jabesh had the same confidence of faith.—Ver. 10. "To-morrow," that is, one day after the messengers had returned to Jabesh. This message of the Jabeshites to the Ammonites must, according to ver. 3, have led the latter to believe that they wished to treat of terms of surrender. It was a stratagem which made the Ammonites all the more confident.—Ver. 11. They are overpowered by surprise. The time of the "morning-watch" is from 3 to 6 o'clock in the morning, when the night is darkest. As Saul's army was not a disciplined one, but hastily gathered from the whole people, he could only hope to gain a complete and decisive victory by attacking the confident Ammonites in their camp from three sides during their soundest sleep. The army, divided into three parts, came "into the midst of the camp" from different directions. The victory was complete "by the heat of the day;" the enemy's army is utterly scattered. "Two were not left together."

Vers. 12-15. Saul's renewed confirmation and general recognition as king.—Ver. 12. This bold deed of deliverance, performed under the immediate impulse of the Spirit from above at the head of the nation, legitimizes Saul before all Israel as their God-appointed king. It is quite in keeping with the enthusiasm with which he had inspired the people that they wished to punish his contemptuous opposers (x. 27) with death as traitors. The words: "Saul should reign over us" are to be taken either as exclamation or as question.—Ver. 13. In respect to this demand Saul appears in a yet nobler light. His heart is full of humble piety; he gives the glory to God alone, saying, "To-day Jehovah hath wrought salvation in Israel." The victory over the foe is to him nothing but a saving act of God Himself. He regards himself as simply the instrument of God. This is the ground ("2, "for") of the rejection of the demand; none should die that day. It is the utterance of royal generosity towards his enemies, whose hearts it must have won. Thereby he gained another victory: 1) over himself—he restrains himself in the exercise of a right, 2) over the anger of those who demanded that justice be executed, 3) over his former opponents, who now clearly see that which, under the influence of haughty contempt, they had doubted, and 4) over the whole people, who must have been carried

* [The word Elohim or El (God) is apparently sometimes used in the Old Testament in a superlative sense—"very great or high," as in Ps. xxxvi. 7 (6), which is literally "mountains of El," Ps. lxxviii. 16 (15), 1 Sam.

xiv. 15, or with Prep. h (to) as in Jon. iii. 3. But in the former cases the true meaning of the word "God" is always kept in the foreground, though the adjectival conception "great" naturally attaches to it.—Ta.]

† [The German has incorrectly 7. Bezek is differently located by different writers. See the dictionaries of Winer, Fairbairn, and Smith, s. v.—Ta.]

along by him on the path of noble moral conduct, and lifted above themselves to the height on which he stood. The enthusiastic recognition of Saul by the whole nation as divinely appointed king was factually (in contrast with x. 27) completed.—Vers. 14, 15. Then follows, under Samuel's direction, the formal and solemn renewal of the kingdom. Samuel orders an assembly of the people at Gilgal in the Jordan-valley; from the scene of victory the people, led by Saul and Samuel, go to that holy spot. The object of the gathering he declares to be the renewal of the kingdom with reference to the election of king at Mizpah, x. 17 sq. What the "renewal of the kingdom" means must be learned from the following words: There they made Saul king before

Israel.—The word מָלַךְ ["made king"] cannot be rendered "they anointed him," because that is not its meaning, and because the act of anointing could have been performed, not by the people, but only by Samuel in the name of Jehovah. For the rest, if there had been a second anointing, it would, on account of its importance, have been expressly mentioned, as in David's case, 2 Sam. ii. 4; v. 3. The translation of the Sept.: "Samuel anointed Saul" is obviously an interpretation, they stumbling at the strange word of the original (מָלַךְ), which seemed to contradict x. 17 sq., and adopting, as the best expedient, the supposition of a second anointing (with reference to x. 1), having in mind the double anointing of David. All the other ancient translations follow the Masoretic text. Starting from the unfounded assumption that an anointing is here spoken of, Thenius wrongly argues that here is a sign of different authorship for chap. xi. and x. 1-16, since a double anointing is hardly supposable. It is in itself quite supposable, since it actually occurred in David's case, though then for a definite reason. But the text gives no support to this supposition. For the words "they made him king before Jehovah" mean nothing else than the solemn announcement and presentation of Saul before the nation as divinely appointed king in consequence of the divine legitimation given by his brilliant exploit against the Ammonites. [What is above said by Dr. Erdmann may serve also as answer to Wellhausen's critical remarks on this paragraph. He holds that chap. xi. attaches itself naturally to x. 16, since Saul in xi. 1-11 is not king, though he knows that he will be, and his whole procedure corresponds psychologically with exactness to the tone of mind naturally induced by the signs x. 9-12. But this is no less true according to the present arrangement of the text. There is historical motive for the double declaration as king, and there is no external evidence to show that x. 17-27 and xi. 12-14 are interpolations.—Tr.] The "before the Lord" (Clericus: "calling on God's name and offering sacrifices to Him") indicates the essential difference between this act and the proclamation and homage at Mizpah, marking the religious act of installation sealed with a solemn offering (before the Lord), by which Saul was formally and solemnly consecrated to his office by the invisible God-king with renewed homage and recognition of the whole nation, and another pledge to keep the divine law. It is Saul's solemn inauguration. The previous facts in the history of his call are the ascending steps to this acme—the solemn beginning of his royal rule.—"What had been done for Saul himself on the day of his anointing, and for the people at the election of king had now in Gilgal been publicly renewed and confirmed for the whole kingdom." Schlier, Saul, p. 22. The "peace-offerings" which were sacrificed "before the Lord" expressed joy and gratitude before the Lord, the peaceful, joyful relation between Him and His people. Along with this religious side of joy the connected sacrificial meal represented its human side. Thus was celebrated at Gilgal by king and people a festival of great joy. There Samuel performs the functions of priest, and, as prophet and priest, is and remains the organ of the word and blessing of God, under which king and people equally stand, and by which the two are to form the indissoluble theocratic unity and fellowship, which from now on must be the foundation of the whole theocratic life.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

See the Exegetical explanations. In addition the following remarks may be made:

1. The deeper the ignominy and the greater the need of God's people under the threats of the powerful foe, so much the more glorious was the deliverance, so much the more overwhelming the manifestation of the glory and the faithfulness of the covenant-God. The weeping of the people in view of the powerlessness of the ununited tribes and of the scornful pride of the enemy, expressed at the same time the humble, penitent spirit in which they sought the Lord's help, as, in the time of the Judges, after defection and alienation from God, they ever turned penitently to the Lord when their need was greatest.

2. Saul's call, in accordance with the occasion which led to the demand for the kingdom, and in accordance with the historical relations of the people to the surrounding heathen nations, was a military one. And so the prelude to his assumption of the government and his public solemn confirmation as king of Israel is this military deed, whose theocratic significance is indicated by the fact, that its source and origin is said to be the laying hold and filling of Saul by the power of the Spirit of God (ver. 6). For the military work of the theocratic king must be sanctified, guided, accomplished by God directly through His Spirit, in order that the outer and inner conditions of the farther development of the theocracy in Israel may be secured.

3. The "coming of the Spirit of God" on Saul (ver. 6), and on the organs of the theocracy generally, is not to be volatilized into an intensifying of their spiritual life, an uplifting of themselves to words and deeds in the service of God, but must be held to be a real, supernatural entrance of the Spirit of God into their inner life. This, however, is accomplished here (vers. 5, 6) as in x. 10, not without an external, natural occasion and human instrumentality. The Spirit of God advances along the path marked out by the divine wisdom.

4. There is a holy anger, justified before God, like that which seized Saul (ver. 6). Its origin is the Spirit from above, whose flame kindles it; its object is the power of sin, the shame and ignominy inflicted on God's people and name, the enemies of God; its aim is the honor of God and the furtherance of the ends of His kingdom.

5. The power of the Spirit of God, which filled and impelled Saul showed itself, in its comprehensive, penetrating power over the national life, by the twofold effect, which was decisive for the first joint action of king and people, and also full of typical meaning for their whole history as people of God: the fear of the Lord in the relation of the people to their God, and the unity of their different parts ("the people went out as one man"); the innermost, the fear of Jehovah, was the source of their conjunction to a firm unity. To awaken and nourish the fear of God in the people by energetic, divinely-guided government, and to set the people as one man in their theocratic fellowship over against the heathen peoples as the people of the Lord, was the task and calling of the theocratic monarchy. These two aims contain the roots of the love of God and one's neighbor as the twofold fundamental law of the kingdom of God. Matt. xxii. 37-40; Deut. vi. 5 sq.; Lev. xix. 18.

6. When Saul, at his election as king and the partial homage which he received, maintained silence towards his scornful enemies and practiced self-denial in quietness and patience, he performed (over against the demand to visit deserved punishment on the despisers of the Lord's Anointed) under the guidance of God's Spirit an act of love to enemies, letting them go unpunished, and setting aside the demand to visit strict justice on them by pointing to the grace and salvation wherein God had just revealed Himself to the whole nation. A prelude of the disposition of forbearing, merciful love, which finds its fulfilment in the New Testament according to the word of the Lord (Matt. v. 44), and through the Spirit from above (Luke ix. 55), and has its ground in personal experience of the merciful love of God (Luke vi. 36).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-11. On what depends the help and deliverance of a people in times of great distress? 1) They must lift their voices imploringly to God (ver. 4). 2) The men whom God has raised up as their helpers, they must receive with confidence as the Lord's instruments (vers. 5-7). 3) They must be subject in obedience and fidelity to the rulers given them by God. 4) They must place themselves under the discipline and guidance of God's Spirit, in order, a) in true fear of God to be well-pleasing to the Lord, and b) in true unity of love to be as one man.

Vers. 1-5. What is meant by the question in a king's mouth: What aileth the people that they weep? 1) A father's faithful observation of his people's weal and woe. 2) A brother's sympathizing compassion for their distress. 3) A king's magnanimous readiness to help.

[Vers. 5-11. HENRY (altered): The spirit and conduct of Saul (comp. x. 9): 1) His humility—anoointed king, but following the oxen. 2) His concern for his neighbors (ver. 5). 3) His zeal for the safety and honor of Israel (ver. 6). 4) The authority and power he exerted, upon this important occasion. 5) His faith and confidence (ver. 9). 6) His industry and close application to this business (vers. 8, 11). 7) His success.—Tr.]

Vers. 6-11. The holy communion in which king and people should stand, through the Spirit of the Lord: 1) In righteous anger against all that is hostile to God's kingdom (ver. 6); 2) In true fear of God, which unites king and people inwardly before the Lord; 3) In faithful love, wherein a) the people are heartily obedient to the king's will, which aims at the common welfare, and b) under his guidance they rise up as one man against the common enemy, and to help the suffering fellow-citizens (ver. 7); 4) In firm, confident faith in the Lord's support, which does not suffer his people to be put to shame (vers. 8-11).

Vers. 8, 9. The messages, To-morrow ye shall have help: 1) A testimony of helpful, active brotherly love; 2) A promise of prompt, hastening help; 3) A trustworthy assurance of fortunate success; 4) A source of great joy ("rejoiced greatly").

Vers. 12-15. To-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel: 1) A jubilee-cry, praising the Lord's honor; 2) A warning cry, reminding of guilty offences against forgiving and compassionate love; 3) An awakening cry, demanding the presentation of thank-offerings before the Lord; 4) A joyous cry, calling to be glad in the Lord.

J. DISSELHOFF: The first kingly deed. The two noblest ornaments of a servant of God are united in it: 1) Burning, holy zeal in the cause of God and the brethren; 2) Corresponding gentleness in one's own cause.

[Vers. 4-6. SCOTT: The Lord, in providence, will make way for those whom He has designed and prepared for usefulness; nor shall any repent of humbly waiting in obscurity and honest industry, till He is pleased to call them forth; for pride and impatience alone can conclude, that the only wise God has lighted a candle to leave it under a bushel.—Tr.]

Ver. 6. STARKE: Official wrath is unforbidden. [Compare "Historical and Theological," No. 4. Anger is sometimes lawful, sometimes a duty. It is difficult, but not impossible, to "be angry and sin not" (Eph. iv. 26). Our Lord was at the same time angry and grieved (Mark iii. 5).—Tr.] S. SCHMID: It is the Spirit of God alone that works good in men, whether in an ordinary or an extraordinary manner. DISSELHOFF: Without this zeal no anointed one may be found. For this word will always hold good: "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord slothfully" [so Luther in Jer. xlviii. 10. Eng. A. V., "deceitfully," but margin, "negligently," which better suits the connection.—Tr.]—But in truth zeal alone is not yet the right ornament of the warriors of Christ. Prove thy zeal, whether it is not perhaps mixed with flesh and blood, or even proceeds altogether from this fountain; and know that zeal for the Lord's cause should not flow from mere excitability, from a momentary ebullition of natural compassion, or from being overcome by human displeasure and anger. Not the strange fire which the sons of Aaron took, but the fire from the holy altar, the Spirit of God—let us learn it from Saul!—must overmaster, inflame, inspire us.

Ver. 7. Berl. Bible: There are two sorts of fear. One is a selfish, reward-seeking fear. In this we are caring for ourselves, and it is self-interest that excites, and that is properly human fear. But there is also a fear of the Lord, the fear that one has for His sake alone, when one fears lest the Lord has been grieved through our own sins, or those of others, or lest we or others should not have sufficiently glorified Him in ourselves.—DISSELHOFF: This can one man accomplish in the people of God, when he is driven by a holy, fiery zeal. The fear of God goes forth from him, and falls upon all to whom he comes. As soon as the fear of the Lord drives an army, a people, to the conflict, no need of being uneasy as to the result.—One cowardly, surly soldier of Christ, afraid of suffering, easily makes a hundred cowards, for cowardice is contagious.—Ver. 12. STARKE: As in God, so in His deputies, mercy and justice should be inseparable; whosoever these two go asunder, government follows them into distraction, and ends in ruin.*—DISSELHOFF: Such a saying (ver. 13) is the fairest ornament of God's warriors, lion-like zeal against the enemies of God, against sin and all its outbreaks, a lamb-like disposition towards individual sinners, for they are not to be destroyed, but to be saved through the same salvation that has fallen to our lot.—BERLENE. BIBLE: Saul's answer instructs the people in two things at once: first, that we must not ascribe victory to man, but to God; secondly, that we must not be too swift in judging those who through ignorance have rejected God's guidance, and that the salvation which God has, in so glorious a manner, given to Israel, would be mighty enough to bring back again those who have wandered away.—God wills not the death of the sinner, etc. Excessive strictness rather repels sinners, than brings them right again.—Vers. 14, 15. CRAMER: The best bond between authorities and subjects is that they intend to be mutually faithful.—DISSELHOFF: When one does even something great for his Lord, and does not shrink from much toil and trouble for His sake, can his heart abide in very great joy if he forgets gentleness and patience towards his neighbor, becomes provoked against him, bitter and ill-mannerly?

* [As Starke has borrowed this (apparently without acknowledgment) word for word from the English Bishop Hall, we have not re-translated, but given the original. And so in numerous subsequent cases.—Ta.]

II. Samuel's solemn concluding Transaction with the Assembly of the People at Gilgal.

CHAPTER XII. 1-25.

- 1 AND Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold I have hearkened unto your voice in
- 2 all that ye said unto me, and have made a king over you. And now, behold, the king walketh before you, and I am old and gray-headed,¹ and behold, my sons [my sons, behold, they] are with you, and I have walked before you from my
- 3 childhood unto this day. Behold, here I am. Witness against me before the Lord [Jehovah] and before his Anointed: whose ox have I taken? or, whose ass have I taken? or, whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or, of whose hand have I received any [a] bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?² and I will
- 4 restore it you. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand. And he said unto them, The Lord is [Jehovah be] witness against you, and his Anointed is [be] witness this day, that ye have not found aught in my hand. And they³ answered [said], He is witness
- 6 [Witness be they]. And Samuel said unto the people, It is [om. it is] the Lord [Jehovah]⁴ that [who] advanced [appointed] Moses and Aaron, and that [who] brought your fathers up out of the land of Egypt!
- 7 Now, therefore, [And now] stand still [stand forth] that I may [and I will] reason with you before the Lord [Jehovah]⁵ of all the righteous acts of the Lord
- 8 [Jehovah] which he did to you and to your fathers. When Jacob was come

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 2. Sept. wrongly καθίσταται, as if from שָׁחַ.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 3. Or, "in his account;" so Chald.: "I hid my eyes in judgment from him." Sept. reads: "a ransom (proper rendering of חֲבִיב, but here—"bribe") and a sandal (reading דָּבָר), instead of דָּבָר), answer against me, and," etc. So in Sir. xlv. 19. Vulg.: "I will despise that to-day." Syr. and Chald. support Heb. The insertion in the Sept. of the easy "answer" is suspicious, and the "sandal" is hard. It seems better to retain the abbreviated Heb. text.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 6. Heb. is sing., but Sept. and several VSS. and Heb. MSS. plu.; the subject is "the people," which may have been taken as a sing. collective.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 6. Sept.: "Jehovah be witness, who," etc., a natural and suspicious insertion, and not necessary. Syr. has "Jehovah is God alone." Ch. and Vulg. as Heb.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 7. Sept. inserts: "and I will tell you," which makes the sentence easier, but is easily supplied in the pregnant Heb. construction.—Ta.]

[came] into Egypt, and⁶ your fathers cried unto the Lord [Jehovah], then the Lord [Jehovah] sent Moses and Aaron, which [and they] brought forth [om. forth] 9 your fathers out of Egypt and made them dwell in this place. And when [om. when] they forgot the Lord [Jehovah] their God, [ins. and] he sold them into the hand of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor,⁷ and into the hand of the Philistines, 10 and into the hand of the king of Moab, and they fought against them. And they cried unto the Lord [Jehovah] and said, We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord [Jehovah], and have served Baalim and Ashtaroth; but [and] now 11 deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee. And the Lord [Jehovah] sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan,⁸ and Jephthah, and Samuel,⁹ and delivered 12 you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwelled safe. And when ye saw that Nahash the king of the children of Ammon came against you, ye said unto me, Nay, but a king shall reign over us, when the Lord [Jehovah] your God was your king. 13 Now, therefore, [And now] behold the king whom ye have chosen, and [om. and] whom ye have desired [demanded];⁹ and behold, the Lord [Jehovah] hath set a 14 king over you. If ye will fear the Lord [Jehovah], and serve him, and obey his voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah], then shall [om. then shall, ins. and] both ye and also [om. also] the king that reigneth over you [ins. will] continue following [follow] the Lord [Jehovah] your God, well.¹⁰ 15 But if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord [Jehovah], but rebel against the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah], then shall the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] 16 be against you, as it was against your fathers.¹¹ Now, therefore, [And now] stand 17 and see this great thing, which the Lord [Jehovah] will do before your eyes. Is it not wheat harvest to-day? I will call unto the Lord [Jehovah], and he shall [will] send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive [know] and see that your wickedness is great which ye have done in the sight [eyes] of the Lord [Jehovah] 18 in asking you a king. So [And] Samuel called unto the Lord [Jehovah], and the Lord [Jehovah] sent thunder and rain that day; and all the people greatly feared the Lord [Jehovah] and Samuel. 19 And all the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the Lord [Jehovah] thy God that we die not; for we have added unto all our sins this evil, 20 to ask us a king. And Samuel said unto the people, Fear not. Ye have done all this wickedness; yet turn not aside from following the Lord [Jehovah], but serve 21 the Lord [Jehovah] with all your heart; And turn ye not aside, for¹² then should ye go [om. for then should ye go] after vain things, which cannot [do not] profit nor 22 deliver, for they are vain. For the Lord [Jehovah] will not forsake his people for his great name's sake; because it hath pleased the Lord [Jehovah] to make 23 you his people. Moreover [om. moreover] as for me [ins. also], God forbid that I should [om. God forbid that I should, ins. far be it from me to] sin against the Lord [Jehovah] in ceasing to pray for you,¹³ but I will teach you the good and 24 the [om. the] right way.¹⁴ Only fear the Lord [Jehovah] and serve him in truth with all your heart; for consider [see] how great things [how greatly] he hath 25 done [wrought] for you [towards you]. But if ye shall still [om. still] do wickedly, ye shall be consumed [destroyed] both ye and your king.

⁶ [Ver. 8. Erdmann not so well makes the apodosis begin here. Here Sept. inserts: "and Egypt humbled them," which has much to recommend it. But, if it had been in the original text, it would be hard to explain how it fell out. The addition of "and his sons" after "Jacob" in the Sept. is probably spurious.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 9. Sept.: "host of Jabis king of Asor," which agrees with the expression in Judg. iv. 2, 7. So the Vulg.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 11. Sept.: Barak. In the Syr. the list is: Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Nephtah, Samson. Probably we should read "Barak" for "Bedan;" the others as in the Heb. text. See Exegetical Notes.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 13. Omitted in Sept. The order in the Heb. does not seem natural, but may refer to the two paths by which they obtained the king (chs. x. and xi.). Wellhausen suggests that there is here a duplet. De Rossi prefers, on the authority of many MSS. and three VSS. (Syr., Vulg., Arab.), the insertion of "and" before "whom ye have demanded."—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 14. On the construction see Exeget. Notes. For Heb. הִנֵּה, "be," Chald. in Walton's Polyg. has הִנֵּה, "live" (which does not help the matter), but P. de Lagarde's ed. of Codex Beuchlinianus (Targ.) has הִנֵּה, "be gathered."—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 15. Sept.: "and against your king," which accords with ver. 14.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 21. The "3" is, with all the ancient vss., to be omitted. Syr. and Arab. and Chald. diverge slightly from the masor. text.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 23. Sept. inserts: "and I will serve the Lord."—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 23. The omission of the Art. in 3 is strange.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. And Samuel said to all Israel. That the following words were really spoken by Samuel is put beyond doubt by the direct impression of historical truth which this narrative in chap. xii. makes, and by the homogeneity of the individual historical features of this picture with the historical picture given us in all that precedes. Ewald (Gesch. [History of Israel] I., 229, Rem. 2) calls this a narrative "which in its present form is inserted only for the sake of the exhortations to be put into Samuel's mouth, and the occasional historical statements of which sound very discrepant," against which we remark: 1) that the historical statements in this piece, as the exposition will show, do not at all contradict the foregoing historical account, and 2) that if a mere insertion had been intended here, in order to put exhortations into Samuel's mouth, it would have been simpler to give it in the form of a monologue; that is, a continuous address of Samuel to the people.—We have here, namely, not one continuous address of Samuel, as this section is usually called, but a dialogue, a conversation or transaction with the people in the grandest style. Samuel speaks to all Israel, and they speak to him by the mouth of their elders (cf. vers. 3-8, 19, 20), and the longer connected declarations of the prophet (vers. 7-17 and 20-26) are embraced by these colloquies and attached to them.—Incorrect also is the usual designation of this section as a parting-address, whereby its significance in relation to the preceding account of Saul's public solemn presentation to the whole people as king of Israel is obscured or concealed. Samuel does not take leave of the people in order to withdraw from the scene of public life and action into the retirement of private life; he rather promises the continuance not only of his intercession for them, but also of his prophetic labors in respect to the whole people; he points expressly to the elevated position which he will assume, as "teacher of the good and right way," hereafter, as now, towards king and people.—Further, when the whole procedure, as is common, is regarded as a solemn resignation of office by Samuel, we must call attention to the fact mentioned in vii. 15, that he "judged Israel all the days of his life," and to the vigorous interference which he repeatedly found necessary during Saul's government. Certainly with the incoming of the kingdom, which the people desired instead of the existing judgeship (viii. 5, 20) in order that the king might judge the people and lead them in war, the official position which Samuel had hitherto occupied as judge in Israel, must have had an end; and this end of his proper judicial office, sole and highest Governor of Israel as he had hitherto been, is the starting-point for what he has now still to say to the people. He remains in fact what he was, the highest judge of Israel according to the will of God, under whose oversight and guidance the kingdom also stands; officially the leadership for external and internal political affairs, for which the kingdom was established, is no longer in his hands. Of a resignation of office nothing is said, but (proceeding only from the fact that the government is now given into the hands of the king, and his official government as judge has now consequently come to an end) he passes in review his previous official life as judge of the people, in order, over against the fulfilment of their desire for a king, which was a factual rejection of his official judgeship externally occasioned by the evil conduct of his sons (viii. 1-7), solemnly to testify and cause them to testify that he had filled his office blamelessly and righteously. On this follows (vers. 7-12) the rebuking reference to the great deeds of the Lord, wherein in the history of His guidance of the people He had magnified Himself in them, and to the guilty relation of ingratitude and unfaithfulness in which they had placed themselves to this their God and king by the longing after an earthly king, which was a rejection of His authority over them. In vers. 13-18, after a solemn confirmation of the fact, that God the Lord in accordance with that desire had given them a king, in powerful words, which are accompanied and strengthened by an astounding miracle, he exhorts king and people together to the right relation, in which in faithful obedience they are to put themselves, to the will and word of the Lord. King and people are to be obedient subjects of the invisible king. Finally follows (vers. 19-25) a word of consolation from Samuel to the people now, in consequence of this warning and hortatory address, repentantly confessing their sin in their demand for a king, in which he gently and in friendly fashion exhorts them to obedience and faithfulness towards the Lord (vers. 20, 21), promises them the Lord's grace and faithfulness (ver. 22), and assures them of his continuing active fellowship with them in intercession and in instruction in the way of truth (ver. 23), and finally with repeated exhortation and warning sets before them the blessing and good pleasure of the Lord along with a threatening reference to the punishment to be expected in case of disobedience (vers. 24, 25).—With this fourfold division this whole dialogic transaction of Samuel with the people connects itself immediately with what precedes, as the conclusion of the assembly of the people in Gilgal. On this connection see Thenius' remarks. Berlenberger Bible: "Thus with this ends in solemn wise the general assembly of the people." [Philipson (in Israel. Bib.): "This chapter is one of the finest in the book, and is a model of old-Hebrew eloquence. Words and tone speak for the high antiquity of this piece."—Tr.]

The words: See, I have hearkened to your voice in all that ye said to me correspond exactly to the words in viii. 7, 21. Samuel at the same time testifies indirectly to the fact that he had therein obeyed the command of God: "Hearken to the voice of the people" (viii. 7, 9, 22). His listening to the voice of the people was based on the repeated divine command, and was an act of self-denying obedience to the will of the Lord.—"And I have made a king" points to ver. 15 of the preceding chapter.—Ver. 2. Walketh is to be understood not merely of leading in war, but in general of the official guidance and government of the people. The "and I" introduces the contrast between the Hitherto and the Now. I am grown old and gray-headed points to the words of the elders, viii. 5. As the people by the mouth of their elders there take occasion from his age to ask a king for themselves, so Samuel here refers back to it, in order not only to point out that this their demand was fulfilled, since he in fact by reason of his age could no longer hold in his hands the internal and external control of the people, but at the same time, in view of the termination of his office and the beginning of the royal rule, to give account of the righteous character of his long career. The reference to his sons as occupying official positions is not to be regarded (Thenius, Keil, et al.) as a confirmation of his age, but looking to chap. viii. 1 (where it is expressly said that Samuel on account of his age had made his sons judges over Israel, that is, his assistants in the judicial office) rather as a confirmation of the declaration that this change in the government must needs have taken place by reason of his age, which had already necessitated the substitution of his sons. [It is clearly wrong to suggest (Bib. Com. in loco) that "a tinge of mortified feeling at the rejection of himself and his family, mixed with a desire to recommend his sons to the favor and good-will of the nation, is at the bottom of this mention of them." There is no trace here of mortification or favor-seeking. Samuel stands throughout above the people, and promises his continued friendship and watch-care, while he cordially accepts the change of the government.—Tr.] What Samuel here affirms of his official career stands in direct contrast with what is said in chap. viii. 3 of the blameworthy official conduct of these sons, since it is inconceivable that he did not know, and now have in mind the covetousness and perversion of judgment and the resulting discontent of the people, which was a cofactor in their desire for a royal government. The mode as well as the fact and content of the following self-justification naturally suggest the statement in viii. 3, and lead to the conclusion that this was the occasion of this (otherwise surprising) justification of his official career, on which in the eyes of the people a shadow had fallen in consequence of the opposite conduct of his sons. In order that, at this important turning-point of his life and of his people's history, there may be perfect clearness and truth in respect to his judicial career and his unselfish official bearing towards the people, and that the lightest shadow of mistrust and misunderstanding may be dispelled, he in the first place refers to his official life which lay clear and open before the eyes of the people from his youth unto this moment when he had become old and gray; for the words "I have walked before you," like the preceding "walketh," indicate his public official intercourse and walk.—Ver. 3. Answer against me, that is, witness against me. A formal hearing of witnesses as a judicial act is here introduced. The judicial authorities are two, a heavenly, invisible, God the Lord, the All-knowing, before whom he walked, and an earthly-human, clothed, however, with divine authority, the Anointed of the Lord, who in the name and place of God executes the royal office, which includes the judicial. Here for the first time after the establishment of the kingdom the theocratic king is called the Anointed of the Lord. Here for the first time after his installation regard is had to Saul in his royal authority and position. Before him as before the Lord, the people, in reply to Samuel's questions put in powerful lapidary style and with grand rhetoric, must bear witness to the following: 1) That he had not covetously appropriated the property of others,—“ox and ass” represent property in a social life based on agriculture and trade, and are expressly named in the Law with the things forbidden to covet (Ex. xx. 17); Samuel's sons, on the contrary, "turned after gain," that is, were covetous, viii. 5;—2) that he had violated no man's right and freedom by oppression and violence,—רָצַח "defraud" is stronger than עָצַר "oppress;" both often occur together, as in Dent. xxviii. 33, to express violence;—his sons "perverted judgment," viii. 3;—3) that he had not been guilty of venality in the administration of justice by receiving bribes,—כֹּפֶר (בָּרָה) "bribe" is here not to be regarded (with Keil) as simply a payment for release from capital punishment (Ex. xxi. 30; Num. xxxv. 31), but means in general a gift of money designed to buy the favor of the judge and thus escape deserved punishment. The gift was to cover the punishment [the Heb. word means primarily "cover,"—Tr.], and thus as covering be an expiation: "that I might hide my eyes from him (or, with it)."^{*} The sons of Samuel took gifts, chap. viii. 3. This was a transgression of the Law, Ex. xxiii. 6; Dent. xxvii. 5.—The answer of the people: that Samuel had done no wrong.—Ver. 5. Strengthening of this declaration by the participation of the people in Samuel's invocation of the Lord and his Anointed as witness.† Calvin: "In these words they confess their ingratitude and perfidy before Jehovah and the king, in that they had rejected the so praiseworthy government of Samuel."

Ver. 6. Further strengthening of the testimony by repetition on Samuel's part of the invocation of God's witness. To "Jehovah" we must supply "witness;" there is no need to suppose that it fell out by clerical error.—Maurer: "Nothing has fallen out. Samuel repeats the name of Jehovah in order to make the transition to what follows." "Appointed" (עָשָׂה) "made," Eng. A.V. "advanced" refers to what they were in their God-appointed calling; they were just that for which the Lord had made them, as leaders of the people and their representatives before God.—Calvin: "The word 'make' is to be understood of those excellent gifts which God had bestowed on Moses and his brother Aaron, that he might use their ministry in leading the people out of Egypt." Samuel also was made by the Lord into that which he was to be and was to the people. In taking part, now, in his invocation of God as witness to his impartiality and justice, the people gave confirmation that he had exercised his judicial authority before the Lord according to his divine calling, and that in this view therefore, there was no necessity for their demand for a king.

* Thenius, on the ground that הַעֲלִים in the sense of "hide" is always construed with מִן, changes the text וְהַעֲלִים עֵינָי בּוֹ into וְהַעֲלִים עֵינָי בִּי, and (if it were only) a pair of shoes; witness against me," against which Keil rightly remarks that the supposed meaning "hide from" does not suit here; that the thought is not that the judge hides his eyes from the כֹּפֶר in order not to see the bribe, but that he covers his eyes with the bribe, in order not to see and punish the crime. The בּוֹ, however, might also be referred to כִּי, and would then mean: that I might hide my eyes "on his account," "towards him," or "in respect to him." The change after the Sept., requiring a large addendum for explanation, compels us to introduce a too special thing (shoes) in the most extraordinary way.

† We must read the Sing. וְיָאמְרוּ ["said"], not the Plu. (Qeri), since "the people" is to be taken as subject.

After (vers. 1-6) having solemnly testified and before God and the king made them testify to the purity and spotlessness of his long official life among the people, he joins (vera. 7-12) to the name of Jehovah, whom he has invoked as witness, the humbling reminder of the unfaithfulness of which they had been guilty in respect to this their God and Lord and His benefits by the demand for an earthly-human king. He here looks at the relation of the people to their God. The reference to Moses and Aaron as the first instruments of the Lord's mighty deeds for His people, and His first deed, the deliverance from Egypt, forms the transition to the following enumeration of God's might-revelations for the deliverance of His people from great dangers.

Ver. 7. Formally and solemnly the first words "and now stand forth that I may reason with you before the Lord" introduce as it were a judicial procedure (Cleric.: "I will conduct my cause, as it were, before a judge"), in which Samuel as the judge before the tribunal of the invisible king represents God's cause over against the people, and holds up before the latter their guilt in this matter of the king.* Ezek. xvii. 20. צִדְקָה [righteous deeds] never means merely "blessing, benefit, kindness," but always contains the idea of righteousness. It indeed often actually means all that (as in Psalm xxii. 32; xxiv. 5; Judg. v. 11; Prov. x. 2; xi. 4) but always from the stand-point of God's faithfulness in covenant and promise; the acts of salvation are proof of the divine righteousness, so far as they are God's reply to man's right conduct towards Him, or, without this, an outflow of God's faithfulness by which He grants man the thing promised as something falling to his share. The Plu. "righteous acts," as in Mic. vi. 5, are God's several deeds of power and grace performed for His people on the ground of His covenant-relation instituted in Abraham and through Moses. [Bib. Comm.: Samuel is here vindicating God, comp. Stephen's speech, Acts vii.].—Ver. 8. The first and greatest of the mighty deeds of the divine covenant-righteousness is the deliverance out of Egypt and introduction into the land of promise.† In ver. 9 the: and they forgot the Lord their God is put as contrast to the "righteous acts" of the Lord; they answered God's covenant-fidelity with unfaithfulness, defection. And so the oppressions of the people by foreign enemies are represented as punishments by the righteous God for their defection. He sold them into the hand, etc., indicates the just retribution of their forgetting Him. When His people abandon Him, He, by virtue of the same righteousness which blesses them if they are faithful, abandons them to their enemies, who enslave and oppress them. The "selling" refers to the right of the father to sell his children as slaves, here exercised by God as the extremest paternal right, as it were (Judg. ii. 14; iii. 8; iv. 2, 9; Deut. xxxii. 10; Isa. i. 1; lii. 3; Ezek. xxx. 12). [It is also the right of the king to sell his subjects, and of God to dispose of His creatures.—Tr.].—In proof of this punitive justice of God Samuel adduces individual facts from the time of the Judges on, but only "prominent events, as they occurred to him . . . neglecting the order of events and of times, which was here unessential" (Cleric.). [Poole's Synopsis: Notice here Samuel's prudence in reproof: 1) by his reproof of their ancestors he prepares their minds to receive reproof; 2) he shows that their ingratitude is old and so worse, and they should take care that it grow no stronger; 3) he chooses a very mild word, "forget," to express their offence.—Tr.].—Hazor was the capital city of the Canaanites, where dwelt king Jabin whom Joshua smote, Josh. xi. 1, 10-13; xii. 19. In the time of the Judges Hazor again appears as the residence of a Canaanitish king Jabin (Judg. iv. 2 sq.), instead of whom, however, the there-mentioned captain Sisera is here named, because he commanded the army which then oppressed Israel. The Sept. insertion of "Jabin king of" after "host of," is evidently a mere explanation.—Into the hand of the Philistines, see Judg. iii. 31, where the attacks of this people are first mentioned. [See also Judg. xiii. 1.—Tr.].—Into the hand of the king of Moab, that is, Eglon (Judg. iii. 12).—These three nations represent, as the most prominent, all the heathen nations into whose hands God gave His people. Samuel mentions them, looking to the beginnings of the sufferings and wars of the Period of the Judges, in respect to which in the Book of Judges also (ch. iii.) the "he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about" (ver. 14) and "they forgot the Lord" are introduced (as here by Samuel) as correlatives.—Ver. 10. The repentant conversion of the people. And they cried to the Lord (comp. Judg. ii. 18; iii. 9, 15; iv. 3), that is, the lamentation over their misery directed to the Lord. The following: we have sinned is their self-accusation on account of their defection from God; the sin is twofold, forsaking the Lord and serving idols. The same accusation is found literally in Judg. x. 40, only that here, as in Judg. ii. 13 and x. 6, Ash-taroath is added to Baalim. Baal is the general designation of the divinity among the Phenicians and Carthaginians; with the Art. it is the male chief deity of the Phenicians; the Plu. refers to the numerous individualizations of this deity. P. Cassel [in Lange's Biblework] on Judg. ii. 13: "The various cities and tribes had their special Baals, which were named not always from the cities, but from various natural qualities worshipped in them. This is like the various attributes from which Zeus received various names and worship in Greece." On Baal-cultus among the Israelites see Winer, B. R.-W. s. v. I., 118. Ashtaroth is the designation of the Phenician and Carthaginian female chief deity (along with Baal) which was also worshipped by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 10); the Plu. refers to the number of the stars, which she as queen of heaven represents (Jer. vii. 18; xlii. 17 sq.); for the Sing. Ashtoreth=Astarte (Grk.) has the same root as star [Germ. stern], astrip, stella, in Pers. Astara (on the Upper Asiatic origin of this word see J. G. Müller s. v. in Herzog's R.-E.); she was not merely the moon goddess alongside of Baal as sun-god, as her pictures with the moon-crescents on the head testify, but as light-giving night-goddess, also star-goddess, representative of the glittering host of heaven (Jer. vii. 18), like the later Artemis.* Comp. P. Cassel on Judg. ii. 13; Winer, s. v. On the renewed introduction of her worship by Solomon, in which is presented the fulfilment of Deut. iv. 19, see 1 Ki. xi. 5, 33.—On the accusation follows the prayer, "Deliver us" in contrast with the forsaking and forgetting, and the vow "we will serve thee" in contrast with "we have served" Baalim, etc. This repentance the Lord graciously answers (ver. 11): 1) by sending deliverers. Again only a few are mentioned: Jerubbaal-Gideon; the name signifies "let Baal strive," that is, with him, and expresses scorn and contempt at the impotence of Baal, whose altar Gideon had with impunity destroyed, Judg. vi. 28-32. Gideon is thence called Jerubbesheth. 2 Sam. xi. 21.—The name Bedan is found elsewhere only in 1 Chr. vii. 17 as name of a descendant of Manasseh, who is, however, of no historical importance. In the Book of Judges, to whose contents this part of Samuel's address (especially ver. 10) unmistakably points, there is no judge of this name; but the connection shows that a judge is here meant. The name has been read Ben-Dan = "the Danite," as Samson was born in Dan, Judg. xiii. 2 (Kimchi), and at the same time a play of words on his corpulence [Arab. badana] has been also supposed (Böttch.). But against this last Thenius rightly remarks that a name resting on a word-play would by no means suit this serious discourse; against the first (apart from the form) is the fact that Samson is never so-called, as must have been the case if the people were here to understand the name. Gesenius (Halle Lit. Z. 1841, No. 41) regards the name as abbreviation of Abdon, and so Ewald, who understands the judge of that name (Judg. xii. 13). But this judge does not occupy the important place in the history which the connection calls for. Similarly we must reject the supposition that Jair of Gilead Judg. x. assumed to be a descendant of Machir (whose great grandson, 1 Chr. vii. 17, is Bedan) is here meant, since the connection of Jair and Machir is not proved; and the supposition that a judge omitted in the Book of Judges from his insignificance is intended, is untenable. The best expedient is to read (with Sept., Syr., Arab) Barak; for the letters of this name (בָּרַק) might easily pass into the other (בִּדְרָ) and the error be perpetuated by copyists. But Barak is one of the most prominent judges along with those here mentioned. The historical-chronological order is not strictly observed in ver. 9 also. Barak represents with Deborah that heroic Israelitish band that (Judg. iv.) broke the power of Sisera and delivered Israel out of the hand of the Canaanites.—The fact that, after Jeph., Sam. names himself as the fourth representative of the divine deliverance is not so surprising as it is thought by the Syr. and Arab. versions and a Greek manuscript (Kennicott in the Addend. to his dissert. gener.) which put Samson instead, and also by Thenius, who, though the Sept. and Vulg. have Samuel, accepts the former reading because Samuel does not speak of his own times till the next verse. Samuel could mention himself without exciting surprise, because he was conscious of his high mission as judge and deliverer, and the profound significance of his office for the history of Israel was universally recognized. By this mention of himself he honors not himself, but the Lord, who had made him (like Moses and Aaron before) what he was, comp. ver. 6-9. Besides, it was under him that the yoke of the forty years' dominion of the Philistines was broken, which work of deliverance Samson was only able to begin. Samuel includes himself as an instrument of the divine deliverance, because over against him the demand for a king involved the rejection of the Lord (viii. 5), and so the sin against the Lord in that demand appears in the clearest light; and this, after having pointed secondly to the repeated wonderful deliverances of Israel out of the hand of enemies by these messengers of God, and thirdly to the quiet and security which they were enabled to attain in the land, he sets before them in ver. 12. These words expressly declare that Ammonitish attacks on the territory of Israel were the first occasion of the demand for a king as leader in war, comp. viii. 20. Clericus well remarks: "It hence appears not improbable that Nahash had made incursions into the Hebrew territory before the Israelites had demanded a king, and after his election had returned and begun the siege of Jabesh. It often happens in these books that circumstances omitted in their proper place are mentioned where they less properly belong." And yet the Lord your God is your king.—By such deliverers He had shown Himself anew their king; this He was by the covenant, and this He remained by His covenant-faithfulness. With the same declaration Gideon (Judg. viii. 23) exhibits the inadmissibility of His elevation as king, and Samuel the sinfulness and the unjustifiableness of their demand for a king.

* The Accus. sign (אֲנִי) is here: "concerning," "in respect to."—The verb judge usually has עָל with the object, as in Jer. ii. 35; Joel iii. 27; but has also the Accus. as in Ezek. xvii. 20.

† We are not with the Sept. to insert וַיִּכְנֹן after עָקַב and וַיִּכְנֹן after כָּצַר. If either had originally been there, it would not have been omitted. The brevilloquent text speaks for its originality. The וַיִּשְׁלַח is the explanation of the עָלָה in ver. 6.

Vers. 13-18. The third section of this transaction: in view of the fact that God has actually established a king in accordance with their demand, though it was a sinful and blameful one, Samuel declares a truth, which contains an earnest warning, namely, that, if the people with their king will maintain the right relation to God in fidelity and obedience to His will, the hand of the Lord will be with them both; in the contrary case, it will be against them both.—Ver. 13. And now. Here the discourse turns from the past and from the judgment of the people's conduct to the present fact of the established kingdom, which, with the words: Behold the king is taken as starting-point for the following declaration and the attached serious warning and truth. In this declaration is set forth the origin of Saul's kingly position—1) on its human side by the words: whom ye have chosen, whom ye have demanded—the discourse here goes regressively first to the election instituted by Samuel, and then to the demand made against him and God's will, and there is just here a progression in the thought;*—2) on its divine side by the words: behold, the Lord hath set a king over you.—Your demand sprang from an evil root, yet hath the Lord granted it; this king—though chosen and demanded by you—is yet alone a work of God; his election and establishment rests on the divine will and command. By these words is confirmed the truth that the Lord is and remains king (ver. 12). So far is that rejection (factually affirmed by the demand) from overthrowing Jehovah's kingdom, that the universal authority of the latter is rather now for the first time rightly declared in the installation of the sought-for king, and in his obligation and the people's to be subject to Jehovah and unconditionally obedient to His will. This point of view of the absolute theocracy comes out here the more clearly not only by the immediately preceding reference to the human side of the origin of the kingdom, but also by Samuel's declaration in ver. 1: "I have made a king over you," to which stands opposed the declaration: "Behold, the Lord hath set a king over you." From this fact, that the installed king is a gift of the Lord, granted to the people's demand (comp. x. 19), follows now, in view of the relation in which therefore people and king should stand to the Lord, the truth and the warning: The well-being of both depends on faithful obedience to the Lord's will and word. The "if" introduces a protasis which includes all of ver. 14, and has no apodosis. The view that the latter has fallen out by similar endings, and read: "then he will save you out of the hand of your enemies" (Thenius) is not satisfactorily supported, and is not required to explain the apodosis, since the absence of the apodosis is easily explained by the length of the protasis, and its content apparent from the context—"well," or "it will be well with you." A similar failure of the apodosis to be supplied from the connection is found in Ex. xxxii. 32. The assumption of an apodosis with וְהָיָה [as in Eng. A. V.] in the sense, "then ye will follow the Lord," is untenable, partly from the tautology it makes in protasis and apodosis, partly from the expectation, awakened by the parallelism with the following sentence in ver. 15, of finding a promise set over against the threat. The voluntative sense of וְהָיָה = modo, "if only" (Keil) [= "O that ye would only"], cannot be taken here, since it would then have the Imperf.† (Ew. § 329 b). Nor can we (with S. Schmid) connect ver. 14 with the last words of ver. 13: "The Lord hath set a king over you, if ye only will, etc.; but if not . . .," since the conditioned character of the former clause would then require in it the Imperf. If (with Kimchi, Maurer) we read וְהָיָה, "ye shall live," we cannot (with Maurer) translate: "who reigns over you after Jehovah" (that is, "next to Jehovah"), since this is an expression foreign to the Old Testament; nor (with Tremellius) supply "sequentes" [that is, "ye will live following Jehovah"]. If an apodosis be insisted on here (changing the text to וְהָיָה), we might perhaps read: "then shall ye live . . . after Jehovah," which answers to the view expressed in the preceding words, of following God in obedience to His commands. But, retaining the text and supposing the apodosis omitted, Samuel here, in keeping with the importance of the moment and the emotion of his own heart, heaps together in most eloquent fashion the demands which are to be made on religious-moral life in view of the conditions of true well-being for the people and their king in the new order of things: to fear the Lord, serve Him, hearken to His voice, not rebel against His word (comp. Deut. i. 28, "rebel against the mouth [commandment] of the Lord"), and be after him, or remain in His retinue true to Him. About the last words Keil rightly remarks (against Thenius) that וְהָיָה "to be after" is good Hebrew, and especially is often used in the sense, "to attach one's self to the king, hold to him," comp. 2 Sam. ii. 10; 1 Kings xii. 20; xvi. 21. This expression corresponds completely to the thought underlying this exhortation, namely, that the Lord, in spite of Israel's rejection of Him by the demand for an earthly-human king, is and remains the King of His people (vers. 12, 13).

* This account of Ashtoreth is in several points incorrect. The word (the etymology of which is not known) has no connection with astrip, and the Plu. Ashtaroth refers (like Baalim) to various god-modifications. See Rawlinson's "Five Great Mon." I. 138, and Schrader "Die Keil.-Insch. u. d. Alt. Test." on Judg. ii. 11, 13.—Ta.]

Ver. 15. The contrast: But if ye will not— (from the preceding are recapitulated only the two traits of obedience to the word of the Lord and not rebelling against His commandment)—then will the hand of the Lord be against you, as it was against your fathers.—This comparative addition looks to the words from ver. 7 to ver. 12, wherein is pointed out how the fathers had brought on themselves by sin and defection the oppression of the enemy, in which the hand of the Lord was heavy on them, and from which the people now hoped to be delivered by the kings. At bottom the defection of the fathers and the demand for a king who was to deliver from oppressions sent by God for their sins, are one and the same wrong against the Lord. Therefore Samuel wishes by his earnest warning to lead them to repentance.—Ver. 16 gives the transition to a miraculous confirmation of that realness of

* Not "and against your kings," "fathers" being taken—"kings" (D. Kimchi), nor (with Sept. and Thenius) "and your king," but (with Chald., Syr., Arab., Cler., Maur., Keil) retaining the harder reading of the text, and taking the י as comparative [—"as," so Eng. A. V.], in support of which is the fact that it sometimes introduces and connects loosely with the preceding whole sentences, the thought in which is subordinate, explanatory, or comparative, Ew. 340 b. It is properly to be explained: "And it was against your fathers," which is shortened into: "and against your fathers," whence is suggested a comparison. [Instead of this somewhat forced explanation it is better either to adopt the reading of the Sept., or to suppose the י "and" to be an error for ו "as." We might expect in ver. 15 the mention of the king.—Ta.]

* On the weakening of the a to e in וְהָיָה, see Gesen. § 64, 3, Rem. 1.

† It has the Imperf. here, and might express a wish but that the construction in ver. 14 is clearly the same as that in ver. 15, which is conditional.—Ta.]

the divine holiness and righteousness, with which Samuel, his gaze fixed on the future, has just directed his exhortation to the people in the form of the announcement of a sentence. "Even now" connects the following with the preceding, so that 1) the picture of a judicial scene, which was introduced in ver. 7, is continued in the following narration, and 2) the signification of the next related fact is closely connected with that of the previously spoken words. The "now also" or "even now" refers back to ver. 7, where the judicial scene is introduced with the same words: "and now stand forth, that I may reason with you." The reasoning continues thence through all the stages of the discourse, which the people have up to this moment heard, and is completed in the fact announced by Samuel [that is, the thunder-storm.—Tr.], in which they are to behold the Lord's judgment on their sin in the matter of the king.—Ver. 17. Is it not wheat-harvest to-day? This question signifies that at that season (in May or June) rain was unusual. So testifies Jerome on Am. iv. 7 [and Rob. I., 429-431.—Tr.]. After the barley-harvest (2 Sam. xxi. 9; Ruth i. 22; ii. 23) followed the wheat-harvest, vi. 13; Gen. xxx. 14; Judg. xv. 1.—"To give voices," said of Jehovah, = "to thunder," Ps. xlv. 7; lxviii. 34; xviii. 14; Ex. ix. 23. Thunder is called the voice of the Lord, Ps. xxix. 3 sq. Samuel announces a storm with thunder and rain as a God-given sign, by which the Israelites should perceive that they had grievously sinned against God in asking a king. The "voices" = thunder answer to the "voice" and "mouth" in ver. 15.—Ver. 18. At Samuel's request this sign of His anger and His punitive justice, as manifestation of His kingly glory, takes place.—The result is that the people are seized with great fear of the Lord and of Samuel. "of Samuel" is added because he, as before by his word, so by his introduction of this manifestation, wonderful and contrary to the ordinary course of nature, of God's wrath, had displayed himself as instrument of the judicial power and glory of the God-king.

Vers. 19-25. Fourth section of Samuel's dealing with the repentant people. Confession of sin, comfort and exhortation to the humbled people.

Ver. 19. Their overwhelming fright and terror of soul leads first to the prayer to Samuel to call on the Lord that He might mercifully spare them. That we die not,—the presence of the holy and just God has made itself known to the people. Before Him the sinner cannot stand, His judgment must reach him. The "for" supplies the basis to the thought contained in what precedes, that they had deserved the punishment of the angry God. Their penitent confession is not merely the admission that they had asked a king, but that they had added to all their sins this evil. Ver. 20. The word of consolation: Fear not, in contrast with: "and all the people greatly feared" (ver. 18). To his consoling word Samuel adds 1) the reference to their sin, which, in order to retain them in wholesome sorrowful repentance, he anew sets before them in its whole extent ("ye have done all this wickedness"), and 2) the exhortation, negative: only turn not aside from following the Lord (the "from after" points back to the "after" in ver. 15); positive: Serve the Lord with all your heart, the undivided, complete devotion of the heart, the innermost life to the Lord is inseparably connected with not turning aside from Him.—Ver. 21. Warning against apostasy to idol-worship. And turn ye not aside [after vanities which do not profit]. (Text-criticism.

—The difficulties in the פִּי "for" after תִּסְרִי or תִּלְכִּי are not set aside by supplying תִּסְרִי or תִּלְכִּי, as many ancient and modern expositors do [so Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. According to this view, the ground of the resumed warning would be here given: "for ye go (if ye do that, namely, turn aside from the Lord) after vanities." But then something is adduced as ground of the warning which is implicitly its object; besides, apart from the hardness of the insertion, the resumption of the "turn not aside" with וְ "and" is a difficulty.

Looking at the following פִּי, it becomes probable that this one was by mistake inserted a line before. It is rendered in not one of the ancient versions (Then.). It is wanting in Luther's version also. The omission of the פִּי gives a good, clear sense and an advance suitable to the lively character of the whole discourse. The "Turn not aside from the Lord" [ver. 20] is continued in the "Turn not aside after vanities," for apostasy to idolatry is the consequence of apostasy from the Lord. The former is introduced with אַל תֵּלֵךְ ("only do not") in the form of urgent request, hearty wish, the latter as a categorically-determined negative with אַל ("not."). Idols are described as נָחָשׁ, "naughty, vain" (= הָכֵל), as in Isaiah xlv. 9 the idol-makers. They cannot help nor deliver, because they are simply, whu, nothing, vanity.—[Comp. 1 Cor. viii. 4.—Tr.].—Ver. 22 is factually the reason why they are not to fear (ver. 20); but formally this verse is the ground of the preceding exhortation; they are not to forsake the Lord and turn aside from Him and serve idols, because the Lord will not forsake them as His people, which is said in contrast with the vain idols, which cannot help and deliver, because they are "naught," while the Lord's "great name" is to be the pledge that He will not forsake them. The words: for his name's sake are explained by and based on the declaration: for it hath pleased the Lord (פִּי הוֹאֵל), not "the Lord hath begun," but "he has by free determination taken the first step thereto, it pleased him" (comp. Judg. xvii. 11; Josh. vii. 7; Ex. ii. 21).—To make you his people.—This embraces all God's deeds, by which He has established Israel in history as His people, the deeds of choice, deliverance out of Egypt, covenanting, introduction into the promised inheritance, preservation from enemies—by these deeds He has glorified His name, which is the expression of all God's revelations of salvation and power to His people. The ground of this is found simply in the determination of the free, loving will of God—הוֹאֵל, comp. Deut. vii. 6-12, which furnishes a complete parallel to the train of thought here. Of the vain idols it is said in ver. 21 אֵל יִעֲלֶה [lo yoiu, "they do not profit"], of the Lord here הוֹאֵל [hoil, "he did kindly, it pleased him"], a paronomasia of pregnant meaning. The name of the Lord, therefore, that by which He has made Himself this name in His relations to His people, and that which thence resulted, the dignity of the people as the Lord's people and their appertinment to Him as His property is the pledge that He will not leave His people. "His people" and "make you His people" are corresponding expressions, they are His people because He has made them His people. Comp. Psalm c. 3; xcv. 7; Deut. vii. 6, 9, 18.—Ver. 23. Samuel promises the people his personal mediation and aid, partly through the priestly function of intercession for them, partly through the exercise of his prophetic office in showing them the right way. The "as for me too" refers to the "Jehovah" in the preceding verse, and to the close connection into which the people (ver. 19) had brought his name with the name of the Lord. The assurance of his intercession follows on the request in ver. 19: "Pray for thy servants." Both passages put Samuel's prayer-life anew in a clear light (comp. vii., viii.). By the solemn asseveration "far be it," he points to the importance which he himself attributes to his intercession for the people. The word "sin" indicates his obligation before the Lord to intercede; to neglect this would be a sin against the Lord; for, as mediator between God and the people, he must enter the Lord's presence in whatever concerned them, for weal or for woe. Comp. his work of prayer in chs. vii., viii. The "not ceasing" indicates his persistency in intercession.—Along with this priestly mediation Samuel promises also his constant prophetic watch-care, which consists in "showing the good and right way," that is, the way of God. The predicates "good and right" show that moral conduct is referred to, and that according to the will and law of the Lord (so Pa. xxv. 4). The instruction is to be given to king as well as people.—Ver. 24. Samuel, having spoken of his person and his personal office, now directs the people's look from his person and work to the Lord, and holds up anew before king and people the great Eiher—Or: either ye will fear the Lord and serve Him and ye will experience the salvation of your God,—or, ye will do evil and—both of you will be destroyed. The discourse culminates in a condensed statement of what is said in vers. 14, 15. The "in truth, with all your heart," exhibits the double character of the service of God, of truth and of innerness, in contrast with the service of outward appearance and dead works. Since this exhortation to fear and serve God relates to the general religious-moral life of the people, we cannot refer the confirmatory declaration: For ye see what great things he hath done for you to the extraordinary natural phenomenon narrated in ver. 18. The mighty deeds of the Lord here referred to are those mentioned in vers. 6, 7 sqq., to which reference is repeatedly made in all these transactions relating to the king (viii. 8; x. 18), from which most frequently is drawn the motive for true fear of God and obedience to His will, because by them God established and confirmed His covenant relation with Israel as His people, and so the people owed Him covenant-fidelity and obedience as their God.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Review of the history of the introduction by Samuel of the Israelitish monarchy under Saul (chaps. viii.—xii.). The following are its principal stadia, in the general and special development of which the well-adjusted connection between the several sections becomes apparent. In chap. viii. Samuel confers with the people concerning their demand for a king, and receives in prayer the revelation from the Lord that he should listen to the people's demand and give them a king. In chap. ix. 1–17 is set forth the providence of the Lord, whereby in the person of Saul the divinely chosen and appointed king of Israel is led to Samuel, and is designated as such by a special revelation from the Lord. Chap. ix. 17—x. 16, Samuel as instrument of the divine call which came to Saul; Saul receives from Samuel first the announcement of his high calling by the Lord (vers. 17–27), then the consecration to the royal office by anointing, and the assurance of his call by reference to appointed signs therefor (x. 1–8), and finally the confirmation and strengthening of his divine call together with qualification for it by the Spirit of the Lord (vers. 9–16).—Chap. x. 18–27. Samuel and the people in the assembly at Mizpah for the public presentation of the God-chosen king, which is followed by a partial recognition only on the part of the people.—Chap. xi. Saul's proclamation and general recognition as king of Israel in consequence of his heroic deed of deliverance from the Ammonites, and also his solemn installation at Gilgal.—Chap. xii. Samuel, in a solemn, affecting final conference at Gilgal, after a justificatory review of his official career, places people and monarchy under the government of the Lord, as their king, and obligates both to obey His will.

2. "Samuel yields to the desire of the people because he knows that now God's time has come; but at the same time he makes every effort to bring the people to a consciousness of their sins. If it were true that Samuel considered the monarchy in itself incompatible with the theocracy, how very differently he must have acted! In that case, when the whole people, deeply moved by his discourse and by the confirmatory divine sign, said: "Pray for thy servants to the Lord thy God, for we have added to all our sins the evil of asking a king" (ver. 19), he must have insisted that the old form be straightway re-established. But he is far from doing this. He rather exhorts the people to be from now on faithful to the Lord, who would glorify Himself in them and their king." Hengstenberg, Beitr. 3, 258 sq. [Contributions, etc.].

3. At Gilgal [chap. xii.] Samuel stands at the highest point of his work as instrument of the divine guidance and government of his people, and as mediator between the people and God as their king and lord. As prophet he leads king and people together into the presence of the Lord, calls forth in the people by a moving discourse the deep feeling of sin and the penitent confession of guilt, places king and people under God's royal majesty and legal authority, and obligates them to inviolable obedience to the will of the Lord. As judge he, at God's command, installs the asked-for king, makes the people solemnly confirm the self-justifying declaration which he with invocation of God and the king had made, conducts the Lord's cause against the unfaithful people by reasoning with them and accusing them, exhibits in thunder and storm the majesty and the wrath of the despised invisible king, decrees weal and woe, salvation and destruction to king and people, according to the regard which they hereafter show to the exhortations and instructions which he had given them as prophet. In this sense, in spite of the termination now of his official functions as judge, he remains a judge over king and people. And there is, besides, his priestly position, in which he again presents himself between the Lord and His people, with the assurance and promise that he will ever intercede for them, and would sin by not interceding. The people so needed him as long as he lived.

4. The Lord's mighty deeds towards and for His people, their apostasy to unfaithfulness and idolatry, punishment for their sins in oppression and misery, cry to the Lord for help in time of need, repentance and confession of sins, new exhibitions of the Lord's grace, these are in constant sequence the chief features of the history of the kingdom of God in Israel, here briefly sketched (vers. 7-12), and in the Book of Judges detailed at length.

5. The mention of the Lord's manifestations of grace and revelations of power for His people, which is here heard from Samuel, and remains throughout all prophecy a standing element of prophetic preaching, has as its aim: 1) to glorify the name of God, to bring out clearly His covenant-faithfulness, and to exhibit the people's high calling as chosen people and God's property; 2) to show more strikingly the people's sin in unfaithfulness, unthankfulness and disobedience, and thereby to bring them to acknowledgment of their sin; 3) to induce sincere repentance and penitent return to the Lord; 4) to show the penitent people the source of consolation and help, and to fix in their hearts the ground of hope for future salvation; 5) to make more effective admonitions and warnings respecting the maintenance and attestation of their covenant-faithfulness.

6. The truth and the fact: "The Lord your God is your King" (ver. 12), notwithstanding its subjective obscuration in the consciousness of the people, whence proceeded the demand (sinful in its motives and moral presuppositions) for an earthly-human kingdom, has lost so little objectivity in validity and importance that now, in the outset of the history of the kingdom granted by God in accordance with this desire, it rather comes out more clearly, since monarchy and people are placed under the immediate royal authority of God (vers. 13, 14), and both people and king (the two embraced as a unit in this point of view, ver. 14), exhorted to like obedience to His royal will, and threatened with like punishment from the Most High King as their Judge (vers. 14, 15, 25). The rejection of the God-king by the demand for a man-king led to a higher stage of development of the theocracy, on which, over against and by means of the earthly kingdom, there was of necessity a so much the more glorious unfolding of the royal honor of God.

7. God's manifestations of grace and salvation to Israel are often regarded in the Old Testament under the point of view of righteousness, and called by this name, as in ver. 7. But this "righteousness" is not then (as is often done) to be taken as = "goodness," "benefit," and the like, for these are different conceptions; nor as = "faithfulness," "trustworthiness," so far as God fulfils to His people the promises which He gives as covenant-God. The ground of this designation of the divine gracious kindnesses is given in the relation in which God as covenant-God stands to His people; established by own free grace and His absolute loving will (ver. 22), it is the norm, according to which the people over against him walk in the obedience due to His holy will (ethical righteousness), and on the other hand the Lord over against His people reveals to them the love and goodness which belong to them as His possession by virtue of the gracious rights established by Him, imparting to them gifts and benefits of grace partly as a promised blessing, partly as reward of faithful and obedient fulfilment of covenant-obligations (Ps. xxiv. 5; xxii. 32; Mic. vi. 5). In accordance with this, God in His deliverances exercises His righteousness (which gives each his own) as King of His people on the ground and according to the norm of the covenant-relation established by Himself in His own free grace (vers. 14, 15, 24, 25). Comp. 1 John i. 9: "God is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins." After the completion of the economy of salvation in Christ, God's righteousness is exhibited, along with His faithfulness, in the bestowment on the penitent sinner of the gracious gift of forgiveness of sins as something which belongs to him by the right accorded him by free grace, since God has ordained that he who penitently confesses his sins shall find pardon.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-6. How a servant of God should, after the example of Samuel, rightly perform the duty of maintaining his personal honor and innocence against unjust accusations: 1) By a clear and true statement of his own course of life and behaviour (vers. 1, 2); 2) By a bold appeal to the knowledge and conscience of others (vers. 3, 4); 3) By a solemn invocation of the all-knowing God as the best witness. [Vers. 2, 3. Samuel a statesman and civil and military ruler, living in times of cruel warfare, political changes, social corruption, and general relaxation of morality; he can solemnly appeal to God and man for the absolute integrity of his official conduct through all the years (particularizing that—a) he has not seized their property, b) defrauded them, nor c) inflicted personal violence, and d) has not taken bribes); and all the people (vers. 5, 6), and God Himself (ver. 18), fully confirm the claim. A notable example, often needed.—HALL: No doubt Samuel found Himself guilty before God of many private infirmities; but, for his public carriage, he appeals to men. A man's heart can best judge of himself; others can best judge of his actions. Happy is that man that can be acquitted by himself in private, in public by others, by God in both.—SCOTT: The honor rendered to those who are concluding their course, differs widely from the applause and congratulation which many receive when they first step forth before the public eye.

This, indeed, often terminates in disgrace and contempt.—Tr.]

Vers. 7-12. Think of former times: 1) That we may with shame remember the Lord's many manifestations of grace and benefits; 2) That we may be penitently conscious of the sins committed against the Lord; 3) That we may humbly acknowledge the ground of all evils and distresses in our own guilt; 4) That we may honestly turn to the obedience of faith towards the Lord. [Vers. 7-12. HALL: Samuel had dissuaded them before—he reproves them not until now. . . . We must ever dislike sin—we may not ever show it. Discretion in the choice of seasons for reproving is not less commendable and necessary than zeal and faithfulness in reproving.—Tr.]

Vers. 14, 15. With whom or against whom is the hand of the Lord? The answer to this question depends on the following considerations: 1) Whether one has, or has not, given himself to be the Lord's with his whole heart—a) in true fear of God, b) in true service of God; 2) Whether one is, or is not, in his will thoroughly obedient to the will of the Lord, a) hearkening unconditionally to His word, b) not resisting His commandments; 3) Whether one is, or is not, in his whole walk ready to follow the Lord in His guidance—a) keeping in the way pointed out by Him, b) keeping in view the goal set up by Him.

Vers. 13-15. True unity between king and people, authorities and subjects: 1) As being holy it is closely bound by the hand of the King of all kings in establishing the covenant between the two (ver. 13); 2) As being deeply grounded it is rooted in the common obligation of both alike to fear God, serve God, obey God (no true unity without right fear of God, humble service of God, faithful obedience to God) (ver. 14); 3) As unshakable and abiding it is maintained in times of heavy assaults, when both are tempted to apostasy, unbelief and disobedience (ver. 15 a); 4) It shows itself ever firmer in view of the Lord's threatenings and promises to both.

Vers. 14-19. The hard speech of God against sinners: 1) Why it is necessary—because men are hard-hearted, hard of hearing, cross-grained; 2) How it makes itself heard—in the earnest exhortations of His holy love (ver. 14), in the threatenings of His righteous wrath (ver. 15), in alarming natural events (vera. 16-18); 3) What is its aim—acknowledgment of sin (ver. 17), fear of God (ver. 18), seeking God's grace (ver. 19).—Vers. 19-21. To whom applies the divine word of consolation, Fear not: To those who—1) penitently confess their sins before God, 2) humbly acknowledge God's punishments as well-merited, 3) eagerly seek God's grace and mercy; 4) are willing to serve the Lord in faithful obedience.

Vers. 20, 21. The exhortation to fidelity, Turn not aside from the Lord. Turn not aside—1) When experiencing His punitive justice, but have child-like confidence in His forgiving love; 2) When harassed by natural inclination to resist His will, but serve Him in faithful obedience through the power of His Spirit; 3) When tempted to fall away by the world which is sunk in the service of vanity, but bravely withstand the idolatry of the ungodly world.—Vers. 20, 21. A threefold word of exhortation to penitent sinners: 1) A word reminding of past sin ("Ye have done all this wickedness"); 2) A word consolingly pointing to the divine grace ("Fear not"); 3) A word exhorting to fidelity ("Turn not aside from the Lord"), which, with the warning against the idolatry of the vain world contains a demand to serve the Lord alone with all the heart.—Ver. 22. The Lord forsakes not His people—for 1) He has made His people His possession—a) by choice out of free grace, b) by covenanting with them in faithful love; 2) He has made Himself a great name among His people, a) by His wonderful deeds in the past, b) by the promises of His word for the future.—Ver. 23. The highest service of love which men can do one another:

1) Intercession for each other before the Lord; 2) Pointing to the good and right way.—Ceasing to intercede for our brethren a sin against the Lord: 1) Because the souls of our brethren as members of His people are His possession; 2) Because the Lord demands intercession as a sign and fruit of love, which flows from the fountain of His paternal love, and in which men as His children are to keep themselves before Him; 3) Because the Lord, in that community of life in which He has placed us, often gives us special occasion and necessity to pray for our brethren. [HENRY: Samuel promises more than they asked. (1) They asked it of him as a favor—he promised it as a duty. (2) They asked him to pray for them at this time, and upon this occasion, but he promises to continue his prayers for them, and not to cease as long as he lived. (3) They asked him only to pray for them, but he promises to do more, to teach them also "the good and the right way," the way of duty, the way of pleasure and profit.—Tr.]

Vers. 24, 25. Fear the Lord: 1) What sort of fear the true fear of God is. 2) On what it is grounded ("great things"). 3) Whereby it manifests itself (serving Him). 4) From what it preserves (from temporal and eternal destruction). [HENRY: And two things he urges by way of motive: (1) Gratitude, considering "what great things he had done for them;" (2) Interest, considering what great things He would do against them, if they should still "do wickedly."—Tr.] Vers. 22, 25. HALL: On Hallowing the Sabbath, I., 113: The hope of genuine national prosperity. Where then is the ground for hope of genuine national prosperity? Where there is 1) Fear of God's Name; 2) Confidence in God's Name.

SECOND DIVISION.

KING SAUL'S GOVERNMENT UP TO HIS REJECTION.

CHAPTERS XIII.—XV.

FIRST SECTION.

The Unfolding of his Royal Power in Successful Wars.

CHAPTERS XIII.—XIV.

I. Against the Philistines. Chap. XIII.—XIV. 46.

- 1 SAUL reigned one year; and when he had reigned two years over Israel, [Saul was — years old when he began to reign, and he reigned — years over Israel].¹
- 2 [Ina. And] Saul chose him three thousand men [ins. out] of Israel, whereof [om. whereof, ins. and] two thousand were with Saul in Michmash and in mount [the mountains of] Bethel, and a thousand were with Jonathan in Gibeah of Benjamin;
- 3 and the rest of the people he sent every man to his tent [tents].² And Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines that was in Geba, and the Philistines heard of it. And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land, saying, Let the Hebrews
- 4 hear.³ And all Israel heard say that Saul had smitten a garrison⁴ of the Philistines, and that Israel also was had in abomination with the Philistines. And the
- 5 people were called together after Saul to Gilgal. And the Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty⁵ thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand which is on the seashore in multitude; and they
- 6 came up, and pitched in Michmash eastward from [over against] Bethaven. When [And] the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait (for the people were distressed), then [and] the people did hide [hid] themselves in caves and in thickets
- 7 [caverns]⁶ and in rocks and in highplaces [hollows]⁷ and in pits. And *some*⁸ of the

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. The translation of Eng. A. V. is untenable, and that given in brackets is the only possible one. The numerals have fallen out, and can be only approximately restored. The plu. מִן would indicate that the period of Saul's reign was less than ten years, but, in the present corrupt state of the text, no such inference can safely be drawn. The omission of this verse in the Sept. may have been from its absence in their MS., or from their inability to make sense of it, or from clerical inadvertence. It is better to leave the numerals blank, and explain in a note that they have fallen out. Some, however, think (Hitzig, Maurer, Thénius, Wellhausen) that the numbers were designedly left out by the author.—Tx.]

² [Ver. 2. Here the Heb., in accordance with universal O. T. usage, has the plural.—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 3. The Syr., Arab., Vulg., Chald., here sustain the Mas. text. The reading of the Sept. is discussed by Erdmann. Wellhausen proposes to read: "and Saul blew the trumpet throughout the land, and the Philistines heard, saying, The slaves revolt (וְעָבְדָם)," the words "saying, etc." being taken as a gloss.

⁴ [Ver. 4. A different Heb. word from that used in xiv. 1, though from the same verbal stem. It is used also in x. 5; xiii. 3; 2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Chr. xli. 6. Ewald renders "officer," distinguishing נָצִיר (Sept. Nasir) from נָצִיר.—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 5. This number is generally regarded as too large. Some suppose baggage included (Patrick), some the chariot-soldiers (Cahen and others, comp. 2 Sam. x. 18), others suppose an error of text and read 3 for 30 (Clarke, Syr., Arab., or 300 (Bib. Comm.). Still other conjectures are given in Poole's Synopsis.—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 6. The lexicons generally render "thickets" as Eng. A. V. and Erdmann; Fürst renders "clefts," and Ewald reads "caves." But Chald. has "fortresses," Syr. and Vulg. "secret places," and Sept. "enclosures" or "holes." Of the modern versions Luther and Diodati have "clefts," Spanish follows Vulg., the French (of Martin), Port., Dutch agree with Eng. A. V. Other German versions give "hedges," "thorn-bushes," "clefts." The renderings of the ancient versions make Ewald's reading probable, and this sense accords better with the context.—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 6. So the ancient versions. The moderns generally render "towers" (so Erdmann), which is supported by the Arab. sarhan. The word occurs only three times in O. T., twice rendered in Eng. A. V., "hold" (Judg. ix. 44, 46) and here "high-place," which, as is remarked in Bib. Comm., is an unfortunate rendering, liable to be confounded with the places of religious worship.—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. Literally, "Hebrews went over," so Syr., Chald., Vulg. The Sept. has ἐκβαίνοντες (וְעָבְרוּ) and Symmachus ἐκ τοῦ ὕδατος. The mas. text does not suit the context, that of Sept. is against Heb. usage, and that of Symmachus (וְעָבְרוּ) is unsupported. Wellhausen proposes וְעָבְרוּ מִעֲבֹרֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן "and they crossed the fords of the Jordan," which gives a good sense with a very slight change in the letters. Throughout this nar-

- Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead, as for [and] Saul he [om. he] was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling.
- 8 And he tarried seven days according to the set time that Samuel had appointed⁹;
 9 but Samuel came not to Gilgal; and the people were scattered from him. And Saul said, Bring [ins. me] hither [om. hither] a [the] burnt-offering to me [om. to me] and [ins. the] peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering. And it came to pass that, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him that he might salute him. And Samuel said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, Because I saw that the people were scattered from me, and that thou camest not within the days appointed [at the appointed time], and that the Philistines gathered themselves together at Michmash, 12 Therefore said I, The Philistines will [Now will the Philistines] come down now [om. now] upon me to Gilgal, and I have not made supplication unto the Lord [Jehovah], [ins. And] I forced myself therefore [om. therefore], and offered a [the] burnt-offering. And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly [ins. in that]¹⁰ thou hast not¹¹ kept the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah] thy God, which he commanded thee; for now would the Lord [Jehovah] have established thy kingdom upon [over] Israel for ever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue; the Lord [Jehovah] hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord [Jehovah] hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord [Jehovah] commanded thee.
- 15 And Samuel arose and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah¹² of Benjamin. And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men.
 16 And Saul and Jonathan his son and the people that were present with them abode in Gibeah [Geba]¹³ of Benjamin, but [and] the Philistines encamped in Michmash.
 17 And the spoilers came out of the camp of the Philistines in three companies: one company turned unto the way that leadeth [om. that leadeth] to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual; And another company turned the way to Bethhoron; and another company turned to [om. to] the way of the border¹⁴ that looketh to the valley of Zebaim towards the wilderness. Now there was no smith found throughout [in] all the land of Israel; for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords 20 or spears. But [And] all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen 21 every man his share and his coulter and his axe and his mattock.¹⁵ Yet [And] they rative the Hebrews (apparently recreant Israelites) seem to be distinguished from the Israelites (who followed Saul).—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 8. This word is not in our Heb. text, but אָמַר is found in several MSS. and printed editions; others have שָׁם which De Rossi suggests has fallen out from resemblance to the two initial letters of the following word שָׁמָּה. On the critical objections to this section, vers. 8-15 a, see Erdmann's Introduction.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 13. Several MSS. and printed eds. insert } and Sept. has שָׁם.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 13. Hitzig proposes unnecessarily to point לֹא instead of לֹא.—Ta.]

¹² [Vers. 15, 16. It is somewhat surprising that Samuel goes to Gibeah (ver. 15), while Saul is found in Geba (ver. 16) without previous mention of his having gone thither. Instead of Geba the ancient vs. have Gibeah, and are followed by Eng. A. V. and Erdmann. Robinson (quoted in Bib. Comm.) thinks Geba correct. A good sense is gotten by connecting 7 a with 15 b. The readings of the Sept. are discussed by Keil and Erdmann.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 18. It is objected, but without sufficient ground, that the word שָׁקַף ("stretches towards, looks, overhangs") cannot be used of "border." The Sept. has "hill" (גִּבְעָה).—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 20. No satisfactory rendering has yet been given of this ver. and the following. The names of the instruments are given differently in different versions, there is doubt about the meanings of the names, the Sept. has a different text in ver. 21, and the initial words of this ver. in the Heb. and the connection of the two verses are yet obscure. The simplest reconstruction of the text would be to consider ver. 21 as an erroneous repetition of ver. 20, and omit all except the last two words (of the Heb.); but this would not account for the difference in form of the two verses, and is rendered difficult by the retention in all the versions of ver. 21 in full. In order to exhibit the differences of the Heb. and the Sept., we set them here down together, giving the latter conjecturally:—

וְהָיָה הַצִּיּוּרָה פִּים לַמַּחְרָשׁוֹת וְלֵאמֹתִים וְלִשְׁלֹשׁ קֶלֶשׁוֹן וְלִהְיָרְדִּים וְלִהְיָצִיץ הַדְּרָן
 ג. וְהָיָה הַצִּיּוּרָה נִבֹּן לִקְצֹץ (לַמַּחְרָשׁוֹת) וְהָאֵתִים שְׁרֵשׁ שָׁקַל לִשְׁן וְלִקְרֹרֶם (וְלַמַּחְרָשָׁה) הֵצִיץ אֶחָד בָּם

The translation of the Greek is: "And the vintage was ready, and their tools were three shekels to the tooth, and for the axe and the sickle there was the same rate (or character)." The Sept. thus substantiates in the main the consonants of the Hebrew, but gives no clear sense; the price of sharpening tools, three shekels to the tooth (adopted by Aquila and Theodorus) is enormous, and the reference to the harvest, while it is suggestive, is unclear. The Heb., on the other hand, offers a meaningless repetition in ver. 21, and the ungrammatical וְהָיָה, the compound וְהָיָה and the disconnected two last words present great difficulties. A sense may be gotten by putting the three first words of ver. 21 at the beginning of ver. 20, and considering the names in ver. 20 as repeated from ver. 21. But, before stating this reading, let us look at the names of implements. The first, which is the same in both had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulter, and for the forks, and for the axes, 22 and to sharpen the goads. So [And] it came to pass in the day of battle¹⁵ that there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people that were with Saul and Jonathan; but with Saul and with Jonathan his son was there found.

 23 And the garrison of the Philistines went out to the passage [pass] of Michmash.

CHAP. XIV. 1. Now [And] it came to pass upon a day that Jonathan the son of Saul said unto [to] the young man that bore his armor, Come, and let us go over to the Philistines' garrison, that is on the other side. But [And] he told not his 2 father. And Saul tarried [was lying] in the uttermost part of Gibeah under a pomegranate tree in Migron,¹⁶ and the people that were with him were about six hun-3 dred men, And¹⁷ Ahiah, the son of Ahitub, Ichabod's brother, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli, the Lord's priest [priest of Jehovah] in Shiloh, wearing an [the] 4 ephod. And the people knew not that Jonathan was gone. And between the passages [passes] by which Jonathan sought to go over unto the Philistines' garrison there was a sharp rock on the one side and a sharp rock on the other side; and the 5 name of the one was Bozez, and the name of the other Seneh. The forefront of the one was situate northward [The one rock was a column¹⁸ on the north] over against Michmash, and the other southward [on the south] over against Gibeah [Geba].¹⁹ 6 And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armor, Come, and let us go over to the garrison of these uncircumcised; it may be that the Lord [Jehovah] will work for us; for there is no restraint to the Lord [Jehovah] to save by many or by 7 few. And his armorbearer said unto him, Do all that is in thine heart; turn 8 thee,²⁰ behold, I am with thee according to thy heart.²¹ Then said Jonathan [And Jonathan said], Behold, we will pass over unto these [the] men, and we will [om.
 9 we will] discover ourselves unto them. If they say thus unto us, Tarry [stand still] until we can come to you, then we will stand still [om. still] in our place and will 10 not go up unto them. But, if they say thus, Come up unto us, then we will go up, for the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered them into our hand; and this shall be a [the] 11 sign unto us. And both of them [the two] discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines; and the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth [there 12 are Hebrews coming forth] out of the holes where they had hid themselves. And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armorbearer and said, Come up to us, and we will show [tell] you a thing [something]. And Jonathan said unto his armorbearer, Come up after me, for the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered them verses (except apparently in the Chald.), is rendered "share" (Sym., Vulg.) "scythe" (Syr.), "cutting-tool" (Ch.), "ox-goad" (Theod.), and is probably best given as "share" or "coulter," though the authority for "scythe" is good. The second name is probably "spade" or "hoe" (so Chald. (?), Sym., Vulg., Kimchi, Winer, Ewald, comp. Isa. ii. 4); Saalschütz (Arch. i., 103-106) prefers "sickle," from Isa. ii. 4. The third name is undoubtedly "axe." The fourth name (which is almost identical in form in the Heb. with the first), is rendered "trident" (Aq.), "bident" (Sym.), "scythe" (Sept.), "goad" (Syr.), "coulter" (Vulg.), and is apparently a repetition by mistake of the first name, or of the last word in ver. 21; if it be the correct reading it is best rendered "coulter." In ver. 21 the third name is usually given as "trident," but by Syr. as "scraper." The words are suspicious and may perhaps be properly read קִשְׁלָכִי (or קִשְׁלָכִי). In the beginning of ver. 21 the second word must drop its Article (perhaps repeated from preceding word), and take the construct form.—The following reading, then, might be proposed: "And there was bluntness of edges to the shares and hoes, and all Israel went down to the Philistines to sharpen every man his share and his hoe, and to sharpen the point of his axe, and to fix his goad." This rendering would account for the Sept. treatment of the latter half of ver. 21, for the repetitions of names, and for the Chald. rendering ("goad") of the first name in ver. 20. It would be necessary to suppose that the dislocation of the words took place very early, before the Sept. translation was made. But such dislocation is hard to account for, and it might be better to suppose a parenthesis and read: "And all Israel went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share and his hoe and his axe and his coulter (for there was bluntness of edges to the coulter and hoes and tridents and axes) and to fix the goad" which is very unsatisfactory, but perhaps the best that the present text permits.—Tx.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 22. Sept. here inserts "of Michmash," which is supported by the construct form מִיְּמִשָּׁם, but is against Heb. usage, which would give "the day of Michmash" (Wellhausen). There is here a duplet, מִיְּמִשָּׁם and מִיְּמִשָּׁם. On the alleged contradiction between ver. 22 and ver. 2 see Exegetical Notes.—Tx.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 2. Sept. Mayšar, Syr., Geb'un, Vulg., Magron. The word means "threshing-floor," Arab. mījran.—Tx.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 3. This verse may be taken as an independent parenthetical sentence.—Tx.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 5. Thenius thinks this word (which is not in Sept.) superfluous, and probably a repetition of the following word; but Syr., Chald., and Vulg., read apparently as the Mas. text.—Tx.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 5. So the Heb.; but the versions have "Gibeah," which, says Stanley, is plainly a mistake.—Tx.]

²⁰ [Ver. 7. So Syr., Chald., Vulg. (perge quo cupis), but the Sept. has "do all that thy heart inclines to," and this is adopted by Erdmann. The Heb. expression is somewhat hard, but not impossible. Syr. read הָלַךְ "go," instead of הָלַךְ "to thee."

²¹ [Ver. 7. Sept.: "as thy heart is my heart," which is better. The Heb. phrase alone may mean "according to thy desire," but this would require a verb before it.—Tx.]

- 13 into the hand of Israel. And Jonathan climbed up upon [on] his hands and upon [on] his feet, and his armorbearer after him; and they fell²³ before Jonathan, and 14 his armorbearer slew after him. And that first slaughter which Jonathan and his armorbearer made was about twenty men, within, as it were, an half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plow [within about a half-furrow of a yoke of land].²⁴
 15 And there was trembling in the host [camp], in the field, and among all the people; the garrison and the spoilers they also trembled, and the earth quaked, so [and] it [om. it] was [became] a very great trembling [a trembling of God].
 16 And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked [saw], and behold, the multitude melted away and they went on beating down one another [om. and . . .
 17 another, ins. hither²⁵ and thither]. Then said Saul [And Saul said] unto the people that were with him, Number now, and see who is gone from us. And when they had numbered [And they numbered and] behold, Jonathan and his armorbearer
 18 were not there. And Saul said unto Abiah, Bring hither the ark²⁶ of God [the ephod]; for the ark²⁶ of God was at that time with [for he bore the ephod at that 19 time before]²⁷ the children of Israel. And it came to pass, while Saul talked unto the priest, that the noise that was in the host [camp] of the Philistines went on and [om. and] increased [increasing]; and Saul said unto the priest, Withdraw thy 20 hand. And Saul and all the people that were with him assembled themselves [shouted]²⁷ and they [om. they] came [advanced] to the battle; and behold, every 21 man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture. Moreover [And] the Hebrews²⁸ that were with the Philistines [ins. as] before that time, which went up with them into the camp from the country round about [om. from . . .
 22 about], even [om. even] they also turned²⁹ [turned] to be with the Israelites that were with Saul and Jonathan. Likewise [And] all the men of Israel which had hid themselves in mount [the hill-country of] Ephraim when they [om. when they] heard that the Philistines fled, [ins. and] even [om. even] they also followed hard 23 after them in the battle. So [And] the Lord [Jehovah] saved Israel that day. And the battle passed over unto Beth-aven.
 24 And the men of Israel were distressed that day.³⁰ For [And] Saul had [om. had] adjured the people saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any [om. any] food until evening, that I may be avenged on mine enemies. So [And] none of the people
 25 tasted any [om. any] food. And all they of [om. they of] the land came to a [the]
 26 wood, and there was honey upon the ground. And when [om. when] the people were come [came] into [unto] the wood,³¹ [ins. and] behold, the honey dropped [was flowing]; but [and] no man put his hand to his mouth, for the people feared the oath.
 27 But [And] Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath, wherefore [and] he put forth the end of the rod that was in his hand, and dipped it in an honey-comb, and put his hand to his mouth, and his eyes were enlight-28 ened.³² Then answered one of the people [And one of the people answered] and

²³ [Ver. 13. Sept. הִשְׁתַּחֲוּוּ — וַיִּפְּחוּ. —Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 14. For this unintelligible reading Thenius ingeniously proposes בְּדָרְסִים וּבְאֲבָנִים "with darts and stones of the field," from which both Heb. and Sept. may be constructed.—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 16. For וַיִּלָּחֶם read (with Sept.) וַיִּלָּחֶם; so Erdmann.—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 18. The improbability of the ark's being in the field, the impropriety of the phrase "bring the ark," and the general use of the ephod in inquiring of God (as in 1 Sam. xxx. 7) recommend the Sept. reading "ephod," the Heb. word for which differs only slightly from that for "ark." Erdmann retains "ark."—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 18. For the same reasons the Sept. reading is adopted here. The Heb. וַיִּהְיֶה is an error for וַיִּבְרַח or וַיִּלָּחֶם; the latter is adopted by Erdmann ("the ark was in the presence of Israel"), who otherwise follows the Heb.—Ta.]

²⁸ [Ver. 20. So Syr., Vulg., Then., Erdmann (Qal); Chald. and Sept. as Eng. A. V. (Niphal).—Ta.]

²⁹ [Ver. 21. Sept. incorrectly ἀπέβη. Note here the contrast between Hebrews and Israelites. The Eng. A. V. has correctly "turned" (סָבַח), but renders the same word (סָבַח) as it incorrectly stands in the Heb. text] again "round about."—Ta.]

³⁰ [Ver. 24. For the insertion of Sept. see Exeget. Notes.—Ta.]

³¹ [Ver. 26. This verse is little more than a repetition of the preceding. Syr. in Walton (but not in Leo) omits 26 a. Sept. reads: "And Jaal was a wood abounding in bees, on the face of the field, and the people went into the place of bees, and lo, they went on talking," where they read וַיִּבְרַח for וַיִּבְרַח; but Wellhausen's emendation: "And there was honey on the ground, and the people went into the wood, and bees were moving" is doubtful. The passage is difficult.—Ta.]

³² [Ver. 27. So the Qeri instead of Kethib "saw."—Ta.]

said, Thy father strictly charged the people with an oath, saying, Cursed be the 29 man that eateth any [om. any] food this day. And the people were faint.²² Then said Jonathan [And Jonathan said], My father hath troubled the land; see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of the honey.
 30 How much more if haply [om. haply] the people had eaten freely to-day of the spoil of their enemies which they found! for had there not been now a much greater 31 slaughter [for now had not the²³ slaughter been great] among the Philistines? And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to Aijalon [Aijalon]; and the people were very faint.
 32 And the people flew upon the spoil, and took sheep and oxen and calves, and 33 slew them on the ground; and the people did eat them with [on] the blood. Then [And] they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the Lord [Jehovah] in that they eat with [on] the blood. And he said, Ye have transgressed [acted faith-34 lessly]; roll a great stone unto me this day [roll me a great stone hither²⁴]. And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people, and say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep, and slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the Lord [Jehovah] in eating with [on] the blood. And all the 35 people brought every man his ox with him²⁵ that night, and slew them there. And Saul built an altar unto the Lord [to Jehovah]; the same was the first altar that 36 he built unto the Lord [to Jehovah].²⁶ And Saul said, Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning-light, and let us not leave a man of them. And they said, Do [om. Do] whatsoever seemeth good unto thee [ins.
 do]. Then said the priest [And the priest said], Let us draw near hither unto God.
 37 And Saul asked counsel of God, Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel? But [And] he answered him not that day.
 38 And Saul said, Draw ye near hither, all the chief [heads] of the people, and know 39 and see wherein this sin hath been this day. For, as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, which [who] saveth Israel, though it be²⁷ in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die.
 40 But [And] there was not a man among all the people that answered him. Then said he [And he said] unto all Israel, Be ye on one side, and I and Jonathan my son will be on the other side. And the people said unto Saul, Do [om. Do] what 41 seemeth good unto thee [ins. do]. Therefore [And] Saul said unto the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, Give a perfect lot.²⁸ And Saul and Jonathan [Jonathan and 42 Saul] were taken; but [and] the people escaped. And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. . . And Jonathan was taken. Then [And] Saul said to 43 Jonathan, Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, I did but taste [I tasted] a little honey with the end of the rod that was in mine hand; 44 and [om. and] lo, I must die. And Saul answered [said], God do so and more also,
 45 for [om. for] thou shalt surely die, Jonathan. And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid [Far be it]; as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground, for he hath wrought with God this day. So [And] the people res-46 cued Jonathan that he died not. Then [And] Saul went up from following the Philistines, and the Philistines went to their own place.

II. Against the other Enemies round about—especially the Amalekites. Chap. XIV. 47–52.

47 So [And] Saul took the kingdom over Israel, and fought against all his enemies on every side, against Moab, and against the children of Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of Zobah, and against the Philistines; and whithersoever he 48 turned himself he vexed them. And he gathered an host [grew in strength], and ²² [Ver. 28. A parenthetical clause, apparently inserted by mistake from ver. 31.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 30. This word should have the Art. in the Heb.—Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 33. Read וְהָיָה (Sept.) instead of וְהָיָה.—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 34. Sept. "what was in his hand."—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 35. Literally: "It (or as to it) he began to build an altar to Jehovah," an obscure phrase.—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 39. The masc. pron. (referring to a fem. noun) may be defended as having an indefinite reference. According to Thénius the Sept. read ἐν τῷ (ἐν τῷ).—Ta.]

²⁸ [Ver. 41. For discussion of the text of this passage see Exeget. Notes.—Ta.]

smote the Amalekites, and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoiled them.

- 49 Now [And] the sons of Saul were Jonathan and Ishui [Ishwi]⁴⁹ and Melchishua; and the names of his two daughters were these [om. were these], the name of the first-born Merab, and the name of the younger Michal. And the name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam, the daughter of Ahimaaz, and the name of the captain of his host was Abner, the son of Ner, Saul's uncle. And Kish was [om. was] the father of Saul, and Ner the father of Abner was the son [were sons⁵⁰] of Abiel.
- 52 And there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul; and when Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man, he took him unto him.

⁴⁹ [Ver. 49. "For יְשׁוּי the Sept. read יְשׁוּי — אִשְׁוִי — אִשְׁכַּעֲלִי" (Wellhausen). Ishyo was equivalent to Ishbaal at a time when the name Baal (lord) was used of the God of Israel. Afterwards, from repugnance to the false Baal-worship, Bosheth was substituted for Baal.—Tr.]

⁵⁰ [Ver. 51. The change to the plural is rendered necessary by 1 Sam. ix. 1 and 1 Chron. ix. 38.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The connection of chap. xiii. 1 sq. with what precedes is not to be explained as a resumption here of the narrative which was dropped in x. 16. In support of this view Thenius affirms that it is only by supposing an original immediate connection between xiii. 2 and x. 16 that the words of Samuel, x. 7, "when these signs come to thee, undertake confidently what occasion may suggest," have a definite reference; but there is such a reference in chap. xi. already in the deed there done by Saul. And, when the same expositor makes Saul, inspired by the patriotic hymns of the prophets, proceed straightway to free his people from the yoke of the Philistines, he takes for granted what is not suggested in the words, and puts too much into them.—Against the view that the real continuation of the narration ending with x. 16 is not given till now (the section x. 17-xii. 25 containing matter foreign to the connection) Keil (Comm. p. 90, Rem. 1 [Eng. Tr., p. 122, Rem. 1]) admirably remarks that, on this supposition, it is inconceivable that Saul, who on his return from Samuel to Gibeah concealed his royal anointing from his kinsfolk (x. 16), should straightway have entered on his public career by choosing 3000 men and beginning the war against the Philistines—or further, that Saul should have had such universal, complete respect as is supposed by the people's pouring to him as king on his call, unless he had before been publicly proclaimed king in the presence of all Israel, and had won by a public deed the recognition and confidence of the whole people—and, finally, that the narrative in xiii. 1-7 requires the intermediate events of x. 17-xii. 25 in order to be intelligible.—But this view of the real and historical connection between xiii. sq. and x. 17-xii. 25 does not exclude the possibility that the redactor of the book from xiii. on used another authority than that employed in the previous history of Samuel, one, namely, which treated of Saul's reign and rejection; though, on the other hand, it is more probable that the editor of the book (which is derived from several sources) here uses the same authority for Saul's life as in chap. ix., speaking more at length of his deeds and official life, after having introduced from the source relating to Samuel what was required to continue the narrative, and set forth the historical events in their objective pragmatical connection.

Ver. 1. The chronological statements at the beginning of Saul's official life correspond to the usual notices of the age and time of reign of the kings at the outset of their history (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 10, 11; v. 4 and the many similar places in the books of Kings). We should therefore expect a different datum from that of the text: "Saul was one year old when he became king, and he reigned two years." And the attempts to extract sense from the present text, at least the first part of the verse, must be pronounced, partly on linguistic, partly on factual grounds, utter failures; so that of Luth., Grot., Cler., v. Gerlach [Eng. A. V.]: "Saul had been king one year," and the Chald.: "Saul was as an innocent child; when he became king." The text (which is presupposed even in the Sept.) is certainly corrupt, in the first place, in the first half, and a number must be supplied between וְשָׁנָה and וְשָׁנָה. Nägelsbach supposes (Herz. XIII., 433) that a י = 50 has fallen out after וְשָׁנָה by reason of the double Nun; to which it is no objection (Thenius) that then Saul, supposing that he reigned 20 years, would have been 70 when he went into his last battle (xxxi. 6), but great difficulty arises from the statement of Saul's youth (ix. 2). Others, as Bunsen, Vaihinger (Herz. VIII. 8) supply a ו = 40, supposed to have fallen out from the following similar ו, which would suit both the statement in xiii. 5, that Jonathan was already a stout warrior, and that in ix. 5. This first statement about Jonathan makes it impossible to accept the supplement י = 30 (in an anonymous version in the Hexapla).—In the second half of the verse many try to retain the text "and he reigned two years over Israel" by construing it syntactically with ver. 2, and explaining, with Grotius, that Saul collected his armed band after having reigned two years. So also Clericus: "As, twelve months and some more after birth one may be said to be the son of one year and living in his second year, so, the whole of one year of reign and the greater part of the second having elapsed, one may be called a king of one year, who was reigning two years." But ver. 1 cannot form a syntactic unit with ver. 2, unless the subject Saul were omitted in ver. 2, which would be arbitrary. Here, too, we must suppose a gap left by the omission of a numeral; and it is highly probable that ו = 20 has fallen out, so that the duration of the entire reign was given as in other cases. But the supposition (taking the text without connection with ver. 2) that Saul reigned altogether only two years, hardly deserves mention; it is shown to be absurd by the summary statement in xiv. 47 of Saul's wars.*

1. The principal war against the Philistines. xiii.; xiv. 1-46.

1. Vers. 2-7. The introduction of the war. That this war occurred in the beginning of Saul's reign is highly probable from the statement at the end of ver. 2, that he sent the rest of the people home. For here a gathering of the whole arms-bearing population is presupposed, from which three thousand men were chosen, and it is natural to infer, since nothing has been said of any general summons of the people except for the Ammonite war (chap. xi.), that on this latter followed soon the war against the Philistines narrated in xiii., xiv.—The statement, "And Saul chose him three thousand men out of Israel," indicates an important fact for Saul's military rule: The formation of a standing warlike body of chosen men into a permanent disciplined army in distinction from the mass of the people, who had hitherto been summoned to war. This body of 3000 men was so divided between Saul and his son Jonathan (who is here mentioned for the first time) that the former had command of 2000, and the latter of 1000. This is indicated by the "with" (וְ), and it is therefore unnecessary to insert with Thenius a "which"

(וְהַ) after "two thousand" (דְּשָׁנָה) "because Saul himself could have been only in one place."† —Michmash, according to Rob. II. 328 sq. [Am. ed. I., 440-442, and see Grove in Smith's Bib. Dict., s. v.—Tr.] the present desolate village Michmash, 3½ hours [nearly 9 Eng. miles, but Grove says 7—Tr.] northeast of Jerusalem on the northern cliff of the narrow pass which runs between it and Geba (which was on the southern range of heights), the present Wady Suweinit. The mountain or mountain-range of Bethel, which along with Michmash was a post of the 2000 men under Saul, can be none other than the range (Josh. xvi. 1) on which the old Bethel lay (comp. 1 S. x. 3). The ruins of Beitin, on the old site of Bethel, and surrounded by mountains, are 3½ hours [9½ or 10 Eng. miles] from Jerusalem. The two posts were thus not far from one another, and had probably about the same altitude.—The other division, of 1000 men, was at Gibeah of Benjamin, the home of Saul's family, under Jonathan's command.—The reason for the dismissal of the rest of the people was partly, no doubt, that Saul did not venture to advance against the Philistines with an undisciplined mass, and that no compact body, but only a strong garrison here marked the borders of the Philistine power and authority.—Ver. 3. Jonathan's heroic deed. He smote the garrison of the Philistines in Geba. There is no reason for reading Gibeah (though the ancient vas. so have it) instead of Geba; for this reading is obviously an attempt to correct the text which (from Gibeah in ver. 2) was supposed to be incorrect. Whether this garrison was the same as that mentioned in x. 5, which was perhaps, in consequence of the Israelites' occupying Michmash, removed to Geba opposite, is uncertain. Jonathan with his thousand men inflicted a total defeat on this garrison of the Philistines. The word "smote," from its ordinary military use and from the context, can here mean nothing but a "slaughter." Saul and Jonathan's first movement may have been concealed from the Philistine garrison by the nature of the ground, or may have been so sudden as to be like a surprise;* and, as to the narrative, it was not necessary to go into details on the method and result of this military blow, because it is considered merely as the beginning and occasion of the decisive struggle against the Philistines. It is therefore unnecessary to regard דָּבָר as "pillar," sign of the authority of the Philistines (Then.), or as the name of a Philistine officer whom Jonathan slew, (Ew.), or as a proper name (Sept.). Aquila has correctly ὑποστήριγμα, statio.—The word "saying"

(וְהָאָמַר) usually, where as here it is connected with blowing a trumpet, introduces what is to be publicly proclaimed after the sounding of the trumpet, comp. 2 Sam. xx. 1; 1 Kings i. 34, 39; 2 Kings ix. 13. We might accordingly say that Saul ordered it to be proclaimed by sound of trumpet through the land: "Let the Hebrews hear." Then would follow (from the connection) the story of Jonathan's heroic deed. These words would in that case be the usual introduction to what was to be made known, as among us in public proclamations accompanied by musical instruments, there are first words to call attention.† The herald would then give the event to be proclaimed simply and clearly.—But it is an equally well-supported view, that what is said is merely that Saul had the important fact proclaimed by trumpet throughout all Israel, without quoting the words of the proclamation, and that the "saying" introduces (as usual) only the words or thoughts of the subject of the sentence. That is: Saul blew the trumpet in all Israel, saying (or thinking), The Hebrews shall hear it, namely, the deed of Jonathan. We need not, therefore, in any case, with Thenius, following the Sept. ἡθετήκασιν οἱ δούλοι, "the slaves have revolted,"‡ put "revolt" (וְהָשָׁמַעַת) for "hear" (וְהָאָמַר) and render: "Let the Hebrews revolt, free themselves." Nor does the "revolting" suit the presupposed relation of the Hebrews to the Philistines. The words of Josephus, quoted by Thenius: "He proclaims it throughout the whole land, summoning them to freedom," contain an explanatory, paraphrastic remark on what was of course understood in the public proclamation in consequence of Jonathan's feat, and cannot therefore furnish a basis for a change of text. But that in fact the content of the proclamation was not a summons to revolt, but the state-

* [Some suppose that the numerals, being unknown to the editor (who lived long afterwards), never were in the text. But neither the omission of ver. 1 in Sept. nor the resemblance of וְהָאָמַר (for וְהָשָׁמַעַת) requires this supposition, which on general grounds is not probable.—Tr.]

† [Thenius (following Sept.) renders "2000, which were partly in Michmash, partly in Bethel."—Tr.]

* [One of the translators who has visited the spot points out that the attention of the garrison would naturally be directed to Saul's force at Michmash, which was very near them on the north; and thus Jonathan, who was several miles distant on the southwest, could more easily effect a surprise.—Tr.]

† [Bib. Comm. compares our Oyes, oyes.—Tr.]
‡ The untrustworthiness of this is shown by the δούλοι, which has arisen by confounding עֲבָדִים with עֲבָרִים.

ment of Jonathan's blow, appears from ver. 4: with the trumpet-proclamation went throughout Israel the news: Saul (that is, as chief commander, head of the military force, a part of which had inflicted the blow) has smitten the garrison of the Philistines.—At the same time the people became aware of the consequence and significance of this attack on the position of the Philistines: Israel, it is said, had become stinking, that is, suspected or hated with the Philistines (comp. xvii. 12; Gen. xxxiv. 20; Ex. v. 21), by their purpose to shake off, arms in hand, the foreign yoke. The enkindled hate and anger of the Philistines must needs have led them to a speedy military undertaking against Israel, as is narrated in ver. 5; and Israel was thereby compelled quickly to gather all its strength against the Philistines. This military summons of the whole people is expressed by קָרָא [called]: The people were called together (summoned) after Saul to Gilgal. Vulg., Sanctius, Luther translate incorrectly: "cried" (instead of "were called together"). The summons took place at the same time with the trumpet-announcement. Saul went to Gilgal, the old camping-place, because the people were to assemble there, and indeed could only assemble behind the steep declivities of the hills in the broad plain which stretches to the Jordan.—Ver. 5. To this movement of Israel answers the rapid gathering of a large army by the Philistines. Most expositors regard the number of chariots (30,000) as too large in proportion to the number of horsemen (6,000), and (comparing similar numbers in 2 Sam. x. 18; 1 Kings x. 16; 2 Chron. xii. 3) suppose an error of text here. According to Thenius the Codex 715 of De Rossi has (originally) simply "a thousand" (אֶלֶף).* It is "a natural conjecture that the sign for 30, ל', has been repeated from the preceding word, and we then read 'a thousand chariots'" (Bunsen). The supposition of three thousand chariot-warriors (Syr., Calov., Hez., Schulz, Maur.) is arbitrary, and unsustained by 2 Sam. x. 18.—The large army of the Philistines (one thousand chariots, six thousand horsemen) encamped in Michmash (which Saul had left) in front of Bethaven. The locality is disputed among modern expositors. In the first place, against Jerome who (on Hos. v. 8, Bethaven, quæ quondam vocabatur Bethel) identifies Bethaven with Bethel, the distinctness of these two places is, according to Josh. vii. 2, to be maintained; according to this passage, Bethaven lay east from Bethel, and according to Josh. xviii. 12 there was a "wilderness of Bethaven." We must first inquire how we are to understand "over against" (קִדְמָה). If we assume that this expression "in geographical statements always means east" (Then.), it yet by no means follows, as Then. thinks, that Michmash was very near the Jordan, far from Gibeah. Apart from the groundless identification of Gibeah and Geba (the former, Jonathan's position, was nine* miles farther south), there is between Bethaven (east of Bethel) and the Jordan so considerable a distance, that Michmash may well have lain east from Bethaven, without being "very near the Jordan," and therefore farther from Geba than the narrative permits. It is, therefore, unnecessary (with Keil), in order to meet Thenius' objection, to render קִדְמָה "in front of," though to this there is no objection, since the constant geographical expression for "east" is מִזְרָח, and the identity of the two neither has been nor can be shown (from Gen. ii. 14; iv. 16; 1 Sam. xiii. 5; Ezek. xxxix. 11, the only places in which our word occurs); and so Ewald, Bib. Jahrb. X. 54 (comp. Keil on Gen. ii. 14). In Isa. x. 29 Gibeah-Benjamin (along with Ramah) is named with Geba in such a way that the latter appears as a strong camping-place, which had to protect the two other places, and from which their territory was commanded. If, now, Saul (according to ver. 2) was posted northward at Michmash and Jonathan southward at Gibeah-Benjamin, the Philistine position at Geba would be between them; certainly the double Israelitish position was intended to embrace the Philistine garrison on both sides. Jonathan having destroyed this garrison by a coup de main, and the Philistines having marched to Michmash in great force (ver. 5), Saul was obliged to abandon this position (which was now after Jonathan's feat of no importance to him), and betake himself to the old camping-place at Gilgal, that he might here assemble the people to war, while Jonathan kept his position at Gibeah-Benjamin (xiv. 16, 17), whence he performed a second bold feat against the camp of the Philistines at Michmash. Thenius reads Beth-horon instead of Bethaven, on the ground that the Philistine camp would probably be pitched in the fertile region around Gibeon; but both these places lie too far west to suit this narrative, and the Philistines, in changing their camp at Michmash (ver. 23), would certainly march eastward in the valley between Michmash and Geba. The people were afraid of them (vers. 6, 7), because they were apprehensive that the Philistines would advance from Michmash into the Gilgal-plain, and overpower them, unprepared as they were.—"And the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait (in angustia), because the people were pressed by the Philistines." This recognition of danger and fear of a superior force expresses itself in three ways. Partly, they hid themselves in the country this side of the Jordan in caves,† thorn-bushes (why thick bushes (from תִּיב, thorn) should not serve for hiding (Then.) is not obvious), in clefs of rocks, in watch-towers or castles (the word is found elsewhere only in Judg. ix. 46, 49, where it is distinguished from migdal, "tower," and is a high, isolated, roofed building, perhaps designed to guard against military attacks. Clericus: "fortified places; they are high places, fortified on a lofty site, as appears from the Arabic, in which the word means any lofty structure") and in pils; partly (ver. 7), they flee across the Jordan into the land of Gad and Gilead (Clericus: "regions toward the source of the Jordan, mountainous and more difficult of access for the Philistine army"), while Saul still remained at Gilgal; we see from this, as well as from the expressions down and up (vers. 12–15), that this Gilgal could not have been the elevated Gilgal or Jiljaleh between Sichem and Jerusalem, which also would be impossible from the military positions here mentioned of the Philistines and of Saul; partly, they go trembling after Saul, that is, the soldiers, who were there as one body under his command (פָּחַד). It thus appears that the Philistines advanced against the Israelites with rapidity and energy in strong force, to avenge themselves and establish their authority; and that among the Israelites there was great dismay and confusion.

* [So De Rossi states in his Vor. Lect., and also mentions that Bochart, Capellus and Houbigant favor the reading of Syr., Arab. 3,000. Wordsworth suggests that the Philistines hired chariots from other nations (1 Chron. xix. 6, 7). Rashi, Radak, Ralbag say nothing.—Ta.]

* [Gibeah was not nine miles southwest of Geba, but about four miles; see the maps of Robinson and Porter, and Erdmann's statement on xiv. 16. Ta.]

† [On these names see "Textual and Grammatical," in loco.—Ta.]

2. Vers. 8–14. Saul's hasty offering in opposition to the divine arrangement, and, in consequence of this, his rejection by Samuel's prophetic judicial sentence.—Ver. 8. Saul waited* according to x. 8 seven days for Samuel to come and make the offering for the people who were arming themselves for the war against the Philistines. After "which" supply "appointed" (עָרַךְ or עָרַם, Sept., Chald.), 2 Sam. xx. 5. Comp. Ew. § 292 b.—But Samuel came not to Gilgal, that is, during the seventh day; the people were scattered from him partly through fear of the Philistines, partly from the failure of the hope held out by Saul that Samuel would come.—Ver. 9. Saul makes the offering, or causes it to be made, without waiting longer for Samuel. The fear that he would become entangled in battle before the people were thereto consecrated by offering and prayer, and apprehension of the complete dispersion and disheartenment of the people drove him (ver. 12) to this disobedience and this overhaste.—Ver. 10. When the offering was finished, behold, Samuel came, from the context, on the same day on which Saul had waited for him in vain and made the offering. In his impatience in the presence of the prepared enemy Saul had not waited to the end of the appointed day.—Vers. 11, 12. Samuel's question: What hast thou done? is an earnest reproof to Saul for his self-willed violation of the divine arrangement which had been prophetically made known to him. In defence Saul pleads three things: the dispersion of the people, the danger of a sudden descent of the Philistines into the plain of Jericho, and the possibility of being obliged to go into battle without divine consecration and blessing. The Heb. phrase (פָּחַד, etc.) is literally "to stroke the face of Jehovah," in order to gain His favor and grace by offering or prayer. Comp. Ex. xxxii. 11. "I forced myself," did violence to my desire, took courage. Saul here intimates that it was only after a strong internal conflict that he determined to act contrary to the divine command.—Ver. 13. Two constructions may here be taken. The first clause may be conditional (אִם=אִלל=אִל), "if thou hadst kept," and the second (אִלל=אִל) "yea, then?" the result: "yea, then would the Lord," or the first may be simply declarative (אִל="not"): "thou hast not kept," and before the second (אִלל=אִל, "yea, then would the Lord have established thy kingdom") we may supply the condition ["if thou hadst kept"] required by the sense. The latter is preferable from the whole situation, to which such liveliness of discourse better answers. Examples of such a construction, with omission of conditional protasis, are Ex. ix. 15; 2 Ki. xiii. 19; Job iii. 13; xiii. 19. See Ew., § 358 a. The twice (beginning of ver. 13 and end of ver. 14) repeated declaration: "thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord," indicates the ground of the similarly twice (first hypothetically—then affirmatively) repeated judgment: "thy kingdom will not be established by the Lord, nor stand." It is therein assumed that Saul received through Samuel a divine direction, and that he had recognized Samuel's arrangement as a direction from God given him through the mouth of the legitimate mediator, which Samuel, as Prophet of the Lord, was. The content of the divine direction was this: Saul was to await the arrival of Samuel, who, not arbitrarily, but in accordance with his other (here unmentioned) prophetic work, determined the time at which the battle was to begin under the consecration and direction of the representative of the invisible King of Israel. Comp. x. 8: "that I may show thee what thou art to do." Saul had thus been directed to await the divine directions, and by his action here transgressed the fundamental law of obedience to his King; unquiet and impatient, self-willed and fleshly, he fails to stand the trial which lay in this command, and sets himself outside of the relation of unconditional obedience to the will of God, the humble fulfilment of which was the condition of the establishment and continuance of His kingdom. Samuel recognized with his prophetic look the disposition of heart which was at the bottom of Saul's conduct, on account of which neither he nor his house could be the permanent bearer of the kingdom. Samuel's judgment is therefore not hasty, unjust, harsh, as it has been thought, but the expression of the divine righteousness and holiness, as whose organ he stood over against Saul; and his conduct towards Saul corresponds exactly to his position (as we have heretofore seen him) as instrument of Israel's God-king. Samuel's judicial sentence signifies the rejection of Saul; negatively, it is the denial of what would have occurred, if Saul had fulfilled the required condition, the permanent establishment of His kingdom, positively it is the announcement that the Lord had chosen another as theocratic king in his stead. Back of this judicial act of Samuel stands as its motive the truth, brought to light by Saul's conduct, that Saul had forfeited the royal office committed to him; for the theocratic king must be, at the head of God's people, in full accord with the royal will of God. Cleric: "Yea, the authority of the prophet, rather, of God Himself, was maintained—which, if Saul could with impunity neglect the most important commands, would afterwards have been despised by the obstinate people impatient of the yoke, and by the king himself."—Ver. 15.

* The Hiph. of Qeri, פָּחַד, is clearly formed after Hiph. in x. 8 and Kethib, פָּחַד (Niph. or Pi) is to be retained. [On this section, vers. 8–15 a, see Erdmann's Introduction.—Ta.]

The 600 men, all that remained to Saul, shows that he could not in any case have avoided what he wished to avoid. The declaration, "thou hast acted foolishly," is thus confirmed. Saul's conduct was foolish because it of necessity produced the opposite of that which he was to gain by obedience and trust in God.

3. Vers. 15-23. Samuel's "going up" from the plain of Gilgal to the elevated Gibeah-Benjamin, Saul's home, is stated simply as a fact, and the reason not given. That Saul also went thither from Gilgal (Then.) is not necessarily supposed in the word "numbered." The mustering of his remaining troops is best placed in Gilgal; he there reviewed them in order now to march against the Philistines. The number of warriors was reduced to 600. Saul had therefore, by his hasty, disobedient conduct, not attained his purpose of holding the people together (ver. 11).—Ver. 16. Here the two positions on the opposite heights of Geba and Michmash, a deep gorge between them running eastward into the plain, are clearly and distinctly marked. The camp of Saul and Jonathan is said to be in Geba (the present Jeba, to be distinguished from Gibeah-Benjamin), without mention of Saul's march to Geba; the words "were encamped" rather introduce us into the midst of the situation. Between the words "from Gilgal" and "Gibeah-Benjamin" [ver. 15] the Sept. (not understanding the passage) inserts: "and the rest of the people went up after Saul to meet him after the men of war, they having come from Gilgal." So with some modification the Vulg.: et reliqui populi ascenderunt post Saul obviam populo qui expugnabant eos venientes de Galgala. But such a filling out is not needed in order to understand the connection. The author's task is not to give a complete, detailed history of this war, but to set forth from the theocratic point of view, in respect to Saul's conduct and God's dealing, what occurred. Having in respect to the former given a detailed account of the scene at Gilgal, without mentioning that Saul had gone from Michmash to Gilgal (which is assumed in ver. 4), it was sufficient, taking it for granted that Saul had moved from Gilgal to Geba, to state the fact that the camp of the Israelites was then in Geba, and thereby to indicate the new scene, in which in the following context the condition of subjugation of the Israelites by the Philistines under the divine permission is set forth. In this simply theocratic sporadic description, which corresponds to the cut-up nature of the land on which this occurrence took place, and to the immediate vicinity of hill and valley, we have from ver. 2 on a series of distinct pictures, without statement of their historical-geographical connection: 1) Michmash—Gibeah-Benjamin and Geba (vers. 2, 3); 2) Michmash—Gilgal (vers. 4-15); 3) Gibeah-Benj. and Geba-Benj.—Michmash. The historical-geographical situation is as follows: At first the Israelitish army in two divisions lay on the one side in Michmash, on the other side in Gibeah-Benjamin. From this point Jonathan smote the garrison or camp of the Philistines in Geba. In consequence of this the Philistines—who controlled the plain—collected their forces. Saul left Michmash and marched down to Gilgal in order there to gather Israel to the conflict against the Philistines, while the latter occupied Michmash deserted by Saul. While Samuel remained at Gibeah-Benjamin, Jonathan's former position, Saul and Jonathan took position over against the Philistines in Geba; that is, at the place where Jonathan had broken up the Philistine garrison.

Vers. 17-23. The oppression of Israel by the Philistines. In vers. 17, 18 the devastation of the Israelitish territory by Philistine raids is described. From the camp of the Philistines at Michmash went forth "the spoiler" (תַּשְׁבֵּץ). The Article denotes that part of the army to which was assigned the task of plundering and devastation, and thus inciting to battle. There were three bands (שְׁבָטִים—as in xi. 11). One of the bands took the road to Ophrah, to the land of Shual. Ophrah was in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23), five Roman miles [1 Rom. mile=about 1618 English yards] east of Bethel (Onom.), conjectured by Roh. II. 338 [Am. ed. I. 447] to be the present Taiyibeh.* This band therefore moved northward. Shual, "Foxland," is probably the same with Shaalim, ix. 4. The second party went towards Bethhoron (Josh. x. 11), that is, westward. The third band moved in a south-easterly direction. This Zeboim (צִבְעִים) is to be distinguished from the Zebolim (צִבְלִים) of Deut. xxix. 22; Gen. xiv. 28; according to Neh. xi. 34 it was a city inhabited by Benjamites, and therefore in the Benjamite territory. The direction is given by the added words: "towards the wilderness," for this wilderness is doubtless no other than that of Judah, which extended east from Jerusalem. While, therefore, the Israelites under Saul and Jonathan held a strong point on the heights, the Philistines plundered the plains and valleys where they had the control.—Vers. 19, 20. Here they deprived the Israelites of arms; for "there was no smith found in all the land." The Philistines had broken up the smithies—for they said: "lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears." Only the implements necessary for agriculture were allowed them—to sharpen which they must go to the Philistines. So Porsenna allowed the Romans iron implements for agriculture only. Before "the Philistines" the Sept. inserts "the land of," which is merely an explanation of an unusual expression. The people signifies the land or territory (Ew. § 281 d). The meaning of the names of implements in ver. 20 cannot be determined with certainty. The first (מַחֲרֶשֶׁת) from its etymology may be any cutting instrument. The fourth (מַחֲרָשָׁה) Jerome renders sarculum, "hoe." The second (אֵת) is, as in Mic. iv. 3; Isa. ii. 4, "ploughshare," or "coultter." The third (קֶרֶדֶם) is "axe" or "hatchet."—Ver. 21 shows the consequence (וְהִתְרָה) of the Hebrews having no smiths, and having to go to the Philistines to sharpen their tools. And there was dulness—properly notching of edges to the shares, etc.; or, there came edge-dulness to the shares. פִּצְרִיהַ from a stem which in Arab. means "cleave." As the Art. here and its absence in פִּים are both strange; and the st. aba.

* [Mr. Grove thinks this uncertain (Smith's Bib. Dict. s. v.).—Tx.]

stands instead of the st. const., it is probable that the text is corrupt, and (with Keil) to be read הַפְּצִיר הַפִּים, Inf. Hiph. and rendered "so there occurred dullness of the edges," etc.) Bunsen says excellently: "The parenthesis indicates that the result of the burdensome necessity of going to the Philistines was that many tools became useless by dullness, so that even this poorer sort of arms did the Israelites not much service at the breaking out of the war." And to set the goads.—"To set" corresponds to "to sharpen," and completes the picture of the Hebrews' dependence on the Philistines in respect to agricultural implements. The previously mentioned implements (including the trident or fork) needed sharpening; the ox-goad needed new setting. The translation of De Wette: "when, namely, the edges . . . were dulled . . ." is certainly not tenable (Then.). On the other hand, neither this parenthesis, which describes the consequence of the oppression, nor the difference in the lists of implements, is so remarkable as to require the following of the text of the Sept. (Then. and Böttcher).—Ver. 21 reads thus in the Sept: "and the vintage was ready to be gathered, and the tools were three shekels to the tooth, and to the axe and the scythe there was the same rate." In their conjectural restoration of the original text according to the Greek, Then. and Böttch. proceed eclectically,* and translate: "And there happened sharpening of the edges to the shares and the spades at three shekels a tooth (that is, a single piece), and so for the axe and the sickle, yea, for the setting of the ox-goad" (Böttch. who differs from Then. as to the names of the implements, renders the second half: "and so for the sickles and the axes, and for the setting of the prong.") Against this (conjectural) fixing of the text are: first, the unintelligibility and confusion of the Greek text, on which this emendation is founded; then, the obviously wrong conception of the Heb. by the Sept. in the beginning of ver. 21; further, the untenableness of the rendering "single piece" for δόντια, שֵׁן [tooth], which is not supported (Then.) by Theodoret's remark "Symmachus renders odonta ploughshare, and Aquila plough," for this means merely that odonta was understood of this or that implement, not that it meant a single piece in reference to price; finally (Keil), "the then value of money," according to which "three shekels for sharpening an axe or a sickle would be an unheard-of price."—From this whole section it appears that, while the Philistines held the lowlands, the Hebrews carried on their tillage on the highlands and in the gorge of the Jordan.—In ver. 22 Sept. has "in the days" for "in the day," and after "battle" inserts "of Michmash," and so Then. and Ew.; but this is not necessary.† Referring to ver. 19 it is said: There was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people

* Rejecting the הַפְּצִיר [vintage] of the Greek, and reading הַפְּצִיר [sharpening], which they connect with הַפִּים [the edges], and instead of לְשֵׁן לְשֵׁן [tridents] read לְשֵׁן לְשֵׁן [at three shekels to the tooth, and so].

† On the form מְלֻחָת see Ewald, Grammar, § 188 c.

that were with Saul and Jonathan. In consequence of the above-mentioned measure of the Philistines, the entire force with Saul and Jonathan, 600 in number (to this force the phrase "all the people" is from the context to be referred) was unprovided with arms. This is not in contradiction with the narrative of the battle and victory of Israel over the Ammonites (chap. xi.); for there we have not a regular army, but a sudden rising of the people, and, even though arms were gotten by that victory, it does not thence follow that the comparatively small force that remained with Saul and Jonathan must have been regularly furnished with arms, inasmuch as the Philistine plan of disarming the Israelites was a permanent one, and necessarily resulted in a general lack of arms. These arms were found only with Saul and Jonathan.—Ver. 23. מְעַבֵּר is the passage or pass of Michmash. From Beer-oth (Bireh) extends a deep valley, the present Wady es Suweinit, south-east and then east, opening into the valley towards Jericho. On the heights opposite lay southward Geba (Jeba) northward Michmash (Muchmas). Eastward from these camps of the Israelites and Philistines several side-Wadys opened into the deep Wady, partly from the north-west, partly from the south-west, by which the passage was formed. Comp. Rob. Pal., II. 327 sq. [Am. ed., I. 440 sq.], and Later Bibl. Researches, 378 sq. [Am. ed., III. 289 sq.]. "The ridges between these (the side-Wadys) terminate in elevated points projecting into the great Wady; and the easternmost of these bluffs on each side were probably the outposts of the two garrisons of Israel and the Philistines." Towards the pass of Michmash (north, therefore, over against the Israelites) the Philistines sent forward a post, a van-guard, as protection against the Israelites, who might else have slipped up unperceived through the side-Wadys or the pass formed by these, and surprised the Philistine camp. The strategical movement here indicated precisely accords with the ground where Robinson has pointed out the pass. It is hence unnecessary (with Ew. and Bunsen) to read מְעַבֵּר and translate: "The van-guard of the Philistines was thrown forward beyond the camp of Michmash," though this in fact was done, since a force was thrown forward from the camp eastward towards the pass.

4. XIV. 1-15. Jonathan's bold attack on the Philistines.

Ver. 1. "On a day" (יִוִּם), on the definite day on which the following occurred. The words: And Jonathan said to his armor-bearer: Let us go over to the Philistines' garrison, are repeated in ver. 6 for the continuation of the narrative which they introduce. What lies between [vers. 2-5] is a statement of the existing special circumstances and local relations. This detailed narration shows that it is taken from the account of an eye-witness. The "garrison" of the Philistines is the advanced post mentioned in xiii. 23. On the other side.

The interjacent statements introduce us into the details of the whole situation: 1) Jonathan says

* הָלֵךְ is an abbreviation of הִלָּךְ, the strengthened demonstr. "that;" it is seldom found, as here, without preceding substantive. Comp. Dan. viii. 16; Ewald, § 103 d.

nothing to his father of his purpose, because he would have forbidden it as too dangerous; the undertaking is set on foot secretly, in the hope of surprising the enemy in sleep or unprepared. 2) Saul (ver. 2) is encamped at the extremity of Gibeah. This is mentioned to show that Jonathan could unknown to him make such a blow. Gibeah (ver. 16) is the city Gibeah in Benjamin, whither also Samuel had gone from Gilgal (xiii. 15) back of Geba towards the south, yet with its extremity (ver. 16) not so far from the pass of the southward-trending Wady, that the movements in the ranks of the Philistines opposite could not be thence observed. Under the pomegranate-tree which is in Migron. By "rimmon" we must here understand not the name of a place, but, on account of the Art., the well-known pomegranate. According to Judg. xx. 45 a rock near Gibeah bore the name "Rock of the pomegranate" [Rimmon]; and was well adapted for a fortified position. It is a natural supposition that the same place is meant here, named after the well-known pomegranate. Luther here renders Migron incorrectly suburb. Linguistically it can only signify a place, which, however, from the local relations cannot be the Migron of Isa. x. 28, north of Michmash, whose name seems to be found in the ruins of Magrun, eight minutes from Beitin. Rob. II. 340 [see Am. ed. I., 463, Stanley's Sin. and Pal. 202]. Rather this place lay south of the pass of Michmash on the northern extremity of Gibeah-Benjamin (Saul), and was marked by the well-known pomegranate. From the context it appears that Gibeah-Benjamin* extended far along on the heights which stretched out (south of Geba) north-east towards the pass of Michmash, and ended in a rock on which the pomegranate stood, and on whose declivity lay the place Migron. The word means perhaps "precipice" (Then.) which is linguistically better than "threshing-floor" (Rosenm. Alterth. II. 2, 171). That two contiguous places should bear this name is, on account of the nature of the ground, as little surprising (Winer) as the frequent occurrence of the names Ramah and Gibeah (Geba).—3) Saul's following consisted of about six hundred men and Ahiah the high-priest. We must render: And Ahiah—bare the ephod.† The words "priest of Jehovah in Shiloh" belong not to Ahiah (Sept., Luth.), but to Eli. Wearing the ephod was a sign of the high-priestly office. Probably Ahiah was with Saul at Gilgal, and ministered in the offering there made by him. The name Ahiah ["Jehovah is brother" or "brother of Jehovah"] is identical with Ahimelech ["brother of the king"] under which this great-grandson of Eli, the sole survivor, (ii. 33) of the house of Eli, appears (xxi. 2; xxii. 9, 11, 20; xxx. 7, e.a.). As to whether of the two names was the original, Ewald remarks that they may have been used without much distinction (since melech "king" might refer to God) as in Elimelech (in Ruth) and Elijah (Geach. II. 585, Rem. 3).—The people with Saul also knew nothing of Jonathan's purpose. This statement connects itself naturally with the remark on Saul's following.—4) Exact description of the ground which Jonathan had to traverse in his bold secret enterprise, vers. 4, 5. According to Robinson's remarks the plural "passes" is to be explained of the several passages which were made possible by the side-valleys. It is not probable that the plural refers to a long passage over the mountain (Then.). Further the word "between" is intelligible only on the supposition of several passes. Between these passes lay opposite one another two rocky crags or projections, formed by the side-wadys opening right and left into the deep, precipitous Wady es-Suweinit. Robinson went from Jeba (Geba) through that Wady across to Michmash. In this passage (from south to north) he had on the left two hills with steep rocky sides. "Behind each," says he, "runs up a smaller Wady, so as almost to isolate them. One is on the side towards Jeba and the other towards Mukhmas" (II. 329 [Am. ed. I. 441]). To this observation of Robinson answers exactly the description in ver. 5, according to which the one rock-ledge, Bozez, was a *column on the north, the other Seneh, on the south, opposite Geba.

Ver. 6. Continuation of the narrative, with resumption of Jonathan's words to his armor-bearer [ver. 1], but with the difference that the Philistines are here not called by their own name, but "uncircumcised." This expression marks the difference between them and Israel as covenant-people, which forms the basis for the following utterance of Jonathan. Ewald's characterization of Jonathan's feeling as "a mixture of youthful impatience and lofty courage" (III. 48) does not fully explain the inner side of this deed. Its natural basis is youthful heroic spirit and impetuous desire of achievement; but it receives high ethical value and significance from its religious root in Jonathan's God-fearing and God-trusting heart, whose feeling is expressed in the word: Perhaps Jehovah will work for us, for there is no restraint to Jehovah to save by many or by few.—Over against the "uncircumcised" Jonathan is clearly conscious: 1) that his people is the chosen one, belonging to the Lord, with whom the Lord has made a covenant, and 2) that the Lord cannot deny His almighty help to this people as their covenant-God. This word of Jonathan expresses the genuine theocratic disposition of the liveliest consciousness of God and the firmest trust in God, whence alone could come a true deliverance of the people from their oppressive burden. The "perhaps" indicates not a doubt, but the humility which was coupled with Jonathan's heroic spirit; he is far from tempting God. The humble and modest hope which is expressed in the word: "perhaps the Lord will work for us" is straightway grounded on the truth: there is no restraint to the Lord, that is, he is at liberty to save by many or by few; that is, the Lord's help is not dependent on the extent or the degree of the means by which it is realized; his helping power is not conditioned, but absolute. The same thought in Ps. cxlvii. 10, 11; 2 Chron. xiv. 11; 1 Mac. iii. 18, 19.—Ver. 7. The answer of the

* [This might be true of the district of Gibeah, but not of the town itself, which occupied the summit of a high rounded hill; nor does it seem necessary to put Migron near Michmash; the statement in ver. 16 rather supposes a greater distance.—Ta.]
† [See "Textual and Grammatical" on this verse.—Ta.]

* מַצֵּב, "poured out," from פָּצַח, then "firm," "hard." [Better from פָּצַח.—Ta.]

armor-bearer contains: 1) encouragement to carry out his design, and 2) assurance that he will act with him and stand by him according to his will. Render: "do all whereto thy heart inclineth."* — Ver. 8. Jonathan explains that, in carrying out his purpose, he proposes that they first show themselves to the Philistines. — In verses 9, 10, we are told how he would therein find a divine sign whether the Lord would grant unto them success in their design. He supposes two cases. If the Philistines at his hail should say: "keep still! till we come to you," they will not go up to them; for that would be a sign of courage and preparedness. But if they should say: "come up to us," they will go up; for that would be a sign of carelessness and slackness. This he would regard as a divine sign that God had given the Philistines into his hands. The divine sign, which Jonathan proposed to find, was a fact which guaranteed the success of the enterprise on its natural-human side also. — Ver. 11. When Jonathan and his esquire showed themselves, the latter of the two cases occurred. The outposts of the Philistines cry scornfully: Hebrews are coming forth out of their holes, and call out to them: Come up to us, and we will tell you something. An expression taken directly from the life of the people, containing an apparently bold challenge, yet (as we may see) not meant in earnest, and concealing cowardice or careless security and neglect. Cleric.: "They hoped to have sport with them, not supposing that they could there climb the rock." Jonathan is now sure that God has given them into his hands.† — Ver. 13. Lively description of the execution by Jonathan and his armor-bearer of their bold undertaking and the brilliant result. On his hands and feet Jonathan climbed up the rock, and the armor-bearer after him. The text-reading: "and they fell before Jonathan and his armor-bearer" etc., gives a very good sense, as Then. expressly admits. We need not, then, after the Sept. read: "and they turned before Jonathan and he smote them," where Sept. incorrectly read וַיִּפְּנוּ for וַיִּפְּלוּ. How (as Ewald asserts) the connection favors the reading of the Sept. is not to be seen. — The armor-bearer slew completely after him. — The Sept. has ἐνεδίδου, whence, however, we are not to read מוֹסִיף ["more fully"] instead of the text "slaying;" the latter is to be retained from the connection, the narrative, from the rapidity of the affair, pressing on to describe how Jonathan, pushing on, strikes down with overwhelming might every one whom he meets, without stopping to kill completely, while the armor-bearer, following him, kills those that were struck down, that they might not rise again. The Heb. word (מִמּוֹתָם) means "killing completely," as in xvii. 51; 2 Sam. i. 9 sq. — A like bold deed in scaling a castle in the Numidian war is told in Sall. Bell. Jugurth., c. 89, 90. — [This force of "complete killing" can hardly be assigned to this Heb. form (Polel, here causative of Qal, of מָוַת). It means simply "kill," and so in the passages cited by the author, and the statement here seems to be that not only Jonathan, but also his armor-bearer (like the feudal esquire) took part in the combat. The phrase "fell before him" fairly means "fell dead;" the words do not warrant the history gotten out of them by Dr. Erdmann. But the Heb. text, though somewhat hard, may be maintained without this. See "Text. and Gramm." — TR.] — Ver. 14. The result of this first slaughter which Jonathan and his armor-bearer made: about thirty men were thus killed. In the last words of the verse the overthrow is set forth in terms taken from ploughing: in about a half-furrow of a yoke of land. — This indicates the position of the fallen, after Jonathan, pressing impetuously on, had struck them down one after another, and his armor-bearer after him had killed those that were not dead. This occurred in the space of about half a furrow in a piece of land which one could plough with a yoke of oxen in a day.* In the length of about a half-yoke lay the twenty slain Philistines stretched out in a row. Cleric.: "Such apparently was the extent of the point of rock which the Philistines had occupied." Of the translation of the Sept.: "about twenty men with darts and slings and stones of the field," Clericus rightly says: "They translated conjecturally what they did not understand." To Ewald's rendering "as if a yoke of land were in ploughing" (so Bunsen, who regards this as an extract from a poet) there are, in the first place, two objections: 1) that the word (מִנְעֵרָה) means "furrow," and not "ploughing," and 2) that "yoke of land" means not the animals, but the land itself. Further objection to this rendering, especially in reference to the completed fact here related [Ewald represents it as an advancing act, while the first half of the verse speaks of it as

* The לָךְ נִסְחָה is difficult, the rendering "turn thee," i. e., "go," not being allowable. It is, therefore, better to read with Ewald לִבְכֶּךָ instead of לְבִיכֶךָ, and render: "do all to which thy heart inclineth." The words: "see, I am with thee according to thy heart," i. e., as thy heart desires, present no difficulty, so that it is unnecessary, with Then. after Sept., to insert לִבְכֶּךָ after לְבִיכֶךָ, and read: lo, I am with thee, as thy mind (is also) my mind. The Heb. text is more appropriate to the occasion from its curtness and pregnancy.

† At the beginning of ver. 12 we find the fem. form for "garrison" [מִצְדָּה] instead of the usual masc. (מִצָּד). On this Röttcher remarks: "The grammatical ground is that in ver. 12 it is said: the people (from several points) of the whole garrison cried out." The whole is properly expressed by the feminine form. See on Gen. xxxviii. 18.

* מִנְעֵרָה is the furrow which the plough makes, as in Ps. cxxix. 3. It is in stat. abs. instead of stat. const., because three nouns here stand together. Ew. § 291 a: "Sometimes the second noun of such a series seems to remain in stat. abs., so that we can only tell from the sense of the whole, the relation of the third to the two preceding. Isa. lxiii. 11; Eccl. xii. 13.—צֶמֶד properly "something bound," then "a pair or yoke of oxen," then "the ground ploughed by a yoke of oxen in a definite time," — jugum, jugerum.

finished.—Tr.], see in Thenius.—[The Sept. text may easily be gotten from the Heb., omitting the κ. ε. περ. as repetition (see Then. and Wellhausen), and gives a better sense. Bib. Com.: "There is nothing remarkable in twenty men being killed in half an acre of land; and moreover the Heb. sentence is extremely obscure, without any apparent reason for its being so. . . . A measure of time would not be out of place, if the words could mean 'in about half the time that a yoke of oxen draw a furrow in the field.'" Others, less well, understand here a space enclosed by a furrow. Philippeon remarks that the ancients were accustomed to measure land by the ploughing of oxen; but the difficulty here is not in the way of stating the land-measure, but in understanding why it is stated. Kitto (Daily Bib. Ill.) gives a good narrative of the exploit of Jonathan. The text must be regarded as unsettled.—Tr.]—Ver. 15. The consequence of this bold deed: panic fear among the Philistines. The success of Jonathan's deed and this consequence are to be explained by supposing that the outposts of the Philistines did not think it possible that the two men could get up, and, when they did, feared that a body of Israelites were behind them, since they could not see down the steep declivity. The camp of the field [Heb.: in the camp (or host) in the field—Tr.] is the whole camp of the Philistines; the terror, which had seized all the people of the outposts, now took possession of the principal camp also. The spoilers also, the body of plunderers, trembled. There are many examples in military history of the contagious power of such fright, extending from a few widely out. And the earth quaked is not to be understood of an earthquake, but of the trembling of the ground under the fearful uproar of the Philistines.—And became a terror of God. The phrase "and became" refers to the before-described disaster of the Philistines, all this grew into a "terror of God," that is, the Philistines recognized herein a mighty help of the God of Israel, by which they had been thrown into this terror. [The natural rendering is "the earth quaked and became a terror of God," that is, the trembling earth became the sign of the wrathful intervention of God (comp. Vulg.); a miraculous earthquake seems to be here described. Others regard the divine name as a superlative addition, and render "a great (a panic) terror" (Gesen., al.) like "cedars of God" Ps. lxxx. 11, but this is not probable in this prose narrative.—Tr.]

5. Vers. 16-23. General flight and overthrow of the Philistines in consequence of Jonathan's exploit.—Ver. 16. Gibeah of Benjamin is not the present Jeba (Then.), which rather answers to Geba. Though the former was farther from the Philistine camp, we need not be surprised that Saul's watchmen could see thither, since from their elevated position they could with sharp eyes see what was going on at that distance (nearly five Eng. miles), or, if not, could go nearer.—And behold, the multitude or the tumult—though מִלְחָמָה may here mean "multitude" (Gesen. s. v.), it is better to render "tumult," since the narrator has in his eye the crowd thrown into confusion by Jonathan's attack. This consideration sets aside one of Thenius' reasons for here also following the free translation of the Sept.;—dispersed hither and thither. It is better to supply "hither" (הֵלֶם before הֵלֶם), which might easily have fallen out from homoeophony; or (with the Rabb. and Ges.) read the Inf. Abs. and render "were more and more broken up." [For another view see "Text. and Grammat."—Tr.] Ver. 17. Saul could explain the affair only as an Israelitish attack. The numbering ordered by him showed that Jonathan and his armor-bearer were missing.—Ver. 18. Bring hither the ark of God. A change of text (Keil) after the Sept. so as to read: "Bring the ephod, for he wore the ephod at that time before Israel," on the ground that the ark had been placed in Kirjath-jearim, and was not used in asking questions of God, is suspicious, because the ark, which was thought to be connected with God's presence, was often taken along to war. Comp. iv. 4, 5; 2 Sam. xi. 11; xv. 24, 25. Why could they not, in accordance with this established custom, have taken it from its usual place in decisive battles, and afterwards carried it back? But it is not said that Saul wished to inquire of God at the ark. He wished first to advance with it against the enemy. But, when he saw that the tumult increased in their camp, and that they were already as good as beaten, he desisted.* [If Saul had not wished to inquire of God by the ark, he would not have said "bring hither," (but "carry forward"), nor "withdraw thy hand." It seems better, therefore, to read ephod, whether we adopt the whole reading of the Sept. or not.—Tr.]—Ver. 19. And the tumult . . . and it increased more and more is a broken construction, the subject being first put absolutely, and the predicate-sentence put as relative-sentence. Withdraw thy hand; that is, from bringing the ark = desist. Instead (ver. 20) of "were assembled, called together" (Niph.), read with Sept. (Alex.), Vulg., Syr., Arab.; "shouted" (Qal), for there was no need of an assembly, as they were already there (Then.), and besides, what is the meaning of "and Saul was called together and all the people," since Saul was the assembler? Translate: And Saul and all the people shouted (raised the war-cry) and advanced to the battle. From this war-cry of the advancing host under Saul that which follows is easily explained. In consequence of the terror thereby produced, the confusion in the Philistine army was very great. That every man's sword was against his fellow in such confusion (comp. Judg. vii. 22; 2 Chron. xx. 22, 23) is explained by what is related in vers. 21, 22. There were Hebrews in the host of the Philistines. By this name, the usual one among foreign nations, the Philistines called the Israelites in their midst. The Art. (the Hebrews) refers to the exacter definition in the relative sentence. And the Hebrews were with the Philistines, as formerly, who had gone up with them to the camp. [It is better to insert who (אֲשֶׁר) after "Hebrews," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. Bunsen supposes that these were prisoners, who had hitherto been compelled to fight against their countrymen. Or, they may have been levies from the part of the land which the Philistines held. To render "divided out roundabout among the Philistines" gives no good sense; the idea of "roundabout" is inappropriate to the whole situation. It is therefore better to read,* with Sept., Vulg., Chald., Syr., Thenius, Buns., "turned." The otherwise insuperable difficulty in the Infin. thus vanishes, and we render: "these also turned to be with Israel;" that is, went over to Israel. This, of course, they could not do without turning their arms against their oppressors. In addition to these (ver. 22) came all the Israelites who had been in hiding on the mountains of Ephraim; when they heard of the flight of the Philistines, they too joined in the pursuit.—Ver. 23 1) affirms that this fortunate achievement was due to the help of the Lord, and 2) states the direction which the battle took. The battle passed over to Bethaven. Between this statement that the fight moved northeast† from Michmash to Bethaven, and that in ver. 31, that the Philistines were smitten that day from Michmash to Ajalon [west], an insoluble contradiction‡ has been discovered, and it has been proposed to read Bethhoron (which lay west of Michmash) instead of Bethaven. But such a contradiction cannot be admitted, because the movements in such a battle are so fluctuating. Here in ver. 23 we have an account of the battle which continued, and passed, not far from Michmash indeed, over to Bethaven in a northeasterly direction; in ver. 31 is an account of the completed battle, and the final result is given, which is naturally this, that the Philistines, drawn by the Israelites from their native land towards Bethaven, fled, the greater part of them at least, westward, and were beaten as far as Ajalon. Bunsen: "In general the flight of the Philistines was naturally westward (ver. 31), yet no exception can on that account be taken to our passage."

* [For הֵלֶם which gives no sense, read הֵלֶם.]

6. Vers. 24-31. Saul's rash order. Between ver. 23 and ver. 24 the Sept. has: "And the whole people was with Saul about ten thousand men, and the battle spread in the whole city in the mountains of Ephraim. And Saul committed a great error" (that day and adjured). This is an explanatory addition to the original text with whose curtness it does not harmonize. It is not in itself improbable that the original six hundred men should grow to this large body in the course of the battle, and that the fight should extend over the mountains of Ephraim is to be expected from the dispersed condition of the Philistines, and is even indicated in the end of ver. 23. The phrase "in the whole city" has arisen from a misreading of the following word "wood" (בֵּיתֵר).—The Masoretic text is short, sharp, and to the point, corresponding to Saul's position and conduct as here described.—And the men of Israel were distressed that day. In chap. xiii. 6 the same word (שָׁדַד) is used to express the oppressed condition of the Israelites. Here it is Saul that presses and drives the people in the pursuit of the Philistines. The word means "harassed, wearied out," and Thenius' objection that one does not see by whom or by what the Israelites were pressed, explains itself.—The wearied condition of the people made Saul fear that the pursuit of the Philistines would thereby be interrupted, and the honor of the day for him diminished. And Saul adjured the people.—He made them swear an oath—bound them by an oath. Cursed be the man that eateth food until evening and I be avenged on my enemies.—Saul's passionate zeal, spurred on by selfishness, self-will and personal desire for revenge causes him to lose sight of the command of nature, to act cruelly towards his brave warriors, and over and beyond to injure his cause. "Blind zeal only hurts." Berleb. Bible: "In this prohibition there was a secret pride and misuse of power, for he desired to force, as it were, a complete victory, and then appropriate the glory of it to himself." The people kept the oath even under the strongest temptation to break it.—Ver. 25. And the whole land came into the wood.—The "land" is put for the people, as appears from ver. 26. Comp. Jer. xxii. 29. The honey which they found in the forest on the ground flowing (הִלָּךְ הַנֶּחֱלֵי) was not that honey-like substance which is found on the leaves of certain bushes and taken off them, but real honey from bees who built on trunks of trees or in clefts of rocks, which, as Schultz (Leistungen, V. 133) has seen in the wilderness of Judea, often flows in streams on the ground from the over-full and pressed honey structure (comp. Deut. xxxii. 13; Judg. xiv. 8; Ps. lxxxi. 17).—Ver. 26. On account of the oath no one partook of the refreshing food which thus presented itself.—Ver. 27. Jonathan, however, had not heard the oath of his father. He dips his staff into the honey and eats, in accordance with the haste of the pursuit—that is, into the honey-comb (Sept.: σπίον; Vulg.: favum, the comb, not the liquid honey), which presented itself; into the comb, not the liquid honey, because only in this way could he get enough with the tip of his staff. Instead of "saw" (Kethib) read "were enlightened" (Qeri); see a similar transposition in Heb. in 2 Sam. xxiv. 20, comp. v. 16. The word describes the bodily and mental refreshment, the reviving of soul, which shows itself straightway in the eyes.—Ver. 28. The last words: "And the people are faint" are spoken by the man who tells Jonathan of the oath of his father, and at the same time stand in contrast with the refreshment which Jonathan had indulged himself in.—Ver. 29 sq. Jonathan's disapproval of his father's conduct by pointing to the injury he has thus done the land and people: "My father has troubled (עָכַר, perturbare), brought disaster on the land" (Genesis xxxiv. 30; Josh. vi. 18; Judg. iv. 35). The disaster is this: that the people, wearied with the battle, had lost all strength by the lack of nourishing food (אָכַל אֶכֶל). The defeat of the Philistines was thus less complete than it would otherwise have been (ver. 29).* Maurer renders as independent sentence: "for now the slaughter of the Philistines is not very great."—Ver. 31. See on ver. 23. Ajalon, the present village Yâlo, in the south-east end of a valley extending westward from Bethhoron. Rob. Later Bib. Res. 188 [Am. ed. III. 145—and II. 253, 254; 14 miles out of Jerusalem, Smith's B. D.—Tr.] The mention of the great weariness and exhaustion of the people concludes the account of Saul's rash conduct, and leads to the statement of its consequences.

* טָרַף כִּכְבִּי נָם לְהִיטֹל (Tx.)

† [According to xiii. 6, Bethaven was northwest from Michmash, and there is therefore no contradiction here.—Tx.]

* Read not הִוָּאֵל as if from הִוָּאֵל, "acted foolishly," but הִוָּאֵל Impf. Apoc. for הִוָּאֵל from הִוָּאֵל, Ges. Gr. § 76, 2 a.

7. Vers. 32-46. The consequences of Saul's overhaste, and the end of the battle.—Ver. 32.† And the people flew upon the prey—that is, as soon as it was evening, comp. ver. 24. The same expression in xv. 19. The people slew the animals to the earth, down to the ground, and then ate "upon (or, over) the blood," blood being on the bodies because they were on the ground, and so "with the blood." On the preposition (וְעַל) see Ex. xii. 8 [Eng. A. V.: "with"], where also it introduces the basis or accompaniments of the food. The people transgressed the command in Lev. xix. 26: "Ye shall not eat on blood" [Eng. A. V.: "with"], that is, no flesh under which or on which there is blood. This is an extension of the prohibition of eating blood in Lev. iii. 17; xvii. 10, 11, which is based on the fact that the blood is conceived of as the seat and bearer of the life.—Ver. 33. The people's eating is characterized as a sinning against the Lord.‡ Saul calls this conduct faithlessness, because the law of the covenant was transgressed. For now the Sept. has (unnecessarily) hither. [The D^hוְעַל, "to-day," "this day," is here not well rendered by "now," which would be וְהַיּוֹם; the Sept. reading is better.—Tr.]—Ver. 34. Saul directs his informants to disperse themselves among the people, and announce that every one should bring his beast to him, and slay here on the great stone, that there might be no sinful eating.§ Saul's command, which speaks for his careful observance of the Law, was carried out by the people. As every where before, so here the people display unconditional obedience to Saul. Only by slaughtering on the stone was it possible to separate the blood from the flesh. When the slaughtering occurred, the night had already set in. The Sept. reading: "what was in his hand" instead of "his ox in his hand" [Eng. A. V.: "with him"] is unnecessary.

* כִּי, properly "thereto comes that," then "let alone," "not to mention," and after an affirmation "all the more," "how much more," 2 Sam. iv. 11; Gen. §155.2 a. וְעַל כֵּן often serves to introduce more strongly the apodosis of a conditional sentence: "yea, then." Ew. § 358, 2 a; Gen. xxxi. 42; xliii. 10; Num. xxii. 29; 2 Sam. ii. 27. The לָא indicates that the apodosis is a question.

† For the meaningless וְעַל read וְעַל, Imperf. Qal. of עָלָה with Dag. forte implicit. Instead of וְעַל, Ges. § 73, R. g. So after וְעַל insert Art. with Qeri.

‡ חַטָּאִים with retracted vowel. Ew. § 188

§ אֶל-הַדָּם "to the blood." The change of Prep. does not alter the meaning; לָא stands for עַל as in Judg. vi. 39 (see Maur. in loc.), 2 Sam. i. 24; x. 7—both sometimes occurring in the same sentence, as xxv. 25; xxvi. 15 sqq.; 2 Sam. ii. 9; xx. 23.

—Ver. 35. Saul built the altar to the Lord as thanksgiving for this victory over the Philistines. The same he began to build—that is, he built this as the first, comp. Gesen. § 142, A. 1. [Bib. Comm.: "began to build, but did not finish," as 1 Chr. xxvii. 24. So Abarbanel; but, according to the Midrash, Saul began among the kings the building of altars (Philippeon). Wordsworth: It seems to be implied that this was the first time he had made acknowledgment to God for his successes.—Tr.] Probably he here used the great stone which he had caused to be brought. He thus established a place for the worship of God in commemoration of this victory.—Ver. 36. He is, however, not satisfied with the defeat of the Philistines, but proposes to spoil them that night till the morning. According to Jonathan's statement, indeed, the defeat was not total. Saul rushes on in his wild desire of revenge, perhaps incited by the consciousness of having committed a gross folly, and thereby hindered the victory—and this he will now make good. The people are again ready immediately to carry out his desire. The priest, however, desires first to have the decision of the Lord. "Hither," that is, to the altar which had been built. [Patrick: because it was dangerous to undertake any thing without God's advice. Bib. Comm.: because the priest doubted whether Saul's ardor was a righteous one, and bravely stood in its way.—Tr.]—Ver. 37. The inquiry of the Lord was conducted by the high-priest Ahiah through the Urim and Thummim.‡ The Lord shall say whether the Philistines are to be pursued, and whether He has delivered them into Israel's hands. There are therefore two questions: whether further pursuit? whether happy result? The failure of a divine answer is for Saul a sign that there is a fault somewhere, on account of which the Lord is silent and does not promise His help.—Ver. 38. Chief (רָאשֵׁי) "corner," "point", the principal men, the heads of the people (Judg. xx. 2), probably the elders (Num. xi. 30). The whole people are called by their representatives, to find out "wherein (or whereby) this sin hath been this day." There is no need to read (with Then. after Vulg.: per quem—and Sept.: ἐν τίνι) "on whom" (מִי) this sin rests," instead of "wherein" (מִי). Rather the thing than the person was here first to be regarded, since the question was of an offence unatoned for,—which, however, indeed, could not be fixed without at the same time discovering the person.—Ver. 39. After the first כִּי [here—"because," "for"], which gives the ground, follows a second and a third, the former introducing the declaration, the latter resuming it after the parenthesis. The silence of the people is (as appears from ver. 45) sign of their conviction that Jonathan had done nothing wrong. [Perhaps, also, sign of their regard for Jonathan. It does not seem that Saul was here guilty of profanity (Bib. Comm.), since he may have used the divine name reverently (the expression was very common among the Israelites), but he is guilty (Bib. Comm.) of further rashness.—Tr.]—Ver. 40. Saul proceeds to decide what was the offence which prevented the divine answer. The means which Saul here employs reminds us of how Samuel (x. 20, 21) by the lot as means of divine decision presented Saul to the people as the king chosen by the Lord. While in the great double question in ver. 37 Saul had applied to the Lord by Urim and Thummim, and by His silence received also an answer, and that a decisive one, he now, in order to discover the cause of this divine decision, employs the lot, as is clear from the words "taken" [ver. 41] and "cast" [ver. 42] (comp. x. 20 sq.), which are never used in connection with Urim and Thummim. The people, who had not answered him when he swore a second rash oath in which he recognized the possibility of Jonathan's guilt and death, now expressly approved his arrangements, but silently decided for Jonathan's innocence and exemption from punishment. Saul (ver. 41) before the casting turns to God with the cry "give (or establish) right." עָרַף, "unpunishable," then "exemption from punishment," "innocence" "right," "truth." So Judg. ix. 16, 19; Josh. xiv. 14. The result of the trial is that Jonathan is taken, ver. 42.—The Vulgate agrees with the Heb. in ver. 41 only in the beginning and end: "and Saul said to the Lord God of Israel—and Jonathan and Saul were taken, but the people went out." The intermediate words agree in part with the Sept., which in vers. 41, 42, has a long paraphrase. In this Then. and Ew. see a part of the original text, reading עָרַף [Thummim] for עָרַף, and finding here the complete formula which was employed in the use of Urim and Thummim. Against which Keil justly remarks, that there is no sign here of the use of Urim and Thummim, since the words in ver. 41 are provably never used of it, but always of the lot, and it is clear from passages like x. 22 and 2 Sam. v. 23 that Urim and Thummim did not consist merely in answering Yes and No, but God by it gave answers, which could by no means be gotten by the lot. The Sept. reading is, therefore, nothing but a subjective and erroneous opinion of the translators.

* [That is, by the Ephod, to which was attached the breastplate with U. and T.—Tr.]

Ver. 43 sq. Jonathan thinks death unavoidable: Lo, I must die.—Saul confirms this with an oath: "God do so and more also," comp. iii. 17. Both hold the erroneous opinion that a sinful promise or oath must be kept. That the lot fell on Jonathan meant only, as a divine disposition, that the person was discovered on whom, according to Saul's opinion, rested the fault, by reason of which God's answer to his question was silence. Against both rises the people's voice as the voice of God. The question [ver. 45] "Shall Jonathan die?" and the answer: "Far be it," express the sorrowful astonishment and the energetic protest of the people who were inspired by Jonathan's heroic deed and its brilliant result. But the decisive fact for the people was the firm conviction that God was with him and carried out through him this deed of deliverance. Over against Saul's oath the people set their own: "As the Lord liveth, there shall not a hair of his head fall to the ground." To the second "wrought" (ver. 45) supply the object of the first: "this great salvation." "And the people rescued him," not, as Ewald says, by putting another to die in his stead, but solely by their energetic protest, in the face of which Saul is obliged to let his oath go unfulfilled. For a similar intervention of the people see Liv. 8, 35.—[Patrick: They did not rescue him by force and violence, but by their petition to Saul and the reason they gave for it. Josephus saith that "by their prayers and vows to God they delivered him." They were too forward indeed to swear directly against Saul's oath; but of the two, his being the most rash, God was pleased to annul it, and absolve him from it.—Wordworth: Observe the humiliation to which Saul is reduced by his disobedience.—Kitto: The enlightened consciences and generous enthusiasm of the people.—Tr.]—Ver. 46. The closing statement. Saul desisted from further pursuit of the Philistines, with whose overthrow as far as it could be effected under the harmful consequences of his blind zeal, he had to be contented. The Philistines went back to their own land. In spite of this serious defeat their strength was not broken (comp. ver. 52). The fact that Saul desisted from pursuit shows that he understood the Lord's silence as a denial, and was obliged to recognize as the cause of it not Jonathan's conduct, but his own arbitrary and rash procedure.

II. Summary account of Saul's wars and family-relations. Vers. 47–52.

Vers. 47, 48. And Saul had taken the kingdom, then he fought, or: "When Saul had taken the kingdom, he fought." The words do not stand in pragmatism connection with the preceding narrative of the battle against the Philistines, as if the intention was to state that thus (by this victory) Saul gained royal authority (Then., Keil). His accession to the throne is mentioned merely as starting-point for the historical-statistical statement of the various wars which he carried on from the beginning of his government. The already-related war against the Ammonites is here again mentioned, and of the war against the Philistines it is said, in accordance with the design of this interposed section, at the end (ver. 52), that it extended throughout his whole reign. His whole government was a warlike one. Wars are here mentioned, of which nothing is elsewhere said. What is said of his wars before and after this is determined by the theocratic point of view, and is designed to show how Saul, in fulfilling his royal calling (essentially a warlike one), came into principal* conflict with the theocratic task and significance of the kingdom, and therefore incurred of necessity the judgment of God. The wars, which he had to carry on with his enemies roundabout, are the following: against the Moabites and Ammonites in the East, against the Edomites in the South, against the kings of Zobah in the Northeast (Zobah, a district of Syria, lay probably north-east of Damascus, between the Euphrates and the Orontes, see 2 Sam. viii. 3 ["perhaps included the eastern flank of the mountain-chain which shuts in Cœle-Syria on that side, the high land about Aleppo, and the more northern portion of the Syrian desert" (Geo. Rawlinson in Smith B. D.).—Tr.]), and against the Philistines in the West. Thus the "roundabout" is pictured to us. The word

* [Principal (Germ. prinzipiell) is "founded on, or connected with principles," in contrast with what is accidental, inadvertent, not fundamental.—Tr.]

נָעַר [Eng. A. V. "vexed"*) indicates the point of view from which these wars are to be regarded as victories: he declared guilty (Keil: by deeds), the Hiph. [causative] of the verb being often used of judges (Ex. xxii. 8; Deut. xxv. 1; Job xxxii. 3), he inflicted punishment, or executed judgment against these nations, because they warred against God's people and thus opposed the Lord's designs with respect to Israel. They were national wars, which Saul carried on for the honor of the Lord and of His people.—Saul's development of power against the Amalekites is made especially prominent; he "gathered strength"

[נָעַר חֵזֶק], Eng. A. V. incorrectly: "gathered a host". This war against the robbing, plundering hereditary enemy, the Amalekites, is in the next chapter described "from the theocratical point of view" (Then.).

Vers. 49–51. Saul's household and family. Three sons are mentioned: Jonathan, Ishwi and Malchishua. Instead of Ishwi in xxxi. 2; 1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 39, is Abinadab. In the last two passages a fourth is named, Eshbaal,† who is certainly the same with Ishbosheth, 2 Sam. ii. 8. The daughters: Merab and Michal.—Saul's wife: Ahinoam, a daughter of Ahimaaz.—[Bib. Comm.: "It is not improbable that Ahimaaz may have been of the priestly family (Ahimaaz was son of Zadok, 2 Sam. xv. 36), and perhaps it may have been owing to such a connection that Ahijah was brought into prominence by Saul. If there is any truth in the above supposition, it would be an indication that Saul was not married till after his election to the throne." But to this last there are serious objections, especially the age of Jonathan, and the whole is a mere conjecture.—Tr.]—Saul's captain of the host, general-in-chief, Abner, abbreviated (ver. 51) Abner, his cousin; in the next verse this relationship is stated more fully: Kish, Saul's father, and Ner, Abner's father, were sons of Abiel.‡—Ver. 52 connects itself as to subject-matter with ver. 46, in order, after the general view of Saul's wars, to show that he had to carry on a hard struggle with one of these peoples, the Philistines, all his life, and so give the ground for the necessity that Saul was under, of forming and maintaining a central body of markedly valiant men about him. This finishes the historical-statistical sketch of Saul as a warrior-prince, to which belongs also from this point of view the mention of his three sons, who fell in battle with him (xxx. 2), and of Abner, his general. The national-historical significance of Saul as a king whose mission was essentially that of a warrior is thereby definitely characterized. At the same time the description of Saul as theocratic king is here ended. In what follows is shown how the Lord transferred the theocratic mission from him to another man. Ewald: According to the prophetic perception of the Work, Saul ceases with chap. xiv. to be the true king, and therefore the history of his reign is here concluded with the necessary general remarks about him."—We cannot (with Then.) hold that the remark (ver. 52) "when Saul saw any strong or valiant man, he took him," is intended to introduce the narrative of David's coming to Saul after the victory over Goliath (xviii. 2), on the ground that here it drags too much after what precedes. It would, if we accepted Thenius' view, stand too abruptly and too far from this narrative of David. It rather concludes the foregoing account, and connects itself with the account of the first formation of a standing army by a levy from the people (xiii. 2).

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The history of Saul up to this time shows with what splendid gifts he was endowed for the fulfilment of his theocratic royal calling, to free from their enemies, especially the Philistines (ix. 16), the covenant-people, who had been united and raised into a new religious-moral life by Samuel. The following narrative of his victorious wars against the enemies of God's people proves that he fulfilled his war-mission. "A knightly king stood at the head of the people, who formed about him a school of heroes and drew to him a vigorous army, and a knightly spirit pervaded the whole people. But Saul led the way in war-like spirit no less than in all virtues of self-denial and self-discipline,—he was a warrior-hero, who maintained on the throne the moderation of his former life." (Schlier, 25 [König Saul, 9]).

2. Yet there shows itself in the development of Saul's inner life (xiii., xiv) a principle, which is directly in conflict with the theocratic principle of the Israelitish kingdom: that of human self-will, which does not subject itself in humility and unconditional believing obedience to the divine will, and fails to establish the absolute supremacy of the latter among the people of God. At the beginning of the fulfilment of his warrior-calling against the Philistines Saul was put to the proof, whether in his royal office he would master his own will and yield unconditional obedience to the word and will of God as true king of His people. This test Saul did not stand, when he was required to follow the divine directions as given him by Samuel's mouth, which should have been for him God's mouth. As bearer of the theocratic-royal office bestowed on him, he set himself in conflict with the theocratic-prophetic watch-office, which Samuel held that he might be the organ of the royal will and command of the covenant-God of Israel. He thus denied the principle of the unconditional sovereignty of God, which was to be set forth and unfolded in his kingdom. It was therefore certain that God's holiness and justice could not permit his kingdom to be permanent (xiii. 13, 14).

3. The first test of faith, which Saul had to submit to, was a theocratic necessity; for Saul must first prove to the Lord by deeds that he wished to be unconditionally subject to the Lord's will, to yield obedience (putting down all self-will) to His word which was to be revealed to him by prophets, and to trust alone to His help. Such tests as Saul had to stand, are, in the life of princes and peoples, as of individuals, in the church as in every member of God's people, of divine significance; failure to stand them leads away from the Lord, brings to naught the Lord's purposes, results in misfortune and destruction. *The individual elements of Saul's probation, the typical significance of which elements for all times and circumstances of the kingdom of God is obvious, are found partly in his outward position, partly in his inner life. The external position of Saul, as to time and place, was one of extreme distress. In consequence of Jonathan's successful coup de main, the Philistines were advancing with a powerful army. The people of Israel, whom he had summoned after Jonathan's heroic exploit (xiii. 3) to battle against the Philistines, became disheartened and despondent, and dispersed themselves; even the permanent band, which he had gathered around him, lost courage and began to disband. The seventh day had come, and Samuel, who had bidden him wait till he came to Gilgal to sacrifice for the people and announce God's will, had not yet made his appearance. This distressing and dangerous position (as he himself xiii. 11, 12 intimates) gave occasion in his heart to the temptation to act contrary to God's will and command. In the first place fear of the threatening dangers seized on his heart; to fear joined itself impatience, which prevented him from waiting out the time appointed by Samuel; alongside of the impatience was doubt of the trustworthiness of the divine promise given him through Samuel; this produced unequilibrium in his mind, which drove him to take self-willed measures to help himself, and dissipated more and more his trust in God; then came sophistical calculation by his carnally obscured understanding; his heart-frame towards God of immovable trust and unconditional obedience was given up. It was the root of unbelief from which all this sprang.—The consequences of this unsteady trial of faith show themselves straightway in two directions: 1) for Saul's inner life: over against Samuel, or, what is the same thing, over against the holy and just God (who had addressed Himself to his conscience through Samuel's question "what hast thou done?") he does not follow the exhortation of his conscience, sorrowfully and penitently to confess his guilt, but, on the one hand, he seeks to excuse and justify himself by pointing to the certainly threatening dangers, as if he had done nothing but his duty, carrying his defence to the extent of an untrue reproach of Samuel ("thou camest not at the set time"), and, on the other hand, he declares his conduct to be thoroughly pious and God-fearing, affirming that he desired simply before the battle began to seek in sacrifice the Lord's face, while in fact this sacrifice against Samuel's express command had its deepest root in the unbelief of his heart, wherein he turned from God to his own flesh and blood, and showed himself openly disobedient to the will of God. The self-justification of the impenitent heart leads to uncleanness and untruthfulness, since lies and truth are mixed together; self-justification before the Lord is inseparable from self-deceit and hypocrisy. Here begins the unsteadiness and passionate character of Saul's inner life, as we see it afterwards (chap. xiv.) time and again, in all the external success of his arms, in all the prosperity of his warlike enterprises. 2) In respect to his theocratic royal calling followed the divine judgment: "Thy kingdom shall not* stand, for thou hast not kept the command of the Lord." The house of Saul, which otherwise would have held the theocratic kingdom permanently, is here declared to have lost it, because Saul had not fulfilled the fundamental condition of unconditional obedience of faith. The judicial sentence is more fully expressed after the second trial (chap. xv.). There the divine judgment proceeds further to reject his person in consequence of continued disobedience; here we have first the rejection of his house, so far as, beginning from him, it might have become the permanent possessor of the theocratic royalty. The divine judgment, which is completed by this word of Samuel, was a righteous one, for "in this way Saul strove, so far as in him lay, to change the Israelitish theocracy (in which God would be King of Israel and by His servants, the prophets, rule in affairs of state and war) into such a kingdom as the heathen had, whose kings did everything according to their own pleasure. Saul strove after unrestrained freedom and authority, but thus became a slave to desire, driven by an evil spirit, and ripe for speedy destruction" (Roos, Einkl. in d. bibl. Gesch. [Intro. to Bib. Hist.], 2, 271).

* [So Philipsson (schreckte er), taking the rad. meaning of the verb to be "to be unquiet." Ges. renders: "to pronounce guilty, gain one's cause, be victorious."—Tr.]

† [On the relation of Eshbaal, Ishbosheth and Ishwi, and the text in ver. 51, see "Text. and Gram." in loco.—Tr.]

‡ [So ver. 51 must be rendered instead of as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]

4. Jonathan's second bold deed of arms (xiv. 1–15) is, in contrast with Saul's failure to stand the trial of faith, an example of valiant heroic faith, which consists in unconditional but humble reliance on the almighty help of the Lord ("perhaps the Lord will, etc.," ver. 6), does not, in this confident reliance, fearfully weigh and reckon the much or little of human means of accomplishment ("there is no restraint to the Lord, etc.," ver. 6), but yet wisely and prudently observes the signs given by the Lord, governs its conduct by them, and then in God's power performs great things ("there came a fright of God," ver. 15).

5. Saul's conduct after his fall in the first probation of faith is an illustration of the fact that, when man's heart has lost its right attitude towards the Lord, his whole life, both in its religious and its moral aspect, loses truth and steadfastness. In accordance with the pretext (xiii. 12) that he must seek the Lord's face before the battle, Saul afterwards heaps up proofs of piety and godliness: he calls for the ark of God [or, the ephod—Tr.] (ver. 18), is zealous against the transgression of the prohibition of eating blood (ver. 33 sq.), builds an altar to the Lord (ver. 35), asks counsel of God as to further military undertakings (ver. 37), swears by the Lord, the Deliverer of Israel, to punish the concealed sin of the people (ver. 39), and calls on him to decide where the wrong is (ver. 41). When the heart has lost its proper attitude towards God of humble obedient faith, and will not return to God in honest penitence, there springs up the delusion that one may satisfy God and one's own conscience by pious deeds. The spur of an evil conscience drives us to the hypocrisy of a forced piety and of legal zeal for the honor of the Lord, while we put our own honor in the place of His. It is characteristic that, after that scene with Samuel, whose words did not bend and break his heart into honest repentance, Saul loses all moral steadfastness. By God's help the victory over the Philistines is gained (ver. 23), the enemy's whole army is routed and fleeing. Saul, instead of thanking the Lord and granting his tired-out people some refreshment, is inflamed with fleshly zeal, which shows itself (ver. 24) in his purpose straightway to annihilate the enemy, and his consequent adjuration of his army not to eat anything till evening. In the thoughtlessness and precipitancy of his warlike ardor, he speaks the traitorous word "till I have avenged myself on my enemies," showing that he puts himself in the Lord's place, and forgets that the question was of the Lord's honor against His enemies and His people's. Saul is zealous for his own honor, for his right and his glory. It is this that makes him blind, so that he wishes to destroy the enemy till evening with people exhausted by a hot contest, without granting them rest and refreshment, cruelly and despotically ignoring natural human rights and needs, and, in addition, enforces his command by an oath. Such thoughtless and overhasty conduct could, as Jonathan distinctly says (ver. 29), only bring destruction. Saul's people, harassed by his blind ardor, could not do what they ought. The defeat of the Philistines was not as great as it would have been if rest and refreshment had been allowed (ver. 30). The strength of the people was broken (ver. 31). From the sinful root of Saul's fleshly ardor comes one evil fruit after another. The famished people, in consequence of his prohibition, rush ravenously on the animals, do not take time to separate blood from flesh, eat the flesh in its blood, and thus transgress the Lord's command. In the night Saul wishes to pursue the Philistines farther, in order to destroy them completely. But God checks him in this through the high-priest. So little does he recognize the fact that he is to blame for the incompleteness of the victory, that he wishes to slay Jonathan, who is wholly free from blame, for his unconscious transgression of his arbitrary and unjustifiable prohibition. The name of the Lord is invoked by Saul more than is necessary, and misused to cover his perverse disposition of heart. In overhaste and blind zeal he swears an oath, which, though convinced of its hostile operation, he wishes to keep, but cannot and is not allowed to keep. So it goes from sin to sin after humble faith in the Lord is once given up; in spite of all religious zeal and zeal for duty and calling, by which it is hoped to win God's approbation and heal the wound of a bad conscience, there remains the inner discord, and, if there come no true repentance and conversion, a condition of inner life must result like Saul's when the Spirit of the Lord left him and the evil spirit came over him.

6. There is here (vers. 24-26) a six-fold testimony against Saul: 1) The word of his own mouth: "till I have avenged myself on my enemies," ver. 24; 2) The word of his son: "my father troubles the land," ver. 29; 3) The failure of the pursuit of the Philistines, vers. 30, 31; 4) the Lord's silence when he was inquired of, ver. 37; 5) The silence of the people at his oath, ver. 39; 6) the decision of the people, ver. 45, by which God's decision was made apparent, and Saul's conflict with the Lord and himself shown to be a conflict also with the people, who recognized God's hand and will better than he. On God's side there are not lacking co-working means by which man, when he detaches himself from God, may be brought to consider himself and return to God. And if he do not return, it is because of the energy with which the human will persistently follows its own path, and rejects all God's exhortations and influences.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. xiii. 1-15. The test to which faith is put: 1) When the need rises higher and higher, and threatens destruction. 2) When the divine help comes not at the expected hour. 3) When human support wholly fails. 4) When one's own heart doubts and is afraid.—Vers. 8-15. Doubt of the heart tempted by unbelief as to the Lord's power and help: 1) Its root in the yet unconquered self (self-love, self-will, self-conceit). 2) Its manifestation in disobedience to the will of the Lord. 3) Its fruit the loss of the blessings of divine grace.

The question of conscience: What hast thou done? 1) What it signifies in the sight of the Lord (vers. 8-10). 2) With what excuses an evil conscience answers it (vers. 11, 12). 3) What judicial answer the word of God gives to it (vers. 13, 14).

The steps in the fall from faith into unbelief: 1) Unrest through doubt and fear. 2) Sin in impatience and disobedience. 3) Excuses that have no ground. 4) Accusation by God's Spirit. 5) Sentence by God's word.—[It is questionable whether we should regard Saul as having had true faith in God.—Tr.]

J. DISSELHOFF: First steps towards the fall of an already approved servant of God: 1) From what hidden corner of the heart has come forth the stumbling-block which made him stumble. 2) What has hindered him, after stumbling, from again walking upright on his feet.—[HENRY: It is not sinning that ruins men, but sinning and not repenting; falling and not getting up again.—Tr.]

[Ver. 14. HENRY: Was not this hard, to pass so severe a sentence upon him and his house for a single error, and that seemed so small, and in excuse for which he had so much to say? No. (1) The Lord here shows that there is no sin little, because no little God to sin against. (2) He shows that disobedience to an express command, though in a small matter, is a great provocation; as in the case of our first parents. (3) He warns us to take heed of our spirits; for that which to men may seem but a small offence, yet to Him that knows from what principle, and with what disposition of mind it is done, may appear a heinous crime.—Tr.]

[Vers. 6, 7. "Man's extremity is God's opportunity."—Ver. 10. A few minutes more, and how great a calamity might have been averted, how great a blessing gained! (Saul could wait no longer, and yet Samuel came when he had just finished the burnt-offering, and had not yet offered the peace-offering, ver. 9.)—Ver. 12. "And I forced myself." Reluctant and self-deceived disobedience.—Ver. 13. The folly of disobeying God.—Ver. 14. "Jehovah hath sought him a man after his own heart." 1) A man devout, not merely by fits and starts, but profoundly and habitually. 2) A man not self-willed, who would rule according to the command of God through the prophets. 3) A man who when he had done wrong would penitently submit to God's chastening, invincibly trust in God's goodness, and faithfully strive to live more according to God's will. (In these and similar points, Saul and David might be contrasted.) MAURICE: This was the man after God's own heart, the man who thoroughly believed in God, as a living and righteous Being; who in all changes of fortune clung to that conviction; who could act upon it, live upon it; who could give himself up to God to use him as He pleased; who could be little or great, popular or contemptible, just as God saw fit that he should be. . . . How many of us feel that those who have committed grave outward transgressions may nevertheless have had hearts which answered more to God's heart, which entered far more into the grief and the joy of His Spirit, than ours ever did! (See the whole Sermon in "Prophets and Kings.")—TR.]

Chap. xiv. 1 sqq. S. SCHMID: When God has resolved to accomplish something great and wonderful through a man, He knows how in a wonderful manner so to move his spirit that, without tempting God and with a believing heart, he attempts that which is above his nature and his power.—Ver. 6. Berleb. Bible: "There is no restraint to the Lord," etc. These words have such force that nothing can be added to them without abating their force. In so saying Jonathan goes through all apparent great perils with a spirit becoming a soul at once righteous and composed. It is true, O God, that it is no harder for Thee to deliver us by few than by many. Our strength counts for as little before Thee as our weakness.—The measure of faith is also the measure of God's help. Such a soul undertakes everything with heartiness because it does not long consider. It knows that God can do everything, and that is enough for it. The more it doubts, too, its own powers, the more it trusts the power of God.—S. SCHMID: Two points has a pious man in his performances especially to observe: one is that his faith shall confide in God's promise; the other, that he shall not doubt God's almightiness.—[Hope, founded on faith: 1) It is certain—a matter of faith—that the Lord can save by many or by few. 2) It may be—a matter of hope—that He will work for us. (People often say: "I have faith that we shall succeed in this enterprise." That is not properly a matter of faith, but only of hope. We believe that God can give success when it is His will; we are persuaded that our enterprise is righteous and would have desirable results; therefore we hope that it may prove to be God's will to give us success.)—TR.]—Vers. 18, 19. STARKE: That is the way with all hypocrites; when a rainburst of misfortune falls upon them, they are quite devout, pray industriously and seek defence and protection from God; but when the storm is past they run off again, and ask not after God, Luke xvii. 17.—[WORDSWORTH: Saul is a specimen of that class of persons who show a certain reverence and zeal for the outward forms of religion, and even a superstitious reliance on them, but are not careful to cherish the inner spirit of vital religion.—TR.]

Ver. 23. The Scriptures ascribe everything to God. And in order not to ascribe everything to the creature, they do not say: Jonathan delivered Israel, but, God saved Israel. From this we can see that a soul which truly resigns itself to God is in His hand only a poor instrument, which He is wont to use with greater advantage the less it works anything of itself, but merely follows the hand and the will of God.—Ver. 24. [WORDSWORTH: Observe his egotism. He does not call them the enemies of the Lord, but he says: "that I may be avenged on mine enemies;" and he speaks in this self-confident tone even after that the Lord had just marvellously interfered to save Israel.—TR.]—CRAMER: To make a vow inconsiderately is censurable, and woe to those who deliberate without consulting God, Isa. xxx. 1.—HALL: Hypocrisy is always covered with a blind and ungrateful zeal, Rom. x. 2.—S. SCHMID: The lack of foresight in those who fancy themselves quite too wise or are carried away by violent passions often lets the fairest opportunity of accomplishing something good slip between the hands.—Ver. 32. S. SCHMID: A sin seldom remains alone, and from one error always arise several others.—HALL: A hasty vow commonly brings much mischief after it.—Ver. 33. Berleb. Bible: Thus do hypocrites know how to see evil in others, but not in themselves.—OSIANDER: That is the way with hypocrites, they will never be guilty, but others shall always be so.—Ver. 35. CRAMER: Hypocrites have the appearance of holiness; but the power of godliness they deny, 2 Tim. iii. 5: Ezek. xxxiii. 31.—OSIANDER: Hypocrites wish to be regarded as if they were promoting the honor of God and of His name, and yet in fact are seeking nothing but their own honor.—Ver. 36. STARKE: A Christian should begin nothing till he is first assured of the divine will.—Berleb. Bible: Saul as a picture of stout self-reliance always wishes only to carry out his purposes without God, to get booty, make the victory greater, annihilate the enemy. It never came into his head to ask God's counsel.—Vers. 38, 39. CRAMER: God's eyes look at faith, and without that it is impossible to please God, Jer. v. 3; Heb. xi. 6.—S. SCHMID: Unjust sentences and rash oaths should not be approved, but condemned at least by silence.—Ver. 40. S. SCHMID: It is wise conduct not to oppose the authorities, but to be pleased with their words and works, so long as God's word and conscience permit.—Vers. 42–44. S. SCHMID: He who has a good conscience is not afraid of God's judgment, John iii. 21. To push justice to extremes is often to do the greatest injustice.—[SCOTT: Those who are indulgent to their own sins are generally severe in animadverting on the sins of others; and such as most disregard God's authority are most impatient when their own commands appear to be slighted.—TR.]

Vers. 1–15. The believing spirit of God's soldiers against the enemies of God's kingdom: 1) It confers not with flesh and blood, but makes the boldest ventures alone with its God (vers. 1–3). 2) It shrinks not back before the greatest difficulties and perils (vers. 1–6). 3) It humbly leaves success to the Lord (ver. 6, "perhaps," etc.). 4) It trusts alone in God's almightiness without regard to human might (ver. 6, "there is . . . to the Lord," etc.). 5) It marks the signs from the Lord, by which it becomes certain of its success (vers. 7-12). 6) It gains, by God's help, a glorious victory (vers. 13-15).

Vers. 16-23. The Lord helps His people in the conflict against their enemies, in that 1) He suddenly and unexpectedly defeats them upon hidden paths and in a wonderful manner (vers. 16-19); 2) He brings their enemies into confusion and causes them to turn their weapons against each other (ver. 20); 3) The forces of His people that had yielded He rescues again and brings them back to His side (ver. 21), and 4) the disheartened and despairing He collects again to His host, to be partakers in His victory.

Vers. 24-46. The folly of those who let themselves be ruled by carnal zeal: 1) They are thoughtless and over-hasty in their resolutions; 2) They are unintelligent and err in the means for their aim; 3) Falling heels over head they miss the goal; 4) Led astray, they carry away with them into error and sin the men who are under their influence; 5) While in self-seeking and self-will striving after good reputation before God and men, they must before God and men be put to shame.

Vers. 35-46. The exhortation, Let us draw near hither unto God. 1) Whereon it rests. (a) On the nearness of God to us; (b) on our duty in all things to place ourselves before God's face. 2) What it aims at. (a) The clear knowledge of the will of God; (b) the consciousness and manifestation of our own sin before the Lord.

Ver. 37. God's silence when we question Him is also an answer, which 1) calls us to earnest self-examination, in order to discover to us the impure ground in our heart, from which the question proceeds, and 2) causes us to mark the divine delay as to that which we desire in a carnal way.

Ver. 45. When is the people's voice God's voice? 1) When it is an echo of that which God by His word and His deeds of grace has spoken into the heart and conscience of the people. 2) When it is a contradiction to that which clearly opposes the word and work of God.

Vers. 24-45. Misuse of the name of God in the service of hypocrisy: 1) By idle swearing in over-hasty resolutions. 2) By impenitent invocation of divine help in self-willed undertakings. 3) By zeal in the name of the Lord against other people's sins, while ignoring and concealing one's own.

CHAP. XIV. J. DISSELHOFF: The time between the stumbling and the fall. We see, 1) How God's wondrous faithfulness drives Saul not to shame at his unbelief, but only to carnal zeal; 2) How he wishes to supply the half-felt want of thorough repentance by outward service of God; 3) How therefore the further gracious respite and help of God led not to upright action but to security. [The fall of Saul may be fully and instructively traced by the help of "Historical and Theological," Nos. 3 and 5.—TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

The rejection of Saul for his disobedience in the Amalekite war.

CHAPTER XV. 1-35.

- 1 SAMUEL also [And Samuel] said unto Saul, The Lord [Jehovah] sent me to anoint thee to be [om. to be] king over his people,¹ over Israel; now therefore [and 2 now] hearken thou unto the voice of the words² of the Lord [Jehovah]. Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts, I remember [have considered³] that which [what] Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for [withstood⁴] him in the way, when he

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Omitted in Sept. (Vat., not Alex.); Syr. has "Israel his people," while Vulg. and some MSS. have "his people Israel." These may be free renderings, or may point to different texts.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 1. Wanting in Vat., Sept., and Vulg., and perhaps in Arab. (though Ar. קול is rather דבר than קול). The Heb. is not to be regarded as a later insertion to avoid an anthropomorphism "voice of God" (but the Targ. has "the word of the saying of Jehovah") but simply as a full expression (comp. אָ קול vers. 20, 22 of this ch.). The Heb. קול is equivalent to "word" (as in Arab.) in the phrase "hear the voice, obey the voice of Jehovah."—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 2. The word (פָּקַד) means "visit," "inspect," "fix the mind on," Vulg. recensuit, Aq. θεωροῦμαι. Others render (improperly) "will punish," so Sept. ἐκδικῶ. Berl. Bib. will heimsuchen, De Wette ahnden, Gesen. (Thez. s. v.). The signification "punish" exists, but the future sense does not accord so well with the following verse.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 2. שָׁמַר with ל' "to set one's self against." In the corresponding passage in Deut. (xxv. 17-19) the word קָרַב is used "to go to meet" in hostile sense, and it is added "cut off thy rear-guard," which perhaps in part suggested the rendering of Eng. A. V., which is found only here, comp. Jer. ix. 7 (8). The Targ., however, has "laid wait" (קָמַר), and Syr. and Arab. omit.—Ta.]

- 3 came up from Egypt. Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy⁵ all that they have, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.
- 4 And Saul gathered [summoned] the people together [om. together], and numbered them in Telaim,⁶ two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah.⁷ And Saul came to a [the]⁸ city of Amalek, and laid wait⁹ in the valley.¹⁰
- 6 And Saul said unto the Kenites, Go, depart, get you down from among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them; for ye showed kindness to all the children of Israel, when they came up out of Egypt. So [And] the Kenites¹¹ departed from among the Amalekites. And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until [as]¹² thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt. And he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people [all the people he utterly destroyed] with the edge of the sword. But [And] Saul and the people spared Agag, and the best of the sheep and of the oxen and of the fatlings [second-rate],¹³ and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them; but everything that was vile¹⁴ and refuse, that they destroyed utterly.
- 10 Then came the word of the Lord [And the word of Jehovah came] unto Samuel, 11 It repenteth me that I have set up [made] Saul to be [om. to be] king; for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments. And 12 it grieved¹⁵ Samuel; and he cried unto the Lord [Jehovah] all night. And when [om. when] Samuel rose early¹⁶ to meet Saul in the morning, [ins. and] it was told Samuel,¹⁶ saying, Saul came to Carmel, and behold, he set him up a place [monument]¹⁷ and is gone about, and passed on [over], and gone down to Gilgal. And Samuel came to Saul,¹⁸ and Saul said unto him, Blessed be thou of the Lord [Jehovah]; I have performed the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Samuel said, What meaneth then [And what is] this bleating of the [om. the¹⁹] sheep 15 in mine ears, and the lowing of the [om. the¹⁹] oxen which I hear? And Saul said, They²⁰ have brought them from the Amalekites; for the people spared the

⁵ [Ver. 3. Sept.: "Destroy him and all his," which is preferred by Wellhausen. The Greek text contains a duplet, and the Vulg. adds "et non conspicias ex rebus ipsius aliquid." The "utterly" which Eng. A. V. everywhere employs in rendering the word כָּל־אֶחָד is as good an expression of the idea, perhaps, as is available. See translator's note in the body of the work.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 4. Sept. "Gilgal" (see Erdmann), Syr. Teloyo or Teloya, Arab. Tawila. Chald., Vulg. and others have taken the word as appellative; Chald.: "by paschal lambs," on which Rashi (Breithaupt's translation) says: "Saul told every man to take a lamb from the royal flocks, and then he numbered the lambs, since it was forbidden (Gen. xvi. 10, al.) to number the Israelites;" Anonymous Greek version (in the Hexapla) $\alpha\mu\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\tau\epsilon\varsigma$ for $\alpha\mu\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\tau\epsilon\varsigma$; Vulg.: quasi agnos.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 4. "It is strange that Judah forms only the twenty-first part of the army, and that 'footmen' and 'men of Judah' stand opposed to one another" (Wellh.). Syr.: "two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand with the men of Judah." The text is not clear.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 5. The definite Art. is better, since it was certainly the principal (possibly, the only) city of the Amalekites. Perhaps it was called Ir-Amalek (Bib. Comm.). Sept. has "cities," and so Josephus (Bib. Comm.).—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 6. On the Heb. verb-form see Erdmann.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 5. The bed of a winter-torrent, or a ravine through which flows a brook or torrent; Arab. Wady.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 6. On account of the absence of the Art. in the Heb. Wellhausen proposes to read וְיָקֵץ (as in Numb.

xxiv. 22; Judg. iv. 11).—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 7. The general direction is here given, as in Gen. xxv. 18 (where, apparently, for וְיָקֵץ we must read וְיָקֵץ).—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 9. On the forms on this verse see Erdmann. Sept.: "the good of the flocks and of the herds and of the eatables (וְכֹשֶׁרֶת) and of the vines (וְכִרְמִים). For וְכֹשֶׁרֶת (Eng. A. V. "fatlings") Vulg. has vestibus, perhaps reading וְכֹשֶׁרֶת , or (Bib. Comm.). וְכֹשֶׁרֶת . Wellhausen transposes the וְכֹשֶׁרֶת from the fourth word to the third and renders: "the best of the sheep and oxen, the fat and well-fed animals." As the text stands the third word is best rendered "second-rate," which is not satisfactory. Proposed different readings are discussed in the exposition.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 11. The meaning here is not clear. The Heb. phrase וְיָקֵץ usually means "was angry," properly "was hot, excited," not only by anger, but (as in Arab., Gesen., Fuerst) by any emotion, as grief. It is difficult, however, to establish the sense "was sorry," the most favorable passage, Gen. xlv. 5, is not decisive, and, indeed, is commonly rendered "be not angry." If Samuel here was angry, it was either with Saul (which is improbable), or with himself (for which there is no reason), or with God (which we should not expect in Samuel), or with the general situation of affairs (which includes the others in part or in whole). The indefinite word "grieved" might therefore, be retained in the translation.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 12. Pregnant construction for "rose up and went to meet Saul." Such constructions are common in Hebrew.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 12. The Sept. here badly transposes the names Samuel and Saul.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 12. וְיָקֵץ clearly here "monument." Its relation to וְיָקֵץ "hand" and its original stem are not known.

—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 13. Sept. inserts: "and he was offering sacrifices," though it is clear from the narrative that Samuel had not seen the animals, ver. 14 (Wellh.).—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 14. The Heb. Art. is here better omitted in Eng.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 15. Sept.: I.—Ta.]

- best of the sheep and of the oxen to sacrifice unto the Lord [Jehovah] thy God ;
 16 and the rest we²⁰ have utterly destroyed. Then [And] Samuel said unto Saul, Stay, and I will tell thee what the Lord [Jehovah] hath said to me this night.
 And he said unto him, Say on.
 17 And Samuel said, When [Though]²¹ thou wasst little in thine own sight, wasst thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel, and the Lord [Jehovah] anointed thee 18 king over Israel? And the Lord [Jehovah] sent thee on a journey [way], and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amalekites, and fight against them until 19 they be consumed.²² Wherefore, then, didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord [Jehovah], but didst fly upon the spoil, and didst evil in the sight of the Lord [Je-20 hovah]? And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea²³ [om. yea] I have obeyed the voice of the Lord [Jehovah]²⁴, and have gone the way which the Lord [Jehovah] sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and [ins. the Amalekites I] have 21 utterly destroyed the Amalekites [om. the Amalekites]. But [And] the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed [things devoted to destruction (or, banned)] to sacrifice unto the 22 Lord [Jehovah] thy God in Gilgal. And Samuel said, Hath the Lord [Jehovah] as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord [Jehovah]? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat 23 of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry [For the sin of witchcraft is rebellion, and idolatry (or idols) and tera-phim is stubbornness].²⁵ Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord [Jehovah], he hath also [om. also] rejected thee from being king.
 24 And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned, for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord [Jehovah] and thy words; because I feared the people and 25 obeyed their voice. Now therefore, I pray thee, pardon [And now, pardon, I pray thee] my sin, and turn again [return] with me, that I may [and I will] worship the 26 Lord [Jehovah]. And Samuel said unto Saul, I will not return with thee; for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord [Jehovah], and the Lord [Jehovah] hath 27 rejected thee from being king over Israel. And as [om. as] Samuel turned about 28 to go away, [ins. and] he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle, and it rent. And Samuel said unto him, The Lord [Jehovah] hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbor of thine that is better than thou.
 29 And also, the Strength²⁶ of Israel will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man that 30 he should repent. Then [And] he said, I have sinned; yet honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people and before Israel, and turn again [return] 31 with me, that I may [and I will] worship the Lord [Jehovah] thy God. So [And] Samuel turned again [returned] after Saul; and Saul worshipped the Lord [Jehovah].
 32 Then said Samuel [And Samuel said], Bring ye hither [om. ye hither] to me Agag the king of the Amalekites. And Agag came unto him delicately [cheer-
 33 fully].²⁷ And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past. And Samuel said,

²¹ [Ver. 17. The natural translation is: "though thou art little in thy eyes, art thou not head of the tribes of Israel?" as in Sept.: after which it would then be better to begin a new sentence and continue it in ver. 18. "Jehovah anointed thee and sent thee." The past rendering, however, (as in Eng. A. V. Erdmann) is possible.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 18. The pron. is repeated here in the Heb., probably by clerical error.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 20. There is nothing in the Heb. corresponding to "yea." The וְיָאָמַר here introduces oratio recta (as ὅτι in later Greek).—Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 20. Sept. badly "the voice of the people."—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 23. The Heb. order, in which the predicate precedes the subject, is more forcible, and not likely to be misunderstood by most Eng. readers. So it is stronger to omit the "as" which is not in the Heb. The word rendered "iniquity" in Eng. A. V. (יָחַס) means "nothingness," and is used of sin in general, and frequently of idolatry or idols, as here. The Vulg., except Vulg. and Chald., are here confused. Chald.: "as the sin of the men who inquire by divination is the sin of every man who rebels against the word of Jehovah, and, as the sin of the people who wander after errors (idols) is the sin of every man who heaps up and adds to the words of the prophets."—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 29. יָמָא is variously rendered. Chald. and Syr. have same stem as Heb., idea of power, eminence; Vulg., triumphator; Luther, held (hero); Martin, force; Diodati, vittoria (victory); De Wette, vertrauen (confidence, trust); Van Ess, wahrheit (truth); Erdmann, hort (refuge). The Sept. and an anonymous Greek version misunderstood this word, and rendered (as if from יָחַס) "and Israel shall be divided into two parts, and shall not return." The Chald. paraphrases in order to avoid the anthropomorphic expressions of the text.—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 32. So Chaldees. Sept., "trembling," Vulg., pinguis et tremens, Aq. ἀνδρ. τρυφερίας "delicately, daintily," and so Sym. ἀσπύς.—Ta.]

As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord [Jehovah] in Gilgal.
 34 Then [And] Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to Gibeah 35 of Saul. And Samuel came no more to see Saul [saw Saul no more] until the day of his death; nevertheless [for] Samuel mourned for Saul; and the Lord [Jehovah] repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-3. The divine commission to Saul to execute judgment on Amalek. Ver. 1 is not to be connected chronologically with ch. xii. (Then.), but continues the narrative of chs. xiii. and xiv. The solemn reminder of Saul's royal anointing and of Samuel's divine mission to that end refers not to xi. 15, but to ix. 15-x. 1. It points to the fact that the following commission is a divine command, communicated by the appointed organ, the prophet of God, and that the bearer of the royal office has here to perform a theocratic mission with unconditional obedience. The "me" stands first [such is the order in the Heb.—Tr.] in order to give prominence to the official authority, as bearer of which Samuel must needs have felt himself obliged by Saul's past conduct to assert himself over against him.—Ver. 2. The Amalekites were a wild, warlike desert-people, dwelling south and south-west of Judea in Arabia Petraea, descended from the same ancestor as the Edomites, and took their name from Esau's grandson Amalek (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16; 1 Chron. i. 36). Comp. Joseph., Antiq. II. 1, 2, where this people is described as an Edomitic tribe, and their territory said to be part of Idumea. The mention of the "country of the Amalekites" in Gen. xiv. 7 is not in conflict with their derivation from Esau's grandson, for this (Hengst., Pent. II. 303 sq.) is merely a proleptical statement (comp. Winer, W. B. I. 51, Anm. 1).^{*} In the prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv. 20) it is expressly mentioned as the first of the heathen nations that opposed Israel as the Lord's people, and whose destruction by Israel (comp. ver. 8) is foretold. The first hostile movement of this people is narrated in Ex. xvii. 8 sq. Soon after Israel's exodus from Egypt the Amalekites fell on their wearied rearguard in the desert of Rephidim, but were defeated by Joshua through Moses' prayer, and were doomed to extermination by the divine command (vers. 14, 16). God's command to Saul goes back to these first hostilities of the Amalekites (which were often afterwards repeated in their alliances with the Canaanites (Num. xiv. 40 sq.), with the Moabites (Judg. iii. 13), and with the Midianites (Judg. vii. 12)), the Amalekites (according to ver. 33) having newly made an inroad, with robbery and murder, on the Israelitish territory.—I have noted what Amalek did to Israel, that is, the whole series of Amalekite hostilities, the beginning of which is expressed in the following words: "how he withstood him" (to Heb. וַיִּתְּחַן supply וַיִּתְּחַן * as in 1 Kings xx. 12), because in Ex. xvii. 14, 16, Amalek is declared the doomed hereditary and deadly enemy of Israel. Comp. Deut. xxv. 17-19.

Ver. 3. The complete extermination of the Amalekites, persons and property, as a righteous judgment of the holy God (as is intimated in the "noted" (considered) of ver. 2) is enjoined on Saul. The phrase "put everything under the ban" [this is the exact meaning of the Heb.; Eng. A. V.: "utterly destroy,"—Tr.] is explained by the following parallel phrases to mean "slaying," the "inferior being put last in each member" (Then.), and the "both . . . and" expressing complete destruction without exception.—[The Ban. The ban, of which we have here a notable instance, was an old custom, existing probably before Moses, but formulated, regulated and extended by him. In its simplest form it was the devotion to God of any object, living or dead. (The object thus devoted was called חֵרֶם , Cherem, from חָרַם , "to separate," "set apart from common use," and from the noun comes, according to Ewald, the Heb. Hiph. "to make a thing cherem," "put under the ban.") When an Israelite or the whole congregation wished to devote to God anything, man, beast or field, whether for the honor of God, or to get rid of an injurious or accursed thing, it was brought and offered to the priest, and could not then be redeemed (Lev. xxvii. 28)—if living, it must be put to death. A deep consciousness of man's sin and God's holiness underlay this law. The wicked thing, contrary to the spiritual theocratic life of God's people, must be removed, must be committed to him who was the ruler and judge of the people. And so the custom had a breadth of use as well as of meaning in Israel which it never had in other ancient nations (Ew.). A city might be devoted (Deut. xiii. 12-17), or a whole nation by vow of the people (Num. xxi. 2), or by command of God (Ex. xvii. 14). In such case all human beings and cattle were to be slain, all the spoil (houses, furniture, etc.) to be burned, the land was to lie for some time fallow, and other things to be given to the sanctuary. From this strict rule there were occasional deviations (Num. xxxi.; Josh. ix. 3-15), but on special grounds. To spare the devoted thing was a grave offence, calling down the vengeance of God. In later times the ban was, doubtless under prophetic direction, softened, and in the New Testament times the infliction of death had quite ceased.—On this whole subject see Ew., Allerth. I. 101 sq. (1866), Herzog R. E., s. v. Bann, Comm. of Kalisch and Bib. Comm. on Lev. xxvii.—Tr.]

Vers. 4-9. How Saul performs this divine command.—Ver. 4. Saul summons the people (Heb. "make them hear," the Pi. only elsewhere in xxiii. 8). The whole of the population fit for war (see the numbers in ver. 4) appears again in arms, because the powerful Amalekites could be overthrown and destroyed only by the full force of Israel.—Telaïm is the same with Telem, a southern city of Judah (Josh. xv. 24), lying, therefore, near the Amalekite territory, which agrees with Saul's choice of the place for his mustering of the army. The reading of the Sept.: "in Gilgal," is an unfortunate gloss, suggested by chs. xi. and xii.—[On the numbers see "Text. and Gram." The separate mention of Judah points possibly to a post-Solomonic date for the chapter. See Erdmann's Introduction, p. 40.—Tr.]*—Ver. 5. The name of the "city" of the Amalekites, against which Saul advanced, is not known.† Saul lay in ambush in the valley. To this Thenius objects that nothing more is said of an ambush, and that Saul went openly to work; but the first remark is of no importance, since it is not intended to give a full account of the battle; and as to the second, Saul was able to treat with the Kenites in the manner described the better because he had concealed his army in a gorge. According to the reading conjectured by Thenius: "and he set the battle in array" (וַיַּצֵּב בְּלָחָקָה, after the Arabic [and Targ.—Tr.]: "he set the people in array there"), Saul, "already prepared for battle," must have addressed himself openly to the Kenites. But neither this declaration to the Kenites, who were living in the midst of the Amalekites, nor the withdrawal of the former from their midst could have occurred as related, if the Israelitish army had stood over against the Amalekites ready for battle. The latter would certainly not have looked quietly on while Saul withdrew the Kenites from them to himself.—The Kenites, a small tribe of the north-western Arabian nomadic peoples (in Canaan as early as Gen. xv. 19), had shown friendship and kindness to the Israelites after their departure from Egypt (Num. x. 29). Moses' brother-in-law, Hobab (Judg. i. 16), belonged to them, and under his guidance it was that this kindness was shown. According to Judg. i. 16 these friendly Kenites dwelt south of the city Arad in the wilderness of Judah, that is, near the Amalekites, and near their original seat. Thence they had descended up to Saul's time farther into the Amalekite territory. Some of them settled in the north, as Heber, husband of Jael (Judg. iv. 11, 17). Another branch of the Kenites, hostile to the Israelites and in alliance with the Edomites, who dwelt in the caves of Arabia Petraea, and are without ground regarded by Hengstenberg (Bileam, p. 190 sq.) as a totally distinct people, are set forth in Num. xxiv. 21 as the object of God's inevitable judgment. The Kenites here mentioned (they appear also in the history of David as friends of Israel, 1 Samuel xxvii. 10; xxx. 29) are withdrawn from the punishment which was inflicted on the Amalekites.—Ver. 7. The defeat of the Amalekites reached from Havilah to Shur. Havilah, according to Gen. xxv. 18, the boundary of the Ishmaelites, probably, therefore in the south-east on the border of Arabia Petraea and Arabia Felix (according to Strabo 16, 767, the region of the Chaulotians, which he puts between the Nabatæi and the Agrei). Shur is the present Wilderness of Jifar, the portion of the Arabian desert bordering on Egypt, into which the Israelites entered after the exodus (Ex. xv. 22). Saul thus smote the Amalekites throughout their territory from south-east towards the west and northwest.—[Havilah and Shur. Great difficulty attaches to the name Havilah on account of the different mentions of it in the Old Testament. It belongs to a Cushite (Gen. x. 7) and to a Shemitic Joktanite (Gen. x. 29), perhaps thus denoting a region in southern Arabia occupied by these two peoples. The statement in Gen. ii. 11 throws no light on the locality. It is difficult certainly to assign to this tribe (the Amalekites) a limit so far south, and we should then have to suppose a place different from those mentioned in the passages cited, and have almost no data for an opinion.—Shur is certainly in the border of Egypt; but it is not easy to fix its exact position from the Bible-statements about it (Gen. xvi. 7; xx. 1; xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7; xxvii. 8; Ex. xv. 22, 23). It seems to be here not a wilderness, but a town or fortress. As the word means "wall," and Ebers has brought out the fact that a wall extended in ancient times across the north-eastern boundary of Egypt (whence the name Mizraim, "the enclosed or fortified"), it is suggested by Wellhausen that the place took its name from the wall near which it was.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. Agag ("the fiery," according to the Arab.) seems to have been the official name of their kings, Num. xxiv. 7 (as Pharaoh among the Egyptians, and Abimelech among the Philistines).—That Saul did not slay Agag, but took him alive, is to be referred, from what we know of Saul, either to a fit of weak lenity and forbearance, or to a vain desire to hold the king of this people prisoner (v. Gerlach).*—The whole people, that is, speaking generally. Some survived of course; the Amalekites appear afterwards, xxvii. 8; xxx. 1; 2 Sam. viii. 12. Their complete annihilation is mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 43.—Ver. 9. Besides the best of the people, king Agag, the best of the property, that is, among this people herds of course, was spared; for selfish reasons Saul and the people were unwilling to destroy the best of the booty. Besides the best of the small and large cattle, there is specially mentioned the best of the כְּשָׂנִים, that is, the animals which held the second rank (so the Sing. denotes the second after the king, 2 Chron. xxviii. 7, the second of brothers, 1 Chron. v. 12; 1 Sam. viii. 2; xvii. 13, and the Plu. goblets of the second rank in value, Ezra i. 10). According to this it must be supposed that the herds were divided into groups according to their value. Perhaps, however, the word also means (Kimchi and Tanchum) "animals of the second birth," which were thought better than the others.—[So Rödiger in Ges. Thea., while Gesenius says incorrectly that they were inferior. Bochart (Hieroz. 2, 43, pp. 429-431) renders "bidentes," that is, animals which had shed, or were about to shed, their two long teeth, at which time they were in their prime. Other meanings have been assigned to the word, none satisfactory.—Tr.]—Fat lambs also, fattened on the meadows, are specially mentioned. The Sept. reading "vineyards" (and so Ew.) is to be rejected, because, as Then. rightly says, we have here to do with things that could be carried along. Thenius and Ewald [and Eng. A. V.] read (with Chald., Syriac, Arabic) "fatlings" (פִּטְלִינִים), instead of "second-class" (as in the Heb.); but this is suspicious on account of the ease of the change.*—"And they spared everything good." From this comprehensive expression, and especially from the following statement of what they destroyed, it is evident that the idea of the word "best" is a loosely-defined one. Namely, it expressly says, they destroyed all property [that was worthless.—Tr.]†

* [Another view is that the Amalekites were an ancient Arabian tribe (Gen. xiv. 7), afterwards partially fused with Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16). So Ewald (Gesch. I. 331), Knobel (V. T., 22), and see Smith's Bib. Dict. s. v. For the view of the text see Herzog R. E., s. v.—Tr.]

* [That is, "set array against," instead of "laid wait for," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]

* This war seems to be the same as that mentioned in xiv. 48; but no date is given, and the chronology throughout is difficult.—Tr.]

† וְיָרֵב is Hiph. of יָרַב, contracted from יָרַבַּב. Sw. § 232 a.

* [Or, to carry him in triumph (Gill), or because of the comeliness of his person (Joseph.).—Tr.]

Ver. 10-23. By command of God Saul is called to account by Samuel for his disobedience, and his excuse being set aside, is by God condemned and rejected.—Ver. 10. Samuel receives a revelation from God concerning Saul's God-opposing conduct. The psychological basis of this revelation is Samuel's exact acquaintance with the condition of Saul's heart, which was already poisoned and rent by self-seeking and self-will. The way and the form in which the word of the Lord came to Samuel is not pointed out. But it is probable from what follows (Ew.) that it was by a dream. The content of the divine word is 1) the declaration: It repenteth me that I have made Saul king.—The repentance of God is the anthropopathic expression for the change of the divine procedure into the opposite of what the holy and righteous will of God had determined under the condition of holy and righteous conduct by men, when on man's side there has been a change to the opposite of this condition without repentance. Theodoret: "God's repentance is His change in administration."† The repentance of God always presupposes a change for the worse in man's conduct towards God, whose holiness and justice must consequently assume another relation to man; hence it cannot exist without accompanying sorrow in the divine love over the sin of man, which necessitates a change in God's action on man's life; but it is too narrow a definition to regard it (as Keil does, on Gen. vi. 6 and here) merely as an anthropopathic expression for the sorrow of the divine love over the sin of man. Saul indeed remains the legitimate king of Israel according to the divine appointment. But, since he has not remained the humble servant of God, as which he was called to be king, God the Lord, with the deep sorrow of His holy love, must now regard and treat him as an apostate who is in conflict with the truth of the theocratic kingdom. This declaration of God's repentance itself involves the judicial decision of God, which, however, is here not yet expressly announced; rather this divine word contains 2) only the ground of God's repentance: for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandment [literally, word]. The first clause denotes internal defection from sincere fellowship of life with the Lord under the figure of a way, in which the walk after God, that is, in His retinue in fellowship with him, is performed in humble subjection to his will and command; Saul has not observed Samuel's exhortation "turn not aside from after the Lord" (xii. 20), and has gone his own way away from God. The last clause: "and has not kept my word," is the external form of the defection: disobedience in the non fulfilment of the divine command. "He has not performed my word," that is, has fallen away, has not reached permanence, fulfilment.—A two-fold effect is produced by this revelation of God on Samuel's heart.—To Samuel was kindled, namely, anger (supply הָאֵשׁ, "anger," as in Gen. xviii. 30; xxxi. 36; 2 Sam. xix. 43, and many other places). That it was holy anger is clear from what follows; for Samuel could pray in his anger. The object of his anger was first, obviously, Saul's defection and disobedience, and then the therein-involved violation of the Lord's honor and thwarting of His purposes. To render: "was sorry" (J. Schmid: doluit Samueli) is inadmissible, because the expression always denotes anger.—[On the difficulty here see "Text. and Grammat."—Tr.]—But to anger at Saul's disobedience and frustration of his holy mission Samuel adds prayer for Saul, mighty, fervent: he cried to the Lord, and persistent, unremitting: the whole night.—The object of the prayer was doubtless not release from the fulfilment of the divine command (Ew.), but the exemption of Saul from the sentence of rejection and the forgiveness of his disobedience. But the hearing of such a prayer is conditioned on the sincere repentance of him for whom it is made. This condition did not appear in Saul, but rather its opposite. Therefore the picture of the priestly mediator, in which character Samuel represents Saul before the Lord, changes into that of the judging prophet, who represents the Lord over against Saul.—[Abarbanel says, that Samuel was angry and displeased because he loved Saul for his beauty and heroism and as his own creature whom he had made king, and that he prayed all night because God had not revealed to him Saul's sin, and he wished to know why sentence was pronounced against him.—Tr.]—Ver. 12. Having thus learned immediately from God by this revelation his divine mission to Saul, Samuel after this grievous night goes early to meet Saul. On the way he learns that Saul had come to Carmel (Josh. xv. 55), now Karmul with extensive ruins dating from ancient times and the Middle Ages, southeast of Hebron [ten miles] on the mountains of Judah (comp. xxv. 2; xxvii. 3); that he had there set up a monument in commemoration of this great victory over Amalek. (יָד, "the hand," here denotes a monument of victory, as in 2 Sam. xviii. 18, because this, like the hand, directs attention to what it denotes.) The "him" [=to him] is in the whole connection significant, as it brings out the selfish principle which actuated Saul. He does not give the honor to God the Lord by unconditional obedience, but he sets up a monument in his own honor.—(כָּסֶפֶת ["is turned, gone about"] cannot mean "went in solemn procession" (Buns.), nor are we to read: "and turned the chariot," as Then. does after the Sept. whose translators did not understand the יָדָה, "passed on.") He passed over, namely from Carmel and the neighboring mountain across the mountains of Judah, and then descended into the Jordan-valley to Gilgal (xiii. 4). Saul went to Gilgal to celebrate his victory with offerings. Thenius and Ewald insert after "Gilgal" (from Sept. and Vulg.) the words: "And Samuel came to Saul, and behold, he was offering a burnt-offering to the Lord, the firstlings of the spoil, which he brought from Amalek," supposing (but without sufficient ground) that they fell out of the Heb. because the following sentence begins with the same words. It is nowhere hinted that, according to the view of the narrator, Samuel and Saul had intended to meet on Mount Carmel (Then.). The Sept. introduced Saul's offering after the analogy of xiii. 8 sq. in order to conform this second great sin of Saul to the first.—Ver. 13. Samuel took the long journey to Gilgal to meet Saul. In the place where he had solemnly pledged Saul and the people to unconditional obedience (chap. xii.), he now executes judgment for disobedience to the divine will. The psychological and ethical momenta of this procedure are clearly exhibited in the following deeply moving narrative. After all that had occurred between Samuel and Saul (xiii.—xv. 1), Samuel's mere appearance must have been an accusation and a warning of conscience for Saul. Conscious of his sin, which, however, he will not confess,—disregarding it, and deceiving himself with all the arts of a heart entangled in hypocrisy and lies, and alienated from the Lord,—he anticipates Samuel's accusation with his defence: 1) he not only meets, but anticipates, Samuel with forced friendliness with the greeting: Blessed be thou of the Lord; and 2) straightway adds the assurance: I have performed the commandment [word] of the Lord.—In this he in one respect tells the truth; for he had broken the power of the Amalekites. But in another respect he tells a lie; for from selfish motives he had failed to carry out the command of complete annihilation, as given in the "word of the Lord."—Ver. 14. Saul is convicted of falsehood by the voices of the animals which he has spared contrary to God's command. Samuel's mode of citing them against him by the question: "What mean these voices?" has an air of holy humor and cutting irony.—Ver. 15. Saul continues to advance in falsehood and hypocrisy, receding more and more from the truthfulness of a confession of sin (which was his duty) by presenting a two-fold defence: 1) "The people spared," he declares; he does not blame himself. And yet in ver. 9 it is said: "Saul and the people spared." He seeks to excuse himself as blameless by transferring the blame to the people. And, suppose the people had spared the good oxen, yet he, the general, had permitted it; the people dared not do it against his will. [Comp. the people's obedience to Saul in xiv. 24, 34, 40.—Tr.] 2) He seeks to extenuate and to justify his transgression of the divine command by pleading the holy purpose of "sacrificing to God". Whether now this was thought of or not, in any case it is hypocrisy, by which Saul seeks to excuse himself and the people. [Bib. Comm.: "Every word uttered by Saul seems to indicate the break-down of his moral character. One feels that after this scene, Saul must have forfeited his self-respect." Bishop Sanderson (quoted by Wordsworth in loco), in his Lectures on Conscience, II. § 13, exposes the futility of the pretence that good intention is a right rule of conscience and a good guide of conduct.—Tr.]—Ver. 16. Samuel interrupts him with the exclamation: "Stay!" (חַיִּי Imper. apoc. Hipሉ. of כָּסֶפֶת, "desist, cease.") To the false and hypocritical speech of Saul he solemnly and sharply opposes what the Lord said to him in the night. (Instead of plu. יֵאָמְרוּ read sing.)*—Vers. 17-19 follows the powerful, crushing address of Samuel, hurled on Saul's conscience with the might of Samuel's conviction that he now spoke as prophet solely in the name and stead of the Lord to the deep-fallen king.

* [On these names see "Text. and Grammat." No satisfactory rendering of them has yet been given.—Tr.]

† פִּטְלִינִים, from the connection, refers to cattle, as in Gen. xxxiii. 14—פִּטְלִינִים. Ewald holds that this cannot be Niph. Part. from פִּטְלִי, "contempt," and thinks the text corrupt, § 128 b, Ann. 1 [yet remarks that the book of Samuel presents many examples of strange words from the popular dialect]. Perhaps it is a mingling of פִּטְלִי, "sucked out," and פִּטְלִי, "despised" (Böttcher). But it is possible that this last word was corrupted in the popular language, so as to produce alliteration with the following word by the arbitrarily inserted פִּ. The second predicate פִּטְלִי is [Nl. Partep.] from פִּטְלִי, "to melt," the "ruined, mangy cattle." Masc. and Fem. here stand together abnormally, as in 1 Kings xix. 11.

‡ [See Gill in loco for a good statement of this.—Tr.]

First comes the reminder of his elevation from lowliness to the high dignity of royalty by the favor of the Lord. The question "wast thou not?" sharpens for Saul's conscience the sting concealed in this recollection. The sentence is variously construed. Kimchi renders: "though thou seemedst to thyself too little and weak to curb the people, yet wast thou the head, and shouldst as such have done thy duty"—wholly against the connection, and under the incorrect supposition that Samuel received Saul's excuse. Köster refers the expression hypothetically to the future: "if thou wouldst henceforward be humble, thou shouldst." But against this is the reference to the past fact: "the Lord anointed thee." Others (S. Schmid, De Wette, Keil) render: "when thou wast little, thou wast made." But דָּמָא must retain its meaning, "if." Here, as in many places (Judg. xiii. 16; Am. v. 22; Jer. v. 2; xv. 1; xxii. 24; Job ix. 15; Josh. i. 18), it="although." Ges. § 306, 2, 9 [Conant's Transl., § 155, 2 g.—Tr.]; Ewald, § 355, 1, 6 [16].† Though thou wast little in thine own sight.—The reference here to Saul's own words, ix. 21, is beyond doubt. It is the humiliating reminder to the haughty Saul of the low position whence he had been elevated to the headship of Israel, and of the modesty and humility which he then possessed. "In thine eyes."

* [See a good note in Bib. Comm. on Samuel's complete acquiescence in the divine decision which at first (ver. 11) so grieved him, and our duty always to trust God.—Tr.]

† [On this construction see "Text. and Grammat." in loco.—Tr.]

Samuel here indirectly points to the haughtiness of his heart as the deepest ground of his defection from the Lord. The Lord anointed thee.—That was God's gracious act by which he had been raised to this height, and had incurred the most sacred obligation to be obedient to the Lord and to keep the people obedient to Him. On this foundation Samuel bases his exhortation in respect to Saul's guilt in this particular case.—Ver. 18. The Lord sent thee on the [properly a] way and said: Go, etc.—It was a distinctly marked way which Saul was to go according to the Lord's command, "after him;" it was a divine mission which he was obediently completely to fulfil. The sinners the Amalekites.—These words give the reason why this people was to be destroyed and not spared, because they strove to annihilate God's people and kingdom.* All this ought to have pledged thee to obedience. The question: Why didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord?—with the accusation which it contains—connects itself all the more emphatically with the reference to the duty of obedience which the Lord Himself had laid on him. The following words characterize Saul's conduct as based on avarice ["didst fly upon the spoil"]. The "fly," as in xiv. 32, expresses eagerness, passionate craving.†—Vers. 20, 21. Saul hardens himself still farther: 1) in deceitful self-justification, positively denying the fault attributed to him (following exactly the order of Samuel's specifications), and affirming with emphasis (וַיִּשְׁקֹץ) that he had gone the appointed way and fulfilled the mission assigned him, witness of which was the captive Agag and the annihilated Amalekites; 2) in vain and hypocritical excuse, which is a mere repetition of the above pretext of the people's act and their purpose to sacrifice to the Lord the spared oxen as "firstlings of the spoil." This might have seemed a pious act, as in the similar case in Num. xxxi. 48 sq.; but, as all the goods of the Amalekites had been devoted—that is, consecrated—to the Lord, and the living things must be killed, no burnt-offering (according to Lev. xxvii. 29) could be made with them (see Keil). Saul evades the fact that the command of God is: Every thing is to be put under the ban (ver. 3). The words: "to the Lord thy God" are a sort of captatio benevolentiae, an attempt to curry favor [others see here, perhaps not so well, an implied censure of Samuel, as if Saul would say: "you rebuke me for serving the God whom you profess to serve."—Tr.]

Vers. 22, 23. Samuel's answer tears away all the cloaks with which Saul had striven to cover his sin, and lays bare the deepest ground of evil in his heart. Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord?—To give color to his open disobedience to the Lord, Saul adduced his purpose to make an offering. In opposition to this is the meaning of Samuel's words: offering, brought with such a disobedient heart, cannot be well-pleasing to God, as is the obedience of the will, which subjects itself unconditionally to the will of the Lord, and brings itself as offering.

External offerings are an abomination to the Lord when there is lacking the heart full of obedient love, the humble consecration of the whole man. The same thought was repeatedly expressed by Samuel (xii. 14, 20, 24) in his exhortations to the people and their king, with the threat of destruction for both, if they should fail in this time-offering and service in faithful, hearty obedience to the will and commands of God. This fundamental ethical truth is affirmed, with unmistakable reference to these words of Samuel, in the classical passages Ps. i. 8-14; li. 18, 19; Isa. i. 11; comp. 16-19; Mic. vi. 6-8; Hos. vi. 6; Jer. vi. 20.—In the following words: To obey is better than sacrifice, the thought takes a new turn: apart from what alone is well-pleasing to God, only an obedient disposition of mind is in itself something good, the offering, without such a disposition, is not a good thing, has no moral value. The "fat of rams," that is, the pieces of fat offered on the altar [see Lev. i. and many other places.—Tr.].—Ver. 23. The thought is carried on as follows: As the outward work of offering without answering devotion of heart and life to God with obedient mind has no moral value, and is not an object of the divine good-pleasure, so disobedience and the thence-resulting rebellion and defiant self-dependence is similar in essence to, stands on the same moral plane with the outward wickedness of witchcraft, that is, "divination in the service of anti-godly demon-powers" (Keil), and of idolatry. ‡

[Eng. A. V. "iniquity"] is "nothingness," then "false god" and "idol," Isa. lxvi. 3, "idol-worship," Hos. x. 3. Teraphim [Eng. A. V. "idolatry"] are household-gods as oracle-deities and dispensers of good fortune, Gen. xxxi. 19. Comp. Keil, Archäol., § 90 [and Smith's Bib. Dict., Arts. "Teraphim" and "Magic," Commentaries of Kalisch, Delitzsch, Lange and Bib. Comm. on Gen. xxxi. 19. Samuel's decided condemnation of teraphim-worship (which he clearly did not regard as a permissible form of Jehovah-worship) is to be noted.—Tr.].—For the sake of emphasis the predicates in both clauses stand before the subjects. As in divination and idolatry the living God is denied and rejected, so is rebellion and stubbornness a defection from the Lord and a rejection of the Lord.* This is the ground (ב) of the declaration in ver. 22. Now follows the sentence thus grounded, with sharp brevity concluding this part of the scene: Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he hath rejected thee from being king †—Rejected by the Lord, Saul is now himself abandoned "to his self-love and his passions" (Berl. Bib.).

Vers. 24-31. Saul's vain striving with Samuel in false penitence, and Samuel's sentence of rejection. Ver. 24. Saul confesses: I have sinned.—To judge from his previous obstinate refusal to acknowledge his wrong, Samuel's earnest and powerful address must have worked on his inner life like a circle of fire ever closing in upon his

* Instead of בְּלִיָּה read בְּתִי— with Sept., Chald., Syr., Arab.

† מִן הַמֶּלֶךְ Impf. Qal. of מָלַךְ with Dag. forte implic. Ges. § 72, Rem. 2.

* [On the difficult subject of the nature of witchcraft and its treatment in the Old Testament see Art. "Magic" in Herzog's R. E.—Tr.]

† מִן הַמֶּלֶךְ with subet. may be predicate when a preceding closely attached verb leaves no doubt as to the sense, Ew. § 357 b.

conscience, so that he saw himself forced to abandon his attempts at palliation and frankly make this confession of sin. The whole preceding narrative shows that it was extorted from him partly by the unsparing revelation of his lies and hypocrisy and the undeniable exhibition of his heart-rooted disobedience, partly by the judicial decision respecting the unavertible consequences of his defection and disobedience. A confession of sin induced by resulting evil and punishment is often no expression of true penitence. And it is not this with Saul; for though he now confesses that he has transgressed the commandment of the Lord, he yet shows that he is not thinking solely of the Lord, since he adds: "and thy word." His conduct before and after this throws light on this apparently unimportant statement of his; powerfully impressed by Samuel's word, he puts it alongside of the word of the Lord; he is concerned to regain Samuel's good-will and approbation. This regard for Samuel's human authority, which ought to vanish out of sight before God's authority, springs from the same root in his heart (lack of humble fear and simple obedience towards God)—as the fear of men and desire to please men which he himself now gives as the reason for his disobedience: For I feared the people and obeyed their voice.—Berl. Bib.: "Here stands revealed the hypocrite, who loved the honor of men more than the favor of God. The people must still bear the blame." Instead of fearing God, he feared the people, he the king, who in this, therefore, was guilty of unpardonable weakness; he obeyed the voice of the people instead of God's voice out of fear of man, if indeed the people did make the demand. And yet in all his confession of sinful regard for men his purpose is evidently to soften his guilt by bringing in the people.—[Ex. xxiii. 2: Thou shalt not follow the multitude into evil.—Tr.]—He prays Samuel: And now, pardon my sin. He does not turn straightway to God with this prayer; the "and now" indicates his belief that he might expect the fulfilment of his prayer in return for his confession of sin. Samuel turns from him, perceiving that the confession and prayer do not come from a truly penitent heart. To this Saul's request refers: Return with me that I may worship the Lord.—Confession, renewed excuse, cry for forgiveness, request to Samuel to remain, desire to approach God, all follow one after another in painful haste. Saul is smitten by his conscience; but his heart is not broken. He nevertheless gives not God the honor. Ver. 26. Samuel, seeing through him, shortly and decidedly rejects his request, and instead repeats his previous judicial sentence, because Saul's desire for forgiveness sprang not from a penitence directed to God, but from a self-loving penitence, whose aim was his own advantage; for he did not trouble himself about his having dishonored God, but was afraid that he might lose the kingdom.—Ver. 27. Samuel's turning away from Saul was a vigorous confirmation of his rejection, and a sign that he would henceforth have no association with him. The impression which the narrative makes on us of a vehement, unquiet and disordered mind is heightened to the utmost by this moving scene in which Saul seizes the skirt of Samuel's mantle in order to arrest his departure, uses physical force, that is, to attain his end: and it was rent.—[It is plain that it is Saul that tears Samuel's garment undesignedly. Some Jewish writers held that Samuel symbolically tore Saul's garment or his own (Gill).—Tr.]—Ver. 28. Samuel uses this as a symbol to show Saul that the Lord had that day rent the kingdom from him. The second part of Samuel's address declares that the theocratic kingdom was to be given to another, "thy neighbor,"—an indefinite expression, since Samuel did not yet know whom the Lord had chosen—who is better than thou, that is, who would walk obediently in the ways of the Lord. Before it was said: "the Lord hath rejected thee from the kingdom;" now it is said: the Lord hath rent the kingdom from thee. Samuel, who for the third time announces the rejection of Saul (whose spiritual steadfastness constantly diminishes), expressly emphasizes the fact that the Lord has rejected him not merely personally, but as the theocratic king. In ch. xiii., on the other hand, it was declared that the kingdom should not remain permanently in his family. Though now Saul retained the kingdom some years after this rejection, God's relation to him was, in consequence of his apostasy, completely altered; he no longer looked on him as the organ of His will, and withdrew from him the power and gifts of His Spirit. His external royalty remained as a divine appointment; but its inner core was rejected; Saul, as bearer of the royal office, was rejected, because he had rejected the Lord.—Ver. 29. Samuel declares this divine sentence to be unavertible and unavoidable: And also the Refuge of Israel will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man that he should repent. that is, the judicial decision, by which the Lord has inflicted on thee the penalty of rejection, remains unchanged and unchangeable by reason of His immutable will. "And also" introduces this sentence as something new—"in addition to this." ΠΣΥ="steadfastness, permanence," then subjectively "trust, confidence" (Lam. iii. 18), then the object of trust, of God: the *Refuge [Eng. A. V. Strength]. The same declaration of the unchangeableness of the divine decisions, only in reference to His promise of blessing, is found in Num. xxiii. 19. Comp. Jer. iv. 28; Ezek. xxiv. 14. The apparent contradiction between this declaration ("The Lord does not repent") and that in vers. 11, 35 ("The Lord repented") is by some expositors harmonized by remarking (Clericus) that here (ver. 29) the words are said θεοπροπῶς [as becomes God], and are there to be understood ἀνθρωποπαθῶς [after the manner of men]; but this does not offer a complete solution of the question, since the expression "it repented the Lord," rightly understood after being divested of its human dress, is the appropriate expression of a real manifestation of the unchangeable divine being and will, only this latter must occupy a different relation to the man who has himself changed. In contrast with man, who repents because his will changes, God is here declared by Samuel to be (in respect to Saul) the unchangeable God, who cannot contradict Himself, as would be the case if He retracted

* [On this word see "Text, and Grammat."—Tr.]

His decision concerning the impenitent Saul; while in ver. 41 and ver. 35 the same unchangeable God is described in human phrase according to the changed relation which His unvarying holy and righteous will must occupy to men when they recede from the religious-moral relation to Him, under which He has hitherto in holiness and righteousness revealed Himself.—Ver. 30. Not even by this overwhelming declaration of the irrevocable character of God's sentence, founded, as it was, in the unchangeableness of His holy and righteous will, is the excited Saul silenced. Two things, he says, wherein is displayed the real selfishness and self-love of his heart. First he repeats his confession of sin. But it is only in one word: "I have sinned." And that this was a hypocritical one is shown by what follows:—Yet, honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people and before Israel, and return with me that I may [better, "and I will,"—Tr.], worship the Lord thy God. How many words, spoken with passionate haste, against that one cold introductory word "I have sinned!" If the Lord's sentence of rejection is irrevocable, Saul will at least before men save the halo of royal honor. His inner man is revealed. He did not honor the Lord by obedience, and when his disobedience was held up before him, he persistently denied the Lord His honor in his impenitent mind. Now comes to light the deepest-lying ground of this conduct. He is concerned about his own honor. In his self-seeking he has clean cast loose from the Lord and withdrawn into himself. [If Saul had been really penitent, he would have prayed to be humbled rather than to be honored (Gregory, quoted by Wordsworth).—Tr.]. And Samuel returned after Saul. He then acceded to Saul's request, not, of course, to yield to his selfish opposition to God's honor, but to preserve unimpaired in the eyes of the people the position of Saul's kingdom, which though theocratically rejected, yet still in fact by God's will remained, and especially not to be wanting in the sacrifice of the people.

Ver. 32 sq. What Saul had disobediently neglected, Samuel executes in the name of the Lord, namely, the extermination of Amalek by slaying king Agag.—Agag appeared before Samuel cheerfully; the word occurs in Ps. xxix. 17 in the sense of "joy." His words: Surely, the bitterness of death is past agree with his joyful mood. S. Schmid sees in them the feigned courageousness which cowards can put on. Others understand a real heroic contempt of death in the presence of death. Probably, however, Agag, not having been slain by Saul, was all the surer of life when he was led from the king to Samuel [since Samuel was an old man and a priest.—Tr.].—Ver. 33. Samuel's words, however, must have immediately shown him his error. They presuppose that Agag had acted with great cruelty in his marauding and military expeditions: "As thy sword has made women childless, so shall thy mother be the most childless [or, be childless] among women;" that is, "because in her son she loses at the same time the king of her people" (Bunsen).—There can be nothing surprising in Samuel's "hewing Agag in pieces" for one who from the theocratic point of view regards Agag's death as a necessity founded in the divine decree, and sees in Samuel the divine instrument for the fulfilment of the divine will, coming in place of him who in spite of his call thereto has refused obedience and service. Grot.: "When kings abandoned their duty, God often executed His law by prophets" 1 Kings xviii. 40. [Samuel's act was not one of revenge, not an individual execution of justice, but a simple carrying out for the people of the ban-sentence pronounced against Amalek by Jehovah.—Tr.].—Ver. 34 sq. The notice that Samuel returned to Ramah and Saul to Gibeah is a significant introduction to the important statement that henceforth Samuel broke off all communication with Saul: He saw him no more to the day of his death. Maurer: "He went to see Saul no more." This does not contradict xix. 24, according to which Saul once more met him. All intercourse with Saul on Samuel's side ceased from now on, since God had rejected him, and Samuel could have met him only as messenger and prophet of God. From this also we see that Saul's kingship, though still one de facto, yet from this time lost its theocratic relation. God's ambassador was recalled from him; the intercourse of the God of Israel with Saul through His Spirit came to an end, because Saul, sinking step by step away from God, had by continued disobedience and increasing impenitence given up communion with God.—In keeping with the above mention of Samuel's fervent, continued prayer for Saul is the statement: "For Samuel mourned for Saul;" this was the human sorrow for this highly-gifted, highly-favored, and hopelessly-sunken man; then follows the deeply pathetic statement: "The Lord repented, etc.;" this was the divine sorrow over the loss of this chosen instrument.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. When the Scriptures speak of God's repentance, anger, zeal, and the like, ascribing to Him human affections and dispositions, and consequently changes, we cannot regard these anthropopathisms as merely figurative statements; these representations, after leaving out the ungodly human element, as Nitzsch (Syst., § 79 A. 2) remarks, have "realness and validity; it is not a human, but a divine movement that is spoken of, and we must therefore deny that it is sinful and passionate, but not that it is efficient and true." The anthropopathic representations set forth a real relation of the living God to man who bears His image, only described from a human standpoint. They are the means of maintaining vigorously and effectively the thought of the living God and His real relation to man, and of saving it from being dissipated in abstractions. Kling admirably says on the two passages in point in this chapter (Art. "Reue" in Herzog): "The latter (ver. 29 "he does not repent") refers to the firm, irrevocable resolution to give the kingdom to a better man; the repentance (ver. 11) looks to the fact that Saul, an humble man when he was called and fitted to discharge his duty in faith and obedience, was now changed, exalted himself in his office, would be his own master, and, setting aside God's express command, followed his own pleasure. Thus he showed himself no longer fit to be king in Israel, God's people, and the divine will, which made him king, changed to the opposite,—a repentance which betrays no mutability in God, but rather reveals His constancy alongside of the mutability of man, His unvarying will that the humbly obedient shall be king in Israel."

2. Persistent impenitence towards the holy and righteous God, as it is exemplified in Saul, has its deepest ground in the unwillingness to subordinate one's own self, especially one's own will to the holy will and the gracious will of God. It leads to hypocrisy, which seeks to cover its own wrong with works of external piety, or lays the blame on outward circumstances and other men. Before the irrefragable self-revelation of the holy and righteous God the impenitent man, despite his concealing lies and hypocrisy, must ever reveal new hidden sins, ever involve himself from step to step in new sins, till the deepest depth of his sinful heart is displayed in self-seeking, self-love, and self-will; and if the sinner will not even then humble himself and take refuge in the grace of God, there comes the judgment of inner hardening, by which the man becomes insusceptible to the influences of God's Spirit and word, and incapable of turning to God, since the will confirms itself in permanent opposition to God; the end is the divine judgment of rejection. See the separate steps of this process in the Exposition of the Section.

3. The word: "Obedience is better than sacrifice" is the refutation of a twofold error: 1) that man can gain God's approval by outward works, apart from a spirit of true obedience in which heart and will are given up and subjected to Him; 2) that man can by such works absolve himself from the performance of moral duties, and escape the guilt and punishment of his disobedience to God.—This declaration further indicates the true relation between the ceremonial law and the moral law. The holy usages of the former, especially sacrifices, do not occupy towards the demands of the latter the relation of the Outward to the Inward. "Every ceremonial law is moral; the outward act is never enjoined but for the sake of the inward thing, what it pictures—represents. Never is there body without spirit. But the fleshly sense would have none of the spirit, and laid hold solely of the body, which thus isolated became a corpse." Hengst. Eint. zu Ps. l. That word contains the principle of and lays the foundation for the position which the prophetic Order (after Samuel's example) takes towards the sacrificial worship and the fulfilment of the ceremonial law in general. Not the offering absolutely is rejected, but the outward work without the root of love to God (Deut. vi. 5) and of the obedience whence alone it can spring as fruit well-pleasing to God. On the relation between the teaching of the Mosaic law and this prophetic doctrine (which dates from this word of Samuel) of the necessity of the sacrifice of a pious heart and an humbly obedient will in contrast with external service according to the prescriptions of the ritual law, Oehler (Herz. XII. 228) says: "The prophets, by bringing out the difference between the ritual and moral laws, and by declaring the merely outward service to be in itself worthless—and valid only as the expression of a godly will, merely logically developed Mosaism, which indeed commonly puts the moral and the ritual; the inward and the outward immediately side by side, but therein indicates not unclearly the sense and aim of its teaching, partly by basing all laws on the divine elective grace and the divine holiness, partly in the fact that even the ritual ordinances of the Law every where display a spiritual meaning, and thus awaken a dim conception of moral duties. On the other hand, Prophecy by inserting in its pictures of the Messianic times essential features of the old ceremonial, shows that it holds fast the divine significance and warranty of the ritual law."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. BERLENB. BIBLE: Although Saul was rejected by God on account of his disobedience, yet God left him still king, so that he was bound to carry out the will of God.—[HENRY: Samuel plainly intimates that he was now about to put Saul upon a trial, in one particular instance, whether he would be obedient to the command of God or no. And the making of this so expressly the trial of his obedience, did very much aggravate his disobedience.—GILL: And whereas he had been deficient in one instance before, for which he had been reprov'd [chap. xiii.], he suggests that now he should take care to observe and do, particularly and punctually, what should be enjoined him.—TR.] It is impossible to be truly a king and to rule in the church, if one does not yet know the voice of the Lord, and cannot distinguish it from the voice of reason and nature.

Vers. 2, 3. STARKE: God's judgments, though they come slowly, yet come certainly and at the right time (Exodus xxxii. 34).—[HALL: He that thinks, because punishment is deferred, that God hath forgiven or forgot his offence, is unacquainted with justice, and knows not that time makes no difference in eternity.—TR.]—SCHLIER: When God the Lord commands such a war of annihilation, then this is no war of human vengeance; still less is it an ambitious war of conquest—but it is a judgment of divine wrath.

Ver. 6. CRAMER: We must beware of communion with the ungodly, that we may not be swept away with them (Rom. xviii. 4).—OSIANDER: God requites to the pious even their forefathers' good works and benefits, which they have done to their neighbor. Who then will say that it is vain to serve God (Mal. iii. 14).—SCHLIER: Thus does every good thing reward itself; nothing remains forgotten; often in later centuries the seed sown in an old past yet every where comes up gloriously, and children and children's children derive advantage from the good done by the fathers.—Vers. 8, 9. STARKE: Not what seems to us good are we to do, but what God will have from us (Jer. vii. 23). Avarice leads to great sins, especially to untimely compassion (1 Tim. vi. 10).—S. SCHMID: No one is more foolish than he who wishes to be wiser than God, and ventures to explain God's word and commandments according to what seems good to him.—Vers. 10, 11. "It repenteth me."—BERLENB. BIBLE: Such feelings must in the case of God be understood in a divine manner, and not as in the case of changeable men in a human manner; they must be understood more in the effect than in the affection, of God's unchangeable righteousness, which moves Him to withdraw His special grace and to withhold His hand, the cause of every change that takes place among His creatures.—[GILL: Though God repented He made Saul king, He never repents of His making His saints kings and priests for Himself. His outward gifts He sometimes takes away, as an earthly crown and kingdom; but His gifts and callings which are of special grace are without repentance, Rom. xi. 29.—TR.]

Ver. 12. OSIAUNDER: The lost sheep we must diligently seek, if perhaps they may be brought to the right way.—Ver. 13. [HENRY: Thus sinners think by justifying themselves to escape being judged of the Lord; whereas the only way to do that is by judging ourselves.—TR.]—STARKE [from HALL]: No man brags so much of holiness as he that wants it (Lu. xviii. 11, 12).—[WORDSWORTH: Here is a proof that a man may be blinded by his own self-will, and that he may imagine that his own way is right, while it is leading him to the gate of death (Prov. xiv. 12; xvi. 25). It is not enough for a man to be approved by his own conscience; but it is necessary to regulate the conscience by God's Will and Word (Acts xxvi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 13).—TR.]—Vers. 14, 15. S. SCHMID: God knows how to bring men's sins to light, however great the care with which they may be cloaked.—STARKE: Nothing remains concealed, and sooner than the sins of the ungodly should fail to be reported, the irrational creatures themselves must reveal them. [HALL: Could Saul think that Samuel knew of the asses that were lost, and did not know of the oxen and sheep that were spared? Much less when we have to do with God Himself should dissimulation presume either of safety or secrecy. Can the God that made the heart, not know it?—TR.]—Ver. 15. [From HALL]: It is a shameful hypocrisy to make our commodity the measure and rule of our execution of God's command, and under pretence of godliness to intend gain.—OSIAUNDER: Hypocrites will not come right out with the confession of their sin, but desire always to excuse and palliate it.—BERL. BIBLE: Beware of covering thy ungodly heart with the cloak of religion, and consider that the day is coming on which God will make manifest what is hidden in darkness and the counsel of men's hearts (1 Cor. iv. 5).—Ver. 16. S. SCHMID: We must not look to what hypocrites say of themselves, but to what God's word says of them.—BERL. BIBLE: Hold on! speak not many vain words to cloak and to palliate! The stitches do not hold. Happy he in whose spirit there is no guile (Ps. xxxii. 2). [SCOTT: The unhumiliated heart, however, will never be at a loss to excuse or palliate the most evident criminality; and it will always be necessary for preachers to drive sinners from their subtleties, to show them the malignity and aggravation of their offences, to silence their objections and excuses, and urge conviction upon their hearts, though the convincing Spirit of God alone can render the means effectual (Jo. xvi. 8, 11).—TR.]

Ver. 20. CRAMER: That is the way with hypocrites, that they make themselves fair, and yet are not washed from their filthiness (Proverbs xxx. 12). They boast of their works, and their hand kisses their mouth (Job xxxi. 27; Luke xviii. 11).—BERL. BIBLE: Saul makes his cause worse and worse, while he wishes to be guiltless, yea, even to be in the right towards God, as if he had executed every thing quite well, even after Samuel had already censured him and sought to arouse his conscience. It is accordingly not only a single sin, but many there come together. He contradicts the prophet, he denies that he has been disobedient; he makes light of his fault, even if any fault were granted, and throws it to and fro from himself to the people; he uses the service of God for a pretext and cloak of excuse, like a vile hypocrite who has little respect for God's omniscience. See what tricks corrupt nature can devise? How crafty it is in its concealment! How many kinds of subterfuges it employs to defend itself!—Ver. 21. OSIAUNDER: It is a horrible crime when any one wishes to cloak his avarice, disobedience and other crimes with religious devotion (Jo. xii. 4-6).—BERL. BIBLE: How many engaged in God's worship deceive themselves herein, who think it is enough to offer something temporal to the Lord, when meanwhile they are constantly maintaining their own disposition and their own will!—[SCOTT: When the Lord expressly says, "Thou shalt," and His rational creature dares to persist in saying, "I will not," whether the contest be about an apple or a kingdom—it is "stubbornness" and "rebellion"—a contempt of the commandment of God, and a daring insult to His majesty and authority.—TR.]—J. LANGE: Even in the Levitical worship God always and chiefly looked to the inner (Ezek. vi. 6; Ps. li. 18, 19). My fellow-Christian! make thy Christianity then consist not in the outward but in the inward, and worship God in spirit and truth (Jo. iv. 24).—BERL. BIBLE: May we then take good care that even when we mean to render the Lord service or obedience, we yet beware of our choice and fancy, and follow only the traces of the divine will, and thereby escape from ourselves or break and tame our own will. Obedience is the mother-grace, the parent of all virtues. It makes the eye see, the ear hear, the heart think, the memory remember, the mouth speak, the foot go, the hand work, and the whole man do that, yea, that alone, which is conformed to the will of God. All these and other things are valuable only in so far as they agree with the will of God.

Ver. 23. S. SCHMID: It is a dreadful fault when one wishes to make light of gross sins. An honest servant of God represents the greatness of the sins according to the truth and prescription of the word of God.—TUB. BIBLE: God rejects no one unless he is before rejected by Him.—BERL. BIBLE: It is impossible for him who is not obedient to God to lay any command upon men. That is what these words and the aim of God therein mean.—The authorities must not proceed according to their own will and notion, but in everything must take God's word and will for their rule.—If He does not drive them (the apostate rulers) from their position, like as He did Nebuchadnezzar, but leaves them ruling, as He also did Saul for a while, yet they are and remain rejected in His might, and vainly write themselves "by the grace of God," when He Himself does not so acknowledge them.—[On vers. 22, 23, there is a sermon by Jeremy Taylor, chiefly on rebellion, in which he uses singular arguments to justify religious persecution.—Tr.]

Ver. 24. OSIANDER: That is the way with hypocrites, that they do not outright and freely confess their sins, but push the guilt, as far as ever they can, from themselves upon others.—

Ver. 26. BERL. BIB.: Every one wonders that God, who is yet so full of compassion, does not forgive Saul, though elsewhere He never refuses forgiveness to any repented sin. But it is due to the fact that the longing after forgiveness in Saul proceeded from no such repentance as God had in view, but from a self-loving repentance, which had only its own advantage as aim. For he was not troubled that he had dishonored God, but was in fear that he might lose the kingdom.—

Ver. 29. OSIANDER: Although God, so long as we do not repent, does not change His threatenings, but certainly carries them into execution, yet if we earnestly repent and better our lives, He does repent of the evil which He had threatened to do us if we had gone on in sin (Jer. xviii. 7 sqq.); and such a change is not instability in God, but grace and goodness.

Ver. 30. BERLENBURGER BIBLE: "Honor me, I pray thee." That shows what he is mainly concerned about (Jno. v. 44; xii. 43); loss and shame he would like to escape, and as he cannot deceive God, he wishes to deceive men by the appearance of God's favor.—

WUERT. BIB.: Hypocrites bewail and lament in their repentance only the chastisements they have to suffer, and not their sins; they seek only their own, and not God's honor (1 Kings xxi. 27).—

[S. GREGORY (in WORDSWORTH): If Saul had been really penitent, he would have prayed to be humbled, rather than to be honored.—W. M. TAYLOR: There came to the son of Kish a tidal time of favor, which if he had only recognized and improved it, might have carried him not only to greatness, but to goodness. But he proved faithless to the trust which was committed to him, and became in the end a worse man than he would have been, if no such privileges had been conferred upon him. . . . As his life wore on, the good features in his character disappeared.—Tr.]—

Ver. 33. S. SCHMID: Although the right of retaliation has no place in personal revenge, yet it is righteously exercised in public judgments (Lev. xxiv. 20). To execute God's strict judgment with a spirit free from all thirst for vengeance, is no barbarity.

J. DISSELHORFF on vers. 1-21. The fall of King Saul shows: 1) How unrepented and only white-washed sin at the first severe temptation breaks out as manifest and criminal self-seeking; 2) How this self-seeking is so blinding as to tell itself and others the lie that it is a labor for the Lord.—The same on vers. 20-23. Sacrifice or obedience? 1) A sacrifice which lacks obedience of heart is an abomination in the sight of God; 2) Where obedience of heart is, there is also the true sacrifice, well-pleasing to God.—The same on vers. 23-31. Beware of a Saul's confession. That you may do this, it is necessary to know two things: 1) What a Saul's confession is; 2) What a Saul's confession works.

Vers. 1-11. God's curse and blessing: 1) Long delayed, but not revoked; 2) At last fulfilling itself according to God's truth and righteousness.

Vers. 22-3. Sacrifice and obedience: 1) Sacrifice without obedience (worthless in the sight of the Lord, perilous for men); 2) Obedience the best sacrifice (on what ground, with what blessed result).

Vers. 10-31. Seeming repentance before the Lord: 1) How it conceals from the Lord the root of sin in the heart; 2) draws the garment of self-righteousness over sin; 3) thereby leads from sin to sin; and 4) drives on towards the judgment of hardening and rejection.

[Ver. 11. The Lord repented: 1) in what sense, 2) for what reasons, 3) with what results. (Comp. "Exeg." on vers. 11 and 29, and "Hist. and Doct." No. 1).—Ver. 11. Praying in vain.—Vers. 11, 16. Grieving, but faithful.—Vers. 12, 13. The glory and the shame of Saul—his victory, his disobedience, his efforts to hide and palliate his offence. (This would embrace nearly the whole chapter).—Vers. 20-1. Eclectic obedience.—Ver. 23. The rejecter rejected. Comp. Rom. i. 24, 26, 28; John iii. 18, 19.—Ver. 27. Clinging to the religious teacher, while not clinging to religion.—Vers. 30-1. Worshipping to save appearances.—Ver. 32. To be without fear of death is not proof of preparation for death.—Tr.]

THIRD DIVISION.

THE DECLINE OF SAUL'S KINGDOM, AND THE ELEVATION OF DAVID. FROM SAUL'S REJECTION TO HIS DEATH.

CHAPTERS XVI.—XXXI.

FIRST SECTION.

Early History of David, the Anointed of the Lord.

CHAP. XVI.

I. Choice and Anointing of David as King through Samuel. Chap. XVI. 1-13.

- 1 AND the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite, for I have provided¹ me a king among his sons. And Samuel said, How can I go? If Saul hear it, he will kill me. And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord [Jehovah]. And call Jesse to the sacrifice,² and I will show thee what thou shalt do; and thou shalt anoint unto me him whom I name unto thee. And Samuel did³ that which the Lord [Jehovah] spake, and came to Bethlehem. And the elders of the town [city]⁴ trembled at his coming [went tremblingly to meet him], and said, Comest thou peaceably [in peace]?⁵ And he said, Peaceably [In peace]; I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord [Jehovah]; sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice.⁶ And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice. And it came to pass, when they were come, that he looked on Eliab and said, Surely the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed is before him. But [And] the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance [appearance],⁷ or [nor] on the height of his stature, because [for] I have refused him; for the Lord [Jehovah] seeth⁸ not as man seeth, for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord [Jehovah] looketh on the heart. Then [And] Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel. And he said, Neither hath the Lord [Jehovah] chosen this [him]. Then [And] Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the Lord [Jehovah] chosen this [him]. Again, [And] Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel. And

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Literally "seen." For similar use of רָאָה see Gen. xxii. 8; Dent. xxxiii. 21.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 3. Chald. has "sacrificial meal" perhaps simply as a connected fact, perhaps to avoid apparent infringement on priestly functions. Vulg. has victimam, other VSS. as Heb.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 4. Sept.: "all that the Lord spake to him."—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 4. It is better to give a uniform rendering to רָעָה, the distinction between "town" and "city" not being found in Heb.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 4. Literally: "is thy coming peace? and he said, peace." Sept. inserts at the end of the verse the words "O Seer."—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 5. Sept.: "and rejoice with me to-day," probably a free reference to the festive character of the sacrificial meal; so Chald. has "meal" instead of "sacrifice."—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 7. רָאָהוּ, Sept. ὁρατός, Erdmann "gestalt," properly the whole personal appearance. Vulg. vultus, whence perhaps Eng. A. V. Luther, "gestalt."—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. These words wanting (but understood) in the Heb., are found in the Sept. "God seeth," and are for clearness better retained. Chald. and Syr. omit as Heb.; Vulg. supplies the words: ego judico.—Ta.]

- 11 Samuel said unto Jesse,* The Lord [Jehovah] hath not chosen these. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children [the young men]? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold, he keepeth the sheep. And Samuel said 12 unto Jesse, Send and fetch him, for we will not sit down till he come hither. And he sent and brought him in. Now [And] he was ruddy,⁹ and [om. and] withal of a beautiful countenance [with beautiful eyes withal], and goodly¹¹ to look to 13 [at]. And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Arise, anoint him, for this is he.¹¹ Then [And] Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren. And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came upon David from that day forward. So [And] Samuel rose up and went to Ramah.

* [Ver. 10. Sept. (Vat. but not Alex.) omits "unto Jesse," perhaps (Wellhausen) because Jesse was supposed not to know Samuel's purpose. In ver. 6 Samuel's "said" is equivalent to "thought."—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 12. This word אֲדָמָה is found only here, 1 Sam. xvii. 42 and Gen. xxv. 25, and in the two last passages seems to refer to the color of the skin. The ancient VSS. do not decide. Chald. and Syr. use same word here as in Gen. xxv. 25; Vulg. rufus, Sept. suppleus. Some moderns render "red-haired." Levy renders the Chald. "red-eyed."—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 12. Sept.: "goodly in appearance to the Lord," and "for he is good," to preserve the moral aspect of the act in reference to ver. 7.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1, exhibiting Samuel in deep grief for Saul, connects itself immediately with xv. 35. We find him here in the same sorrow in which we left him. Samuel mourned for Saul in view of the great gifts of grace which he had received, but had nullified and lost by his disobedience and impenitence, in view of the Lord's honor, which he had violated, and in view of the people, for whom he had by his conduct turned God's blessing into a curse. Samuel's grief was an expression of the same love which drove him to intercession for Saul and at the same time filled him with holy anger (xv. 11). It was sorrow for Saul's rejection, but there was not (Brenz, Tremellius) connected with it prayer for the restoration of Saul to his former relation to God and for the renewal of his kingdom, of which nothing is said.—The question: How long? contains a divine reproof, indicating (so the words: "seeing I have rejected him from being king over Israel") that Samuel by his deep, long-continued grief over Saul's condition (a lamentable one under all circumstances and evermore) was out of sympathy with God and God's decrees and ways, which are clearly announced in these words and in xv. 35. Calvin: "The excellent prophet here displays something of human weakness. Samuel here looked on a vessel made by the invisible hand of God Himself utterly broken and minished, and his emotion thereat shows his pious and holy affection,—yet he is not without sin; not at all that the feeling is evil, but because it is excessive." From his own sad thoughts and feelings Samuel is directed through the Spirit of the Lord to the thoughts and the will of the Lord in respect to the Theocracy, as organ of which Saul is rejected. [Comp. the similar dealing with Elijah, 1 Ki. xix.—Ta.]. The Lord commands him to enter into His ways, which are to lead to the choice and consecration of another as instrument of the royal authority of God over His people. The divine command is: Go and anoint one of the sons of Jesse the Bethlehemite, whom I have chosen to be king over Israel.—This command presupposes an exact acquaintance on Samuel's part with Jesse and his house, and the presence in his family of the conditions necessary for the theocratic kingdom. That the family was a wealthy one is certain from ver. 11. That true godliness and piety reigned in it appears from Samuel's acquaintance and intercourse with it, and the sacrifice which he held in the house.—Ver. 2. Heretofore Samuel had grieved for Saul—now he fears him: How can I go? if Saul hear it he will slay me.—This protest against the plain direction of the voice of God rests naturally on the fact that Saul was still, notwithstanding the divine sentence of rejection, rightful king of Israel, and would regard the designation of another to the office (if it could not be kept concealed from him) as an act of treachery and revolt, even though Samuel should plead the divine command in his justification. "He will kill me,"—to explain these words, therefore, we need not suppose that the evil spirit had already driven Saul to madness. Even if that were the case, Saul might in his seasons of quiet also resolve to slay the betrayer of the kingdom.—This fear of Samuel is overcome by inspired direction as to what he is to do to conceal the act; he is to go to hold a sacrificial feast, and so announce himself. This divine command supposes that Samuel did not confine his circuits to certain holy places (vii. 16) where the people appeared in large numbers, but visited other places to hold public divine service, and that Jesse consequently could not be surprised at his appearing in Bethlehem for such a purpose. Berl. Bib.: "People must have been accustomed to Samuel's coming to this place and the other to sacrifice, which was very proper for a prophet, especially at the time when Shiloh was desecrated." This throws a new light on Samuel's combination of priestly work with prophetic.—No shade of untruthfulness rests on this command. As Saul's anointing (x. 16) was concealed, so David's anointing also is, according to the divine will, yet to remain a secret. Samuel was to keep this secret. Its concealment behind the sacrifice was not a lie.* Calvin: "It is to be observed that he practiced no simulation, but said what was true, namely, that he had come to sacrifice; but he put fraud on no one, he deceived no one, he used no bad arts, but conformed to the divine command, because it was not meet to publish God's design, when as yet God wished it to be concealed;—here lurked no falsehood, and the end was good, unconnected with fraud or treachery, but God wished David's anointing to be carefully kept as a secret deposit, so to speak, and a pledge.”—Ver. 3. The performance of the divine commission in the sacrificial feast. Three directions are to be distinguished: 1) Samuel is to invite Jesse to the sacrificial meal; it is a slain-offering (זֶבַח) that is spoken of, with which was connected a feast; he is to be associated with Jesse in the feast in the narrower circle of the family. “Call in the sacrifice” is construct. prœgn. for “call to take part in the sacrifice.” 2) Samuel is to await direction from above. “I will tell thee what thou shalt do.” This exhibits the specifically divine factor (of which Samuel is to be organ) in the choice of the new king of Israel; 3) He is to anoint as king him whom God shall name.—Ver. 4. And Samuel did, etc. The troubled condition of soul which could not accept God's thoughts and ways disappeared before the strict obedience of the will, which bowed before the Lord's will. The elders of Bethlehem came tremblingly to meet him with the question: Comest thou in peace? (The Sing. יָאֵמַר “said,” because one spoke in the name of all. Comp. Judg. viii. 6; Num. xxxii. 25). This question does not mean “Has a misfortune occurred, as the cause of thy coming?” nor does it express fear of punishment for some special misdoing (in the pillaging) in the Amalekite war, but it is the involuntary utterance of the fear which Samuel's sudden, unexpected appearance produced; for though he no longer formally held the office of judge, he yet appeared here and there (as formerly in his judicial circuits) to make unexpected visitation and exercise his watch-office as prophet. On such occasions it was his principal care to administer earnest rebuke, and to remove the evil that he found. To this refers the fright of the elders at meeting him, and the question whether he came in peace or for good?—Ver. 5. He answers the question in the affirmative and so quiets the Bethlehemites, declares the purpose of his coming to be to institute a sacrifice for the people of Bethlehem, and directs them to sanctify themselves and take part with him in the sacrifice. The “sanctifying” means the consecration of the person to the service of God by washing the body and putting on clean garments as symbol of the cleansing of the soul for communion with the holy God. Comp. Gen. xxxv. 2; Ex. xix. 10, 22. (The same pregnant construction here as in ver. 3). While directing the elders to take part in the offering, Samuel gives a special invitation to Jesse and his sons (by the same direction, to sanctify themselves) to partake of the sacrificial meal with him. [It is to be observed that the Heb. text here makes no difference between the invitation to Jesse's family and the general invitation to the elders. The Sept. and the Chald. make the former refer to the sacrifice and the latter to the sacrificial meal. It seems that there was a special meeting with Jesse and his sons, but it is not so stated in the text. After ver. 6, indeed, nothing more is said of the sacrifice, the narrative taking this for granted, and going on to the main occurrence.—Tr.].—After the ark was removed from the Tabernacle and Shiloh had thus ceased to be the place of worship and sacrifice for Israel, there were several places where altars for sacrifices were erected. The offering of the sacrifice is here to be put after ver. 5, and not (Then.) after the words “in the midst of his brethren” ver. 13, for the “coming” in ver. 6 refers to the feast, as appears from the words in ver. 11, “we will not sit down,” and from the general connection. Samuel thought (lit., said) that Jesse's eldest son, Eliab, was surely the Lord's anointed.—Ver. 7. The difference is sharply stated between the divine thoughts and human judgment according to human standards. The voice of God inwardly teaches Samuel two things: 1) in respect of Eliab's person, he is not to infer from his imposing exterior that he was the chosen of the Lord. With this humbling correction, which connects itself with vers. 1, 2, he is taught 2) a general truth respecting the difference between divine and human modes of thought and judgment: Not what man sees—to which we must supply the words “sees the Lord.” This ellipsis is not so hard as to require us to suppose (Then.) that these words have fallen out of the text. The thought naturally fills itself out from what precedes. The ground of the truth, that human judgment and divine judgment are not the same but different, is now declared.—For man looks on the eyes, but the Lord looks on the heart, that is, man judges according to the outward appearance,—the expression “the eyes” is not (with Sept.) to be exchanged for “countenance,” but to be retained as signifying the outward appearance, which concentrates itself in the eyes, in contrast with the heart or the centre of the inner life, whence springs man's will and his whole spiritual frame. Not according to the agreeable appearance which commends itself to the eyes, but according to the moral worth hidden in the depths of the heart, according to the disposition of soul that pleases Him does the Lord judge, who proveth the heart and the reins.—Ver. 8. The same decision is announced with reference to the second son, Abinadab. And so ver. 9 as to the third, Shammah. Thus Jesse made seven of his sons pass before Samuel. But Samuel's decision, according to the voice of God within him, is always negative. The “he said” in vers. 8 and 9 refers to Samuel, and = “he thought.” We are, therefore, not thence to suppose that Samuel had communicated to Jesse the object of his mission. It is not till ver. 10 that the words “to Jesse” are added, expressly indicating an address of Samuel to him: the Lord hath not chosen these. It does not, however, follow, even from these words, that Samuel made Jesse a sharer in the divine secret. According to the following narrative none of the family (David's father and brothers), know anything of David's high destiny. That address to Jesse is merely a negative declaration that the divine selection, with which Samuel was concerned, and which in the absence of express intimation of its nature, might refer to the prophetic office, rested on none of these seven sons. Samuel's word was by reason of its indefiniteness a riddle, whose solution Jesse was to attain only from the following development of the history of his youngest son.—Ver. 11. To Samuel's question whether these are all the young men, Jesse answers that the youngest yet remains. The prophet of the Lord is not satisfied with the presentation of the seven sons; he bids the father send for the youngest, before they sit down to the sacrificial meal. סָבִי = "we will not surround," namely, the table, we will not sit around it to eat till he come. So De Wette, Ewald, Maurer. The explanation: "we will not turn about, namely, to proceed to something else, but will remain here waiting" (Then., Bött.) does not suit the situation as given by the context.—Ver. 12. David's appearance, ruddy, of the color of the hair, red hair being regarded in the East (as contrasting with the usual black color) as especially beautiful. דָּבִי (as xvii. 42; Eccles. ii. 16) used adverbially = "at the same time," "withal," beautiful of eyes and good, pleasing in appearance. In this youngest son were united the beauty of the oldest, and that which is well-pleasing to the Lord, what "the Lord looks on," a heart and mind after the will and good pleasure of the Lord (ver. 7). And so the divine decision is announced to Samuel: Arise, anoint him, for this is he. He is thus freed from all doubts and suspicions. Sure of his course, Samuel (ver. 13) performs the ceremony of anointing David (the object and meaning of the act being still an enigma to Jesse and his other sons) in the midst of his brethren or from among [Germ. unter] his brethren; the Heb. preposition (בְּיָמֵי) may mean either. Thenius adopts the latter on the ground that the brothers had gone away, but this is not required by the narrative. Samuel's words in the second half of ver. 11 rather imply that they were all there. [Abarbanel and Philippon also adopt this view of the word, "among" his brethren, that is, "he alone of his brethren," because this better explains their after ignorance.—Tr.]. In any case the special significance, which God designed this anointing to have, was hidden from them. Anointing was always a symbol of the divine impartation of the Spirit from above on the Anointed. The impartation began immediately for David: The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward.—This could not have happened, if the religious-ethical conditions had not been present in David's heart. This impartation of the Spirit was (along with the general gift of the divine Spirit) the special endowment with gifts and powers for the special theocratic royal calling, to which David was chosen and consecrated by this anointing according to divine decree and will. The word "from that day forward" denotes the continuity of the impartation of the Spirit to David's inner life, and indicates its unbroken development under the guidance of the divine Spirit to full fitness and capacity for the royal calling. Keil properly calls attention to the fact that nothing is here said of any explanatory word of Samuel touching this point, as in Saul's anointing, chap. x. 1. Whether David was now informed by Samuel of the meaning of the act is uncertain. Most probably he was not informed, since it was performed in the presence of the brothers, and its object was (according to the will of God) to remain concealed from them and the people. [It seems likely that a royal destiny for David would be the last thing in the minds of his brothers, for his higher intellectual and spiritual gifts were apparently at this time unknown to them. Gradually the course of events led them and the people (so Abigail xxv. 30) and probably Saul (xxiii. 17) to look on David as Saul's successor, and David would receive intimations concerning his destiny from Samuel. There is, therefore, no serious difficulty in understanding the silence of the brothers in the succeeding history.—Tr.]. Samuel went to Ramah. That David was in constant communication with him (and perhaps with the prophetic school there) is quite certain from the following history. Comp. xix., xx. sq. In this intercourse with the prophet of the Lord he learned the meaning of Samuel's enigmatical act, and, under the progressive occupation and enlightenment of his inner life by the Spirit from above, received the knowledge of the duties of his royal calling and the preparation to fulfill them. For the present his election and anointing to be king of Israel remained a divine secret.

* [On the obvious political reason for this secrecy see Bib. Comm. and Wordsworth in loco.—Ta.]

* [See Ps. vii. 9; 1 Chr. xxviii. 9; Luke xvi. 15.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The affairs of the kingdom of God go their way without break or halt according to God's high thoughts and decrees, though human sin and its attendant judgment (as in Saul's case), or human weakness (as in Samuel's immediate grief for Saul) may seem to hinder the plans of the divine wisdom. "In the history of Israel the concealing curtain of human purpose and action is lifted, and the thus unveiled, all-moving and all-guiding hand of Him of whom it is written, 'He worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will' (Eph. i. 11), appears therein" (F. W. Krummacher, David, p. 1). But it is also precisely by human sin and foolishness that the history of God's kingdom under the guidance of the divine wisdom and providence receives new occasions and impulses to wider and higher development according to the aims which God sets before Himself.

2. Samuel's grief for Saul, transgressing the bounds set by God and thus displeasing to Him, is easily explicable psychologically not merely from natural human feeling, but also from Samuel's theocratic calling and prophetic official interest. Considered from this point of view also it is not in conflict with Samuel's immovable prophetic opposition to Saul and his sentence of rejection, but is at the same time the most striking refutation of the false conception of Samuel's relation to Saul in this prophetic-judicial bearing towards him, which makes the latter a pitiable sacrifice to priestly jealousy and one-sidedness (see the literature in Winer, to which is to be added M. Dunker, Geschichte des Alterthums I.).

3. The concealing of the truth, when there is no design to deceive, when its utterance is required by no duty, and when the interests of the moral order of the world and of the kingdom of God are in no wise injured, is far from being untruthfulness, much less falsehood; it is rather duty and obedience to the divine will.

* [In 1 Chr. ii. 13-15 only seven sons of Jesse are mentioned; one may have died in youth. The Syr. and Arab. write Elihu (1 Chr. xxvii. 18) as seventh and David as eighth.—Tr.]

4. The beginnings of David's theocratic life, as they present themselves in his election and calling to be king of Israel, have their roots (when we look back in the light of the divine history of revelation) in the consecrated ground of a family in Judah distinguished in history for piety and godliness, which belonged with its traditions to the shepherd-city of Bethlehem. The family whence Jesse sprang was from the beginning one of the most prominent in the tribe of Judah. One of its ancestors, Nahahon, stood at the head of the whole tribe in the march through the wilderness (Ruth iv. 20; Num. i. 7; ii. 3). "How remarkably the noblest and loveliest theocratic piety was nourished in this family, even in the degenerate times of the Judges, appears in the history of Ruth and Boaz; the latter a type of theocratic integrity, the former a truly consecrated flower of heathendom turning longingly to the light of divine revelation in Israel" (Kurtz in Herz. III., 299). Jesse, the son of Obed, was the grandson of this Boaz. His intimacy with Samuel speaks for his piety and that of his family. David was the noblest scion of this family, far excelling his brothers (vers. 7, 10) in heart-piety and theocratic feeling. His posture of heart, which stood the divine test and was well-pleasing to God, was the fruit of the piety of his father's house, whence sprang the humble, consecrated disposition* in which, after his anointing, he ripened more and more in soul under the guidance of God's Spirit to his high calling of theocratic royalty, coming by manifold experiences to a constantly clearer knowledge of this calling, and so guided by the Lord that not only the riddle of his dumb consecration was ever approaching solution, but also "from the course of events (connected with Samuel's former words to Saul) others, as Jonathan, and even Abigail, concluded that David was destined to be king, xxiii. 17; xx. 30" (v. Gerl.).—But also, when we look forward in the light of divine revelation, the early part of David's consecrated life contains many typical elements as factual prophecies or prefigurations of the future. His shepherd-life,† continued after he was anointed, in which on the one hand self-consecrated he immerses himself in the contemplation of God's revelation in nature and in His word, and on the other hand must be ready at any moment to meet the greatest dangers and exhibit boldness and prowess (xvii. 34-37), presents on these two sides types of his religious life as king, the Spirit of God developing on the basis of this double natural ground two sides of his character, which not merely co-exist, but are interwoven with each other: 1) intensively the innermost concentration and immersion of his thoughtful, meditative heart into the depths of God's revelation of His power, grace, and wisdom in nature, word, history, and into the depths of the sinful human heart, whence sprang in his psalms partly the inspired praise of God with furtherance and deepening in every direction of the knowledge of God, partly advance in the knowledge of the natural grace-lacking condition of the human heart; 2) extensively his admirable energy and heroic courage in the life of conflict, which he had evermore to lead. In the hiddenness of his royal calling from the people, the gradual ripening of his inner life for his office and the lowliness of the sphere whence he was raised to the throne, he is a type of Christ who, sprung from him according to the flesh, and by the prophets called "Son of David" and "Sprout of Jesse" (Isa. xi. 1, 10), passes his holy youth in privacy, gradually develops therein for his Messianic calling, and then at the end of this divine-human development steps forth from the lowliness of a natural-human life as the king of Israel, who completes in his person and work God's revelations for the establishment of His kingdom on earth, and therein enters on the war of subjugation against the ungodly world. From David's quiet anointing in the modest family-circle at Bethlehem to be King David, up to the birth, in the obscurity of a stall at Bethlehem, of the "Son of David," the "King of the Jews," there is an unbroken series of divine revelations, the beginning and end of which are bound together by the descent of the Saviour of the world from the Tribe of Judah "according to the flesh." And as heathendom entered the principal line of the tribe of Judah (whence came Jesse's house and David) in three distinguished women,* thus sharing in the derivation of the Messiah from Jesse's family,—and so the impulse implanted (by the fundamental blessing, Gen. xii. 3) in the seed of Abraham towards union with heathendom, which takes mostly a thoroughly perverted direction in all Israel's early history, showed itself in this family (consciously or unconsciously) in a normal and truly theocratic way—so we see, at the end of this development of the kingdom of God in Israel which goes from Bethlehem to Bethlehem, heathendom approaching in Bethlehem the new-born king of the Jews (having a natural right in Him because of its natural God-ordained share in His incarnation) in order to pay Him its homage. [This last statement expresses a parallelism, not a typical relation. That certain heathen women accepted the God of Israel, and that certain heathen astronomers believed in the divinely-sent king of the Jews are both facts illustrative of the promise to Abraham, but we cannot call them type and antitype, since they express not an essential principle, but a concomitant phenomenon of the fact of redemption. So the numerous cases in which God raised His servants from low to high position (as in David's life) are illustrations of a mode of divine action, and thus parallel to our Lord's history, but the relation of the events in the Old and New Covenants is not that of type and antitype, since they express an incidental and not an essential spiritual principle. David, as prophet and king, is a type of the true prophet and king, and his experiences as a spiritual-minded man answer to the experiences of the man

* [That is to say, the instruction and example of his father's house was God's means of developing this disposition in him. Piety is never inherited, but is always the direct creation of the Holy Spirit of God (John iii. 6).—Ta.]

† [The care of the flocks, perhaps an honorable occupation in earlier times (Jacob, Moses), was in later times usually given to inferiors, as servants and younger children.—Ta.]

* [Tamar (Gen. xxxviii.), Rahab (Matt. i. 5), Ruth (Ruth iv. 13), to which some add Bathsheba (or, Bathshua), but this is uncertain.—Ta.]

Jesus; but we cannot apply the term typical (without an unworthy lowering of its meaning) to all the outward resemblances between their lives.—TR.]

5. The word: "Man looks on the eyes, God looks on the heart," like that other: "Obedience is better than sacrifice" (xv. 22) refers to the right condition of heart in a truly pious, humble disposition towards God the Lord. As we see clearly the difference between God's word and man's, between God's thoughts and man's, when Samuel says to himself "this or that one is the chosen one," and the Spirit from above says to his heart "no," and points him to one of whom he had not thought,—so we see according to their different standards the difference between divine and human judgment. The natural man judges according to the outward and visible; God, who proves and knows the heart and the reins (Ps. cxxxix. 1, 2; xlv. 22 [21]), judges according to the character of the heart and the direction of the will, according to the disposition of soul.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. BERLENB. BIBLE: We may indeed have compassion upon every one who is wretched because of his sin; but when God's rejection is seen in continual hardening, that man must be given over to God's righteous judgment.—God demands in the souls He sets apart for Himself and for the guidance of others, such a dying to all things, that He does not allow them to regard any other interest than His, whatever reason may be alleged.—SCHLIER: The Lord reproves Samuel, who had indeed meant well, but had not thought rightly; even a Samuel had to subject himself to God's will, and with his whole mind and life send himself forward in God's ways.—Ver. 2 sqq. STARKE: Faint-heartedness and feebleness is found even in the best saints, Matt. viii. 26.—[HENRY: From this it appears 1. That Saul was grown very wicked. 2. That Samuel's faith was not very strong.—TR.]—S. SCHMID: In doubtful, trying and perilous circumstances it is best to ask God for counsel.—CRAMER: A wise man is silent until he sees his time; but a fool cannot wait for the time, Eccl. xx. 7; Eccl. iii. 7; Gen. xxvii.; Jud. xvi. 16.—J. LANGE: There is a great difference between an untruth, when one says what is false, and silence, when one prudently keeps to himself what it is not necessary for others to know, x. 15, 16.—[We are not bound to tell everything unless we profess to be so doing, or the person asking has such peculiar relations to us as to warrant his expecting it. From failing to distinguish between deception and concealment, some persons condemn concealment and many justify deception. See an excellent discussion, with particular reference to this passage, in THORNWELL'S "Discourses on Truth."—TR.]—BERL. BIBLE: Samuel speaks the truth, though he does not speak all the truth, but partly conceals and partly reveals, according to his present design.—Ver. 5. J. LANGE: So too the worthy appropriation of the atonement of Christ unto salvation must, according to the evangelical covenant of grace, be made with real inner purification, Isa. i. 16.—Ver. 6. S. SCHMID: Human wisdom, however great, may yet be easily deceived accordingly even the wisest men must take care not to be too hasty in deciding.—Ver. 7. CRAMER: God looks not at the outward work, but at the heart, and judges according to what His eyes see, Isa. xi. 3; Acts x. 34.—BERL. BIBLE: Men decide only according to the appearance, and so are commonly deceived; but the Lord looks to the depths of the heart, its most delicate movements, and our character, which is all clear to Him, and better known than we are to ourselves, Ps. vii. 10; cxxxix.; Heb. iv. 12, 13.—True, deep-grounded humility of heart is the only "appearance" in man that pleases God (Isa. lvii. 15); to this He looks as the ground of all virtues, for in it His fear has place. But where there is hidden pride, the fear of God is easily neglected.—[W. M. TAYLOR: We must not undervalue attention to the symmetrical discipline of the physical frame. Yet muscularity is not Christianity, and bodily beauty is not holiness. The character, therefore, ought to be the principal object of attention.—TR.]—OSIANDER: Christians too must not be judged by the outward walk, since commonly, through the infirmities of their flesh, they have a bad appearance, while hypocrites, on the contrary, make a good show in their life, 2 Tim. iii. 5; Matt. vii. 15; Rom. ii. 20.—[This is true as regards a mere plausible exterior; but Christians should be judged by their actions, Matt. vii. 20.—TR.]—Ver. 9 sqq. S. SCHMID: God knows how to try, often and long, the patience of believers to their good, that He may confirm them in their faith and patience.—Ver. 11. God is wont to exalt the lowly, that they may always remember their lowliness, and not be proud, but glory only in God who has exalted them, 1 Cor. i. 27 sqq., 31. [SCOTT: Nor does He favor our children according to our fond partialities; but often most honors and blesses those who have been the least regarded.—TR.]—Ver. 13. CRAMER: Christians are temples and dwellings of the Holy Ghost, 2 Cor. vi. 19.—S. SCHMID: When we have done our duty as commanded by God, we have to leave the rest to God's government, Matt. x. 23.

Vers. 1-13. F. W. KRUMMACHER: Call and anointing of the shepherd-youth: 1) By what this was occasioned, 2) How it was performed.—[Ver. 7. HENRY: "The Lord looketh on the heart." 1. He knows the heart. 2. He judges of men by the heart.—TR.]—J. DISSELEHOFF (The History of King David, 14 sermons): The secret of the choice: 1) The Lord does not choose those who by peculiar gifts of nature are distinguished above others, but 2) He chooses those who faithfully profit by the greater or less measure of God's grace which is granted them, 3) Who show this faithfulness by pure zeal and obedience in the labor entrusted to them, and 4) Those who even after some success in their labor do not boastfully press themselves forward, but remain in silent humility and quiet seclusion till the Lord brings them forth.

[Ver. 1. Remedies for improper mourning: 1) Submission to the will of God ("I have rejected him"); 2) Diligence in present work for God ("fill thy horn and go"); 3) Hope that God will bring a better future ("I have provided me a king").—Ver. 4. Why do men so shrink from religious teachers?—Vers. 6-12. Difficulty of selecting men for important positions: 1) Causes: a) Intrinsic difficulty of properly estimating character. b) Management of partial friends. 2) Lessons: a) To avoid haste in deciding. b) To make diligent inquiries. c) To seek special Divine guidance.—Ver. 12. The youth of David. Handsome, energetic, brave, talented and accomplished, of good family, devout—faithfully pursuing an humble calling which developed manliness, and trusting God for the unknown future—O the glorious possibilities of youth! (Comp. KITTO, "Saul and David," p. 197 sqq., MAURICE, "Prophets and Kings," p. 38 sq.)—[Tr.]

II. The Darkening of Saul's Mind by the Evil Spirit, and David's First Appearance at the Court of Saul as Harpist.

VERS. 14-23.

14 BUT [AND] the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord [Jehovah] troubled him. And Saul's servants said unto him, 15 Behold now, an evil spirit from God¹ troubleth thee. Let our lord now command — thy servants which [om. which] are before thee, to [and let them, or they will] seek out² a man who is a cunning player³ on a [the] harp; and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and 17 thou shalt be well. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now a man that 18 can play well,⁴ and bring him to me. Then answered one of the servants [And one of the young men answered] and said, Behold I have seen a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, that is cunning in playing⁴ and a mighty valiant man and a man of war and prudent in matters⁵ and a comely person, and the Lord [Jehovah] is with 19 him. Wherefore [And] Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, and said, Send [ins. to] 20 me David thy son, which is with the sheep. And Jesse took an ass⁶ laden with bread, and a bottle [skin] of wine, and a kid,⁷ and sent them by David his son 21 unto Saul. And David came to Saul, and stood before him, and he loved him 22 greatly, and he became his armor-bearer. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let 23 David, I pray thee, stand before me, for he hath found favor in my sight. And it came to pass, when the *evil*⁸ spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took an [the] harp, and played with his hand, so [and] Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 15. The Heb. text here uniformly designates the source of righteous influence as "the Spirit of Jehovah," and the source of evil influence as "evil spirit," "evil spirit of God," or "evil spirit from Jehovah," the significance of the last preposition being obvious; except in ver. 23, where it is "spirit of God," and Sept., Chald., Syr., Arab. and Eng. A. V. there insert "evil;" in xix. 9 it is "evil spirit of Jehovah," and there Sept. writes "God," instead of Jehovah, Chald. and Eng. A. V. insert "from" before "Jehovah," and Arab. omits the divine name. Elsewhere throughout the Old Testament the Divine Spirit is called either "Spirit of God" or "Spirit of Jehovah."—Ta.]

² [Ver. 16. This clause is difficult in the Heb., and varies in the ancient VSS. Chald. follows the Heb.; Sept. takes עֲבָדֶיךָ as subject, omits אֲדַבְּרָנָה, and renders: "let thy servants now say before thee and seek," where "say" for "speak" is not tolerable (we should expect רָכַח instead of אָמַר); Vulg.: "let our lord command, and thy servants who are before thee will seek," where לִפְנֶיךָ is made to qualify "servants" (so in Eng. A. V.), contrary to usage, which demands that it stand after a verbal conception; Syr. omits the speech of the servants in ver. 16, and goes on in ver. 18: "thy servants are before thee, let them seek." As the Heb. now stands, the words לִפְנֶיךָ עֲבָדֶיךָ must form a separate clause; but the construction is thus harsh. If we could omit לִפְנֶיךָ (which, however, is sustained by all the VSS.), an easy reading would be given: "let our lord now command, and thy servants will seek."—The use of the second pers. suffix when the verb is in the third pers., though not the usual construction, occurs elsewhere, as 2 Sam. xiv. 11.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 16. The participle, as complement of the verb "to know." See Ew., Gr. § 285, a, and Ges. § 142, 4.—Ta.]

⁴ [Vers. 17 and 18. Infin. as complement, Ges. § 142.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 18. Or, "in speech," as in margin of Eng. A. V.; but "affairs" seems to suit the connection better.

Chald. "counsel" Vulg., Syr. and Erdmann "word." In Isa. iii. 3 לִשְׁכָּח is "enchantment," though the phrase is rendered by Jewish commentators "clever in discourse" (Philippson). Comp. 1 Sam. xviii. 14.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 20. Sept. "omer" or "homer" (ῥομβος), on which Wellh. rightly says that bread was not reckoned by measure; he proposes to read a numeral here instead of רֹמְבֹס, since bread was usually counted by loaves.

But we may follow the ancient VSS., which render "ass-load of bread."—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 20. Fully: "a kid of the goats."—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 23. See note 1 on ver. 15.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 15. Observe the sharp contrast between the statement in ver. 13: "the Spirit of the Lord came upon David," and that which here immediately follows: The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul.—The Spirit is meant which Saul received in consequence of his anointing, and by which he became another man, that is, a man full of great royal thoughts, courage of faith and inspiration. The cause of the departure of the divine Spirit from him, as given in the narrative, was his rejection by the Lord, and his persistent, impenitent pride and disobedience of heart towards the Lord.—Berl. Bib.: "No doubt Saul took his rejection to heart, and, instead of yielding humbly to God's righteous judgment and bowing beneath God's mighty hand, gave himself up to displeasure and discontent at God's holy ways, and was therefore given over to the power of an evil spirit, which vexed him and sometimes even drove him to madness."—And an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him; literally, fell upon him and frightened him (נִצְּלָהוּ). Pa. xviii. 5. The narrator means to describe Saul's condition as one of anxiety and terror, which was produced in him by an evil spirit. This spirit (called in ver. 23 also the evil spirit), is, according to the narrative, not the condition itself of gloomy melancholy and torturing anguish, but an objective power, which produced it. It is a wicked spiritual power, which came upon him as the opposite of the good, holy spirit which he had once possessed, and goaded him to rage and madness (xviii. 10, 11), finding its occasion in the conflict within his soul and in the passionateness of his nature, which, after the Spirit of the Lord left him, was unbridled. It came on Saul from the Lord; that is, the Lord gave him over to the power and might of this spirit as punishment for his disobedience and defiant self-will; for this reason this spirit is called in vers. 15, 16 "an evil spirit of God," and in ver. 23 simply "a spirit of God," that is, one that came from God. [It seems clear that the evil spirit here cannot be resolved into simple melancholy without doing violence to the narrative (so the demons of the N. T.). Reasons for melancholy and madness may be found in Saul's life and character (see the pathological and psychological aspects of his case treated by Kitto, Maurice, Krummacher, Ewald, and others), but over and above these the narrative speaks, as Erdmann says, of an objective spiritual wicked power, which had strange control over him. This possession by the spirit was in accordance with psychological conditions, yet distinct from them, and was controlled by the almighty God of Israel. We have here the proof of the belief in evil spirits by the Israelites many centuries before the exile, a belief very general, no doubt, though not as fully developed here as in "Job."—Tr.]—The servants of Saul speak of this cause of his mental condition in order (ver. 16) to counsel him to let them find a skilful harpist, that he may be healed by the strains of music of his suffering of soul. Saul having commanded this (ver. 17), one of the young men of the court (ver. 18) mentioned the son of Jesse, whom he himself knew. In order to induce Saul to call him to court, he describes him at length, as not merely a harpist, but also what would especially recommend him to Saul, a valiant man, a man of war, an elegant man [or prudent—Tr.], a comely person, with whom the Lord is. All these characteristics appear clearly in David's history; their combination in this description shows that the young man was well acquainted with him. His beauty of person has already been mentioned in ver. 12. He had showed his bravery and warlike spirit, if not in battle, yet in conflict with ravenous beasts for his herd (xvii. 34 sq.). His piety and communion with the Lord, the culminating point of the description, has already been referred to in vers. 12, 13. His eloquence is a new feature and characterizes the future psalmist.—Ver. 19. The message to Jesse to send his son to court.—Ver. 20. Jesse is soon ready. He sends his son with presents appropriate to a herdsman and countryman. From this it appears that it was still customary to bring presents as a sign of obedience and subjection, see on x. 4. The Heb. text, in spite of its difficulty, is to be retained; render: an ass laden with bread. נִסְתָּר, not, as Sept., נִסְתָּר, "since bread was not reckoned by measures" (Keil). Clericus: "an ass laden with bread, with a skin of wine and with a kid, so that David might have nothing to carry." Maur.: "an ass laden with bread," &c. Compare the ἄρτων τρεῖς θύους (= τριῶν θύων φάρτων) [three asses of bread = a load of three asses] of the tragic poet Sossibius.—Ver. 21. So David came to Saul and stood before him; that is, served him. Becoming fond of him, Saul retained him and placed him among his armor-bearers, entrusted him, therefore, with a military service, informing Jesse (ver. 22) that his son would remain with him.—Ver. 23. David's playing had the effect of relieving, freeing Saul from his suffering, so that he became well again; when he heard the music, the evil spirit departed from him. The power of musical sounds over Saul was such that his gloomy mood vanished. Many illustrations from heathen writers of the wholesome effect of music on the mind are given by Cleric, Grot., and Bochart, in the Hieroz. p. I., 1, II., c. 44 (I., p. 511 sqq. ed. Rosenmüller). [Bochart also inquires whether David's songs to Saul were sacred or secular (see Browning's poem "Saul"), and how music had power over the evil spirit. See Kitto, "Saul and David," p. 202 sq.—On the nature of the instrument which David used, the harp, kinnor, see on x. 5, and the Bib.-Dictionaries and books on Archaeology. Whether the kinnor was played with the hand or with a plectrum (either would suit the statement in ver. 23) is uncertain.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. To be rejected by the Lord for continued disobedience and hardness of heart against the chastening and guidance of His Spirit, is identical with the departure from the heart of the Spirit of God, which can dwell and be efficient only where heart and will are turned to the light from above. But when the Spirit of God departs from the man, he is not simply left to himself, but, as Saul's example shows, his heart becomes the abode of the evil spirit. Theodoret: "Where the divine spirit departs, the wicked spirit comes in his place."

This should teach us to pray with David: Take not thy Holy Spirit from me." Man is governed either by the Spirit from above or by the spirit from beneath; there is no third course. For he is as little isolated in the invisible as in the visible world; he must be part of the organism of the one or the other of the invisible worlds; he belongs either to the kingdom of light or to the kingdom of darkness; he is guided either by the Spirit of the Lord or by the evil spirit, according as he decides for a permanent attitude of heart and direction of will to this side or that. But Saul's example teaches still more, namely, the divine causality in the position of the rejected man under the power of the evil spirit: He gives the apostate, reprobate man into the power of the evil spirit, permits the latter to control him; when man by continued conscious opposition to Him renders His Spirit inefficacious He righteously punishes him by giving him over to the evil spirit, who must serve God, and can do nothing except the Lord, who is almighty over all spirits, give him a field within the moral order of the world, in which, for the execution of His punitive justice, even the power of the evil one must be subservient to Him. Therefore the wicked spirit is here called a spirit "from the Lord." *—The consequence of the possession of the inner life by the evil spirit is not merely its sunderance and derangement (there being of necessity conflict partly between the divine nature of the soul and its indwelling ungodly inclinations and passions, and partly among these last themselves), but at the same time the filling of the heart with wicked thoughts, dark melancholy, and the spirit of hatred, the perversion and dedication of the natural noble gifts of the spirit and heart (so richly possessed by Saul) to the service of the kingdom of evil. But in all this there is presupposed as back-ground not a merely physical suffering, but a corresponding ethical determination of the inner life against God. "There is much suffering and melancholy which has its origin in purely bodily sickness; as soon as the sickness ceases, the melancholy also ceases. But there is also to-day much heaviness of mind, which has its ground in the kingdom of darkness" (Schlier).†

2. The counter-picture to Saul, who is controlled by the evil spirit, is David, under the guidance and discipline of the Spirit of God from his anointment on. His divinely-bestowed natural gift of poetry and music is not merely sanctified and consecrated by the Spirit of the Lord, but also powerfully developed and intensified, and by the Lord's ordination taken into the service of His merciful love; for this love is seen in that He makes David's art alleviate Saul's sufferings, and in the depth of Saul's soul makes the chords of the godlike man resound in the demon-possessed nature and drown its tones. The power to set forth the Beautiful as the Harmonious in music is a natural gift of God's grace, which, employed in the service of sin and of the kingdom of darkness, robs music of its divine nobility and misuses it for the furtherance of the kingdom of evil in the human heart and in the world; but, on the other hand, (as in David's case), developed according to its God-implanted laws, and under the guiding discipline of God's Spirit, checks and expels the power of evil, rouses again the nobler feelings of human nature (created by and for God), and restores at least for a time the disturbed harmony of the life of the soul. David's harp playing before Saul is the prelude to the harpings and songs which flowed from the heart of the future royal singer.

3. With the beginning of his service at the court of Saul, David, under the wonderful guidance of God's hand, whence he had through Samuel received the royal anointing, enters on the path of inner and outer development till he ascends the throne. It was the way of external cultivation and preparation for the representative side of the kingdom by the experiences and knowledges which he gained at the royal court concerning all that pertained to the fulfilment of the royal calling, but also, what is far more important, a way of deep suffering, which must needs have served to try and tempt, but also to purify, prove and confirm him, and establish his inner life in communion with his God; from this school of suffering, whose experiences afterwards resound throughout his Psalms, he comes forth as a man who has been educated from shepherd-boy to king.

[Helps in the study of David's life: Chandler's Life of David (abounds in illustrations from classic antiquity, and is polemical against Bayle); Ewald's History of Israel; Stanley's Jewish Church (brilliant in description); Schlier's Saul and Krummacher's David (devotional); Stähelin's David (strictly scientific); F. D. Maurice, Prophets and Kings of O. T. (fresh and clear); Kitto's Saul and David (in Daily Bib. Illust.); W. M. Taylor's David, 1875 (excellent); Graetz, Geschichte der Juden; Apocrypha relating to David in Fabricius, Codex Pseud. Vet. Test., Tom. I.; Legends concerning him in Koran, Suras ii., xxxviii.; Weil's Biblical Legends of the Mussulmans; Baring-Gould's Legends of O. T. Characters. See also Josephus, Antiquities VI. 8—VII. 15; Wilberforce's Heroes of Hebrew History; and Articles in the Dictionaries of Herzog, Smith, Fairbairn, and Ersch and Grube. Voltaire and Bayle deal with David's life in an unworthy spirit.—TR.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 14. CALVIN: As God grants His gifts richly to those who serve Him in the obedience of faith, so He withdraws them again from those who are slothful in employing them, that we may not believe God is under obligation to us. God does indeed distribute His gifts richly and abundantly, but He also demands from us the right use of them, that they may subserve His aims. Whoever, then, does not give back to God what He has received from Him, will certainly soon lose it.—CRAMER: He who will not let himself be ruled by the Spirit of God, drives it out; and where that is driven out, there is no third state possible, but the evil spirit goes in again, Luke xi. 23 sq.—Vers. 15, 16. SCHMID: We should have compassion even upon those who by their sins have drawn on themselves God's chastisement, and should give them counsel as to how their case may be bettered.—[Ver. 18. David was a brave soldier and a famous musician. There is a very unwise notion abroad in America that to perform well on musical instruments is something effeminate. But the Hebrews thought not so, nor did the Greeks, nor do the Germans.—TR.]—Ver. 19. OSLANDER: God gradually, more and more, draws His people forward and exalts them; yea, He leads them by degrees from one ground to another even unto eternal life.—Ver. 23. CRAMER: Only God's word and believing prayer can drive out Satan with his assaults, Eph. vi. 17, 18.—SCHLIER: There is a wonderful power in song and the harp over the human heart; how much sorrow and anguish retreat before it—how much of the power of darkness is broken; where song and the harp dwell in the fear of God, there the power of evil spirits gives way, there the good spirits come, hell is silent, heaven comes down.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: We ask, "Did the harmonies banish the demon?" No! But the higher mood into which the king was brought by them sufficed at least to give the affliction less room for working on his mind, while against a full, clearly conscious life of faith on Saul's part, the power of the evil spirit would have been utterly wrecked.—SCHLIER: Thoroughly better would it have been for him if he had been converted—if he had earnestly repented. But of repentance Saul would know nothing; he let himself be cheered, but he would not turn about. If our sins give to the kingdom of darkness power over us, then we must repent. He who chooses to persevere in sin and cannot acknowledge his guilt, should not wonder forsooth if he finds no peace. Evil conscience, evil guest. No peace, nor any rest! But the word stands fast forever that the Lord makes the upright to prosper.—WUERT. SUMMARY: The mourning of this world and the heaviness proceeding from an evil conscience can be relieved by no harping nor any diversion, if forgiveness of sins is not earnestly sought and gained, and the heart is not truly bettered.

* [On the relation of the spiritual influence on Saul to the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit as taught in the N. T., see Hodge's Theol., II., 660 sq. (especially 668).—TR.]

† [On the possibility of demoniac possession at the present day, and on the general subject of the power of evil spirits in the ancient and modern world, see Mr. R. S. Poole's Art. "Magic" in Smith's Bib. Dict.—TR.]

Vers. 13–23. J. DISSELHOFF: The anointing of the chosen one: 1) Whom the Lord chooses for His servant, He causes before His work to be anointed with power from on high; 2) The anointing does not at once give the throne, but it first leads into lowliness; 3) The anointing does not annihilate natural gifts and powers, but sanctifies them and fits them for the service of the Lord.

Vers. 14–23. F. W. KRUMMACHER: The harper: 1) How David came to Saul; 2) What he experienced at the king's court.

Ver. 14. Man is under the dominion either of the holy or of the evil spirit: 1) Statement of this truth. 2) Indication of the opposite consequences in the two cases. 3) Application of the solemn warnings therein contained.

[Ver. 21. "And he loved him greatly." 1) Saul, with all his faults, a loving man. Comp. xxiv. 16. 2) David an eminently lovable youth. Some of the qualities which made him such are indicated in ver. 18: handsome, accomplished, brave and soldierly, prudent, pious. (Highly creditable to a youth to gain the love of old men.) 3) The Lord loved David, and caused his fellowmen to love him. Vers. 13, 18. Comp. Gen. xxxix.

Vers. 17–22. Example of the young harper David: 1) Improvement of youthful leisure a preparation for the work of life. 2) Something in itself unimportant often the providential occasion of great results. But note: a) It can only be the occasion; the causes must together be as great as the effect. b) There must be disciplined character, or occasions will be in vain. 3) A youth leaving home for scenes of temptation is safe if "the Lord is with him." (Comp. W. M. TAYLOR, David, Sermon III.)

ROBERT BROWNING's finest poem is on "Saul," depicting his madness, and the effect of David's harp and song.—TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

Saul's New War with the Philistines and David's Exploit with its Diverse Consequences for Him and for his Relation to Saul.

CHAPTERS XVII.—XIX. 7.

I. The two Camps and Goliath's arrogant Challenge.

CHAP. XVII. 1–11.

- 1 Now [AND] the Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shochoh [Socoh], which belongeth to Judah, and pitched
- 2 between Shochoh [Socoh] and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim.¹ And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by [in] the valley of Elah 3 [of the Terebinth], and set the battle in array against the Philistines. And the Philistines stood on a [the] mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a [the] mountain on the other side, and there was a valley [the ravine 4 was] between them. And there went out a champion^a out of [from] the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and 5 a span. And he had an helmet of brass [copper] upon his head, and he was armed with [clothed in] a coat of mail [corselet of scales]; and the weight of the coat 6 [corselet] was five thousand shekels of brass [copper]. And he had greaves^b of brass [copper] upon his legs, and a target [javelin] of brass [copper] between his 7 shoulders. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head^c weighed six hundred shekels of iron; and one bearing a shield [the shield-8 bearer] went before him. And he stood and cried unto the armies [ranks]^d of Israel, and said unto them, Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? am

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. This name is variously spelled in the VSS. Sept. Vat., Ἐφεσδαμὶν (omission of s and r for d), Ag. & ἐφεσδαμὶν, Syr. Opharsemin (for Opharsemin, a common mode of inversion in Syriac writing of proper names, and r for d), Arab. Pharasemin (after the Syriac), Vulg. Amibus Dommim (confines of Dommim, a translation of the first part of the Heb. word). These readings establish the form in the text, which, however, appears in 1 Chron. xi. 13 as Pae-dammim (Sept. Ἐφεσδαμὶν, Syr. Paei demayo [Paei, or well of the waters], Vulg. Pseudomim, Arab. well of Bethlehem [after Syr.]), probably a shortened form of our word.—TR.]

 I not a [the] Philistine, and ye servants^e to Saul? choose you a man for you, and 9 let him come down to me. If he be able to fight with me, and to [om. to] kill me, then will we be your servants; but [and] if I prevail against him and kill him, 10 then shall ye be our servants and serve us. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies [ranks] of Israel this day; give me a man that we may fight together.
 11 When [And] Saul and all Israel heard these words of the Philistine, [ins. and] they were dismayed and greatly afraid.

II. David and Goliath. Vers. 12-54.

12 Now [And] David was the son of that [this] Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah, whose name was Jesse; and he had eight sons; and the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul [the man in the days of Saul was old, advanced in 13 years].^a And the three eldest sons of Jesse went and followed [had followed]^b Saul to the battle; and the names of his three sons that went to the battle were 14 Eliab, the first-born, and next unto him Abinadab, and the third Shammah. And 15 David was the youngest; and the three eldest followed Saul. But [And] David 16 went and returned from^c Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem. And the 17 Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run [carry them quickly] to the camp to thy brethren.

^a [Ver. 4. Chald. (misunderstanding the Heb., but serving to establish the text) "a man from between them," Syr. "giant." The Vulg. curiously renders "spurious," that is, according to explanations suggested in Poole's Synopsis, "giant," because giants were looked on as despising the laws of marriage, born of uncertain fathers, hence called "sons of the earth." The rendering "giant," "mighty man,"—"one distinguished among (יָצָא) men," or "a man of sons (בְּנֵי)"]—Ta.]

^b [Ver. 5. In the Heb. Sing., but according to all the ancient VSS. Plu.—Ta.]

^c [Ver. 7. Literally "flame," from the flashing of the metal, Aq., Th., φάλαξ δόρυς.—Ta.]

^d [Ver. 8. It seems better to express in the translation the distinction between "army" (צְבָא, חֵיל, מַחֲנֶה) and "ranks" (מַעְרָבָה)—Ta.]

^e [Ver. 8. Sept. writes badly "Hebrews," and omits Art. before "Philistine." "The phrase 'the Philistine' is conceived from the stand-point of the Jewish narrator" (Wellh.).—Ta.]

^f [Ver. 12. This word (הָיָה) is grammatically impracticable; it no doubt belongs to the original text, being the Redactor's reference to the preceding narrative, ch. xvi., and in order to indicate this reference in the translation, the word is rendered "this," instead of "that." It is retained in Chald., Vulg., Greek (σὺν, possibly), and omitted (on account of the difficulty) in Syr., Arab.—On the omission of vers. 12-31 in the Vat. Sept., see Erdmann in Introductio and Expositio.—Ta.]

^g [Ver. 12. This corrected reading is adopted (from the Syriac) also by Maurer, Thenius, Wellhausen, and by Erdmann. Bib. Comm. prefers the reading of the Vulg.: "old and of a great age among men" (אֵלֶּיךָ בְּיָמָיו) which, however, is hardly defensible. The inversion of Eng. A. V. is not allowable. The Chald. has (in Jesse's honor): "the man in the days of Saul was old, counted among the choice young men." So in Talmud, Berakoth 58, 1, the explanation is: "he went forth with the army, and went in with the army, and taught in the army" (but Philippon renders: "he had a retinue"). These attempts all do violence to the text, which in its present form yields no good sense, but becomes natural and easy when we substitute אֵלֶּיךָ or יָצָא for אֵלֶּיךָ. See Erdmann's Expositio.—Ta.]

^h [Ver. 12. This construction is explained by the grammarians as pluperfect; yet its difficulty suggests an insertion of הָיָה by clerical error, possibly from the following clause. At the same time this whole paragraph is marked by grammatical harshness, due to the connection which the Redactor keeps up with ch. xvi.—Ta.]

ⁱ [Ver. 15. Some MSS. have מִמֶּנּוּ instead of מִמֶּלֶךְ, and one inserts בְּ before "Bethlehem."—Ta.]

18 ren; And carry these ten cheeses [pieces of cheese¹¹] unto the captain of their thousand, and look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge [and bring a token¹² from them]. Now [And] Saul and they and all the men of Israel *were*¹³ in the valley of Elah [of the Terebinth], fighting with the Philistines. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him, and he [om. he] came to the trench [wagon-rampart] as [and] the host was going forth¹⁴ to the fight and [ins. they] shouted for the battle. For [And] Israel and the Philistines had [om. had] put the battle in array army against army [line against line]. And David left¹⁵ his carriage [baggage] in the hand of the keeper of the carriage [baggage], and ran into the army [ranks], and came and saluted [asked after the welfare of] his brethren. And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion, the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name [Goliath the Philistine by name, of Gath¹⁶], out of the armies [from the ranks¹⁷] of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words; and David heard them. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid. And the men of Israel said, Have ye seen this man that is come up? surely [for] to defy Israel is he come up; and it shall be that the man who killeth him, the king will enrich¹⁸ him with great riches, and will give him his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel. And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies [ranks] of the living God? And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done to the man that killeth him. And Eliab, his eldest brother, heard when he spake unto the men, and Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why comest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle (for to see the battle art thou come down). And David said, What have I now done? Is there not a cause [Was it not a word merely¹⁹]? And he turned from him toward another, and spake after the same manner; and the people answered him again after the former manner. And when [om. when] the words were heard which David spake, [ins. and] they rehearsed them before Saul; and he sent for him.

32 And David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him; thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. And Saul said to David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him, for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a [the] lion and a [the] bear,²⁰ and took a lamb²¹ out of the flock; And I went after him and smote him and delivered it out of his mouth; and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard,²² and smote him and slew him. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear; and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them,²³ seeing he hath defied the armies [ranks]

¹¹ [Ver. 18. Properly "thick curds."—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 18. Aq. σύμμιξιν (intercourse), Sym. μισθοφορίας (pay), Th. ὁ δὲ δὲν χορῆγον, Chald. "their welfare," Syr. "message"—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 19. Or, if this be a part of Jesse's speech, "are;" so Erdmann.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 20. The Art. is to be omitted before לָקַח, otherwise לָקַח, etc., must be the Accus. after לָקַח, which gives an unnatural sense, and breaks the connection with לָקַח.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 22. The Heb. is more lively: "put his baggage from him upon the hand," etc.—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 23. So the Heb. requires. The champion's name was "Goliath the Philistine."—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 23. On the Kethib and Qeri see Erdmann, Exposition.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 25. The unusual Hiph. form (omission of chireq) is perhaps from assimilation to the preceding word, the doubled Nun depressing the pretonic syllable. Similar form in 1 Sam. xiv. 22.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 29. So also Erdmann, Philippson, Bib. Com., and the ancient VSS.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 34. On the Art. and לָקַח see the Exposition. Maurer proposes to render לָקַח "with," equivalent to "and." So Kimchi and Junius in 2 Kings vi. 5.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 34. The לָקַח for לָקַח is a remarkable instance of a perpetuated clerical error. Norn and De Rossi state that all MSS. and early Edd. read לָקַח; but the Ed. of Athias has retained the erroneous form which is corrected by some other editors (as Walton).—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 35. Sept. "throat;" other VSS. as Heb.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 36. Sept. here inserts: "shall I not go and smite him, and take away to-day the reproach from Israel?" so nearly the Vulg.—an insertion from ver. 26.—Ta.]

37 of the living God. David said moreover [And David said], The Lord [Jehovah] that delivered me out of the paw [hand]³⁴ of the lion and out of the paw [hand] of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of the Philistine. And Saul said unto 38 David, Go, and the Lord [Jehovah] be³⁵ with thee. And Saul armed David with his armor [clothed David with his military dress], and he [om. he] put an helmet³⁶ of brass [copper] upon his head, also he [and] armed [clothed] him with a coat of 39 mail [corselet of scales]. And David girded his sword upon his armor [dress] and he [om. he] assayed³⁷ to go, for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, 40 I cannot go with [in] these, for I have not proved them. And David put them off him. And he took his staff in his hand, and chose him five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in [into] a [the] shepherd's bag³⁸ which he had, even [namely] in [into] a [the] scrip;³⁹ and his sling was in his hand, and he drew near to the Philistine.

41 And⁴⁰ the Philistine came on and drew near [the Philistine drew nearer and 42 nearer] unto David, and the man that bare the shield went before him. And when [om. when] the Philistine looked about [om. about] and saw David, [ins. and] he disdained him, for he was but [om. but] a youth and ruddy and of a fair countenance.⁴¹ And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to 44 me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods. And the Philistine said to David, Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto [to] the fowls of 45 the air and to the beasts of the field.⁴² Then said David [And David said] to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a [om. a] sword and with a [om. a] spear and with a [om. a] shield [javelin], but I come to thee in the name of the Lord [Jehovah] of hosts, the God of the armies [ranks] of Israel, whom thou hast defied.
 46 This day will the Lord [Jehovah] deliver thee into my hand, and I will smite thee and take thine head from thee, and I will give the carcasses⁴³ of the host [army] of the Philistines this day unto [to] the fowls of the air and to the wild beasts of the earth, that [and] all the earth may [shall] know that there is a God in Israel
 47 [Israel hath a God]. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord [Jehovah] saveth not with sword and spear; for the battle is the Lord's [Jehovah's], and he 48 will give you into our hands. And⁴⁴ it came to pass, when the Philistine arose and came [went] and drew nigh to meet David, that David hasted and ran toward the 49 army [line] to meet the Philistine. And David put his hand in [into] his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, and ³⁴ [Ver. 37. Th. "mouth." The word "hand" should be retained, in the sense of "power."—Tx.]

³⁵ [Ver. 37. The unapococp. Impl. sometimes occurs in optative sense, as in 1 Sam. iii. 17, וַיִּשְׁמַע.—Tx.]

³⁶ [Ver. 38. Instead of וַיַּחַד some MSS. and edd. have וַיַּחַד.—Tx.]

³⁷ [Ver. 39. Sept. ἐκωάσας, "labored in going, went with difficulty," as if they read ἐκωάσας, which is not a bad sense. Sym. gives ἐκωάσας, "limped," and so other (anonymous) Grk. VSS. ἐκωάσας, which may represent the text-word or וַיִּחַד. The Vulg. renders "began" (and so Erdmann), and Syr., Arab., Chald., "did not wish." The Heb. word (וַיִּחַד) more commonly means "to be content, willing," but in some cases expresses determination, resolution, making up one's mind to a thing. Thus in Deut. i. 5 Moses "determines, takes in hand," to explain the law, and in Josh. xvii. 12 the Canaanites "resolved and carried out their resolution" to dwell in the land. Here David resolves, undertakes to walk in armor, because he had not tried it; if he had tried it before, he would not have made such a resolution. Thus in the Heb. stem lies the conception of "resolving" with the added idea frequently that the attempt is made to carry out the resolution, so that the Eng. "undertake, assay, begin, succeed in (when the undertaking is carried out), fail (when the undertaking is not carried out)," may in different connections properly render it. So a similar determination is often found in the Heb. and Chald. וַיִּחַד, which with the neg. means "resolve not to do a thing."—We may then maintain the Heb. text against the Sept., and we see that the Chald. and Syr. have introduced into their translation the expression of the failure which is expressed in the context, and may be involved in the Heb. וַיִּחַד.—Tx.]

⁴⁰ [Ver. 40. "Fixture" is not a good word; but some general term is needed for Heb. וַיִּחַד, like Germ. geräth or weg. The double name here is suspicious; the second is omitted by Vulg., and translated eis συλλογὴν by Sept.; but both are given in Chald. and Syr. One may be a gloss.—Instead of "smooth stones," L. de Dieu renders "parts of stones," i. e. "sharp pieces," and refers to Isa. lvii. 6.—Tx.]

⁴¹ [Ver. 41. This verse is omitted in Sept., but is in keeping with the liveliness of the whole description.—Tx.]

⁴² [Ver. 42. Sept. and a few MSS. read "eyes."—Tx.]

⁴³ [Ver. 44. Some VSS. and MSS. have "earth."—Tx.]

⁴⁴ [Ver. 46. In the Heb. the word is וַיִּחַד; comp. Am. viii. 3 for collective force. To this Wellhausen objects that the collective sense is inadmissible before וַיִּחַד, and therefore prefers the Sept. reading "thy corpse and the corpses of the camp;" yet וַיִּחַד may here easily—"mass of corpses," as Chald. "putrid flesh."—Tx.]

⁴⁵ [Ver. 48. The simpler form of this verse in the Sept.: "and the Philistine arose, and went to meet David," seems not so much in accordance with the tone of the narrative as the more elaborate expression of the Heb. —Tx.]

- 50 the stone sank into his forehead, and he fell upon his face to the earth. So [And]⁸⁴ David prevailed over the Philistine with a [om. a] sling and with a [om. a] stone, and smote the Philistine and slew him, but [and] there was no sword in the hand of David. Therefore [And] David ran and stood upon the Philistine, and took his sword, and drew it out of the sheath thereof, and slew him and cut off his head therewith. And when [om. when] the Philistines saw their champion was dead, 52 [ins. and] they fled. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose and shouted, and pursued the Philistines until thou come to the valley [ravine⁸⁵] and to the gate of Ekron. And the wounded of the Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim, 53 even [and] to [as far as] Gath and to [as far as] Ekron. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and they spoiled their tents 54 [camps]. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem, but [and] he put his armour [trappings] in [into] his tent.

⁸⁴ [Ver. 50. This recapitulatory verse (quite in the Heb. manner) is omitted in Sept.—Ta.]

⁸⁵ [Ver. 52. Erdmann and others take the Sept. reading "Gath" (Γαθ), instead of "ravine" (Μαθ), a not improbable correction; yet the VSS. sustain the Heb. reading, which, moreover, as the more difficult, would easily be changed into the obvious "Gath." It is better to retain Shaaraim as a proper name, as a more natural geographical description of the direction of the rout; the rendering: "In the gate-way," moreover, as a climax, ought to follow, not precede, the words: "and to Gath and to Ekron."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-11. The camps of the Philistines and the Israelites confronting one another. Goliath's appearance on the scene and his arrogant challenge. The power of the Philistines was not broken; they rose with renewed strength against Israel, and made another attempt to reduce them to subjection. The Philistine army assembled at Socoh, now Shuweikeh. This is, however, not the Socoh (also called Shuweikeh) three German [fourteen English] miles southwest of Hebron on the spurs of the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 48), but the Socoh west of these mountains in the plain of Judah, about four German [nineteen English] miles southwest of Jerusalem, and about three German [fourteen Eng.] miles southwest of Bethlehem (Josh. xv. 35) in Wady Sumt (Acacia-valley), which Robinson, II., 604 [Am. ed., II., 20, 21] regards as the same with Terebinth-valley (ver. 2), while, according to Thénius, "the latter is probably to be looked for in a branch of that Wady, in Wady Sûr, which runs up towards Beit-Nuab." Azekah, whither (Josh. x. 10) Joshua pursued the five kings who were besieging Gibeon, from Gibeon, that is, to the southwest. Its position is in general determined by that of Ephes-dammim, the present ruins of Damum, about one Germ. [four and three-fourths Eng.] mile northeast of Shuweikeh. The rendezvous of the army was Socoh, the camp was at Ephesdammim. On the nature of the ground, according to Robinson, see Ritter, XVI. 114 sq.*—Ver. 2. The Israelitish army assembled and encamped in the Terebinth-valley. As the Israelites must have moved from the northeast, the Terebinth-valley must be placed northeast of the Philistine position, and regarded as a plain in Wady Sur or Massur.—Ver. 3. The position of the opposing armies towards the mountain, on the declivity of the mountain (this is not in conflict with the Israelitish position in the Terebinth-valley, if we suppose lowlands descending from the heights), the two separated by the still deeper bed of a brook, is vividly described.—Ver. 4. Goliath comes forward—description of his person. He is called "the man of the midst," middleman [champion] because he advances between the two armies (vers. 8, 9) to decide the matter by single combat. (Maurer: "D'13 interval between two things, here between two armies (râ metaxua, Eur. Phœa. v. 1285, on which the Schol. says: "the space between armies where single combats took place), whence D'137 ו'13, one who decides a contest by single combat between two army-lines." Sept. Al., Ἀμεσολος (ver. 23), error for δμεσολος). See examples of similar single combats among the Oriental nations in Stähelin's "Leben Davids," Bas. 1866, p. 4.* Neither of the armies dares to attack. Saul and Israel feared the Philistines, instead of bravely attacking the hereditary enemy of the Theocracy in reliance on the help of the Lord. The explanation is found in Saul's false attitude towards the Lord. "The king reckons only with human factors, believing that he has forfeited all claim to help from above. What wonder that his position seems to him in general doubtful, and he thinks it prudent—unbelief makes us cowards—to act merely on the defensive." (F. W. Krummacher.) The plu. "out of the camps of the Philistines" does not justify us in accepting the arbitrary rendering of the Sept., "out of the ranks," it refers to the various camp-divisions out of which Goliath came (comp. Ew. § 178 d).—Gath, one of the five Philistine capital-cities, has now disappeared without trace. When Joshua destroyed the giant race of the Enakim (Josh. xi. 21 sq.) in this region, there remained some of them only in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (ver. 22). Goliath's height is given exactly: six cubits and a span. The change in the Sept. of the six to four is due to the desire to give plausibility to what seemed incredible. According to Thénius (die althebr. Längen und Hohlmaasse in den Theol. Stud. und Krit., 1846, p. 117 sq.) Goliath's height was 9 feet 1 inch (Parisian).† See in Then. and Keil (Comms. on this verse) examples of like

* [Examples from classic history in Chandler's "David,"—Ta.]

† [According to other computations the cubit was eighteen inches, and the span nine inches, Goliath's height, therefore, nine feet nine inches. The copper-shekel is by some estimated at a little over an ounce.—Smith's Bib.-Dict., "Weights and Measures."—Ta.]

* [See Arts. "Socoh," "Azekah," "Ephesdammim," in Smith's Bib.-Dict.—Ta.]

tallness in ancient and modern times. The skeletons of Pusio and Secundilla, mentioned by Pliny (N. H. 7, 16) were a Paris inch longer [10 ft. 3 in. Roman measure.] [Keil mentions a giant who came to Berlin in the year 1857, who was as tall as Goliath; and "Chang, the Chinese giant, lately in England, was 7 feet 8 inches high" (Bib. Com.). On the giants of the Bible see the dictionaries of Winer (Riesen), Herzog (id.), Smith, and Fairbairn.—Tr.]—Vers. 5-7. Goliath's arms are in keeping with his bodily size: 1) copper-helmet; 2) scale-corselet; (שָׁלֵשׁ, according to Num. xi. 9 sq.; Deut. xiv. 9 sq.; Ezek. xxix. 4 = "scale"), a harness or corselet made of overlapping metallic plates (σκαλιστόν, Aq. "clad with scales"), not of chain-rings. Such scale-corselets were common in ancient oriental wars. See Layard, "Nineveh and its Remains," II. 4, and Bochart, Phal. III. 13. [Also Kitto, "Saul and David," p. 211 sq., and Philippon in loco.] The weight of the corselet, or coat-of-mail, was 5000 shekels; the shekel was not a full German loth [half-ounce]; Then.: "about 139 Dresden pounds." The corselet probably descended far down the body, as we see in the pictures of Assyrian warriors in Layard's "Nineveh." 3) copper-greaves on the legs. (Read plu. "greaves," as in all ancient VSS.) These greaves did not cover the thighs (Bunsen), which in oriental fashion were protected by the corselet. 4) a copper-lance between his shoulders. The Heb. "lance" (יָדָה) is to be retained in spite of the reading "shield" (יָדָה) in Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab. The text is confirmed by ver. 45, "where the shield would be out of place, with two offensive arms" (Then.).* As the ancients carried even their swords on their shoulders (II. 2, 45; Bochart, Hieros. 1, 2, 8), there is nothing strange in his carrying this javelin "between the shoulders." 5) a spear, whose shaft (read יָדָה for יָדָה, comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 19; 1 Chr. xx. 5) was like a weaver's beam, and whose head weighed 600 shekels of iron, "somewhat over 16½ Dresden pounds, quite in keeping with the other statements" (Then.). Vers. 8-11. Goliath's contemptuous and fear-inspiring challenge. Ver. 8. He stood and orled to the ranks of Israel: Why are ye in battle array? behold, I represent the whole Philistine people, and ye are servants of Saul. Send one of you to fight with me, and "let him come down to me;" Goliath was standing, namely, in the valley, beneath the Israelites who were encamped on the hill-side.—Ver. 9. The proposed agreement to decide the question of subjection by the single combat, which, in Goliath's opinion, would undoubtedly result in favor of the Philistines. Clericus here cites the combat between the Horatii and the Curiatii, and the agreement (Liv. I. 23) between the Romans and Albans "that the nation, whose citizens conquered in the combat, should rule the other in peace."—Ver. 10. Goliath's scorn and contempt of Israel lay not merely in the reproach that they were Saul's slaves and in the tone of his words, but also in the challenge itself, because it was not answered.†—

* [It is not necessary to suppose that the VSS. had a different reading from the Heb.; they were misled by the position of the kidon (lance) between the shoulders. See Bochart, Hieros. II. 136-140.—Tr.]

† [The Chald. adds in ver. 8: "I am that Goliath the Philistine, of Gath, that slew the two sons of Eli, the

Ver. 11. Fear and trembling take possession of Israel with Saul at the head. F. W. Krummacher: "Israel is afraid, because its king is. They dare not in childlike spirit appropriate the promises of Jehovah. The wings that should bear them up in trustful upsoaring to the Lord of Hosts are crippled."

Vers. 12-31. David in the camp—his preparation for the combat with Goliath.—Ver. 12. The full account of the person and family of David tells what we already know from chap. xvi., and yet reads as if nothing had been said of his origin. This suggests that the Redactor of the Book here appends and works in a narrative concerning David, which began with the family history, and then related the combat with Goliath and its occasion. This view is supported by the "that" or "this" (הַיֵּנִי), which is evidently added in order to connect the words with xvi. 1. Vulg. properly: "the above-mentioned Ephrathite." The last words of ver. 12 relating to Jesse, the "Ephrathite" (that is, of Ephrath, the old name of Bethlehem, Gen. xlviii. 7, see Ruth i. 1, 2), are difficult. The rendering, with retention of the text, "was come among the weak" (D. Kimchi, S. Schmid, Keil) [Eng. A. V. "went among men"] is opposed to the ordinary meaning of the Heb. (עָמַדְתָּ) = "people, men." Bunsen's explanation: "belonged to the men of standing" is, by his own judgment, possible only by an arbitrary insertion, and is otherwise meaningless. [Comp. the Targum: belonged to the נָתַן, the vigorous young men.—Tr.] Hitzig (see in Thenius) renders: "he was an old man among men," which arbitrarily omits נָתַן, "went." It seems best, with Grotius, Thenius, after Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab., to substitute "in years" (עָמַדְתָּ) instead of the text, and render "he was advanced in years." This phrase indeed is not found elsewhere, but we have the similar phrase "advanced in days" (Gen. xxiv. 1; Josh. xiii. 1) = aged. This statement of Jesse's age gives the reason why he does not himself go into the field, but only his three oldest sons. In the pluperfect "went . . . had gone" (Ew. § 346 c, A. 3—"the verb standing in sequence is then explained as plup. by means of its own perf.") we have a trace of the effort of the Redactor to work the new narrative, to which the simple "went" belonged, into the whole history. The pluperfect was necessary here, because the account of David's family carries us into a time anterior to the already related appearance of Goliath.* While we have here eight sons of Jesse (and so xvi. 10 sq.), only seven are named in 1 Chr. ii. 13-15, David being there the seventh. Clericus rightly supposes that there the name of one of David's brothers is by error omitted. The name of the third, here and xvi. 6-9 written Shammah, is Shimeah in 1 Chr. ii. 13 [Eng. A. V.: Shimmi perhaps after Vulg.—Tr.] and xx. 7, priests Hophni and Phinehas, and carried captive the ark of the covenant of Jehovah, and brought it to the house of Dagon, my Error, and the Philistines have not honored me by making me captain over a thousand . . . what great thing has Saul done that you should make him king?" This Targum (of the fourth century) has not a few such fanciful expressions of the simple and graphic Heb. text.—Tr.]

* [On this construction see "Text. and Grammat."—Tr.]

Shimei in 2 Sam. xxi. 21 [so Kethib, but Qeri is Shimeah; Erdmann writes 'שְׁמִי, putting the vowels of the Qeri under the Kethib, comp. 1 Kings i. 8.—Tr.] and Shimeah in 2 Sam. xiii. 3, 32.—Ver. 14. The words: and the three eldest followed Saul are a repetition of the statement in ver. 13, and show the pains the Redactor took to introduce his new material clearly and connectedly.—Ver. 15. Here the narrator takes up the "and David" of ver. 12, after having explained that the three oldest brothers had followed Saul to the war. David was "going and returning" from Saul to feed his father's sheep in Bethlehem; that is, he did not remain constantly at the court of Saul, but went back and forth, to court, and then home to attend to his pastoral duties. This he could do, since Saul was not always in the gloomy state which required David's harp. Inasmuch as it appears from what follows that this going and returning from Saul was not from the theatre of war (for then he would already have given account of his brothers, and also his appearance there surprises them), it must have fallen in the time before Saul went to the war. According to this David was not constantly at the court of Saul, and from time to time exchanged the harp for the shepherd's staff. Although, according to xvi. 21, he is Saul's armor-bearer, he is yet not with him in the field; he is even (ver. 33) a boy ignorant of war, and (ver. 28) an unauthorized spectator of the battle. This has been regarded as in conflict with ch. xvi., and therefore the section vers. 12-31 has been declared to be a later interpolation (Mich., Eichh., Dath., Berth., after the Vat. Sept., which omits it), or by another author than that of ch. xvi., and in conflict with the latter (De Wette, Then., Ew., Bleek, Winer, Stähelin). But it is unnecessary to suppose a contradiction here. If Joab, the General, had ten armor-bearers (2 Sam. xviii. 15; comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 37), King Saul would certainly have more than one, as to which note that in xvi. 21 it is not said that David became the armor-bearer of Saul [properly: "he became an armor-bearer to him."—Tr.]. As totally unpracticed in war (so ch. xvi. supposes him to be), David, notwithstanding his enrolment among the court-esquires (armor-bearers), could not be needed by Saul in war, and he needed not to be taken along for his music, because in the midst of military affairs Saul's mind was concentrated on one point, held by one thought. Finally, the words of xvi. 21, 22, do not exclude the supposition that David went to and fro to his father; they rather open a way for it, since his service with Saul had respect to a definite end, which no longer existed when Saul's condition of mind was for a long time better. And so this statement in ver. 15 may be very well harmonized with that of xvi. 21-23; they do not exclude each other. The sentence [ver. 15] is to be taken, in connection with the second half of ver. 14, in a pluperfect sense, and as an addition of the Redactor's, the aim of which is to furnish the connection between xvi. 21, 22, and the following narrative of David's visit from Jesse to the army, which is from another source than ch. xvi.—[Paraphrase of vers. 12-17: "Let us leave the army for the present in order to introduce another personage. David was the son of a Bethlehemite named Jesse (already mentioned in ch. xvi.), who, an old man, did not himself go to the war, but had sent his three oldest sons. The youngest, David, had been at Saul's Court, but had been going to and fro to his father's house. It was while the Philistine champion above-mentioned was daily offering his challenge (for he repeated it forty days) that Jesse determined to send David to his brethren."—Tr.].—Ver. 16 connects itself in content with ver. 8, and prepares the way for the progress of the narrative, in order to show how David's conduct on the field of battle over against the bearing of the Philistine was motivated by the insolence of the latter. Thenius: "If vers. 12-31 were interpolated, this explanatory insertion could not be accounted for at all."—Ver. 17. "Parched peas"

(קָלִי, Lev. xxiii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 28) [or "parched grain."—Tr.].—According to Thenius the Ephah=3 Dresden pecks. "And carry them quickly to thy brethren," that is, the parched grain and the bread.—[Bib. Comm.: "All the circumstances necessary for the understanding of the narrative having been explained, it now proceeds more smoothly."—Tr.].—Ver. 18. "Cheeses," that is, pieces of cheese or curds (literally, milk, so the ancient VSS.). The word cannot mean "milk-portion," that is, one milking of a cow (Mich., Schulz), since, as Then. properly remarks, David could not have carried ten such portions with the rest of his load. This gift David is to carry to the captain over a thousand, the chiliarch, under whose command his brothers were. A sketch from military folk-life, such as we often even now see. "And inquire of their welfare"

(דִּלְגוּ), comp. 2 Sam. xi. 7; Gen. xxxvii. 14; 2 Kings x. 3.—And take their token, that is, take a token from them, "that we may see and know that they are well, and that thou hast been with them" (Berl. Bib.). The old expositors have here made unnecessary difficulty. The pledge was a token, which, though David had seen them, would be of special value to the father's heart as an immediate sign from their own hands of their being alive and well (in place of a letter).—Ver. 19 is not an explanatory remark of the Narrator or Redactor, but a part of Jesse's speech to David, who is thus instructed where to find his brothers; we must therefore render in present time: "And Saul . . . are in the terebinth-vale."—[This construction is favored by the phrase: "and they," which seems more appropriate in Jesse's mouth. Yet the rendering of Eng. A. V. is allowable.—Tr.].—Ver. 20 relates the arrival of David on the field of battle, and thus introduces us into military life. מַעְקֵל means properly "wagon-track;" it is doubtful how it is to be rendered here and in xxvi. 5, 7. The Complut. Sept. translates by σπογγίλαις, "rounding," in accordance with the meaning of עָגַל, "to be round," and the usual form of ancient camps

* הַמַּעְקֵלָה [Eng. A. V.: "trench"] the הַ is to be taken with Thenius as הַ local (comp. x. 10, הַמַּעְקֵלָה, and not as feminine ending. [So Gesenius and Buxtorf, but Winer and Furst as the masoretic pointing.—Tr.])

(Winer, R.-W. I. 681). This points not to a wagon-rampart, but to the round circumvallation. Vulg. wrongly: "ad locum Magala."—[The Syr. has "camp," the Chald. "fortification," the Arab. "army" or "camp." Erdmann renders "camp-wall," Philippon "wagon-rampart," Bib.-Com. "wagons," i. e. "wagon-rampart," Calvin, "the place of wagons." This last seems to be the literal meaning of the word (so margin of Eng. A. V.), and best suits the circumstances of 1 Sam. xxvi. 5, 7; the wagons were made into a fortification or rampart. The renderings of Syr. and Arab. are general, of the nature of paraphrases.—Tr.] "The host" is not connected with the preceding verb ("and came to the host"), but begins an independent sentence, in which the original construction "and the host which" is interrupted by the phrase "and they shouted," the subject of which is supplied from "host."*—And they shouted in the battle, that is, raised the war-cry. We need not change the Heb. prep. "in" to "to;" it is a pregnant construction: they shouted as men do in battle [or better "they shouted (and advanced) into the battle."—Tr.]—Ver. 21 gives the position of the opposing armies.—Ver. 22. "His baggage," the present that he had to deliver [and anything else that he might have with him.—Tr.]—"He came and asked after his brothers, in order to learn of their well-being." Clericus: "for he knew that the tribe of Judah was in the front, Num. ii. 3; x. 14."†—Ver. 23. Goliath's advance, already described in ver. 4, and here repeated, first directs David's attention to him, and incites him to the resolution to fight the champion. עָלָה [Eng. A. V. "came up"] is not "came on" (De Wette), but "ascended," that is, he came over the valley so near to the Israelites, that he advanced some distance up the height on which they were encamped, in order to throw more contempt into his challenge.—(The Kethib, מִסְעָרוֹת, can be rendered neither caterva hominum (Gesen.), nor loca plana (מַסְעָרוֹת), nor speluncæ (מַסְעָרוֹת); these meanings give no good sense. It is better to take the Qeri with Sept. and Vulg. [Chald. "ranks," or, still better with Then. [Syr.] the Sing. "the line."—Surprising is the description of Goliath: "Goliath the Philistine his name," instead of "Goliath his name, the Philistine of Gath," as the Vulg. [so Eng. A. V.] translates. We need not, however, transpose the Heb. text (Then.), since in the popular language "Goliath the Philistine" may have become a proper name. We see here too that the author is drawing from a narrative whose description of Goliath (which the author retains, though he had already, ver. 4, described him) contained this popular designation of the grant.—Ver. 24. Even the sight of Goliath fills the Israelites with fear and trembling.—Ver. 25.‡—The וַיִּזְעַק [Eng. A. V. "surely"] after "have ye seen?" gives the ground of the exhortation therein contained to get ready with anger at Goliath's insolent bearing towards Israel; it corresponds to Germ. ja, Eng. surely. Comp. Mic. vi. 3; Job xxxi. 18; Ges. § 155, i, e (d).—And the king who shall kill him, him will the king enrich, etc. This indicates that Saul had already issued a proclamation, urging the combat with the giant. As generals and princes were accustomed to encourage to such deeds of arms by offering large prizes (Josh. xv. 16; Judg. i. 12; 2 Sam. xviii. 11; 1 Chron. xi. 6), so, according to the talk which passed among the people, Saul had promised the highest possible reward to the conqueror of Goliath: great riches, his daughter to wife, and freedom from taxation. This last is the meaning of עֲשֹׂה, not, as Ewald holds, elevation to the rank of free lord, or baron, as the middle rank between king and subjects.—[The word is synonymous with our "free," see its use in Ex. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12; Job iii. 19; xxxix. 5; Ps. lxxxviii. 5 (6), of slaves set free, of a dead man free from the cares of life, of the wild ass at liberty. Here probably of freedom from taxes.—Tr.]*—As in ver. 27 the people give the same answer to David's question (ver. 26), which supposes this offering of rewards to be a usual thing, we must conclude that Saul actually made these promises (though nothing is afterwards said of their fulfilment), especially as the same thing is repeated in ver. 27. From Saul's tendency to rash and exaggerated action, and from his changableness, we can easily understand both the promise and his unwillingness to perform it.—Ver. 26. The ground and justification of David's question concerning the reward of slaying the Philistine is furnished by the high significance of the deed as expressed in the words: "and take away the reproach from Israel;" this significance lends the deed such value that Saul, in David's opinion, must assign it a high prize.—For who is this Philistine, etc.—These words do not, in the first instance express David's desire to fight the Philistine (Keil), but they contain the ground of the preceding thought, that the insult offered Israel by the Philistine must be wiped out. This ground lies in the contrast (already indicated in the preceding words "the Philistine . . . Israel") between the stand-point of the Philistine as an uncircumcised who has no community with the living God, and stands outside of God's covenant with Israel, and the stand-point of this covenant-people, which is expressed in the words: "rank of the living God." How should this insult of the unclean Philistine cleave to the people of Israel, who are consecrated to the living God, whose battle-line, therefore, is also devoted to him? The living God is emphasized over against the dead idols of the Philistines. Since the Philistine has reviled the people of God, the covenant-people of the Lord, he has directed his scorn and derision against the living God Himself; and he who does the deed that takes away this reproach from Israel, will have God on his side, and do the deed with God's help. In these words David is seized with holy anger, whose fire flames up from his theocratic sense of honor, to which violence is done by the Philistine's challenge. His words already indicate his calling, which he has

* [On this construction see "Text. and Grammat." The better translation is: "and he came to the rampart, and the host was going forth to the fight, and they shouted." etc.—Tr.]

† [This is a rash conclusion of Clericus.—Tr.]

‡ The וַיִּזְעַק with the unusual Dagh. dirimens (as in x. 34)—comp. Ew. § 29 (b) with § 71.

* [This throws incidental light on the development of the political organization in Israel, since we have here apparently a regular system of taxes.—Tr.]

received from the Lord, to rouse the people of Israel, by awakening a new and vigorous theocratic spirit, out of the lethargy into which they had fallen in respect to their hereditary foe under the steadily sinking Saul (a lethargy illustrated in the repeated and unanswered challenge of Goliath), to the height of a true theocratic life.—[Bib. Com.: "The expression 'the living God' occurs first Deut. v. 26, then Josh. iii. 10; 2 Kings xix. 4; twice in the Ps. (xlii. 2; lxxiv. 2), four times in the Prophets, and frequently in the New Testament. It is generally in contrast to false gods (1 Th. i. 9, etc.)."—Beaides Isa. xxxvii. 4, 17; Jer. x. 10; xxiii. 36; Hos. i. 10 (ii. 1); comp. similar expressions in Ps. xviii. 46; Jer. xlv. 26, and the asseveration of Jehovah "as I live" and the significance of the divine name "I am that I am."—Tr.]—Ver. 28. Over against David appears his oldest brother Eliab as the representative of a totally different disposition. His words show not merely complete lack of brotherly love for David, but bitterness and hatred towards him. In contrast with David's holy anger, his unholy anger is kindled at David's talk with the soldiers. Perhaps envy and ambition lay at the bottom of this. His two questions: 1) Why hast thou come down?—the down refers to the relatively elevated position of Bethlehem—and 2) With whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? 1) express the thought: "Thou hast nothing to do here, belongest not here," indicating a haughty, quick-judging nature, and 2) reproach David with neglect of duty as keeper of his father's flocks. While all David's thought and feeling is on the great national disgrace and its removal, and his mind is concerned with plans for saving the honor of Israel and Israel's God, Eliab in his low and blind zeal thinks only of the flock of sheep and the possible loss to them from lack of oversight; the type of a narrow soul, incapable of great thoughts and deeds. But from the reproach of inconsiderate neglect of duty, he passes to a two-fold serious accusation: I know thy arrogance and the naughtiness of thy heart, for to see the battle art thou come down.—His zeal blinded by envy and jealousy, he ascribes David's visit to the worst motives: 1) pride, in that he wishes to rise above his shepherd-life and play a part in the war, and 2) badness of heart, according to the connection wickedness, brutality, in that he wishes to enjoy himself and please his eyes in the battle. In Eliab's words we see the disposition which he falsely and with hate-blinded zeal ascribes to his brother.—As he forms in word and bearing the sharpest contrast to David, so David's conduct towards him (ver. 29) is in sharpest contrast to him. His answer is quiet, passionless, but a decided and explicit disavowal of the wrong angrily charged on him.—What have I now done? that is, nothing that I have done gives ground for the reproaches and accusations which you have addressed to me. Opposed to the "done" (עָשִׂיתִי) is the following "word" (דָּבָר).—Was it not a word merely?—This is not: Was it not a command? namely, of my father, to come hither, must I not obey (Luther, Gesen.)? for this would be unintelligible to Eliab from its brevity. David would have expressed himself more definitely, if he had meant his father's command. The reply refers to the word (ver. 26) which David had spoken, as appears from what follows; and so the ancient VSS. The sense is: Is not this word permitted me? Can I not seek information by such a word?—Ver. 30. David turned from Eliab to another with the same question, and received the same answer. The meaning of דָּבָר ("word") here and ver. 31 in reference to ver. 26 confirms the view of its meaning in ver. 29.—Ver. 31. "In the presence of Saul," not "to Saul," "markedly expressive of respectful announcement" (Then.). David's zeal exhibited to the people for the honor of the Lord and of Israel was the cause of his again appearing before Saul, and the preparation for the deed of heroism by which he was to save the honor of Israel and its God against the scorn of the Philistine.

Vers. 32–40. David's conversation with Saul on his resolution, and his preparation for the combat with Goliath.

Ver. 32. Let no man's heart fail because of him.—To read (Then. after the Sept.) "my lord" (אֲדֹנָי), instead of "man" (אִישׁ) destroys the general character of the affirmation, which is here so appropriate; for, according to ver. 24, the fear of the Philistine was universal in Israel.—"Heart," here—"courage," comp. Germ. beherztheit [literally "heartedness;"] so Eng. "courage," from French cœur, "heart."—Tr.]—The Pron. "him" is better referred to the Philistine; Then. refers it to Saul [let not my lord's heart fail him"], and Vulg. renders in eo, "in him." David first expresses the general thought, "no man's courage must fail on his account," and then individualizes it in the words "I will exhibit such a manly courage."—In this exhortation to courageousness David expresses his own stout courage over against the universally feared Philistine, and the want of courage in Israel. As proof of his courage he announces his determination to undertake immediately the combat with this Philistine.—Ver. 33. Against this Saul represents that David as a youth cannot venture on a battle with this man, who had been a warrior from his youth. [In xvi. 18 David is designated by the same term, "man of war," which here describes Goliath; but this term would naturally have different meanings as used by the young man in ch. xvi. and by Saul here, and moreover the contrast here rather refers to the ages of the two antagonists. David might seem to Saul's retainer a brilliant young "warrior," and yet as a stripling seem to Saul unable to cope with this experienced "warrior."—Tr.]—Ver. 34 sq. To this remark of Saul David, in order to show his courage and strength, replies by narrating a victorious combat with a lion and a bear, which he had while keeping his father's flocks. The Art. [omitted in ver. 34 in Eng. A. V.—Tr.] before "lion" and "bear" is better understood as representing David's immediate view of the animals in his description [the lion which I now in imagination see before me], than as pointing them out as the well-known animals.* (אֵל before הַלֵּוֹן is sign of the Acc., Ew. § 277 d.)

* [On the varieties of lion and bear found in Palestine anciently and now, see the Arts. in Smith's Bib. Dict.—Tr.]

Bötcher: "As לִּפְנֵי before the Nominative is always either limiting or emphasizing (Jer. xlv. 4; xxxviii. 16 Keth.; Ezek. xlv. 3 al.), the form 'and what the bear was' very naturally expresses the sense 'and even the bear,' for the black, ugly bear seemed to the Hebrew still more dreadful than the noble lion, and stands after the latter in a climax (Hos. xiii. 7 sq.; Am. v. 19; Prov. xxviii. 15; Sir. xlvii. 3)." Comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 8, where special strength and courage are ascribed to the bear.—לִּפְנֵי is clerical error for לִּפְנֵי.)

As we cannot suppose that the two animals united in a robbery, David must be regarded as here combining two combats, one with a lion, the other with a bear. The constant use of the singular suffix (ver. 35), which with two subjects is surprising, is not to be explained (Keil) by supposing that David here combines the two exploits, "killed the one beast and the other," for not only does the "beard" not suit the bear, but the impression made on us by the narrator is that he is thinking of one animal, not of two. It is better to understand ver. 35 of the lion, since he is first named in ver. 34, and the following statement suits him only. Against this cannot be urged the impropriety of speaking of a lion's beard, for the ancients frequently mention it, Hom. Il., 15,275; 17,109; Mart. x. 9. Thus in the words "there came the lion and the bear," there is a vivid description of David's killing the lion, evidently with his shepherd's staff. See 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, where it is related of Benaiah, a captain of David's, that he killed a lion in a pit. On the fact that lions are killed with sticks by the Arabs see Thevenot, Voyage de Levante, II., 13. Comp. Rosenm., Bibl. Thierreich, p. 132.* Ver. 36. Here David first says expressly that he slew both beasts. He expresses his confident conviction that he will likewise slay the Philistine. "The Philistines, this uncircumcised, shall be as one of them." But at the same time he grounds ("seeing that") this conviction and certainty of victory on Goliath's wickedness, his defiance of the ranks of the living God, wherein we again see David's strong and clear consciousness of the theocratic significance of this battle between the Philistines and the Israelites, whose covenant-God is condemned in His people and their army, and who therefore cannot abandon His people's cause, which is His own.—Ver. 37. David again declares the ground of his confidence that he will conquer Goliath, namely, his trust in the mighty help of the Lord, which he founds on his experience of that help in the combat with the lion and the bear. The experience of the Lord's help is the foundation of hope for new help.—Saul accordingly permits him to go to the fight, and assures him that the Lord will be with him.—Ver. 38 sq. "His garments" (לְבָשׁוֹ) can from this connection mean only garments which pertained to warlike equipment (xviii. 4), over which the sword was girded.—Ver. 39. That David puts on Saul's armor shows that he was of about the same stature with him. [Not necessarily, since the armor may have been capable of change of size by tightening.—Tr.]

David cannot go, he says, in these garments, not because they are too large, but because he is not accustomed to them. He sees that they would only hinder him in the fight, and lays them off.—Ver. 40. He exchanges the armor for his shepherd's implements, staff and sling. The latter was as necessary to the shepherds as the former, in order to keep off the wild beasts. David must therefore have been well-practiced in its use.—See an example of skill with the sling among the Benjaminites, Judg. xx. 16. So he advanced against the Philistine.

Vers. 41-54. David's victory over Goliath.

Ver. 41. The mutual approach of David and Goliath is here again described in a very lively manner: Goliath drew nearer and nearer to David, in consequence of David's approach to him (ver. 42). V. 42. As he comes nearer Goliath looks more closely at David and despises him, seeing in him not a warrior, but a pretty youth. This account tallies exactly with xvi. 12.—Ver. 43 sq. The Sept. reads: "Am I as a dog, that thou comest against me with staff and stones?" and David said, Nay, but worse than a dog." The Plu. "staves" seemed to them strange, and was therefore changed into the Sing., and this occasioned the additional words. It stands, as Keil observes, "in scornful exaggeration of what seemed to the Philistine the wholly unsuitable armor of David." The words: "worse than a dog," do not suit David's character; they would be excessive abuse. The Philistine's word: "am I a dog?" sets forth his feeling of insult at David's coming against him with a staff, which was ordinarily employed not against men, but against beasts. And the Philistine cursed David by his god. Here is shown the innermost contrast which comes into play in the battle between Israelites and Philistines: the contrast between the living God and His people on the one hand, and the idolatrous, antitheocratic world on the other. Similar are the scornful defiance which warriors of antiquity mutually gave at the beginning of a combat.—On ver. 44 comp. Ezek. xxix. 5.—Ver. 45 sq. David's answer to Goliath's reproaches contains in an advancing line of thought the most important elements of his character: 1) he expresses most sharply that contrast between their two stand-points in their religious-moral aspect: Thou comest to me relying on thine own strength and thy powerful armor, but I come to thee in the name of Jehovah Sabaoth, the God of the ranks of Israel, whom thou hast defied. The name of the Lord is for David the totality of all the revelations by which the living God has made Himself known and named among His people. Of these elements, which form the conception of the name of God, he here, suitably to the situation, adduces those which characterize Him in respect to His warlike and ruling power as Captain and Conqueror of His people (Ps. xxiv. 10). The words, "whom thou hast defied," form the factual ground of David's second declaration, ver. 46: The Lord will, because I come against thee in His name, give thee into mine hand, &c. David expresses his certainty of victory, but at the same time affirms that it will be God's deed. Triumphant heroic courage before victory, and humble bowing before God as the bestower of victory are here united in David. The rendering of the Sept.: thy corpse and the corpses (of the army, &c.) is no doubt occasioned by the strangeness of the Sing. [Eng. A. V. has Plu. "carcasses." See Text. and Gramm.—Tr.] "Corpses" (גִּבּוֹרִים) is to be taken collectively.—3)

* [See Bochart, Hieroz. III., cap. IV., who renders "the lion or the bear," and so refers the exploit to either, which seems better. "Beard" may be used in a general way for "chln." See "Text and Grammat."—Tr.]

By the help which God the Lord will grant His people in this victory, all the world will know that Israel has a God, not: "that God is for Israel." The sense is: The other nations will learn that God does not suffer Himself to be mocked in His people, but as their covenant-God helpfully and mightily espouses their cause.—Ver. 47. 4) Together with the knowledge, which reaches beyond Israel to the heathen nations, that Israel has a protecting and saving God, for Israel themselves (here called "all this assembly") the blessing of this not doubtful victory will be, that they shall know that the Lord needs not external mighty means, as sword and spear, for His help; for His is the battle, by His almighty will the issue of the battle is determined in His people's favor, arms of war do not secure His help, but His power alone secures success, even when not those arms but seemingly feeble means are employed. He gives the enemy into the hand of His people.—Ver. 48 sq. Goliath's approach to David at the beginning of the combat is minutely and vividly described; as well as David's preparation for the battle, and its speedy termination. David's unbroken courage is made more evident by the remark that he went "toward the line" to meet the Philistine. The stone flung from the sling reached Goliath's forehead. The addition in the Sept. "through the helm," is a superfluous interpretation. If his forehead and face were covered by the front of the helm, the stone might indeed penetrate through the latter. But it may also be supposed that Goliath, confident of victory, advanced against the despised shepherd-lad with uncovered forehead. Comp. W. Vischer, Antike Schleudergeschosse [Ancient Slings], Basel, 1866, p. 5, where he speaks of slingers who could hit the part of the enemy's face at which they aimed.—Ver. 50 sq. expressly declares the superiority of David over Goliath with sling and stone, in accordance with David's words, ver. 47, that victory is not determined by strength of warlike arms. To this refers also the added statement, "David had no sword in his hand," which is at the same time the reason for the following statement, namely, the slaying of the giant with his own sword, with which David cut off his head. After the fall of Goliath the terrified Philistines take to flight, without trying a battle. The Israelites raised the battle-cry, and pursued them.—Ver. 52. The text reads: "up to a ravine." This gives no good sense, since the ravine between the two armies cannot be meant, nor can we suppose such an indefinite locality, the word not having the Article. As Gath and Ekron are afterwards named as the limit of the pursuit, it is natural to suppose that here גִּבְרָה ["ravine"] stands by error for גֹּת [Gath]. גִּבְרָה שְׁעָרִים is usually understood of a city, Shaarim: "on the road as far as Shaarim." Thenius' objection, that no such city is mentioned elsewhere, is not tenable, for see Josh. xv. 36. Thenius renders after the Sept. "in the way of the gates," understanding by this the whole space between the outer and inner gate, since city gates were in the form of a building, enclosing a space, and so had two doors (2 Sam. xviii. 24); against which is partly the absence of the Art., partly the double גֹּת, "up to," as the sign of direction and progress. According to the usual view the Philistines fled along the road from Shaarim partly towards Gath, partly towards Ekron, and many of them were slain. "This direction of the flight resulted from the nature of the country. The Wady Sumt, where the combat took place, passes northward from Socoh, turns after two or three miles westward by the village Sakarieh (סַכָּרִיָּה). Sept. Josh. xv. 36, Zakariu, emptying into the Wady Simchim; about a mile from this is the village of Ajjur, which is held to be ancient Gath (Rob. II. 606-8 (Am. Ed., II., 66, 67); Ritter, XVI., 91), and so the Philistines fled through the valley that Robinson also traversed in his excursion from Jerusalem to Gath.* Another portion of the Philistines remained in Wady Sumt and fled northward, where the Wady Sumt takes the name Wady Surar, in which lies the present city Akir." Stähelin, Das Leben David's, p. 7 sq.—Ver. 53. From this hot pursuit of the Philistines up to their cities the Israelites turned back to spoil the enemy's camp.—Ver. 54. David carried Goliath's head to Jerusalem. This is no anachronism, since only the fortress of Jebus on mount Zion was then in the hands of the Jebusites, the city Jerusalem being already in possession of the Israelites (Josh. xv. 63; Judg. i. 21). But why should not this city be selected as the place of deposit of this trophy, since it was the nearest to the field of battle? Goliath's arms, on the contrary, he put into his dwelling. גִּבְרָה [usually = "tent," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.] is the ancient word for dwelling, as in iv. 10; xiii. 2; 2 Sam. xviii. 17; xix. 8; xx. 1, and here the old homestead in Bethlehem is meant. It is no contradiction that we afterwards (xxi. 9) find the sword of Goliath in the sanctuary at Nob; for meantime it might have been carried thither to be permanently kept as sign of the victory granted Israel by the Lord over their old hereditary enemy.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David and Goliath, with the two armies, represent the immediate contrast of the godly and antigodly life, of the Theocracy and the Anti-theocracy within the world; on one side the sincere humility, which bows beneath the hand of the living God, will be only. His instrument, only seeks His honor, only strives after the ends of His kingdom, and is therefore by God highly exalted—on the other side the pride and arrogance, which boldly lifts itself above everything divine, puts its trust only in earthly human power, pursues God's kingdom and honor with scorn and contempt, stands up perpetually against God's people to oppress them, but is at last cast down and judged by the Lord.

[At the end of the Psalter the Sept. has an additional Psalm referring to this combat, as follows: "This is the autographic (though supernumerary) Psalm of David, composed when he had the single combat with Goliath. I was little among my brethren, and youngest in the house of my father. I kept my father's sheep, my hands made an organ, my fingers joined together a psaltery, and who will tell it to my lord? He is the Lord, He heareth. He sent His messenger and took me from the sheep of my father, and anointed me with the oil of His anointing. My brethren were handsome and tall, and the Lord was not well pleased with them. I went forth to meet the Philistine, and he cursed me by his idols; and I drew his sword from his side, and beheaded him, and took away reproach from the children of Israel."

* [Robinson declines to fix Gath; Mr. J. L. Porter (in Smith's Bib. Dict.) places it on the Tel-es-Safieh.—Tr.]

This is certainly not genuine (it is given also in the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions), but it sets forth the religious-theocratic spirit with which David viewed the conflict. We might have expected that David would thus celebrate his victory; but there is no trace in the Heb. of such a Psalm.—TR.]

2. David and Eliab represent within the people of God the contrast between the disposition which looks above to the honor and the ends of the living God, and that which looks to earthly possession and earthly-worldly interests, which is not capable of recognising ideal moral motives in others, but judging by itself, ascribes to them only low and selfish aims. Selfishness, passionately roused by envy and jealousy, hinders a just judgment of the bearing and conduct of brethren, and leads to wicked accusation against them.

3. He alone can perform great things for the kingdom of God in its conflict with the hostile world, who like David 1) resists and overcomes himself, and shows true manly courage in patiently bearing the injustice of misunderstanding and calumny, and not repaying evil with evil; 2) is filled with the fire of holy anger against ungodliness and sin, and of holy enthusiasm for the cause and honor of the Lord; 3) expects not victory from his own strength and human might, but trusts in the Lord alone.

4. That the world hostile to God's kingdom can long unpunished visit its scorn on the truth of the eternal and living God, is commonly a result of the inner weakness, disorder, and timidity of the members of the kingdom of God. When, therefore, there arises a man from their midst who with mighty word and deed encounters and conquers the foe, this is a direct interposition of God's hand in the development of His kingdom, and such a man is His chosen instrument for the casting down of the haughty worldly powers, and for a new gathering together and elevation of His people.

5. Those men of God, who contend for the honor and cause of the Lord and His kingdom on earth, are, in unshakable reliance on Him, sure of their victory precisely because they have not their own honor in view, and do not set their hope on human-earthly might. As their trust in their own strength vanishes, their trust in the Lord's help increases, which is not dependent on anything creaturely. A life hidden in God is the source of the most courageous testimony and the greatest prowess, and in the name of God opposes the most inimical powers of this world, joyously certain of the victory of the Lord's cause and of the ends of his kingdom.

See further the remarks in the Exegetical Exposition.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 10. SCOTT: Degenerate professors of religion often receive just rebukes from most decided enemies. . . . In human accomplishments the opposers of the truth of God have frequently possessed an undisputed superiority; confiding in this, they have defied, and still do defy, the advocates of spiritual truth to engage with them; and they dream of a total and decided victory.—TR.]—Ver. 14 sqq. SCHLIER: David is acquainted with the Fourth Commandment, and knows that for him God's way always goes in God's commandment. No one has blessing and success in life who has not in youth learned obedience.—Ver. 16. LANGE: Without a divine call one should not go into the peril of conflict.—[This remark seems inappropriate here. The Israelites had every call of patriotism and honor, but they did not heed.—TR.]—SCHLIER: They are the best rulers, in great things as in small, who have first themselves learned to hearken and serve. The best training for command is obedience.—["Forty days." Two pictures, every morning and evening: the giant and boastful warrior, with huge weapons, stalking forth and defying Jehovah and His people—and ten miles away the quiet youth, tending his sheep, bearing crook and sling and harp, trusting Jehovah, and all unconscious of his splendid destiny.—Ver. 20. HALL: If his father's command dismisses him, yet will he stay till he have trusted his sheep with a careful keeper. We cannot be faithful shepherds, if our spiritual charge be less dear unto us; if, when necessity calls us from our flocks, we depute not those who are vigilant and conscionable.—TR.]—Ver. 22. SCHMID: Often is that which to man appears thoughtless and rash, a work of the special Providence of God. So we must not be over-hasty in judging.

Ver. 23. STARKE: To revile and talk big is the manner of Satan and all his comrades. Pa. lxxiii. 8. O man, guard against it.—To pious souls nothing is more painful than when they are compelled to hear the ungodly revile God. Pa. x. 1 sq.—[Ver. 24. TAYLOR: Which of us is not sometimes brought almost to a stand-still, when he surveys the ignorance, infidelity, intemperance and licentiousness by which we are surrounded? It seems to us, in moments of depression, as if these evils were stalking forth defiantly before the armies of the living God, and laughing them, Goliath-like, to scorn; and our courage is apt to cool as we contemplate this show of force. But we must not allow these feelings to prevail. The God of David liveth, and He will still give us success.—TR.]—Ver. 26. HALL: While base hearts are moved by example, the want of example is encouragement enough for an heroic mind. See ver. 23.—Ver. 28. ORLANDER: See what envy does: how hateful it makes pious people, and how it is wont to excite bitter hate and aversion among brethren! Prov. xiv. 30.—SCHMID: Wrath and envy interpret everything in the worse sense, however good it may be in itself.—HALL: There is no enemy so ready or so spiteful as the domestical.—[SCOTT: In times of general formality and lukewarmness, every degree of zeal which implies a readiness to go further, or venture more in the cause of God, than others do, will be censured as pride and ambition; and by none more than near relations and negligent superiors: and such censures will seldom be unmingled with unjust insinuations, slanders and attempts to blacken a man's character.—TR.]

Ver. 29. STARKE: We must not be turned away from the execution of the divine will by bad or by good words, by favor or by disfavor.—HALL: He is fitted to be God's champion, that hath learned to be victor of himself.—[TAYLOR: When we are assailed in our home, or beyond it, with scorn and derision, let us remember that our real conflict in such a case is not with the scorner, but with ourselves. Let our effort be put forth not to silence him, but to control ourselves, and then we shall succeed in obtaining a victory over both.—TR.]—Ver. 30: SCHLIER: If you wish to show manly spirit, conquer yourself; if you wish to be brave, subdue your wrath, and learn to curb yourself; if you wish to do great deeds, show it in little things, show it in the duties of common life, show it in the things which the world counts for little, but which are highly esteemed in the sight of God.—BERL. BIBLE: David troubles himself little as to whether he is praised or blamed, if only God is glorified through him.—[HALL: He whom the regard of others' envy can dismay, shall never do ought worthy of envy. Never man undertook any exploit of worth, and received not some discouragement in the way.—TR.]—Ver. 32. CRAMER: In need and peril one should look not alone to his weakness and the greatness of the peril, but to God the Almighty (2 Chron. xx. 12; 2 Kings xix. 14).—CALVIN: God often works in an extraordinary manner in those who undertake a great and glorious work. We must therefore carefully distinguish the general and ordinary powers of the faithful servants of God from their special and extraordinary gifts. When, therefore, we undertake to do something great and difficult, we should earnestly prove ourselves as to whether our powers suffice for it, and whether we trace in ourselves the movement and impulse of divine power, through which alone there is promised us a happy result.—[Ver. 33. HALL: David's greatest conflict is with his friends: the overcoming of their dissensions, that he might fight, was more work than to overcome the enemy in fighting.—TR.]

Ver. 34. J. LANGE: Temptations, when they are rightly regarded and directed, serve to strengthen our joy of faith (Rom. viii. 35 sq.).—Ver. 36. CRAMER: When God has once given us help we must always remember it, and encourage ourselves therewith for the future (2 Cor. i. 8; 2 Tim. iv. 16).—BERL. BIBLE: In this way are the saints accustomed to strengthen and increase their faith through their experience; and so must we also learn to do (2 Cor. i. 10).—CALVIN: On the manifestations of God's grace which we have received we should build our hope for the future; for God is always like Himself, and His almightiness constantly the same, and those who call on Him He is always ready to help.—OSLANDER: He who reproaches God's people, reproaches God Himself.—

Ver. 37. STARKE: God often produces the greatest things by trifling, and to outward appearance contemptible means and instruments.—CALVIN: David goes not into the conflict clothed with human armor, but persists in the confidence firmly rooted in his soul, that God will without human equipment give him the victory over death. For God's power and strength needs no human means; it is sufficient unto itself, and need borrow nothing elsewhere.—BERL. BIBLE: He who wishes to assure himself of victory must throw away such weapons, and fight with the pure and simple word of God.—[HALL: It is not to be inquired how excellent anything is, but how proper. Those things which are helps to some, may be incumbrances to others. An unmeet good may be as inconvenient as an accustomed evil.—Vers. 39, 40. David's weapons were really best suited to his undertaking. With heavy armor he would have been no match at all for the giant; but lightly armed, he could keep at a distance and might destroy him with his missiles. "Fight the devil with fire," is a very foolish proverb, for with that weapon he will assuredly beat us. In like manner some imperfectly educated preachers attempt to meet the skepticism of the day by preaching about "Science," "Philosophy," or "Criticism," when they might accomplish greatly more by speaking of those experimental and practical subjects which they know how to handle.—TR.]

Ver. 42 sqq. SCHMID: He who despises his enemy before he has tried him, acts very unreasonably.—CRAMER: An undeserved curse does not stick (Matt. v. 11).—BERL. BIBLE: The world always despises believers as a worthless, unarmed mass, not at all furnished with carnal power.—Simple souls have no other weapons than the cross and tranquillity. Therefore are they despised by haughty men.—Ver. 44. STARKE: Cursing and big talk are the proper work of godless people. Seldom ever was there a good end of ostentation. Presumption is at once the prologue and cause of ruin [from HALL].—SCHMID: God requites to the godless upon their own head the evil which they threaten and seek to carry out against the pious. Ps. vii. 17 [16]; cxi. 10 [9].—Ver. 45 sqq. SCHMID: Against God no weapons avail, no strength, yes, not the whole world.—STARKE: There is no better fighting than under the shield of the Almighty (Ps. cxi. 1 sq.).—BERL. BIBLE: The shield that covers me is faith, my sword is the strength of God, in which I have put all my confidence; my spear is the entire freedom from all selfhood, so that I seek no other interest than that of God. In such equipment, namely in entire self-devotion, as I do not trouble myself about the result, I venture all I am and have. [MAURICE: In this story everything is said to make us feel the feebleness of the Israelitish champion; everything to remind us that the nation of Israel was the witness for the nothingness of man in himself, for the might of man when he knows that he is nothing, and puts his trust in the living God. . . . And this is the sense which human beings want now as in times of old. . . . To disbelieve this is to fall down and worship brute force, to declare that to be the Lord. How soon we may come through our refinements, our civilization, our mock hero-worship, to that last and most shameful prostration of the human spirit, God only knows.—TR.]—Ver. 46. CALVIN: God's action is of such a kind that by His great deeds He draws all to wonder, and constrains even godless, scornful men to bow before His doing, and against their will to confess that it is not man's, but God's work.—Ver. 47. CRAMER: Where human help gives out, divine help begins again, that the honor may be God's (Judg. vii. 2).

Ch. XVII. 1-50. J. DISSELHOFF: The first sending of the anointed one out of stillness into strife: 1) He does not seek to hurry out of the stillness into the peril of the strife: but he goes with confidence when he is sent; 2) He seeks in the strife not his own interest, but only the honor of his Lord and the welfare of His people; 3) His only weapon is faith in the living God and His cause, and this weapon is his victory.—F.W. KRUMMACHER: David and Goliath: 1) Israel's need, and 2) The divine deed of deliverance through David.

Vers. 1-11. The decisive conflict between the people of God and the world which is hostile to God: 1) The two camps, which stand over against each other (vers. 1-3); 2) The weaponed might in which the enemy comes forth to challenge the host of Israel (4-8); 3) The decision as to servitude or dominion, with which this conflict is occupied (9); 4) The proving which the people of God have to stand in presence of the challenge to this conflict (10, 11).

Vers. 12-31. How the Lord leads His servants, in order to prepare them for the victorious conflict for the honor of His name: 1) Out of retirement into the stirring life of the world, vers. 12, 13, (comp. with xvi. 17-23); 2) Out of the conflict-stirred world into the stillness (vers. 14, 15); 3) Out of the stillness into the conflict of the world (vers. 17-31).

Vers. 32-41. The brave spirit of a soldier of God over against the might of the enemy: 1) Wherein it shows itself: a) In the strength and encouragement with which it can lift up the dejected hearts of others (ver. 32 a); b) In the bold resolution with which it goes to meet the mighty foe in conflict notwithstanding his apparent superiority (32 b); c) In the endurance of the temptation and assault which are prepared for it by taking counsel with flesh and blood (33); 2) Whereon it grounds itself: a) On the help of the Lord already experienced in victorious conflict (vers. 34-36 a, 37); b) On the prize of the conflict, the honor of the Lord (36 b); c) On the divine equipment assumed instead of carnal weapons, namely, the power of the Lord (38-41).

Vers. 42-54. Faith contending with the world for the honor of the Lord: 1) Called forth by scoffing at the Lord's honor (42-44); 2) Ready for conflict in the Lord's name (45); 3) Sure of victory in reliance on the Lord's help (46-48); 4) Crowned with victory through the Lord's might (49-54).

Vers. 42-47. The battle-cry in the kingdom of God: "The battle is the Lord's." 1) The enemy is the enemy of the Lord and of His kingdom (42-44); 2) The armor is the name of the Lord (45); 3) The combatants are the people of the Lord, whom He acknowledges as His possession (46); 4) The victory is the gift of the Lord, unto the honor of His name (47-54).

Vers. 48-54. The defeats which are prepared for the world by the kingdom of God: 1) Through what sort of combatants? Through such as a) like David heroically lead the van of God's host and decide the conflict (ver. 48), and b) such as bravely bring up the rear, perseveringly pursuing the already-smitten foe. 2) With what sort of weapons? a) With weapons which they themselves have according to their calling through God's grace and wield in reliance on God's help (ver. 49), and b) with weapons which they take from the foe, in order to give him the finishing stroke with his own weapon (50, 51). 3) With what sort of result? a) In respect to the foe: Annihilation of his power on his own ground (52), and b) in respect to the booty, rich gains (53, 54).

[Vers. 8-11. "A man." 1) Often in civil and religious conflicts one man is wanted to fight the battles of his brethren—the need of the hour is a man. 2) Often Providence is preparing the man, not far away—perhaps no one would now dream that he is the man—his pursuits would not suggest it, nor the character he has thus far developed—his friends do not know what is in him (xvi. 11; xvii. 28)—the enemy may despise him at his first appearance (43, 44). 3) Yet looking back one can always see that there was no accident—that he had the suitable combination of native qualities—and that his pursuits gave the requisite training.

Vers. 28-30. David and his brother. 1) The elder brother slow to recognize that his younger brother is a grown man. 2) The unjust judgment and unmerited public rebuke. 3) The young man's self-contained and conciliatory reply. 4) His quiet perseverance in acting out the sacred impulse within (ver. 30, comp. ver. 26).—TR.]

III. The Immediate Consequences of David's Exploit in Respect to his Relation to Saul.

David at the Royal Court; his Friendship with Jonathan; Saul's Hatred towards Him; Saul's Attempt on his Life.

CHAPTER XVII. 55—XVIII. 30.

1. David at the Royal Court.

CHAP. XVII. 55—58.

- 55 AND¹ when Saul saw David go [going] forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of his host, Abner [om. Abner], Whose son is this youth? [ins. Abner]. And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell [do not know].
 56, 57 And the king said, Inquire thou whose son the stripling is. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him and brought him
 58 before Saul, with [and] the head of the Philistine [ins. was] in his hand. And Saul said unto him, Whose son art thou, thou [om. thou] young man? And David answered [said], I am [om. I am] the [The] son of thy servant Jesse the Bethle-hemite.

2. David's Friendship with Jonathan. He is made General of the Army.

CHAPTER XVIII. 1—5.

- 1 And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his
 2 own soul. And Saul took him that day, and would let him no more go home
 3 [would not let him return] to his father's house. Then [And] Jonathan and David 4 made a covenant, because he³ loved him as his own soul. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments [war-dress], even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle.
 5 And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, and behaved himself wisely.⁴
 And Saul set him over the men of war, and he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.

3. David is hated by King Saul. Vers. 6—16.

- 6 And it came to pass as they came, when David was [om. was] returned from the slaughter of the Philistine,⁴ that the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing,⁵ to meet King Saul, with tabrets, with joy and with instru-

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 55. The passage xvii. 55—xviii. 5 is omitted by Vat. Sept., but by no other ancient version. Whether it was wanting in the Heb. MSS. used by the Alexandrian translators, or omitted by them to avoid an apparent contradiction, it is almost impossible with our present lights to decide. We do not know what MSS. they had. Erdmann and others regard the passage not as an interpolation, but as an account taken from an authority different from that of xvi. 14—23, and irreconcilable with it. For a proposed reconciliation see Erdmann's Introduction and Note and Remark of Translator in the Exposition following.—Ta.]

² [Ver. 3. The Sing. pron. is due to the fact that "Jonathan" is the real subject in the foregoing clause.—Ta.]

³ [Ver. 5. The verb יָצָא means in Hiph. properly "to act prudently;" but there is sometimes connected with this the notion of success, as probably throughout this chapter. } is to be supplied before the verb.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 6. Margin of Eng. A. V. "Philistines," and so the Arab.; the other VSS. have the Sing., which is to be preferred here, though the return at the end of the campaign is meant, because the slaying of Goliath was its most prominent event.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 6. The Heb. is difficult. The Sept. has merely: "And the dancers came out to meet David." etc., omitting the first clause perhaps to avoid the statement that David excited Saul's jealousy on the day of his combat with Goliath, and yet was afterwards preferred by him to places of honor. This difficulty is removed if we suppose this verse to refer to the end of the campaign (Philippson).—Chald. has "to praise with dances," Syr.

7 meuts of music [triangles]. And the women answered one another as they played, 8 and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. And Saul was very wroth,⁶ and the [this] saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed [given] unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed [given] but thousands; and what can he have more but the kingdom? [there remains for 9 him only the kingdom.]⁶ And Saul eyed⁷ David from that day and forward. 10 And it came to pass on the morrow that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied⁸ in the midst of the house; and David played [was playing] with his hand as at other times, and there was a javelin in Saul's hand [and 11 Saul's javelin was in his hand]. And Saul cast⁹ the javelin, for he [and] said, I will smite David even to [I will pin David to] the wall with it [om. with it]. And 12 David avoided out of his presence [turned away from him] twice. And Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord [Jehovah] was with him, and was departed from 13 Saul. Therefore [And] Saul removed him from him, and made him his [om. his] 14 captain over a thousand; and he went out and came in before the people. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways, and the Lord [Jehovah] was with 15 him. Wherefore when [And] Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, [ins. 16 and] he was afraid of him. But all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and came in before them.

4. Saul's Artful Attempt against David's Life in the Offer of Marriage with his Daughter. Vers. 17–30.

17 And¹⁰ Saul said to David, Behold my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife; only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's [Jehovah's] battles. For [And] Saul said, Let not my hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what¹¹ is my life, or [om. or] my father's family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the 19 king? But it came to pass at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel,¹² the Meholathite, to wife. 20 And Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David; and they told Saul, and the thing 21 pleased him. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may [and she shall] be a snare to him, and that [om. that] the hand of the Philistines may [shall] be against him. Wherefore [And] Saul said to David [ins. the second time],¹³ Thou shalt this day be my son-in-law in the one of the twain [om. in the one of the twain].

renders the second word "drums." Wellhausen proposes to substitute (after the Sept.) מְדַלֵּלִים for דְּשִׁלֵּי. According to Ew., § 339 a we may translate: "for song and dance;" but this is difficult here on account of the Art. and the nature of the words, and it seems better to change the Art. מְ into ל and render as in Vulg. and Eng. A. V., or with Theinus to insert ד, and render "song with dancing."—The Kethib "to sing" (so Chald. and Syr.) is preferable in the latter case, the Qeri "for song" in the former.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 8. These two clauses are omitted in the Sept., which has thus a noticeable simplicity and directness in its narrative, but loses much of the warmth and life of the Heb. To reject these clauses as "exaggerated" and "psychologically inaccurate" (Wellhausen) is obviously carrying subjective criticism too far. The historical authority is every way in favor of the Heb. text.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 9. Keth. Partec. of stem עָן, Qeri of st. עָן. Sept. omits vers. 9–12, as to which see remark on ver.

8. This passage may be omitted without injuring the sense; but it adds to the vividness of the narrative, agrees with xvi. 14–23, and rests on the same authority as the other portions of the chapter.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 10. Erdmann and Philippon: "raved," and so Wordsworth and the Targum; the Syr., Arab. and Vulg. and most Eng. commentators (Patrick, Gill, Clarke, Bb. Com.) render "prophecy." See the Exposition.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 11. The Greek (Alex. MS.) and Chald. have "lifted," as if from מָלַךְ, and this seems better (מָלַךְ), since it does not appear that he actually cast the weapon (see xix. 10).—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 17. The passage vers. 17–19 is omitted in Sept. (Vat.), namely, the story of Merab, perhaps as apparently useless in advancing the narrative. The name Merab means "increase." Comp. in Eng. the well-known "Increase Mather."—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 18. Literally "who is my life?" which is explained by the following clause; but this clause is not therefore necessarily a marginal (unauthorized) addition. The Alex. Sept. has: "what is the life of my father's family?" which is clear, but unsupported.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 19. Some MSS. and VSS. have Adriel.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 21. The Heb. text (דְּשִׁלֵּי) seems to be supported by all the VSS. (the clause is omitted in Vat. Sept.). The translation here given (which is that of Theinus, Erdmann, Wordsworth, Bb. Com.) is the most satisfactory as to sense; but its correctness is open to doubt. Philippon renders: "with the second," the older Eng. Comms. follow the Targ.: "in one of the two." Theodotus has the ingenious rendering: διὰ τὰς δύο, and another Gr. V.S.: ἀπὸ ἀμφοτέρων. The Arab. cuts the knot by translating: "I wish thee to be my son-in-law," herein forsaking the Syr., which has "in both of them." Some Jews held that David married both the daughters.—Ta.]

- 22 And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune [Speak] with David secretly, and say, Behold the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee; now, therefore, be the king's son-in-law. And Saul's servants spake these words in the 23 ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a [the]
 24 king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man and lightly esteemed? And the servants of Saul told him, saying, On this manner spake David.
 25 And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry but¹⁴ an hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of the king's enemies.
 26 But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines. And when [om. when] his servants told David these words, [ins. and] it pleased David well
 27 to be the king's son-in-law; and the days were not expired.¹⁵ Wherefore [And] David arose and went, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two¹⁶ hundred men, and David brought their foreskins, and they [better om. they]¹⁷ gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law. And Saul
 28 gave him Michal his daughter to wife. And Saul saw and knew that the Lord [Jehovah] was with David, and that [om. that] Michal,¹⁸ Saul's daughter, loved 29 him. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David, and Saul became [was] David's 30 enemy continually. Then¹⁹ [And] the princes of the Philistines went forth. And it came to pass, after [as often as] they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, so that his name was set by.

¹⁴ [Ver. 25. Some MSS. have DM '3, which is not necessary, since '3 alone may mean "but;" or it may be taken as—"for."—Tr.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 26. This clause is omitted in Vat. Sept. See on ver. 8.—Tr.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 27. This number is sustained by all the VSS. except Vat. Sept., which has "one hundred," probably to avoid an apparent contradiction. Here the presumption is not in favor of the smaller number (Wellhausen), but in favor of the harder reading. Wellh. refers to 2 Sam. iii. 14, where the Heb. has 100, and the Syr. 200, which perhaps shows a disposition to exaggerate, but cannot be regarded as decisive against our text.—Tr.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 27. The ling. is found in Sept., Aq. and Theod., as well as in Vulg., Syr., Arab.—Tr.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 28. Sept.: "all Israel," which is better suited to the context.—Tr.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 30. This verse is omitted in Sept. (Vat.).—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 55–58. David at the royal court, his lineage better known, and himself permanently taken up.—On the relation of this section to xvi. 14–23 (the two coming from different sources), and to the general narrative, see the full discussion in the Introduction, p. 16 sqq. Considering the undeniable difference between the account here (where Saul is ignorant of David's person and family), and that in xvi. 14–23, (where Saul, after negotiation with Jesse, takes David to his court, and keeps him till the outbreak of the war), and considering the vain attempts which have been made to harmonize this difference, we accept Nägelsbach's conclusion (Herz. xiii. 402): "All attempts at reconciliation failing, we can only, till a satisfactory explanation is found, suppose that these two accounts come from really different and discrepant sources." [Without laying stress on the fact that Saul here inquires after David's father, and not after David himself (which, though urged by Houbigant, Chandler, Wordsworth, and others, does not seem to amount to anything), we may still insist that the two accounts, though different, are not necessarily discrepant in the sense that both cannot be true. It is only necessary to admit that David's absence at home had been long (and there is no exact chronological datum), that Saul had rarely seen him except in moments of madness, that Abner had been absent from court when David was there, and that the personal appearance of the latter had changed (suppositions which, taken singly or together, are not improbable), and Saul's ignorance becomes natural. These old naratives, giving brief and partial views of occurrences, may well sometimes seem to contradict each other, and it is wise (as Nägelsbach hints) in view of the historical authority of the Heb. text, at least to suspend our judgment.—Tr.]

Ver. 55. We need not take the verbs here as Pluperf. (Then., Keil, &c.), since this narrative is to be regarded simply as an addition to the preceding. In their context vers. 55, 56 belong after ver. 40 and form a supplement to the vivid description of David's advance against Goliath. The words "against the Philistine" refer to the close of ver. 40. Saul's question is to be understood not merely of David's father and family, but also of his person. According to this Saul does not know him. The question and Abner's answer must necessarily be taken in connection with the surprise and astonishment felt at David's bold procedure. Saul's question could not be answered till David's return; it is therefore mentioned here, and connected with David's appearance before Saul under Abner's guidance.—Vers. 57, 58. The concluding words of ver. 57: "and the head," &c., show that this statement is to be put between ver. 53 and ver. 54. According to this Abner's leading David to Saul was occasioned by the latter's question. David's words in ver. 58 are not to be regarded as forming his whole answer; from xviii. 1 we infer that he had a somewhat long conversation with Saul.

2. Ch. xviii. 1–5. David's friendship with Jonathan and permanent residence at Saul's court as commander of the army. Ver. 1. The consequence of this conversation was the formation of a friendship between David and Jonathan, as is indicated by the words: "when he had ceased speaking with Saul." The word "knot" (נִקְשָׁר) as in Gen. xlv. 30) denotes, under the figure of a chain, the firm union and inseparable unity of souls in friendship, expressing the thought that their inner lives of feeling work deeply into each other, and so each has perpetually fast hold of the other. Clericus: "In almost all languages friendship is considered as a union of souls bound together by the band of love." Grotius: "An admirable description of friendship. So Aristotle (Nicom. IX. 8) has noted that friends are called one soul. The same thing is set forth by the Lat. concordia and the Greek ὁμοψυχία. Papinius says that souls are bound together."—And Jonathan loved him as his own soul. To the conception of firmness is here added the idea of innerness of friendship, the complete identification of essence of two souls.* (The Kethib has the rarer contracted suffix ִי, the Qeri the commoner ִיָּהּ. Ew. § 249 b).—David's heroic courage, firm trust in God, and splendid feat of arms had won him Jonathan's heart.†—Ver. 2. Not till after the narrative of this friendship follows the statement that Saul took David permanently to court: he took him, that is, into his service, and allowed him not to return to his father's house, as he had done in ch. xvii. 15; the words presuppose that David had desired to return thither. That Saul virtually ordered David's permanent stay with him immediately after their conversation (Keil) is not necessarily to be assumed. Rather from the sequence of the sentences it seems as if the narrator intended to connect the rise of the friendship of David and Jonathan with the friendly relation which Saul first assumed in his conversation with David, and then to set forth David's permanent stay at court as a consequence of this friendship.—Ver. 3. Jonathan's love for David (he loved him as his own soul) is the ground of this solemn and formal sealing of their friendship. The covenant indicates the mutualness of the love which they pledged one another. GROT.: "they mutually promised perpetual friendship," comp. xx. 3.—Ver. 4 is closely attached to ver. 3 in so far as here by the gift of the upper garment, the robe (כִּטְּיָה) and the separate parts of the war-equipment to David, the conclusion of the covenant of friendship on Jonathan's part is solemnly confirmed. Clericus supposes that the object of this gift was to enable the poorly-clad David to appear at court in seemly dress. But the mention of the several weapons, which together make a complete war-outfit, rather suggests that Jonathan wished to honor David as the military hero; and this manner of sealing their friendship was a proof that the two, as heroes, equally crowned by God with victory, could love one another, and that Jonathan was far from feeling envy and jealousy of David for his heroic deed. Jonathan's here taking the initiative is in keeping with his position at court as king's son in respect to the young shepherd. His clothing David with his own war-dress is sign that his hearty friendship sets aside the barrier which his rank and position would raise between them in the first instance on the common ground of the theocratic chivalry, as whose representatives they had come to love one another. [Philippson: The gift of one's own garment, especially by a prince to a subject, is in the East still the highest mark of honor. So in "Esther" (ch. vi.) Mordecai is clothed in the king's apparel.—Tr.]—Ver. 5 belongs to what goes before as the declaration of the honorable position which David (along with this relation to Jonathan) took at Saul's court, as generally beloved in his office and calling. First, his position was a military one; for that the "went out" (which is to be taken separately, and not connected with the following)* refers to war, and not to "general business" [Clericus] is plain not only from the following account which mentions not only military undertakings for Saul, but also from the statement of the position of General which he received in consequence of his success in what was entrusted to him, and from the account of the military equipment which Jonathan (ver. 4) presented to him. In all, whereto Saul sent him, he was successful.—His warlike undertakings were fortunate and successful. The Verb (הִשְׁכִּיל) means "to act prudently, wisely" and then to be successful," as in Josh. i. 7 [Eng. A. V. "prosper"]. It always refers to conduct, "to act wisely, and then to be prosperous in one's undertakings." Saul set him over the men of war, that is, made him a military officer. He was appointed commander of a body of soldiers.—David soon attained to high consideration and acceptance in the eyes of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.—By this term we are to understand the officials at Saul's court. David's winning loveliness of character is here brought out more strongly by the statement that he did not excite the envy and jealousy of his fellow-officials at court. Clericus: "he pleased even the courtiers, who are commonly envious, especially of those who have newly found favor with the king." This idea is involved in the "and also" [= and even]. [Philippson: "As he was afterwards promoted to be chiliarch, he must here have been made centurion." But see on ver. 13.—Tr.]

3. Vers. 6–16. Here is related how Saul's deadly hatred against David springs from envy and jealousy. As the section xvii. 54–58 lays the foundation for David's permanent stay at the royal court—and as the section vers. 1–5, being the summary description of David's personal relations to Saul's family as Jonathan's friend, and to the court-officials and the people as military commander, explains what is afterwards said of David's relation to Jonathan and of his military career—so in this section, vers. 6–16, we have the cause of the deadly hate which Saul henceforth bore in his heart against David, there being preserved (a fact to be noted) in ver. 5 a significant silence as to Saul's feeling towards him, only the friendly disposition of Jonathan and of the offi-

* [The German (obviously by oversight) has: "and he loved Jonathan as his soul," and explains it as the expression of the formation of friendship on David's part.—Tr.]

† [Jonathan's conduct no less exhibits his own lofty and generous nature (Bib. Com.).—Tr.]

* [Erdmann translates (not so well): "And David went out; everywhere, whither Saul sent him, he was prudent (successful)." This is to avoid supplying "and" before "was prudent;" it seems better (with Chald., Syr.) to supply "and." See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

cials and people being mentioned. That no strict chronological advance is attempted in the narrative in xvii. 55 sq. is clear from the above remarks. As in ch. xvii. ver. 55 belongs as to its contents to ver. 40, and ver. 57 belongs next to ver. 54, so ver. 6 here is not connected in context and time immediately with ver. 5, but goes back to xvii. 52, 53. In vers. 1-4 is told what happened to David immediately after his victory over Goliath; he became Jonathan's friend, and was permanently fixed at court. That was the immediate result of his exploit (which decided the issue of the war with the Philistines.) In ver. 5 we have a further consequence: Saul employs David in warlike enterprises against the Philistines, and gives him command of a body of troops. But, according to xvii. 52, 53, the war with the Philistines was not ended by the victory over Goliath; on the contrary, they were again several times defeated, and their camp was plundered by the victorious Israelites on their return from pursuit. That Saul in thus finishing the war employed David as a bold leader is clearly stated in ver. 5, wherewith is also summarily told how David in his new position won the favor of the people and also of Saul's servants, while it is not said that Saul in appointing him to office bestowed his favor on him. The narration of ver. 6 now, going back to xvii. 53, connects itself with the return of the people and of David from the concluded war, in order to point out how on this occasion Saul's ill-will and hatred towards David arose, on which is founded the whole of the following narrative of the relation between David and Saul. The "as they came" refers to the return of the whole army from the happily ended war (comp. xvii. 53); at the same time is mentioned David's return with express reference to his victory over Goliath, which had determined the successful issue of the war, in order to bring into its proper historical connection the honor which then accrued to him. This return of David, therefore (along with the whole army), is not synchronous with his return to Saul in xvii. 57 immediately after the killing of the Philistine, but occurred after the victory over the whole Philistine army was completed. Here began Saul's envy and hatred against David. There is, therefore, no contradiction between the statement that Saul kept David by him and gave him a military command (vers. 2, 5), and the following statement (ver. 6 sq.) that in consequence of the honor shown David he conceived a lasting hatred against him (ver. 9).—We have the description of the festive reception given by the women from all the cities of Israel to the returning victorious army, Saul at its head. In the words: with song and dance the Art. [in Heb.] points to the usual employment of song and dance in such receptions. They met Saul with tabrets, with joyful outcry, and with triangles. Here מְנַחֵם ["joy"], standing between the two instruments of music, must denote, in distinction from the song of joy, the joyful cry which accompanied the beating of the tabrets. For dances accompanied by tabrets see Ex. xiv. 20.—Ver. 7. The women performed an antiphonal song; "they answered one another in turn" (Cleric.). The Partep. מִשְׁחָקִים [Eng. A. V. "played"] means perhaps alternate dancing, corresponding to the alternate song (Winer: Contredance a. a. Tanz), along with the choral dancing (מְחֹלִים). The Piel of שָׂחַ, "laugh," properly = "sport, play," e. g., of children on the street, Zech. viii. 5.*—The song: "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands" (comp. xxi. 12 and xxix. 5)—a part of a folk-song, which shows the great consideration in the sight of the people which David had obtained by his victory over Goliath.—Ver. 8. Saul was very wroth that greater honor was paid to David than to him. And there is yet only the kingdom for him, that is, for him to obtain. In this outburst of wrath he expresses in a curt ejaculation the well-founded anticipation that the so highly honored David would receive the royal dignity in his place. Clericus: "especially since Samuel had more than once predicted that it would pass into another family."—Ver. 9. From this point dated the evil, curious eye with which Saul henceforth looked on David.† Clericus: "in these words we see envy and jealousy." Luther: "And Saul looked sourly on David." It is an express statement of the continuous bitterness of Saul against David from now on.—Vers. 10, 11. Saul's anger against David rises to madness and to murderous purpose. The evil spirit from God came upon Saul. Comp. xvi. 14: "מְנַחֵם [Eng. A. V. "propheesied," Erdmann, "raved"], the influence of the evil spirit, analogous to the ecstatic condition of inspiration in which the good spirit from God put the prophets: as raved, raged." The old condition of internal disorder again came over Saul, now heightened by envy and jealousy against David. As in xvi. 23, David seeks by playing on the harp to mitigate Saul's rage. But as he was its object, the madness takes the form of an attempt on his life. The harp in David's hand and the spear in Saul's hand—taking the place of the sceptre, xxii. 6—are here put in sharpest contrast to one another.—[Saul's condition of mind is neither that of simple madness nor that of true prophecy. He is under the control of a power higher than himself; but it is an evil power. For the precise expression of this supernaturally-determined condition of mind and soul, in which the whole spiritual energy of the man moves freely, yet in a sphere into which it is supernaturally brought, becoming for the time one with the spirit, the Heb. has no other word than naba (נָבָא), and the Eng. no other word than prophecy. R. P. Smith ("Prophecy a Preparation for Christ," II. 54 sq.) points out a difference between the Niphal (generally but not always used of true divine prophecy) and the Hithpael (generally but not always of false prophecy), and we may here render: "he acted the prophet" (so here Junius); but it is desirable to exhibit in the translation, if possible, the supernatural element. Whether the Eng. "propheesied" will bear the meaning "spoke like a prophet" or "raved supernaturally" is doubtful; but it is so used of false prophets in Eng. A. V. in 1 Kings xxii. 10 (Hithp.) and 12 (Niph.).—Tr.]—Ver. 11. מְנַחֵם, Hiph. of שָׂחַ,

* [And see Judg. xvi. 25 for its use on festive occasions.—Tr.]

† מְנַחֵם, "eyeing," Denom. from מַחֵה, "eye."

properly "to stretch out longitudinally," comp. Ps. xxxvii. 24). As it is not said, that Saul actually threw the spear against the wall (as in xix. 10), the sense rather is: "he purposed to throw," and we are to suppose a threatening movement of the arm.*—David turned, withdrew before this threatening movement. Twice he did so; this supposes that Saul twice lifted his spear. This also proves that Saul only moved, did not throw the spear, as in xix. 10. Bunsen well observes: "If Saul actually threw the spear, we could not understand David's twice retiring. Saul held the spear in his hand, and David stood so near him that he could save himself only by withdrawing." This is therefore not the same thing as what is told in xix. 9, 10, where Saul actually throws the spear, which pierces the wall. The Sept. has after its manner arbitrarily omitted this section vers. 9–11, because it wrongly assumed the identity of the two accounts.—Ver. 12 relates how Saul's heart was divided between fierce envy and fear of David; the latter became an object of fear to him. The reason given for this is that the Lord was with David, and was departed from Saul. Through the honor accorded David for his God-given victory Saul became aware of what had already taken place, namely, that he was forsaken and rejected by the Lord.—Ver. 13. Enmity against David (born of envy and jealousy) and fear of him (as one specially blessed by God) led Saul to remove him from his presence.—He made him captain over a thousand. This means a different military position from that mentioned in ver. 5, "whether it denotes a higher position than the first, or the latter means an undefined promotion, as to which we can now hardly determine with certainty" (Keil).—He went out and in before the people is to be understood of David's military undertakings.—Ver. 14. Here as before (ver. 5) David is in everything prosperous. Whereby Saul's fear (which had led him to remove David from his side) is only increased, he was afraid of him (ver. 15); for he saw afresh that God was with David (ver. 14), but was departed from him.—Ver. 16. The love of the whole people for him now grew still greater, his consideration rose still higher. This must needs have increased Saul's fear, and along with it his envy and jealousy. So Saul's condition of soul is portrayed in progressive development with psychological truthfulness. Of this nothing is said in ver. 5, not a word of Saul's feeling towards David's success. Here, therefore, in vers. 15, 16, we have not the same situation (as if from a different source) as in ver. 5. The difference between them and the advance in the exhibition of Saul's inner life and his attitude towards David is obvious.†

4. Vers. 17–30. Saul's attempt on David's life in connection with his marriage with his daughter. In fulfilling his promise to give his daughter to the conqueror of Goliath (xvii. 25), Saul takes occasion to prepare the way for David's death in battle with the Philistines by requiring him to inflict a heavy defeat on them, thus artfully hoping to get rid of him. Such a murderous purpose Saul doubtless had when, after the failure of his murderous attempt in the house, he gave David command over a thousand. A clear light is thus thrown on his new appointment here to a definitely determined military position.—Ver. 17. "My oldest daughter" (Heb. large, as in xvi. 11 small=youngest). Saul's words: only be valiant, etc., are not to be taken as a condition, for the condition of receiving Saul's daughter to wife was the conquest of Goliath; but they contain an obligation which Saul lays on him, and which David is to accept in return for the honor of becoming Saul's son-in-law. Such exhortation and expectation on Saul's part would not seem strange to David, since in his continued wars against the Philistines Saul needed valiant heroes as leaders of his soldiers. It was also in itself perfectly proper for Saul to say to David: "Fight the battle or wars of the Lord;" for in thus designating Israel's wars against the Philistines, he expresses the same idea which David expressed in the words (xvii. 36, 47): "He has defied the ranks of the living God," and "The battle is the Lord's." These wars were "the wars of Jehovah," because Israel, whom the Philistines oppressed, was God's chosen covenant-people, in which the kingdom of God was to take shape within the territory contested by the Philistines, in attacking whom, therefore, the Philistines were trying to make void God's purpose of salvation. So must God needs oppose these enemies of His people and of the holy affairs of His kingdom. And this is the meaning of the title of that old collection of songs, Num. xxi. 14: "Book of the Wars of the Lord." And as it was the war of God Himself, the combatants therein were necessarily sure of the Lord's assistance.—But behind this proper language of Canaan was hid Saul's cunning and wickedness towards David. —Saul thought: My hand shall not be on him, but the hand of the Philistines shall be on him.—This "he thought" shows the same disposition in Saul as the same expression [Eng. A. V. "said"] in ver. 11. There he had stretched out hand and spear; but the deed had not come to performance. Here Saul resolves that David shall not die by his hand; but guile shall lead him to the desired end. So deep-sunken is he morally and intellectually that he seeks to avoid only the outward completion of the evil deed with his own hand, separates between the criminal hand and the wicked heart, and besides covers his wickedness with the hypocritical tongue, which speaks zealously for the things of the Lord. Berl. Bib.: "The finer the words the greater the deceit. Further, he would rather see the Philistines triumph than David survive."—Ver. 18. David's artless simplicity and honest humility are here sharply contrasted with Saul's artfulness and trickiness. As heretofore the struggle between Saul's better and worse impulses and the progress of the latter has been set forth with admirable delicacy and clearness, so now, on the other hand, David's disposition and character is most excellently exhibited by the simple narration of his conduct.—By the question: Who am I? David intimates the distance between his insignificant person as shepherd-lad and the high honor offered him. The question: "וְיָדָע [Eng. A. V.: "what is my life?"] does not refer to David's life; for if it mean his personal life, it involves a tautology with the preceding, and reference to his official life does not suit the connection, where the point is only of his person and family, apart from the fact that grammatically the personal interrogative pron. [so in the Eng.: "who is my life?"—Tr.] does not suit the noun "life." Nor can it mean in general position in life; וְיָדָע never means this. Keil, in defence of this view, says, that "וְיָדָע refers to the persons of the class of society to which David belonged," in which he admits that it is not the neuter real [Germ. sachliche.—Tr.] conception "condition of life," but the fundamental meaning of the word "The living" that is here employed; "for וְיָדָע never refers to things, but always to persons" (Böttcher). The word means here (as וְיָדָע in Ps. lxxviii. 11; 2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 13) a troop, people, or, from the connection: "my folks, my family." See Ew. § 179 b. To this is added: My father's family.—In his own eyes David seems too insignificant in person, in family and the House of his father to be son-in-law to the king.*—Ver. 19. "In the time of giving" that is, when she ought to have been given. Ew. § 237 a: "When the time is clear from the connection, a future event may be expressed by the Inf. with וְיָדָע." Comp. Deut. xxiii. 14; 2 Kings ii. 2.—Saul did not keep his word; for some reason he gave Merab to Adriel, the Meholahite to wife, "which cannot surprise us, considering Saul's capricious disposition in his advanced age" (Stähelin, Leben Davids, p. 11). A place, Abelmeholah, is mentioned in Judg. vii. 22, in Manasseh, west of the Jordan.—The section vers. 17–19 is arbitrarily omitted in the Sept. because the translators did not understand why Saul failed to keep his promise, and why his action was so contradictory or undecided.—One really does not see why the oscillating, self-contradictory Saul, governed by the momentary whims of his discordant soul, should not have been guilty of such breach of faith. Thenius' confident assertion "that these verses contain nothing but a popular story made out of the fact related in ver. 20 in imitation of Jacob's marriage with Leah and Rachel," is wholly without ground. To such an imitation there is lacking agreement in the chief features of the two narratives.

* [For a different pointing of the verb—"he lifted," see "Text and Gram." Erdmann's rendering is allowable, but rare.—Ta.]

† [The separate mention of Israel and Judah in ver. 16 points to the independence and separateness of Judah even at that time (Bib. Com.), and perhaps also to a post-Solomonic date for the authorship of the book.—Ta.]

Vers. 20–30. Michal becomes the wife of David, who issues victoriously out of the great dangers in battle with the Philistines, into which Saul had sent him to a certain death, as he hoped. That it is expressly said of Michal: She loved David, does not warrant the conclusion that Merab did not love him, and was therefore not given to him. The reason for this is not mentioned, simply because Saul's procedure was arbitrary. Perhaps there was at this moment no war with the Philistines in which he might have looked for David's destruction. It pleased Saul that Michal loved David. Between the transpiring of Michal's love and Merab's marriage we must suppose a space of time, during which Michal's love was developed.—Ver. 21. Michal was to be a snare to David, that is, Saul would impose such conditions on him in the marriage as would secure his death: on her account or occasion the hand of the Philistines should be on him (comp. v. 25):—וְיָדָע [Eng. A. V. in the one of the twain,] see "Text and Gram." is literally: in two [feminine]. Accordingly it is proposed to render (as Bunsen): David is to make a double marriage with Merab and Michal, as Jacob did; in this case (so Tremell.) ver. 19 is to be taken as Pluperfect: "she had been given." Similarly, S. Schmid, only he takes ver. 19 in this way, that Saul excused himself to David, and offered to restore Merab to him, she having been already married to another; but if he did not wish this, he should at least marry Michal. Or it is rendered: "Twice shalt thou sue for my alliance"—having failed in Merab's case, thou shalt succeed in Michal's (Cler.); or it is translated in duabus rebus gener meus eris hodie [in two things* thou shalt be my son-in-law to-day] (Vulg.), or, "by the second thou shalt contract an alliance with me to-day" (S. Schmid in the 2d ed. of the Bib. Heb. of Ev. v. d. Hooght, Lips., 1740). But all these renderings are materially [that is, as to content; German, sachlich.—Tr.] and linguistically untenable. The difficulty lies in their taking the numeral as a cardinal number. But there are passages where it = the second time, as undoubtedly in Job xxxiii. 14, and Nehemiah xiii. 20. If now we connect the word with the following (according to the accents), it reads: "a second time wilt thou become my son-in-law," that is, according to the explanation first given by Bunsen: "The first time by the betrothal to Merab (afterwards broken off), the second time by the actual marriage with Michal." Bunsen remarks that this explanation is forced and grammatically hard, as to which (1) grammatically the "second time," is justified by the above-cited passages, and (2) as to content or meaning this view is far less difficult and suspicious than that preferred by Bunsen, though it must be confessed to be open to the objection that the first marriage did not actually take place.—Keil's explanation: "in a second way thou shalt be my son-in-law," is unclear, and the rendering "second way" seems not grammatically sustained.—We escape all the difficulties of a connection with what follows if, with De Wette and Thenius, neglecting the accents (which cannot be finally decisive), we connect with the preceding and translate: "And Saul said to David the second time" (understanding the first time to be in ver. 17).—Thenius thinks that the words "And Saul said * * * to-day" [Eng. A. V. "Saul said * * * twain"] are an interpolation by the same hand as vers. 17–19, (1) because Saul would not have made the proposition first himself and then through the courtiers (ver. 22); (2) because he certainly acted only through others, the better to conceal his shameful purpose, and (3) because, if Saul had spoken first directly to David, we should expect also a direct answer from David (as in ver. 18). But these three reasons seem insufficient to establish his view; for (1) it does not appear why Saul should not first make this proposition himself, when we recollect that David returned no answer, and he thought it necessary to employ the agency of the courtiers*; (2) in making the proposition himself he could the better conceal his purpose, as he had not performed his first promise to David, and might now seem to make it good by offering his second daughter; (3) David's experience of deceit was sufficient to make him silent at first in respect to Saul's offer. O. v. Gerlach here well says: "Saul proposed this matter to David; but the latter did not answer, as he knew Saul's vacillation, and distrusted him; it therefore needed the persuasion of others to induce him to come into Saul's views."—Ver. 22sq. In the fluent discourse of the courtiers we see (1) something of the flattering, conciliatory tone usual in such circles, and (2) Saul's lively interest in the success of his plan to destroy David through Michal's love. Saul's servants were to speak with David "in secret," that is, "as if they did it behind the king's back" (Keil).—David's answer (ver. 23) is two-fold: (1) he affirms the great importance of such a step as marrying the king's daughter—referring to the distance between him and the honor for which he was to strive, and probably also herein alluding to Saul's former breach of faith in respect to Merab, which proceeded from contempt for his person; (2) he declares himself too poor to furnish a dowry suitable for a king's daughter. As to the dowry, or "morning-gift," see Gen. xxxiv. 12.—Ver. 25. In consequence of the courtiers' report of David's reasons for declining the marriage, Saul advances another step.† To attain his end he dispenses with the usual dowry, and demands only a hundred foreskins of Philistines (Jos. Ant., vi. 10-27, 600 heads)! It is herein supposed that the Philistines were again attacking Saul. This appears also from the fact that David was in this way to show that he had killed a hundred Philistines, to avenge the king of his enemies. Thus Saul thought to put David out of the way by the hand of the Philistines.—Ver. 26. David accepts Saul's proposition the more gladly as the demand was in keeping with his military calling, and he was to win Michal by a heroic achievement. And the days were not expired, that is, the time to the marriage, or the time set by Saul for the performance of the warlike deed, though Saul is not expressly said to have set any limit. Ewald explains that the time for the marriage with Merab was not yet expired [so Bib. Com.—Tr.]; but it is more natural to refer to the marriage with Michal.—Ver. 27. David marched to battle with his men, that is, with the thousand which had been assigned him (ver. 13), not with a few valiant followers (as Ewald, Bunsen, and others hold, because with a large body there would have been no danger); we are to suppose that David attacked a large Philistine force, as is intimated in the words "he slew among the Philistines two hundred men," which he could not have done with a small party. David doubly fulfills Saul's demand by bringing two hundred foreskins. And they counted out the full number. The arbitrary method of the Sept. is seen in their reading "one hundred" from ver. 25 instead of "two hundred." [Many modern critics, neglecting the spirit of the narrative, prefer the Sept. reading to the Heb., referring also to 2 S. iii. 14. Ignoring the enthusiasm and prowess of David, they insist on an arithmetical correctness in his slaughter, as if a youthful warrior on such an occasion would not rejoice in going beyond the mark. In 2 S. iii. 14 David properly mentions the price demanded by Saul; all beyond was not price, but free gift.—Tr.] Ver. 28sq. Here, similarly, the Sept. for "Michal, Saul's daughter," puts "all Israel." Bunsen: "A completely unfounded change of the Heb. text," taken from ver. 16. The issue of the hostile schemes set on foot against David is the opposite of what Saul intended. The narrative asserts not only that God was with David, but also that Saul knew it. Michal's love to David, and Saul's hate, which had grown into permanent enmity, are here sharply contrasted. "Saul was yet the more afraid" points back to vers. 12-15. Saul's perception of the fact that David was under God's special protection only increased the feeling that he himself was forsaken and rejected by God, who shielded David against his wicked designs.*—Ver. 30 stands in pragmatic connection with the following narrative of Saul's conduct towards David, whose brilliant exploits against the Philistines and rising reputation still more inflamed the jealousy and hatred of Saul.

* [On the text of this verse see "Text. and Gram." Philipsson explains: "My life offered in battle would be a poor gift," which, however, the text will hardly bear.—Tr.]

* [That is, by two deeds—killing Goliath and slaying the Philistines (ver. 25).—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The history of sin in Saul's inner life shows a steady and rapid progress in evil after it had gained footing and mastery in his heart. When a man once gives place to passion in his soul, he comes more and more into its power, and is at last completely ruled by it, and driven even more violently on from sin to sin. "He that doeth sin is the slave of sin."—Jealousy, which, in a heart that has lost God's love and honor as its centre, is born of selfishness (wanting all love, honor, joy for itself alone), has always for its companion envy of the successes, the honor and the good fortune of others. From envy come gradually hatred and enmity, and then, by hidden or by open ways, murder—"he who hateth his brother is a murderer." Parallel to the example of Saul are those of Cain and Joseph's brothers.

2. With the deeds which God the Lord performs in the history of his kingdom through chosen instruments, whom He has thereto prepared and enabled by the wise leadings of His grace, are often connected immediate consequences, which (like the consequences of David's victory for him,) are of far-reaching importance

* [That is, David's silence as to Saul's proposition explains why the latter had recourse to his courtiers.—Tr.]

† It is unnecessary to read, with Sept., Vulg., Chald., and others, לֹא 'ל, instead of 'ל. Maurer: "Here, as often elsewhere, after a negative, 'ל signifies "but," or rather "for" in this sense: the king desires no dowry, but (for) he desires a hundred Philistine foreskins."

* לֹא contracted from לֹא and prefix לֹא —Ew. § 328 c. Olshausen, Gr., pp. 297, 530, regards it as a clerical error for לֹא .

for their further course in life, and provide them with broader and higher equipment of the inner and outer life for greater tasks which are assigned them for the kingdom of God. And the more willingly they thus enter the school of suffering and conflict, as David did, the more do they grow in humility, obedience, and childlike submission to God's will, but the more also do they learn the truth of the word: God gives grace to the humble, He makes the upright to prosper. He who, like David, walks humbly and obediently in God's ways, unmoved by the good fortune granted him, or by the trials and conflicts which often come upon him out of such good fortune through the sins of others, sees himself everywhere led by the Lord's hand, and accompanied by His blessing.

3. True friendship in two souls must be rooted in a like attitude of the heart to a loving God, must exhibit itself in a mutual unselfish devotion of heart in love which is based on a common love to the Lord, and must approve itself in the school of suffering.

4. In the character-pictures which it presents to us (as is clear in the history of Saul and David), Holy Scripture never exhibits a pause in religious-moral life, but always holds up the mighty "Either * * * Or," which man has to decide,—either forward on the way in which man walks at the hand of God with giving up of his own will and humble obedience to the will of God, or backwards with uncheckable step, when man puts God's guidance from him, and, following his own will, suffers not God's will to be accomplished in, on, and through himself.

[Maurice: (Prophets and Kings of the Old Test.): I have not tried to ascertain the point at which the moral guilt of Saul ends and his madness begins; the Bible does not hint at a settlement of that question. It is enough for us to know, and to tremble as we know, that the loss of all capacity for discerning between right and wrong may be the rightful and natural result of indulging any one hateful passion. On the other hand, it is comforting to believe that there are conditions of mind to which we must not and dare not impute moral delinquency; a still greater and deeper comfort to know that in these conditions, as well as those where there is most of wilful wrong, God may still be carrying on His great and wonderful work of "bringing souls out of darkness and the shadow of death, of breaking their bonds asunder." There are glimpses of light in the later life of Saul which must be referred to the divine source.

Chandler (Life of David, p. 60): David, in the destruction of the Philistines, acted contrary to no rules of religion and morality; for the men he destroyed were the enemies of his country, in a state of actual war with his prince and people, and therefore lawful prize wherever he could lay hold of them.—TR.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. J. LANGE: To love good people, and that in such a way that one loves and esteems them for the good he sees in them, is a sign that one is good himself.—SCHLIER: True friendship is a gift of God, and God grants it to those who seek Him.—BERL. BIBLE: The connection which God establishes between truly converted men is almost indescribable. There is an incomprehensible something that out of two such souls makes a single one in God. No blood relationship or natural friendship comes up to this, because such a union proceeds from utter conformity. When men have experienced such a oneness of soul, they make with each other an everlasting covenant.—[Ver. 3. TAYLOR: A league of friendship, which for sincerity, constancy, and romantic pathos, is unrivalled in the annals of history, whether sacred or profane.—TR.]

Ver. 4. SCHMID: True and genuine love delights to show itself also by outward signs.—CREMER: They are true friends who help not only in prosperity but also in necessity.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: These two loved each other truly in God, to whose service they had devoted themselves in holy hours of consecration, and their views, judgments, opinions and strivings were completely harmonious.—When such conditions concur, there grows up the sweet flower which the apostle, in distinction from universal love, calls "peculiar." There blooms the friendship, which, rooting itself in similarity of sanctified natural disposition, and working an improvement of this on both sides, takes one of the highest places among earthly blessings. There knits itself the communion of heart, in consequence of which one man becomes to another, as it were, a living channel, through which there incessantly streams upon him a fulness of refreshing consolation and encouragement, enriching his inner life.—Ver. 5. SCHLIER: The Lord makes everything right and good! That God who so wonderfully led David, and even in the least and most trifling things trained him up for his calling, will also lead us by the hand step after step, and if we let ourselves be led, will certainly lead everything to a good result. Let us always hold to the old saying: As God will, hold I still!—Ver. 7. F. W. KRUMMACHER: Let us always celebrate our heroes, perpetuate their memory in monuments, twine laurel crowns for all who have done good service for the common weal, or through their creative gifts have enlarged the domain of elevating and wholesome ideas. Only let us not forget, through whatever of great, noble and blessed is achieved by the sons of man, to be reminded first of the Father of spirits, from whom every good and perfect gift comes down to us, and let us in humility and modesty give to Him, before all others, the honor which is His due.—Ver. 8. STARKE: Where prosperity comes, envy soon follows (Gen. xxxvii. 8, Dan. vi. 1-5). [HENRY: Now begin David's troubles, and they not only tread on the heels of his triumphs, but take rise from them; such is the vanity of that in this world which seems greatest.—SCOTT: Lavish commendations of those whom we love and admire, in such a world as this, often prove a real injury.—TR.]

V. 9. sq. F. W. KRUMMACHER: Were it granted us in our own local circles everywhere to look behind the curtain, who knows how often we too should behold like scenes! Scenes of a wild outpouring of an injured feeling of honor, or of unrestrained vexation at losses, or of flaming and heart-consuming envy, so that we too could not avoid designating these paroxysms by the expression "demoniacal."—BERL. BIBLE: Selfishness occasions a deadly jealousy, for it makes one grudge the favors which God grants to others.—SCHLIER: If everything had gone on so, if all the people had continually shouted to meet the bold hero, how easily might pride have taken possession of him, how easily might he have fallen from his humility, and become full of vanity and assumption. Therefore God the Lord took him into His own school, and such a school of trouble is indeed bitter, but it is good and wholesome, and he who learns in it first rightly becomes a man after God's own heart.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: Scarcely one trying condition of life can be thought of, in which David had not found himself at some time or other during his pilgrimage. Even for his own sake, that he might not be exalted above measure through the abundant favors vouchsafed unto him, he needed continual reminders of his dependence on Him who, on high and in the sanctuary, dwells with those who are of contrite and humble spirit. Besides, David was to become even for thousands of years a loved and comforting companion to the weary and oppressed of every sort, and for that reason, also, no cup of trouble must pass him by untasted.—[SCOTT: For every great and good work a man must expect to be envied by his neighbor; no distinction or pre-eminence can be so unexceptionably obtained, but it will expose the possessor to slander and malice, and perhaps to the most fatal consequences. But such trials are very useful to those who love God; they serve as a counterpoise to the honor put upon them, and check the growth of pride and attachment to the world; they exercise them to faith, patience, meekness, and communion with God; they give them a fair opportunity of exemplifying the amiable nature and tendency of true godliness, by acting with wisdom and propriety in the most difficult circumstances; they make way for increasing experience of the Lord's faithfulness, in restraining their enemies, raising them up friends, and affording them His gracious protection; and they both prepare them for those stations in which they are to be employed, and open their way to them: for in due time modest merit will shine forth with double lustre.—TR.]—Ver. 10. CRAMER: When one opens the door of his heart to the devil by envy, pride, scorn, sour looks and rudeness, he is not far off, but soon enters in with his hellish forces (Gen. xxxvii. 8, 18 sq.). WURT. SUMM.: How unhappy is a man who has turned away from God, and yet will not acknowledge and confess his guilt, but still assumes that he is in the right! This makes him discontented with God, and grudging and hostile to others who are favored by God.—Ver. 11. STARKE [from BR. HALL]: It is well for the innocent that wicked men cannot keep their own counsel. [HENRY: Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul, and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the sweetness and usefulness of God's persecuted people, and the brutishness and barbarity of their persecutors.—TR.]—Ver. 12. OSIANDER: God turns away the blows of enemies, so that they are in vain and do no damage.—

STARKE: Those who have in God a gracious father and a protector are feared by others (Mark vi. 20).—Ver. 13. S. SCHMID: The evil which ungodly men threaten and do to the pious God knows how to change into something good (Gen. l. 20).—Ver. 15. SCHMID: One can avenge himself on envious men in no better and nobler way, than when with God's help, he behaves himself wisely, and seeks in prayer the increase of the divine blessing.—Ver. 16. STARKE: When ungodly men think to lessen the honor and consideration of the pious, it is often so much the more increased.—CHRYSTOTOM (3 Homilies on David and Saul): But that holy man even after all this, continued caring for the other's interests, and incurring perils to promote his safety, and taking place in the ranks in all battles, and preserving by his own perils the one who wished to slay him, and neither in words nor in deeds did he provoke that savage wild beast, but in all things yielded and was obedient.—TR.]

Ver. 17. Friendlier face, worse rogue; therefore try the spirits (Psa. xxviii. 3, lv. 22 [21]). [Saul a hypocritical pretender, both to paternal affection (comp. vers. 20–21), and to pious devotion, "the Lord's battles."—TR.]—OSIANDER: Hypocrites persuade themselves that they have done no evil if only they do not put their own hand to it, although they manage to do it through others.—STARKE: A true Christian must also be a good soldier, and fight the Lord's battles (2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 7).—Ver. 18. A pious man is even in prosperity humble of heart.—BERL. BIBLE: This humility of David may teach us much. He knew well that he was to be king, and that God had caused him to be anointed thereto; yet he never spoke of such a favor, but rather gives it to be understood how utterly nothing he is, and how unworthy he thought himself.—Ver. 20. SCHLIER: When God does not give us something which we have desired, we should be certain that our wish would not have been good for us, and should be not less certain that God has something better in store for us.—Ver. 22. STARKE: One should not let himself be used for the purpose of causing others to fall.—Ver. 23. BERL. BIBLE: A truly humble man never seeks his own honor, even though opportunities should occur in which he might well do so.—Simplicity and uprightness put all the devices of evil subtlety to shame. And those who always go straight forward often catch those who wanted to catch them.—Ver. 29. OSIANDER: The greater injustice and violence any one does to innocent people, the more must he be afraid of them.

[HENRY: Observe how God brought good to David out of Saul's projects against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter to be a snare to him, but that marriage made his succeeding Saul less invidious. 2. Saul thought by putting him upon dangerous service to have him taken off, but that very service increased his popularity and facilitated his coming to the crown. Thus God makes the wrath of man to praise Him, and serves His designs of kindness to His own people by it.—TR.]

Vers. 1–2. F. W. KRUMMACHER. The fruit which David personally gained from his triumph over Goliath was threefold: a joyful acquisition, a perilous honor, and a threatening displeasure.

[Ver. 12. TAYLOR. Three lessons from this chapter: (1) The evil of centering our thoughts and plans entirely on ourselves. This was the root of Saul's misery. (2) The servant of God may expect to encounter adversity in an early stage of his career. (3) The wisest course in time of danger is to do faithfully his daily duty, and leave our case with God.—Tr.]

Chap. xviii. DISSELHOFF: Pleasure and Burden, or, Temptation and Victory: (1) In the pleasure lies the temptation, (2) in the burden lies the power to overcome.

[Vers. 1-4. Jonathan, the man of generous soul. (1) Generous in admiring. (a) Not jealous, though his own military fame is eclipsed. (b) Fully appreciating the merit of a new and obscure man. (c) Admiring not only a brilliant exploit, but modest, graceful and devout words (David's "speaking," comp. xvii. 37, 45-7, and remember that he was a poet of rare genius). (2) Generous in proposing friendship, where he might so naturally have indulged jealousy (as his father did). Love at first sight, seeking permanent union. (HALL: "A wise soul hath piercing eyes, and hath quickly discovered the likeness of itself in another. * * * That true correspondence that was both in their faith and valor, hath knit their hearts.") (3) Generous in giving, what was not only valuable and suitable to his friend's present wants, but honorable as being associated with himself.—Generosity, shown in mutual appreciation and mutual benefits, is the basis of sweet and lasting friendship—and in general, it is one of the noblest traits of human character.

Vers. 1-9. How David gained a friend and an enemy. (HALL: "David's victory had a double issue, Jonathan's love and Saul's envy, which God so mixed that the one was a remedy of the other.")

Vers. 5-30. David's prudence. (1) Amid the perils of sudden prosperity. The shepherd-youth honored with the friendship of the prince, the plaudits of the multitude, military command, the prospect of entering the royal family—but he behaved wisely and prospered all the more. (HENRY: "Those that climb fast have need of good heads and good hearts." HALL: "Honor shows the man. * * * He is out of the danger of folly, whom a speedy advancement leaveth wise." Comp. Joseph and Daniel.) (2) Amid the plots of jealous rivals—Saul, the courtiers—but he avoids the javelin of rage, and foils the cunning of hypocrisy. (3) Amid provocations to wrath, by promises broken (ver. 19), and fresh demands (25). The brilliant young warrior and poet as prudent as a sage statesman—for the Lord was with him (vers. 12, 14, 28).

Ver. 17. The shrinking hand and the scheming heart.

Vers. 28-9. Growing prosperity, growing hate.—Tr.]

THIRD SECTION.

Open Deadly Persecution of David by Saul, and David's Flight from Saul.

CHAPTERS XIX. — XXVII.

- I. Jonathan proves his friendship for David in Saul's open attempts on David's life. David's first flight from Saul's murderous attempts, and his escape by Michal's help.

CHAPTER XIX. 1-24.

- 1 AND Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants that they should
- 2 kill [about killing¹] David. But Jonathan, Saul's son, delighted much in David. And Jonathan told David, saying, Saul, my father, seeketh to kill thee; now, therefore, I pray thee [and now] take heed to thyself [i.e. I pray thee] until the morning [to-morrow morning,² om. until the], and abide in a secret place, and hide
- 3 thyself.³ And I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where thou art, and I will commune [speak] with [to] my father of thee; and what I see [I

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. This is the literal rendering of the Heb., and so the ancient VSS., except Vulg., which makes "they" the subject of the killing (so Eng. A. V.), and Arab., which correctly makes "he" (Saul) the subject. The context shows that neither to Jonathan nor to the servants of Saul was charge given to slay David.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 2. Literally: "in the morning." Sept. αὐριον πρωι, which Thenius says is the rendering of Heb. מִקְרָא; but קֶרֶב, as Weilh. points out, includes the notion "early in the morning."—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 2. Sept. reverses the order and reads: "hide thyself and remain in secret," as if the hiding must precede the dwelling in secret; but the hiding may just as well be regarded as the consequence of dwelling in secret (against Weilh.).—Tr.]

- 4 will see what he says that [and] I [om. I] will tell thee. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father, and said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because [for] he hath not sinned against thee, and
 5 because [om. because] his works have been to thee-ward very good. For [And] he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine, and the Lord [Jehovah] wrought a great salvation for all Israel;⁴ thou sawest it and didst rejoice; wherefore, then, wilt thou sin against innocent blood, to slay David without a cause?
 6 And Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan, and Saul sware, As the Lord
 7 [Jehovah] liveth, he shall not be slain.⁵ And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan showed him all these things. And Jonathan brought David to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past.
 8 And there was war again, and David went out⁶ and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter, and they fled from him. And the [an] evil spirit from the Lord [Jehovah]⁷ was upon Saul; as he sat [and he was sitting] in his house, with [and] his javelin [ins. was] in his hand, and David played [was playing] with his hand. And Saul sought to smite David even [om. even] to the wall with the javelin, but he slipped away [got away] out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall. And David fled, and escaped that night.⁸
 11 Saul also [And Saul] sent messengers unto David's house to watch him, and⁹ to slay him in the morning; and Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save 12 not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain. So [And] Michal let David 13 down through a [the] window, and he went and fled and escaped. And Michal took an image [the teraphim],¹⁰ and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow [the quilt] of goats' hair for his bolster [at its head],¹¹ and covered it with a cloth [the cover-14 let]. And when Saul sent messengers to take David, she¹² said, He is sick.
 15 And Saul sent the messengers again [om. again] to see David, saying, Bring him
 16 up to me in the bed, that I may slay him. And when the messengers were come in [And the messengers came in and] behold, there was an image¹³ in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster [behold the teraphim in the bed and the quilt
 17 of goats' hair at its head]¹⁴. And Saul said unto Michal, Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped? And Michal answered [said to] Saul, He said unto me, Let me go,¹⁵ why should I kill thee?
 18 And David fled and escaped and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all

⁴ [Ver. 5. Sept.: "all Israel saw and rejoiced," other VSS. as Heb. It is here more fitting and politic in Jonathan to refer to Saul's own knowledge of David.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 6. Sept., Syr. and some MSS. have Qal: "shall not die."—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 8. Sept. κατέχευε, either an explanation (Schleusner), or they read ῥῆμα (Wellh.); the Heb. is to be maintained.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 9. In this divine name the VSS. vary. The Vat. MS. has θεοῦ, Alex. has κυρίου, text in Stier and Thiele's Polygl. (which is an eclectic text) omits it, as does Arab.; the others as Heb. That יהוה is without the Art. is not decisive in favor of יהוה, for an evil spirit could as well come from Jehovah as from Elohim (i. e. the deity), and may as well be called "a spirit of Jehovah." Elsewhere the Heb. has רוח; but it is at least as probable that the Vat. would change the text to secure uniformity as that the Masorites would change for no reason at all. See note on xvi. 14.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 10. On this reading see Erdmann in the Exposition.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 11. Wellhausen (following Sept.) objects to the "and" on the ground that the two actions (of watching and killing) are not here co-ordinated, the killing not being entrusted to the watchers. This is perhaps an unnecessary refinement, ver. 14 being possibly a repetition of this statement, not necessarily a sending of additional messengers. Yet, as Saul sends in ver. 14 apparently to take, not to kill David, the reference of the killing here to Saul and the omission of the ו (which may have been repeated from the preceding word) give a good sense.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 13. "Teraphim" is a plu. word, but is here used in the Heb. as sing.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 13. The Eng. A. V. renders "bolster" to correspond to its above rendering "pillow." The Heb. means simply "at its head;" the exact use which Michal made of the quilt is not clear.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 14. The Sept. has "they said," that is, the people of the house, the servants, speaking with the messengers at the door. But the Heb. text is perfectly natural: either it means Michal sent word, that is, said through her servants, or, if she herself spoke with the messengers, she reported David sick to gain time, having meantime prepared the bed to deceive her own servants (whose fidelity she might doubt) or Saul's messengers in case they should go to look for David.—The Vulg. has the indefinite responsum est.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 16. תְּרָפִים, teraphim. Chald., Syr., Arab., Vulg., render "image." Sept. has κενοτάφια, "cenotaphs, empty tombs," a contemptuous designation of the vanity of the idols, Aq. gives μικροῦματα or σπορομαί, the latter (meaning "half figures") being important as bearing on the form of the teraphim.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 16. מְרִאשְׁתֵּי, from רָאשׁ or רִאשׁ by the local preformative מ. The plu. would be properly מְרִאשְׁתֵּי (see Jer. xiii. 18) as from רִאשׁתֵּי. Comp. Ew., Gr. § 100 b, Fürst's Concordance s. v.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 17. Or: "send me away." The verb is fem. in many MSS. and Edd.—Ta.]

- that Saul had done to him. And he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth.¹⁶
 19, 20 And it was told Saul, saying, Behold David is at Naioth in Ramah. And Saul sent messengers to take David; and when they saw the company¹⁷ of the prophets prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed [as leader] over them, the Spirit of God was [came] upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied.
 21 And when [om. when] it was told Saul, [ins. and] he sent other messengers, and they [ins. also] prophesied likewise [om. likewise]. And Saul sent messengers again the third time, and they prophesied also [also prophesied]. Then [And] went he also [he also went] to Ramah, and came to a [the] great well [cistern]¹⁸ that is in Sechu.¹⁹ And he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And
 23 one said, Behold, they be [are] at Naioth in Ramah. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah; and the Spirit of God was [came] upon him also, and he went 24 on and prophesied until he came to Naioth in Ramah. And he [ins. too] stripped off his clothes also [om. also] and [ins. he too] prophesied before Samuel in like manner [om. in like manner], and lay down naked all that day and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets?

¹⁶ Ver. 18. So the Qeri, but the Kethib is Nevaloth.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 20. So universally taken (—קהל). Lud. de Dieu, however, refers to the Æth. stem קהל—conscors, whence he thinks our word may mean magnum numerum, or, senatum, presbyterium Prophetarum. In Æth. the word represents only magistracy, superiority (Dillmann, Lec. Æth.), which does not suit here.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 22. The word is anathrous, and so far supports the Sept.: "the cistern of the threshing-floor" (Wellh.), as this construction is unusual; but that it is not unexampled is shown by 2 Sam. xii. 4; 1 Kings vii. 8, 12, and would be not unnatural here in speaking of a well-known cistern, where קלס might almost have the force of a proper name. The addition of Sept at beginning of ver. 22: "and Saul became very angry," is suspicious because of its naturalness.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 23. Sept. Σεφ, Ar. Ramah. The Heb. is to be preferred.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-7. Warding off through Jonathan's mediation of the first open outbreak of Saul's deadly enmity to David.

Ver. 1. Saul advances so far in his deadly hate towards David that he speaks openly to his courtiers of his purpose to kill him. The "killing" [Eng. A. V. is wrong, see Text. and Gram.—Ta.] refers not to Jonathan and Saul's servants, but to Saul himself.—Ver. 2. Jonathan shows his friendship for David 1) in informing him of Saul's designs on his life, and counselling him to conceal himself, and 2) in interceding for him with Saul, and trying to turn away his anger (ver. 3), in which he succeeds.—In thus attempting to restore friendly relations between his father and David, Jonathan's aim was to keep David at court for the welfare of his father and the people, because he saw in David a specially chosen instrument of the Lord for the welfare of Israel, as he expressly declares in ver. 4. (קלס with ק as in Ps. lxxxvii. 3; Deut. vi. 7: "to speak concerning one." Ew., § 217, 2.)—David is to hide in the field, as we infer from Jonathan's saying that he will speak with his father in the field where David is. The place designated by Jonathan was perhaps one to which Saul used often to go, or where he was accustomed to hold confidential and private conversations. To "what" [see Text. and Gram.—Ta.] we must supply "he says" or "I hear" (Vulg.: et quodcumque videro tibi nuntiabo [so Eng. A. V.]). Against De Wette's translation: "what it is," Thenius properly urges that Jonathan already knew what Saul then had in mind. Against Thenius' view that David was to hide near Saul in order to hear what he said is the fact that Jonathan himself says to David: "I will tell thee." Rather we must suppose with Keil that Jonathan made this arrangement in order that he might tell David the result of the conversation immediately, without having to go far from his father, and thus awaken suspicion of an understanding with David.—Vers. 4, 5. Jonathan's statement to Saul is three-fold: 1) he spoke good of David, that is, he spoke favorably of him, pointing out his excellent qualities and his services to Saul and the nation; 2) on the ground of this he implored Saul not to sin against his servant. This designation of David as his servant accords with the foregoing reference to the good which David, as Saul's faithful servant, had done; 3) to this he adds two reasons, a negative: "he hath not sinned against thee," that is, he has done nothing to call forth thy vengeance; and a positive: "his works are very useful to thee," that is, far from doing thee harm, he hath done thee only great service by his deeds.—The relation of ver. 5 to the latter part of ver. 4 is this, that Jonathan, continuing his mediation, here reminds his father of the deed which is specially to be taken into consideration, the slaying of the Philistine, and how he had therein ventured his life: "he put his life in his hand" (xxviii. 21; Judg. xii. 2), risked his life (perhaps alluding to David's hand, which swung the sling against the giant, on the firmness and certainty of which his life depended).—Jonathan then proceeds to point out how serviceable to Saul this deed of David was: and the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel; thou sawest it and didst rejoice. This reminder of Saul's joy at David's exploit (seen with his own eyes) and its grand results, this vivid presentation of the situation at that time is the psychological stepping-stone to the ethical change which is brought about in Saul's attitude towards David by Jonathan's pressing and yet modest supplication: Why wilt thou sin against innocent blood, to slay David without cause?—Saul was changeable and uncertain in his unstable inner life, because there was yet in him a noble germ whence good fruit might yet come.—Ver. 6. Saul swore, a characteristic indication of his to go to one extreme or another. David's life was now saved. [Some think that Saul swore insincerely, to put Jonathan off his guard; but this is not so probable as that he was here sincere, but fell again under the power of jealousy (ver. 10).—Tr.].—Ver. 7. Jonathan, having performed this friendly service for David, informs him of the result according to promise (ver. 3), and David resumes his place at court. David was in Saul's presence "as yesterday and the day before," that is, as in times past.

* [The Heb. (קלס) means the "palm or hollow of the hand," as the proper place in which to put something, usually the hand as receptacle, not as instrument.—Ta.]

Vers. 8-17. David's first flight in consequence of another murderous attempt on Saul's part, the result of envy and jealousy.

Ver. 8. The background of this narrative is formed by the military life which was connected with the continued wars with the Philistines. The "went out" is not to be changed into some other word (with Then. after Sept. καταχυρε), but to be retained (as in xviii. 5, 16) as expressing David's marching forth to battle.—Ver. 9. The ethical ground of Saul's new outburst of rage after David's success is his envy and jealousy of David's honor and glory, as is intimated by the preceding mention of the latter's victory over the Philistines.—"We have two similar accounts of Saul's outbreaks (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sq.) simply because such outbreaks were really frequent (comp. especially xviii. 18) and like one another" (Nägelbach in Herz. XIII. 403). An evil spirit of Jehovah came upon Saul.—While this evil spirit is in xvi. 15 and xviii. 10 referred to Elohim, the Deity in general, Jehovah is here affirmed to be its sender, because Saul's condition, which was there only ascribed in general to a higher divine causality in respect to his person, is here regarded as a judgment of the covenant-God of Israel on the reprobate king, who hardens his heart against God.—Along with his military calling, David here again takes his old place as harpist. He did not abandon the post assigned him by the Lord, so long as the Lord did not through events command him to leave it, as was afterwards the case, cf. ch. xx.—The Sept. took offence at the "evil spirit of Jehovah" and left out "Jehovah."* But the Genitive means nothing more than what is said in xvi. 14, that the God of Israel sent an evil spirit on Saul, or gave him over to the power of the evil spirit.—Ver. 10. David escapes Saul's spear, which penetrates the wall. He flees the same night. (The Art. of the Pron. is lacking from similarity of sound, Ew. § 392 a, and § 70 c). The Sept. reads: "and it came to pass that night that Saul sent" (inserting "וַיִּשְׁלַח" and connecting with the following), looking to ver. 12, where the flight by night is first mentioned. Against this it is not necessary to insist that the narrator here in Hebrew fashion gives the result first by anticipation, and then details the immediate incidents; for Saul's attempt may have occurred in the evening, or, if it happened in the day-time, David may first have hidden in Saul's house, and then at night have fled to his own house. That David fled to his own dwelling and remained there till night, appears from ver. 11, according to which Saul sends messengers to his house to watch him and to kill him in the morning (that is, when he went out again). With this agrees exactly the fact that Michal, who acquainted him with the danger threatening him in his house, presses him to flee that night, because in the morning he would be slain. In the night of the same day on which the attempt on his life occurred, David fled from Saul's house to his own, and the same night by Michal's means he fled from his own house. [Kitto: "We may guess that only the fear of alarming the town, and of rousing the populace to rescue their favorite hero, prevented him from directing them to break into the house and slay David there." Others suggest the fear of alarming or injuring Michal. She could easily get notice of Saul's design from Jonathan or others.—Tr.]

Ver. 12. Through the window, because the door was watched (ver. 11) by Saul's men. For similar escapes through windows see Josh. ii. 15; Acts ix. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 33.—With this flight of David began his weary fleeing before Saul, and the great sufferings and dangers which he encountered in this unsettled life.—Ver. 13. By a trick with the teraphim Michal deceives Saul's catchpools.—The teraphim were the images of domestic or private gods (Penates) which the Israelites retained as the remnant of the idolatry brought from the Aramean or Chaldean home (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34) in spite of their removal after the entry of Jacob's family into Canaan (Gen. xxiv. 2 sq.) and of the absolute prohibition of idolatry in the Law, which reappear especially in the period of the Judges (Judg. xvii. 5; xviii. 14 sq.) and particularly meet us in the houses of Saul and David in spite of Samuel's prophetic zeal against such idolatry (1 Sam. xv. 23; comp. Hos. iii. 4; Zech. x. 2). The Plu. here represents a single image, which it seems (ver. 16) must have had the human form at least as to head and face, though the size may have varied, since (Gen. xxxi. 30 sq.) it was so small that Rachel could conceal it under the camel-saddle, while Michal here uses it to make Saul's men believe that David was in the bed. The teraphim which Laban calls his "Elohim" were probably originally tutelary deities, dispensers of domestic and family good fortune. On the derivation and meaning of the name see Rödiger in Ges. Thes. III. 1520, Hävernicks on Ezek. p. 347 sq., and Delitzsch Gen. II. p. 220 [and Art. "Teraphim" in Smith's Bib. Dict.—Tr.].* On the meaning see particularly the Arts. in Winer and Herzog. Whether it was a wooden image is uncertain, as also, whether Michal had such domestic gods on account of her barrenness (Michaelis, Thenius, Keil). לֵבָר (which the Sept. read לֵבָר "liver," whence Joseph says that Michal put a palpitating goatliver into the bed to represent a breathing sick man) is from נָנִיב ["to braid"] and means woven-work or net [rendered quilt or mattress, Eng. A. V. pillow.—Tr.]. The plural of "goat" (יָנִיב) here = goats' hair. The Def. Art. points to something which belonged to the furnishing of a couch or bed.* She put it at his head, which may mean either that she put a woven cover under his head, or a hairy cover on or around his head. In any case Michal's purpose was to make the head of the teraphim look as much as possible like a human head. The נָנִיב ["with the coverlet"] must, on account of the article, be understood of some piece of household stuff, therefore of the bed-cover. The word (נָנִיב) means the upper garment of the Oriental, which is a wide cloth thrown around the person, and served also for bed-clothing.—Ver. 14. When Saul's messengers come the first time, Michal says to them that David is sick. [On this untruth see "Hist. and Theolog." to this chap. at end.—Tr.].—Ver. 15. Saul, determined to carry out his purpose orders David to be brought up to him on the bed, that is, to his house, which, therefore, was higher than David's. "Saul must therefore have resided in Gibeon on the height" (Then.).—Ver. 16. The messengers come and discover the deceit. The express mention of the "goat-hair cover at his head" shows that this had materially contributed to the success of the deception. It appears from ver. 13 that to the words [of the Heb.]: "behold teraphim in the bed," we must supply "laid" or "placed."—Ver. 17. Saul demands an explanation of Michal. Why hast thou sent away my enemy?—In these words appears all Saul's bitterness and blindness. It is a sort of "persecuting mania" that shows itself in David's persecutor.—Michal's defence does not agree with the statement in vers. 11, 12, that she herself urged David to flight. From fear of her father she tells a "lie of necessity," saying: "He said to me, send me away, why should I kill thee?" She pretends that she wished to prevent his flight, but he threatened to kill her if she stood in his way. [To this deliverance is referred Ps. lix. by its title and Ps. vii. by some critics.—Tr.]

* [See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]

* [See other opinions in Poole's Synopsis on Gen. xxxi. 19, and in Patrick's Comm. here.—Tr.]

Vers. 18–24. David's flight to Ramah to Samuel.

Ver. 18. David told Samuel all that Saul had done to him.—That David takes refuge in Samuel's quiet seat of the prophets is explained by the intimate connection which David already had with Samuel and the prophetic school presided over by him, and especially by the official-theocratic connection which David's anointing had brought about between the two men. Samuel now becomes God's instrument for saving and preserving David as the Lord's Anointed from the attempts of Saul. David dwelt "at Naioth" with Samuel, who went thither with him. Naioth is to be distinguished from Ramah, Samuel's dwelling-place, and to be regarded as a place where Samuel stayed as long as David, who had at first reported to him at Ramah, was with him (comp. vers. 22, 23). The Kethib has everywhere Nevsioth, Vulg. (with Qeri) Naioth. The appellative, signifying "dwellings," became the proper name of the place where dwelt the prophets who gathered about Samuel as their head (comp. ver. 20). The plu. form indicates a colony consisting of several dwellings, a prophetic cenobium.*—Vers. 19, 20. Saul, having been informed of David's stay in this cenobium, sent messengers to fetch him.† The prophets here appear 1) in an assembly, 2) therein engaged in prophesying, and 3) under the lead of Samuel. It is to be noted that we have here prophets, who in inspired discourse give forth their inner life filled with the Holy Ghost, not sons of the prophets, as in 2 Kings iv. 38; vi. 1, who as scholars and learners sit at the feet of their master and teacher. The prophetic community here, therefore, under Samuel as head is not yet a prophetic school, to educate young men for the prophetic calling, but is a prophetic seminary, in which, under Samuel's guidance in an externally strictly ordered yet internally free association, the prophetic powers are practiced and strengthened, mutually incite, nourish, and further one another, and the prophetic charisma finds ever new nourishment and new growth by this common holy discipline. And the Spirit of God came upon the messengers of Saul; Spirit of God, not Spirit of Jehovah, because we here have not to do with the Spirit of the covenant-God, but with the supernatural principle of inspiration. And they too prophesied. Clericus: "They sang divine praises, being seized on by a sudden affluus which they could not resist (as Saul, x. 10), so that they no longer had control over themselves." The condition of Saul's messengers is that of ecstatic ravishment, into which they were brought by the overpowering might of the inspired song or word of the prophets.—Ver. 21. Saul's second and third companies of messengers fall into a similar ravishment. [The repeated occurrence of this supernatural seizure adds greatly to the force and effectiveness of the narrative. The purpose of this in the divine providence, we may suppose, was to bring Saul himself.—Tr.].—Ver. 22. Then went he also to Ramah and came (on the way thither) to the great cistern (well known, as

* [Chald. renders "house of instruction," and in ver. 20 "scribes." Smith's Bib.-Dict., Art. Naioth.—Tr.]

† The Sing. נִיבִי is surprising. According to Ewald, § 316 a, 1, the Verb or Adj. when it stands as one half of the sentence before the yet unmarked (and not clearly conceived) subject, may remain in the most indefinite Pers., the masc. sing., as in 1 Kings xlii. 36; Josh. vii. 20; Gen. i. 14; Mic. vi. 16, etc., but when the subject has been named, this indefiniteness cannot exist. The Sing. must therefore be here regarded as a corruption, and we must read (with Ew., Then., and all vsa.) the Plu.—The word נִיבִי, which sounds remarkably like the preceding לִקְרֹה here from the connection—as assembly—לִקְרֹה. It appears here only, and is to be regarded as a transposition (so the Greek and several Rabbin) of the word meaning "assembly," occasioned by the similar sound of the preceding לִקְרֹה.

* [On the character of the bed (here a separate couch, not the oriental divan) see Philippon in loco, and Works on Archaeology.—Tr.]

† [Chald. : "They saw the company of the scribes praising and Samuel standing over them teaching."—Tr.]

the Art. shows) that was in Sechu.—a now unknown region or locality near Ramah. The Sept. has "cistern of the threshing-floor" (יָדַיָּה) instead of "great" cistern, and "on the hill" (גִּבְעָה) instead of "Sechu." But, though it is true that threshing-floors were usually on hills, there is no need here of a change of text.* Saul, learning that David and Samuel were at Naioth in Ramah, went thither.—Ver. 23. While he was still in the way there happened to him what happened to his messengers. The Spirit of God came upon him also, and he went on and prophesied till he came to Naioth in Ramah. The difference between Saul and his messengers was simply that the inspiration came on him as he was approaching the residence of the prophet, and that it attained a higher grade and lasted longer, completely suppressing his self-consciousness.—Ver. 24, namely, relates: And he too stripped off his clothes, and he too prophesied before Samuel. The throwing off of the clothing was the effect of the heat of body produced by internal excitement. Abarbanel: "because of inward warmth, and to spread the garments out." We may suppose that the messengers also cast away their garments (though it is not expressly so said), as the prophets in their times of excitement and heat may well have done. The "he also" is not found in the following sentence: he lay naked all day and all night. This does not necessarily mean complete nakedness (עָרְיָה, 2 Sam. vi. 20), because there was worn under the kethoneth or tunic a fine woven shirt of linen or cotton (יָדַיָּה, Judg. xiv. 12 sq.; Isa. iii. 23), and over it a long sleeveless outer garment (יָדַיָּה, xviii. 4; xxiv. 5-12). Comp. Keil, Bibl. Arch., II., 39.—Saul lay in his undergarment (a sort of shirt which was next to the body, but did not completely cover it) unconscious; so completely was he overcome by the ecstasy. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets? See ch. x. 11, 12, where the origin of this saying is related. Here we have not the origin, but the application of the already existing proverb.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The picture of a true, faithful friend, already presented to us in Jonathan, is here completed in the account of his conduct towards Saul and David in individual significant traits and clear colors; but at the same time along with this picture of noble friendship we find one of an humble, reverent, childlike spirit towards the sinful purpose of his father. As soon as Jonathan has learned from his father the danger that threatened David's life, he shows his faithful love for his friend by imparting to him the evil designs of his father, by enjoining on him to hide himself, by promising to soften if possible his father's wrath, and by informing him how he (David) should soon learn the result of his effort at mediation and rescue. But Jonathan's noble character appears in yet clearer light in his conduct towards his father. For his friend's sake he dares, at the risk of his life, to oppose the rage and the sinister designs of his own father. Openly and frankly he represents to his father the great crime he would commit by slaying David. His heart is free from envy and jealousy while he sets before his father David's great services to the royal house and the whole nation. His words and bearing show mainly firmness and decision, and yet childlike piety, reverence, and obedience; no word not in keeping with the Fourth Commandment from his lips. And in addition to all this is his magnanimous self-denial, since he doubtless suspected that his friend would ascend the throne after his father. Though he himself possessed all the qualities which should adorn God's Anointed on the throne, heroic courage, undisputed, universally acknowledged military renown, firm trust in the living God, and a noble disposition, he shows not the slightest trace of envy and unkindness towards David. "Notwithstanding all this he was not only nobly ready, if the Lord should so command, to give up his birthright, but strove wisely and vigorously to defeat all that was conceived and undertaken against God's decree, even at the risk of falling by his own father's hand, a sacrifice to his piety and friendship" (F. W. Krummacher). Jonathan is a character that rises on the platform of Old Testament-life in peculiarly noble, harmonious, ethical-sympathetic form, whether we regard him as the heroic warrior and leader, or as faithful, self-denying friend, or as humble, modest prince-royal, or as the frank, unshrinking denouncer of wrong and sin.

2. In David's ethical-historical character, as presented to us in this section, we have to note in the first place his humble and obedient behaviour in the calling appointed him by the divine providence at the royal court, in spite of the quickly changing and fiercely outbreking passionate moods of Saul, and in spite of the dangers which he saw threatened him. Every moment he put himself at the king's disposition, and was at his side to help him whenever it was necessary. He went quietly on the way which the Lord had appointed him. And therefore he was under God's protection, and experienced the preserving help of his God.—Yet this flight, in which his wife's faithful love was the Lord's means of saving him, began the unbroken series of severe sufferings and trials by which David was to be confirmed in his faith and trained in a hard school for his royal calling. In this long life of suffering he had uninterrupted experience as a confirmed servant of God of the help, the consolation, the strengthening from above to which his Psalms bear testimony. Roofs: "Lay David's good and bad fortune in the balances. A courtier and officer, who falls under the king's displeasure, whom the king with implacable rage seeks to kill, whom the courtiers and many others, to please the king, despise and persecute, a man who is compelled to flee, who in need and affliction must always conceal himself, who can often find no place on earth where to lay his head, such a man may well talk of misfortune, and is in this view a miserable person. But if we remember that God in his deepest needs vouchsafes gracious visitations to the soul of this man, lifts it, as it were, above all mists and clouds, grants it clearest insight into truth, refreshes it by undeceptive addresses and friendly consolations, and through it points all men to happiness, we must admit that this man's good fortune is greater than his bad fortune, that his honor is greater than his reproach, and that the good that he has superabundantly makes up for all his outward want."

* [See "Text and Gram." The Vat. Sept. reads Sephi, not "on the hill."—Ta.]

2. The title of the 59th Psalm refers its origin to David's dangerous situation in Gibeah, "when Saul sent and they watched the house to kill him." And in fact the recurring verses 7 and 15 [6 and 14] of this very artistically arranged Psalm point to ambushments which begin in the evening. But it is repeated ambushments that are there spoken of. Since now in our history only one night is mentioned, it seems more appropriate not to refer this Psalm to those dangerous days in Gibeah (Delitzsch, Moll), but with Hengstenberg to find its occasion in David's remembrance of the deliverance wrought that night through Michal, which was the beginning of the weary flight, wherein he encountered such unspeakable dangers and sufferings. "Such being the importance of the fact, we should expect David to perpetuate its recollection by a Psalm" (Hengst.). The Psalm was sung when he looked back on the long line of enemies' snares and divine deliverances, of which the events of that evening and night were the beginning and type. We must not, however, confine ourselves to that event alone, but must include all David's similar experiences of Saul's traps. "From the Psalm it appears only that it was called forth by an attempt on the singer's life; in other respects the circumstances are those which belong in general to the Saul-period" (Hengst.).*

4. The teraphim-image, which Michal employs, shows that these Aramæan idols, these forms of "strange gods" which Rachel took secretly from her father's house (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34)—in spite of their burial by Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 2 sq.), and their ordered removal by Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 22) and Samuel's zealous opposition to them (1 Sam. xv. 23)—hid in the privacy of domestic life, whence in the time of the Judges they came openly forth (Judg. xvii. compared with xviii. 14 sq.), still maintained themselves. As the teraphim were oracular deities in their old homes (so in Ezek. xxi. 21 Nebuchadnezzar inquires through them whether he shall march against Jerusalem or against Ammon), so also in Israel (Judg. xvii. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 23; Hos. iii. 4; Ezek. xxi. 26; Zech. x. 2) they were superstitiously used as oracles, counsel being asked through them concerning the future. Hävernick (on Ezek. xxi. 26): "The use of the teraphim as oracles came no doubt through their connection with the Ephod (comp. Hos. iii. 4; Zech. x. 2), the ancient general notion of their magical power passing over into the more special one of prediction." Under Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 24) their removal was decreed in connection with other idolatrous abominations, but they kept their place till the Exile.

5. In respect to the history and theocratic significance of the so-called Schools of the prophets, we must distinguish the two periods in which, in point of fact, the only mention of them occurs. In the first place we meet with prophetic unions or prophetic communities in the age of Samuel, which are more exactly defined during his relations with Saul: first that band of prophets (x. 5, 10), which in Gibeah descends from the sacrificial hill and meets Saul, prophesying with music and song. Perhaps this community resided in Gibeah, in support of which we may perhaps with Keil adduce the name "Gibeah of God." In ch. xix. the prophetic community stands in a near relation to Samuel as the "president." The members are called Nebiim (prophets); they prophesy under Samuel's lead; their inspiration (as in ch. x.) is so mighty that persons that do not belong to them, as Saul's servants and Saul himself, are seized and overpowered by it, and fall into a like ecstasy. David is closely connected with them, as is shown by his flight to them and stay with them. He found there only temporary safety indeed from Saul's persecutions, but abiding consolation and strength in the inspired prophetic word, in the blessings of the fraternal community, and in the consoling and elevating power of the holy poetic art, whereby he doubtless stood in peculiarly intimate connection with the community. The members of the body formed a Cenobium; their outward life of union symbolized their inward union under the mighty impulse of one and the same Spirit, the Holy Spirit, a union which they saw accomplished through this prophetic Spirit which informed them all. In point of fact we find certainly at this time such an organized prophetic community only in Ramah; whether Samuel, who was its president there in the latter part of his life, was also the establisher of the form of associated life, is doubtful; but in any case it may be confidently maintained that through the powerful influence which he exerted on his contemporaries by the prophetic Spirit which dwelt and worked in him, awakening and fashioning a new life, this Spirit, which in its essential nature tended to produce association, showed itself in such unions of prophetic men. The original power and vigor of this Spirit expresses itself in these extraordinary phenomena and overwhelming effects, just as in the Apostolic church they appear as the fruit of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii.; 1 Cor. xiv.).—The theocratic significance of this association consisted in the fact that, along with Samuel's lofty prophetic form, they were the centre and source of the reviving religious-moral life of the nation, after it had lost its theocratic centre in the national sanctuary, which was despoiled of the ark of the covenant. The prophetic men of this community, which is by no means to be regarded as an association of pupils, represent the manifold theocratic-prophetic influence on the people, which was first completely brought to bear by Samuel's labors; they form, when Samuel's life is approaching its end, the aftergrowth (nurtured by him) of the combined divinely-appointed theocratic office of prophet and judge (alongside of the royal office), as bearers of which we find the prophets in David's time. In their midst originated and was cultivated the theocratic-prophetic writing of history, as representatives of which a Gad (comp. xxii. 5) and a Nathan are mentioned along with Samuel (1 Chr. xxix. 29). Comp. Thenius on 1 Sam. xix. 19 and xxii. 5.—On the prophetic schools under Samuel see Oehler in Herr. R.-E., s. v. Prophetenthum des A. T., XII. 214-217.

* [The way in which this Ps. contrasts Israel and the heathen makes it difficult to refer it to this incident in David's life; and it is the city, not the house that the enemy here surrounds. The title is not necessarily part of the inspired Psalm.—Ta.]

The history is silent concerning the prophetic communities during the whole period from Samuel to the age of Elijah and Elisha. Not till the epoch in the development of the prophetic Order in Israel marked by the grand prophetic characters of Elijah and his successor Elisha do we again meet with these communities, and then only in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes at Gilgal, Bekef, and Jericho, in which places there was a numerous membership (2 Kings iv. 38; ii. 3, 5, 7, 15, 16; iv. 1, 43; vi. 1; ix. 1); here, however, they are not called "prophets" as under Samuel's lead, but sons of the prophets (1 Kings xx. 35), a name which indicates that they stood to the leaders and presidents of the communities in a dependent relation as scholars and disciples. They have their places of assembly and abode, designed for a large number, where they sit at the feet of their prophetic masters (comp. 2 Kings vi. 1 sq.), and receive prophetic instruction and cultivation. Only such can we properly call prophetic schools, whose prophetic presidents and leaders (as Elisha's case shows) had to legitimate themselves by the power of the prophetic spirit dwelling in them. While under Samuel's presidency the prophetic communities appear as freer associations of prophetic men for the exertion of united influence on the people, these later ones are distinct Unions, in which teachers and scholars, masters and disciples stand in a relation of mutual co-ordination [control and subordination]. The subject-matter of the instruction was the divine law and the history of the divine dealings with the covenant people; the aim of the instruction was the nurture and furtherance of the prophetic spirit by holy discipline in an organized God-serving life. The pupils were trained in unconditional obedience to the divine law, in living appropriation of the holy will of God as absolute norm for their own wills; from their Cenobia thus equipped they went forth among the people to testify of the living God, of His word and His righteous and gracious dealings, and with absolute obedience to perform the special tasks imposed on them by the masters with divine authority (comp. 1 Kings xiii. 20 sq.). Besides this general theocratic significance these Unions had the special duty to form the centre of the service of God for the people in their separation from the sanctuary at Jerusalem (comp. 2 Kings iv. 23, 42), and in the prophetic work of their members to oppose a solid power to the heathenism which pressed in on the people under an idolatrous government, and to maintain the honor of the living God. Comp. Oehler ubi supra, p. 220 sq.—In respect to the historical continuity of such prophetic associated life in the interval between the prophetic communities of Samuel and these later schools of the prophets, nothing can be certainly determined, although, as Oehler shows against Keil (as above, p. 215), the great number of prophets, which, according to 1 Kings xviii. 13, must have existed when Elijah appeared, seems to favor such continuity. Comp. on the other side Keil's remarks in his commentary on ch. xix. p. 147 sq. [Eng. Transl., pp. 199-205.]

[Michal's deception in ver. 13 may be called a stratagem, her statement in ver. 14 is a falsehood carrying out the stratagem, and her answer to her father in ver. 17 is, as Erdmann terms it, a "lie of necessity;" that is, a lie held to be necessary, in order to save one from suffering or perplexity. Clearly this last is unjustifiable; when Saul demanded an explanation Michal ought to have answered that she thought it right to save her husband. Her stratagem (ver. 13) may be defended on the ground that Saul, in assuming the position towards David of an open enemy (without legal warrant), having previously tried to kill him, had thus put himself out of ordinary relation with him, and was to be treated as a public enemy or a madman. Whether the statement in ver. 14 is then properly a part of the stratagem is not so easy to say. The decisive question is: Was it necessary to the success of the stratagem? was it based on Saul's abnormal, unnatural, criminal attitude towards David?—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-4. BERL. BIBLE: So far is Saul carried by self-love, which often transforms itself into fury against the friends of God, and it is incredible how far it can go wrong. Jonathan acted as a true friend to David, and presents therein a picture of a faithful and upright friend, who not only warns David of danger and gives him good counsel, but also at his own peril speaks to his father for him, declares his innocence and praises his noble services, and thereby brings him again into his father's favor.—SCHLIER: Even in grown persons there is nothing more beautiful than reverence for parents, and doubly beautiful is this ornament when one thing is understood, how to lead parents away from sin and yet in so doing always show modesty and respect, when one thing is understood, how to fulfil the Fourth Commandment in truth and love. [TAYLOR: Such a manifestation of prudence and principle combined. Prudence did not go so far as to make him silent about the sin which Saul was purposing to commit; principle was not so asserted as to arouse his father's indignation.—Tr.].—Ver. 6 sqq. BERL. BIBLE: A kindly and hearty, an humble but also righteous opposition is suited to turn away the evil that has been resolved on and hinder it from coming to the birth.—SCHLIER: Open thy mouth for thy neighbor, and stand up for him, excuse him where thou canst, speak to his advantage wherever it is possible, let it be a joy to thee to bring to light his good side, be in earnest to promote peace wherever it is practicable.

Ver. 8. BERL. BIBLE: O my God, how wonderfully dost Thou lead Thy servants! Scarcely are they out of one trial when again Thou stirrest up for them another.—Ver. 9. SCHLIER: God the Lord allows the evil spirit no power over us, if we have not first called down punishment upon ourselves by our sins; he who is in the power of darkness and therefore does the works of darkness, has before given himself up to darkness.—Ver. 10. BERLENS. BIBLE: Temptation with men who are grudging and envious and cannot bear the righteousness of the child of God, does not last long, because such men condemn their unrighteousness.—Ver. 11. KRUMMACHER: The Lord in every way takes care that His servant David, adorned with His laurels, shall not lift his head too high. In David, too, is richly verified the apostolic saying: Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.—Vers. 13, 14. CRAMER: In cases of urgent need, where there is no time for long reflection, a woman can often more quickly devise a plan, surpassing therein the male sex (Eccl. xxv. 19; Gen. xxxi. 35; Josh. ii. 6). [HALL: Who can but wonder to see how . . . Saul's own children are the only means to cross him in the sin, and to preserve his guiltless adversary.—TR.].—Ver. 17. SCHLIER: A "lie of necessity" is never permissible, wrong can never become right; lying always remains wrong, and doubly wrong when the lie is spoken to a father. Truth is well-pleasing to God the Lord, and truth, spoken with an eye to the Lord, always finds the Lord's protection.—CRAMER: There are three sorts of lies: lies of necessity (Exod. i. 19; Gen. xx. 2; xxvi. 7; Josh. ii. 6); lies of sport (Gen. xlii. 9; xxvii. 15; Jud. ix. 8); shameful and hurtful lies. Guard against all three, and speak and love the truth from thy heart.—[TAYLOR: Michal's affection for David could not stand the strain of trial. It was not like that of Jonathan, because it had not, like Jonathan's its root in devotion to the Lord. She could not and did not follow her husband through persecution, and exile, and danger, because she was not one with him in God. (An idolater perhaps without the cognizance of her husband). She could tell lies for David, but she had not the courage and the faith to go with him into suffering, or to tell the truth for him.—TR.]

Ver. 18. OSIANDER: Those who are in trouble should betake themselves to the assembly where God's word is taught, and there seek consolation.—CRAMER: God always raises up for His people good friends and patrons, who must help them (1 Kings xviii. 13).—SCHLIER: Instead of any further answer, Samuel led David to his Naioth, into his school of the prophets; amid the songs of praise of his prophet-scholars, amid their common prayers and studies of God's word it was good to dwell; there was consolation and peace, there was help to be found even for such a troubled heart as David had. Let not such an example be presented you in vain. Are you troubled, then seek the word of the Lord and prayer, seek it especially there where men are gathered to attend to God's word and to pray. [HALL: God intended to make David not a warrior and a king only, but a prophet too. As the field fitted him for the first, and the court for the second, so Naioth shall fit him for the third.—TR.].—Ver. 20 sqq. STARKE [from HALL]: It is good going up to Naioth, into the holy assemblies; who knows how we may be changed, beside our intention? Many a one hath come into God's house to carp, or scoff, or sleep, or gaze, that hath returned a convert (1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25).—As one coal kindles another, so it happens that where good is taught and heard, hearts also do not remain unmoved (Acts xvi. 13, 14).—BERL. BIBLE: That is the blessing which God often grants to devout assemblies, that many a one goes in with an evil, impure and hostile mind, and comes out again with quite another heart and mind.—Vers. 23,

24. WUERT. SUMM.: Saul's prophesying was more an irresistible work of divine power, than an evidence of divine grace. We see also by his example, that not all who prophesy, who exhibit extraordinary movements of spirit, are thereby shown to have the Spirit of God, and to stand in favor with Him. Many of them, according to the saying of Jesus (Matt. vii. 22, 23), will on that day be found out and condemned as evil-doers.—SCHLIER: In Saul we have an example how God follows a man till he either turns or hardens himself. How deep was Saul already sunken; yet God the Lord did not yet leave him, but again turned toward him. He felt the mighty hand of God, and yet he would not bow. Then God's hand, which could not make him bow, must harden him more and more.—When the Lord's hand comes upon us, we wish to bow, we wish to enter into ourselves, and to humble ourselves. Well for him who lets himself be reproved and chastised, but woe to us if we shut ourselves up against the Lord's hand.—[TAYLOR: In reviewing this narrative, observe how diversified are the resources which Jehovah has at command for the protection of His people. Each time the means by which David was delivered are different. At first he is defended by God's blessing on his own valor against the Philistines; then he is indebted for his safety to the mediation of Jonathan; then to the agency of Michal; and finally to the miraculous work of God's own Holy Spirit. In the subsequent portion of the history we shall find that the same principle holds, and that in each new peril he is preserved by some new instrumentality.—TR.]

Vers. 11, 12. F. W. KRUMMACHER: A new storm: 1) By what David is threatened; 2) How he is delivered from the danger.—Ver. 18. David at Ramah: 1) He breathes the atmosphere of the communion of the saints; 2) He sees a new plan to murder him wonderfully frustrated.

[Vers. 4-7. An attempt at Peacemaking: 1) The means employed. Jonathan appeals, with tact and delicacy, to justice, gratitude, piety, memories of the past, conscience. 2) The apparent effect. Saul's better feelings revived, his conscience aroused. In his passionate way, he takes a solemn oath, no doubt with superficial sincerity. All seems restored "as in times past." 3) The final result. David's merits, at the call of Providence, shine forth with new lustre. Slumbering envy wakes, and the last enmity is worse than the first. (Comp. xx. 33, 34). Lessons: (1) It is at any rate a consolation to have tried, and to have had even temporary success. (2) Peacemaking does not always fail. (3) We must fear for the results wherever the wrong-doer does not repent of the sin involved; the only sure peacemaking must begin in peace with God. (4) How deep-rooted and ruinous a sin is envy; it may swallow up the noblest feelings, break the most solemn promises, lead to madness and murder. And no wonder, for the envious man sins at once against himself, his neighbor, and his God.—TR.]

II. Jonathan's faithful friendship proved by his last vain attempt at a reconciliation of Saul and David.
Chapter XX. 1—XXI. 1 [Eng. A. V., XX. 42].

1. Conference between David and Jonathan as to the discovery of Saul's disposition towards the former and the mode of informing him thereof.

CHAPTER XX. 1-23.

1 AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan,¹ What have I done? what is my iniquity and what is my sin before thy father that 2 he seeketh my life? And he said unto him, God forbid [Far be it!]² Thou shalt not die; behold, my father will do³ nothing either great or small but that he will 3 show it me, and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so. And David swore⁴ moreover,⁵ and said, Thy father certainly knoweth [knoweth well]⁶ that I have found grace in thine eyes, and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this.⁷
lest he be grieved. But truly, as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, and as thy soul 4 liveth, there is but a step between me and death.⁸ Then said Jonathan [And Jonathan said] unto David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth [saith],⁹ I will even [om.
5 even] do it for thee. And David said unto Jonathan, Behold, to-morrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit¹⁰ with the king at meat; but let me go, that 6 I may hide myself in the field unto the third¹¹ day at even. If thy father at all [decidedly]¹² miss me, then say, David earnestly asked¹³ leave of me that he might run to Bethlehem, his city, for there is a yearly sacrifice¹⁴ there for all the family.
7 If he say thus, It is well, [ina. then] thy servant shall have peace; but if he be 8 very wroth,¹⁵ then be sure that evil is determined by him. Therefore [And] thou shalt deal kindly with¹⁶ thy servant, for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord [Jehovah] with thee; notwithstanding [but], if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself, for why shouldst thou bring me to thy father? And Jo-9 nathan said, Far be it¹⁷ from thee; for, if I knew certainly that evil were deter-
10 mined by my father to come upon thee, then would I not tell it thee?¹⁸ Then said
David [And David said] to Jonathan, Who shall tell me? or what if thy father

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Sept. "came before Jonathan and said," not so well. Wellhausen refers for a similar order to 2Sam. xviii. 18.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 2. The divine name is not in the Heb.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 2. On the Qeri and Keth. see Exposition.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. So Chald., Syr., Vulg., Arab.; Sept. "answered." Wellh.: "The Sept. is right for David never swears," but see latter part of this verse and 1 Kings ii. 8.—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. See Erdmann's Expos. against Theodotus.—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 3. The Inf. Absol. is throughout the chapter variously translated.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 3. Anonymous Greek version adds: "lest he tell David," which is probably a gloss and not a translation.—Tr.]

⁸ [Ver. 3. The Sept. here gives substantially the sense of the Heb.—Tr.]

⁹ [Ver. 4. Margin of Eng. A. V.: "Say what is thy mind," which is a free rendering.—Tr.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 5. Literally: "I should certainly sit," and so Chald., Syr., Arab., Rashi ("I am accustomed to sit") and the Greek vas. except Sept., which has "I will not sit," clearly from the succeeding narrative; on a special occasion like this (there seems to have occurred between ch. xix. and ch. xx. a reconciliation of Saul and David) he would be looked for.—Tr.]

¹¹ [Ver. 5. The fem. form is difficult. We may suppose עַרְבָּ here fem., or render (Rashi) "evening of the third day," against which is the Art. with עַרְבָּ, or (with Sept. and Wellh.) omit the numeral.—Tr.]

¹² [Ver. 6. Inf. Absol. "pressingly inquire after me."—Tr.]

¹³ [Ver. 6. Niph. reflexive.—Tr.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 6. Margin of Eng. A. V.: "feast," which gives the sense.—Tr.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 7. Sept., "if he answer thee roughly," probably from ver. 10.—Tr.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 8. Heb. לָךְ. Sept., Chald., Syr. (perh. Vulg., Arab.) דָּךְ which is the Heb. usage (לָךְ seems to be found nowhere else, לְךָ, לְךָ in a few instances after דָּךְ).—Tr.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 9. This is the same Heb. phrase as is found in ver. 2.—Tr.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 9. Or, we may render: "If I knew, etc., and did not tell thee—" and supply "Jehovah do so," etc. Syr.: "If I knew, etc., I would come and tell thee," an impossible rendering, but perhaps from a different text.—Sept. adds after "come upon thee," μὴ ἴδῃς τίς τὰς τέλει σου, which is probably a duplet (so Wellh.).—Tr.]

answer thee roughly?¹⁹ And Jonathan said unto David, Come and let us go out 11 into the field. And they went out both of them into the field.
 12 And Jonathan said unto David, O [By]²⁰ Lord [Jehovah], God of Israel, when I have sounded my father about to-morrow any time [this time to-morrow] or the third day,²¹ and behold, if there be good towards David, and I then send not 13 unto thee and shew it thee, the Lord [Jehovah] do so and much more to Jona-[13] than.²² But if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will shew it thee, and send thee away that thou mayest go in peace, and the Lord [Jehovah] be with thee 14 as he hath been with my father. And thou shalt not only [And O that thou wouldest]²³ while yet I live show me the kindness of the Lord [Jehovah] that I 15 die not [And O,²⁴ if I die]. But also thou shalt [that thou wouldest] not cut off thy kindness from my house forever, no, not [ins. even] when the Lord [Jehovah] 16 hath cut off the enemies of David every one from the face of the earth. So [And] Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying,²⁵ Let the Lord even require [David, and Jehovah required] it at the hand of David's enemies.
 17 And Jonathan caused David to swear²⁶ again, because he loved him, for he loved him as he loved his own soul.
 18 Then [And] Jonathan said to David [him], To-morrow is the new moon, and 19 thou shalt [wilt] be missed, because thy seat will be empty. And when thou hast stayed three days, then [om. then] thou shalt go down quickly²⁷ and come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand, and thou shalt 20 remain by the stone Ezel.²⁸ And I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as 21 though I shot at a mark.²⁹ And, behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go, find out [om. out] the arrows. If I expressly say unto the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them, then come thou, for there is peace to thee and no hurt, 22 as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold the arrows are beyond thee, [ins. then] go thy way, for the Lord [Jehovah] hath sent 23 thee away. And, as touching [as to] the matter which thou and I [I and thou] have spoken of, behold the Lord [Jehovah] be between thee and me [me and thee] forever.³⁰

¹⁹ [Ver. 10. See Erdmann in the Expos. No satisfactory rendering is offered by vss. or expositors. Eng. A. V. is substantially supported by Chald.; the other vss. render: "who will tell me whether thy father, etc?" and this seems best if the present text is retained. But, while there is no good external authority for changing the text, the meaning "whether perchance" for כִּי לֹא is not established.—Abarbanel quotes the explanation: "who will tell me if thy father answers peace, or who will tell me what thy father answers rough?" (which is nearly the form adopted by Erdmann), and then gives his own view that David says two things: 1) he asks who will tell him Saul's decision, whether good or bad? 2) he exclaims "or what will thy father, etc?"—Ewald and others follow the vss. as above.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 12. On the whole passage, vers. 12-17, see Erdmann's discussion.—The Vocative here (as in Eng. A. V.) is hardly possible. The vss. supply different words, Syr., Arab., "witness," Sept., "knows." Two MSS. insert וְיָ by the life of Jehovah" and Rashi calls it an oath. We must either so take it (which is simpler), or suppose the phrase interrupted and resumed below in the beginning of ver. 13.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 12. The same difficulty as in ver. 5; וְיָ occurs a few times (perhaps only in Ezek. vii. 10) as fem. We have also to supply "or" between מָחָר and הַשְּׁלִישִׁית. Yet we cannot throw out the latter (Wellh.) which is sustained by all the vss., and does not in its content contradict the narrative. Jonathan may easily have seen reason for putting off his inquiry till the third day.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 12. This clause clearly belongs to ver. 13.—Ta.]

²³ [Vers. 14, 15. Instead of לֹא read לֵאמֹר, לֵאמֹר.—Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 16. There is no reason for the insertion of "saying" here. Chald., Vulg., render by the Aor. "required." Syr. has Fut. It is properly a remark of the author, not of Jonathan, but it sounds like a marginal gloss which has crept into the text, though the Sept. had it before them. See the Exposition. On the opinion that "David's enemies" here stands for "David" himself, and that this was fulfilled when his kingdom was divided because he deprived Mephibosheth of half of his possessions (2 Sam. xix.), see Poole's Synopsis in loco.—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 17. Sept., "swore to David." The difficulty is in the reason assigned, namely, Jonathan's love for David, which seems to support the Greek reading, on which see Erdmann in loco.—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 19. Literally "very." Sept. and apparently Chald. (וְיָ) and Syr. read פָּקֵד instead of יָרַר. The וְיָ seems to be maintained by the vss., Chald. and Syr., "well, greatly," Vulg. "quickly" (so Eng. A. V.); some explain it of a deep descent into the valley. The Denom. שָׁלַשְׁתָּ "thou shalt thrice do" (So Erdmann), hardly "thou shalt wait three days" (but contra Philippson, Wellh., and apparently some vss.). Perhaps the best rendering would be: "and the third day thou shalt watch thy opportunity and come to the place."—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 19. Syr., "that stone," Chald., "stone of a sign," whence Rashi "lapis viatorius" to point travellers on the way.—Ta.]

²⁸ [Ver. 20. Literally "to shoot (me) at a mark." Sept. "I will shoot three times with arrows," afterwards one arrow only is mentioned, as in ver. 21, where the Heb. has the plu. And in ver. 36 we have the Sing. in the Heb. Yet this does not establish the Sept. reading, since the Plu. in the Heb. may be used in a general sense, while the Greek may have changed the number to make it agree with ver. 36.—Ta.]

²⁹ [Ver. 23. Chald. and Sept. have "a witness for ever," which may be simply an explanation, or they may have read עַד עַד.—Ta.]

2 Jonathan learns Saul's disposition towards David, and gives information to the latter, who flees.

VERS. 24—XXI. 1 [XX. 42].

24 So [And] David hid himself in the field. And when the new moon was 25 come, the king sat him down to eat meat. And the king sat upon his seat as at other times, even [om. even] upon a [the] seat by the wall, and Jonathan arose²⁶ 26 and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty. Nevertheless [And] Saul spake not any thing that day, for he thought, Something hath befallen him, he 27 is not clean, surely he is not clean.²⁷ And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month [the morrow of the new moon, the second day],²⁸ that David's place was empty; and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore 28 cometh not the son of Jesse to meat, neither yesterday nor to-day? And Jonathan 29 answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Bethlehem; And he said, Let me go, I pray thee, for our family hath a sacrifice in the city, and my brother, he²⁹ hath commanded me to be there; and now, if I have found favor in thine eyes, let me get away,³⁰ I pray thee, and see my brother. Therefore he cometh not unto the king's table.

30 Then Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman,³¹ do I not know that thou hast chosen³² the son of Jesse to thy own confusion [shame] and unto the confusion [shame] of thy 31 mother's nakedness? For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore [And] now, send and fetch 32 him unto me, for he shall surely die. And Jonathan answered Saul his father and 33 said unto him, Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done? And Saul cast³³ a [his] javelin at him to smite him, whereby [and] Jonathan knew that it was de-34 termined³⁴ of his father to slay David. So [And] Jonathan arose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month, for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.

35 And it came to pass in the morning that Jonathan went out into the field at the 36 time appointed with David, and a little lad with him. And he said unto his lad, Run, find out [om. out] now the arrows which I shoot. And as [om. and as] the 37 lad ran [ins. and] he shot an [the] arrow beyond him. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, 38 lad and said, Is not the arrow beyond thee? And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not. And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows³⁵ and 39 came³⁶ to his master. But [And] the lad knew not any thing; only Jonathan and 40 David knew the matter. And Jonathan gave his artillery⁴¹ unto his lad, and said 41 unto him, Go, carry them to the city. As soon as the lad was gone [The lad went.] [ins. And] David arose out of a place toward the south [arose from beside the stone],⁴² and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times; and they kissed one another and wept with one another until David exceeded [wept greatly].⁴³

²⁶ [Ver. 25. On this reading see the Exposition.—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 26. Better, after the Sept., "he has not cleansed himself."—Ta.]

²⁸ [Ver. 27. The Heb. is difficult. Wellh., combining Heb. and Sept., reads simply "on the second day." Chald.: "on the day after, which was the intercalation of the second month" (translated in Walton's Polyg., "the day after that day which was, etc.") that is the day after the "second new-moon," or the second day of the month. The rendering given above is altogether the easiest.—Ta.]

²⁹ [Ver. 29. The Heb. does not admit this rendering. Wellh. suggests וְהָיָה "and lo!"—Ta.]

³⁰ [Ver. 29. Some MSS. and add. have "send me away."—Ta.]

³¹ [Ver. 30. Sept., son of "a faithless damsel," as if they read נְעוּרָה instead of נְעוּרָה, which is against the var. and the rule proclivis scriptio praeferat ardua.—Ta.]

³² [Ver. 30. Sept., "art associated with" (חֲבֵרָה). The ל before בֵּן is unusual. Yet if we substitute בֵּן for ל there seems to be no good reason for changing the text.—Ta.]

³³ [Ver. 33. Or, brandished (Bib. Com.).—Ta.]

³⁴ [Ver. 33. Instead of כִּלְתָהּ read כִּלְתָהּ (Wellh.).—Ta.]

³⁵ [Ver. 38. So in Qerf; the text has Sing. "arrow." See on ver. 29.—Ta.]

³⁶ [Ver. 38. Sept., brought them," בָּרָא. Between the two readings it is hard to decide.—Ta.]

⁴¹ [Ver. 40. Literally his "implements." The distinctive word "artillery," though now rarely used in this sense, is needed and should be retained.—Ta.]

⁴² [Ver. 41. A difficult passage. The Heb. (as given in Eng. A. V.) does not yield a good sense, and the var. deal variously with the sentence. Chald.: "from beside the s. one of the sign (or the stone Aitha) which is on the 42 And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord [Jehovah] saying, The Lord [Jehovah] be between me and thee and between my seed and thy seed forever.

CHAP. XXI. 1 And he arose and departed; and Jonathan went into the city.

south" (from ver. 10). Syr.: "from beside the stone," Sept., Vat., "from the Argab," Alex., "from sleep" (see Orig. Hez. ed. Montf.), Vulg. and others as the Heb. It seems probable that the readings here and in ver. 19 are the same, and that we should render in both cases either "beside the stone" or "beside the stone East (or, the sign-stone)."—Tn.
[Ver. 42. Or, with Sept. and Wellh. omitting "David," "wept with one another greatly."—Tn.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Vers. 1-23. Conversation and agreement between David and Jonathan on the mode of discovering Saul's real attitude toward David, and informing him of it.

Ver. 1 is connected immediately with the foregoing, the narrative of David's flight from Nainoth in Ramah standing in pragmatic connection with the account (close of ch. xix.) of the proceedings of Saul and his messengers. They came to seize David; instead of which the irresistible Spirit of God had overpowered them and defeated their design. David must herein have seen the protecting hand of his God, which thus gave him opportunity to flee from Nainoth, where he could no longer find asylum.—Having by flight escaped the machinations of Saul and his followers, he seeks and finds a way to an interview with Jonathan.—David's three-fold question as to his fault is a three-fold denial of it, since it involves as many assertions of his innocence. An echo of this assertion is found in the declaration, so frequent in the Davidic Psalms, of his innocence and purity in respect to the persecutions of his enemies.—That he seeks my soul, that is, my life, comp. Ex. iv. 19. S. Schmid: "The questions in this verse are an appeal to Jonathan's own knowledge."—Ver. 2. Jonathan's answer to David's complaint is (1) the distinct assurance: far be it, thou shalt not die, and (2) the ground of this affirmation. Though this assurance has immediate reference to what David says of Saul's attack on him (as Jonathan's following words are intended to show that he knew nothing of such a murderous plan on Saul's part), yet at the same time Jonathan, looking to David's high divine mission for the people, prophetically declares what was determined in the Divine counsel concerning the maintenance and preservation of his friend's life.—For לֹא ("to him") read אֵל ("not.") The marginal Impl. (אֵלֶיךָ) is to be preferred to the Perf. of the text, expressing customary action ("does nothing") [Eng. A. V. "will do nothing"]; so Sept., Vulg., Chald. We may indeed read the word as Prticip. with Bunsen, who therefore regards the "masoretic change" as unnecessary. Jonathan means to say: "My father as a rule does nothing without telling me, nothing great or small" that is, absolutely nothing, comp. xxii. 15, xxv. 36, Nu. xxii. 18. The appended remark: "Why should my father hide this thing from me? It is not so!" supposes that the intimate relation between Jonathan and David had been concealed as far as possible from Saul. They were secret friends, as far as he was concerned. Otherwise Saul would certainly not have spoken to his son Jonathan (xix. 1) of his purpose to kill David. This confirms what Jonathan here says to David. Saul's lack of self-control* showed itself in his taking counsel about his scheme of murder with those about him, his violent passion so mastering him that he could not at all conceal the fury of his heart. His communication of his plan (xix. 1) was the occasion of Jonathan's hindering it; Saul even swore to Jonathan that he would not kill David, and this Jonathan told David (xix. 6, 7). To this Jonathan's word here refers: "thou shalt not die," &c. Since that time there had been another war with the Philistines (ib. ver. 8), and shortly before this conversation of David and Jonathan the incident narrated in vers. 9-24 occurred. David's words in ver. 3: "he (Saul) thought Jonathan must not know this," confirm Jonathan's assurance that his father had told him nothing of a plan of murder. But, it may properly be asked, did Jonathan know nothing of the events just described, on which David's declaration is based? It is certainly possible that he [Jonathan] was at that time absent from court; but the connection does not favor this view. But, if he were present, Saul's attempt against David could not possibly have remained concealed from him. Accepting this supposition as the more probable, we must, in order to understand Jonathan's words, look at the whole situation. The account of all the occurrences from xix. 9 on exhibits Saul in a relatively unsound state of mind, produced by a new attack of rage and madness. As now Saul had before, after recovering from such an attack, sworn to Jonathan in consequence of his representations, that he would not kill David, Jonathan might regard this late attempt on David as the result of a new but temporary access of rage, and, remembering his distinct oath in his lucid period, might suppose that he would not in a quiet state of mind resolve on and execute such a murder. Thus his decided "it is not so" may be psychologically explained. Nägelsbach: "Between xix. 2 and xx. 2 there is no contradiction, since in the latter passage Jonathan merely denies that there is now a new attempt against David's life" (Herz. R.-E. xiii. 403). But while Jonathan had in mind merely the symptom in his father's condition, David knew how deeply rooted in envy and jealousy Saul's hate toward him was. He assures him with an oath, what was perfectly clear to him, that Saul sought his destruction. אֵל refers to what is said in ver. 1, and so—"therefore, moreover," not "the second time, again," since nothing is said of a previous oath. David's reply contains two things: (1) the explanation (connected with the indirect affirmation that Saul had resolved to murder him) of Jonathan's statement that Saul had said nothing to him of the murder, by referring to Saul's undoubted knowledge of the friendship between them, and (2) the assertion (with a double oath) that he saw nothing but death before him. (2) is here intensive, =imo, so especially in oaths, xiv. 44, 1 K. i. 29 sq., ii. 23 f., 2 K. iii. 14.—2 expresses comparison or similarity). "Yea, as a step, like a step." The picture is of a precipice, from which he is only a step removed, over which he may any moment be plunged.

*This seems to be the meaning of Erdmann's uners hallenigkeit here.—Tn.

Ver. 4. Jonathan's answer supposes that he gives credence to David's assertion, and proves his friendship by offering his help, with the declaration that he wished to fulfill every wish of his soul. The reply of David (ver. 5) shows how far he had cause to fear that there was only a step between him and death. The recollection of the obligation on him to take part in the new moon feast at court as a member of Saul's family (not merely as one (Then.) who had a standing formal invitation), brings him face to face with the danger in which his life stood; for the feast fell on the following day. On the religious celebration of the day of new moon with burnt-offering and sin-offering and sound of trumpet see Nu. x. 10, xxviii. 11–15. As a joyful festival it was connected with a cheerful meal. To this refers Saul's conjecture (ver. 26) that David was absent on account of levitical uncleanness. And I must sit at table with the King. That is, as a matter of course, according to custom, he would be expected by Saul to take part in the meal. The Vulg. rightly renders ex more sedere soleo, but the Sept., proceeding from the fact that David was not present, wrongly inserts a negative: "I shall not sit at meat." Ew. § 338 b.: "I am to sit," where the meaning is, "I will certainly sit." As in xvi. 2, it is here supposed that the custom was to sit, not to recline at table.—Let me go, that I may hide myself. This is not a mere formula of courtesy, but a request that Jonathan would not press him to appear at table, but permit him to depart, that he might escape the danger threatening him. Till the evening of the third day, that is, from the present day. This supposes that the festival was prolonged by a meal the day after new moon.—Comp. vers. 12, 27, 34, where Saul looks for David also the day after new moon.—From the fact that both David and Saul here look to the former's appearance at the royal table, it has been held (Then., Ew.) that this whole narrative contradicts ch. xix., and is taken from another source. But there is no contradiction if we remember that Saul acted (according to xix. 9 sq.) under an attack of rage or madness, and, on the return of a quiet frame of mind, would expect everything to go on as usual, and the whole personnel of his family to be present at table. After his previous experiences, David must now know certainly whether Saul in his times of quiet and lucidity, maintained against him that hostile disposition which showed itself in his intermittent attacks of rage.—Ver. 6. David wishes through Jonathan to determine Saul's attitude toward him, and find out certainly whether in his hate the latter has really conceived a plan for his destruction. As David, according to ver. 5, is to hide in the field till the evening of the third day, his excuse for absence can be regarded only as a pretext, or a "lie of necessity," and the explanation that, by reason of the proximity of Bethlehem to Gibeah, he might, meantime, easily go home, must be rejected as out of keeping with the sense of the whole narrative. In this statement, which Jonathan was to make in case Saul missed David, namely, that the latter had gone to attend a family feast, the fact (easily explained from the absence of a central sanctuary) is supposed "that individual families in Israel were accustomed to celebrate yearly festivals" (Keil); this would be the case more naturally in those places where, as in Bethlehem (comp. xvi. 2 sq.), there were altars dedicated to the Lord as centres of sacrifice. O. v. Gerlach: "In the then disorganized condition of public worship, to which David first gave regular form, family usages of this sort, after the manner of other nations, had established themselves, which were contrary to the prescriptions concerning the unity of divine worship." On the yearly sacrifice see on ch. i. 1.—(777) from the connection not Pass. but Reflex.,—"sought for himself." David could ask leave of absence from Jonathan as competent representative of the royal family, if he did not wish to go to Saul.—Ver. 7. Saul's conduct in these two contrasted forms, was for Jonathan as for David the sign of his permanent attitude towards David in the condition of quiet in which he now was; for such a sign was necessary not only for Jonathan (S. Schmid) but also for David, since, as appears from the tenor of the whole narration, he did not yet certainly know how Saul in the depths of his heart was disposed towards him. If he says "well," it means peace for thy servant, that is, from the connection, "he has laid no plot of murder against me." In the other event, if his "anger burn," know that evil on his part is a settled thing. 777="to be finished, settled," "firmiter decretum est" (S. Schmid). The "evil" is not "malice," and its development to the highest point (Vulg.), but the danger to David, Saul's murder scheme, as appears from the phrase "by him."—Ver. 8. And show mercy to thy servant,—this refers not merely to the request of ver. 6 (S. Schmid, Keil), nor to what Jonathan should do in case Saul's answer was unfavorable, but to the general help expected from him, that David might escape the threatened danger. That it includes what David looks for from Jonathan in case Saul answers angrily, appears from Jonathan's reply in ver. 9. David grounds his request on the covenant of the Lord which Jonathan had made with him. So he calls their covenant of friendship, because it was not only made with invocation of the Lord's name, but also had its deepest ground and origin in God, and its consecration in their life-like communion with God. Thou hast brought me,—this indicates the initiative which, in the concluding of the covenant, was on the side of Jonathan (xviii. 1–3).—In the words: "If there is iniquity in me, slay thou me," David adds a special request, which is closely connected with what precedes. He would rather atone for any sin which might rest on him by death at his friend's hand; Jonathan shall do him the kindness in this case not to deliver him up to Saul, that he may not be slain by him. This supposes that Jonathan had the right to inflict capital punishment for crimes against his father as king.—Ver. 9. Jonathan's answer first decidedly sets aside the case last put by David. The "far be it from thee" is not to be connected with what follows, as if it were here said what was to be far (Ges., Del., Maur.), but is to be taken absolutely, and to be referred (as ver. 2) to what David had just said. The "from thee" is therefore not expletive (Cleric.) The Vulg. rightly: absit hoc a te. This involves Jonathan's firm conviction of David's innocence.—Then follows Jonathan's solemn assurance that he will inform David if Saul exhibits a hostile disposition towards him. This was the service of love which he had first to do for his friend, that the latter might then take further measures for saving his life. (׳פ is particle of asseveration=yea, truly.) If I know certainly that * * * that is, if, from your statement (ver. 7), I know beyond doubt that evil on my father's part is a thing determined. From the connection, and on account of the vigor and emphasis of the interrogation, which is in keeping with Jonathan's excited feeling, it is better to construe the "if" etc., as first member (protasis), and the "and not," &c., as second interrogative member (apodosis) of a conditional sentence* [as in Eng. A. V.]—Ver. 10, Tremell, Ges., Ew. (§ 352 a), Then. and Bunsen take this as one sentence: "who will show me what rough thing perchance thy father will answer thee" (׳פ װ=whatever thing); against which we must insist with Keil that this signification of װ occurs only where another case is mentioned, where the ground-meaning is "or." As ׳פ ["what"] indicates a new question, we must here suppose two questions. The first: Who will show me? is connected immediately with the last words of Jonathan in ver. 9: "I will come to thee and tell thee," namely, the evil determined on by my father. David is thinking in this first question of the danger which Jonathan would thus incur, and, for that very reason, putting him out of the question, asks: "Who will show me (the evil)," that is, what thy father decrees against me (Maur.) "He asks what he would be willing to tell a servant" (S. Schmid). The Berl. Bib. explains excellently: "The matter cannot be entrusted to a servant, and thou must have care for thyself, lest thou also come under thy father's displeasure." The sense is therefore: "No one will tell me," namely, the evil determined by Saul. This question, with its negative sense, is the answer, spoken with excited feeling, to Jonathan's word: "I will tell thee the evil determined on," and the tender, thoughtful form in which he clothes the decided: "Thou canst not tell me." The second question: Or what harsh thing will thy father answer thee? refers to Saul's anger (ver. 7), whence Jonathan purposed learning that Saul's evil plan against David was completed. Schmid's explanation: "and if thou choose a messenger, how shall I understand what evil thy father answers?" rests on the false distinction between a person bringing the information (to whom only the first question is to refer), and the nature of the information (to which the second question is to refer), and requires us to supply a sentence which could by no means have been omitted. Maur., De Wette, Keil regard the question as referring to the evil consequences to Jonathan, if he himself brought the information to David: What would thy father answer thee hard (Maur.: "what thinkest thou he would decree against thee," contrary to the meaning of ׳פ), if thou thyself didst it? Against this is the word "answer," since Jonathan would not say to Saul that he intended to tell David—and we cannot appropriately supply the idea that, if Saul afterwards heard of Jonathan's going to David, he would answer him harshly. Rather the second question reads fully: "Or who will tell what thy father," etc. Saul's evil word, by which his fixed evil purpose is to be discovered, is distinguished from this latter. But the evil answer is not to be understood of threats against David (Bötcher), but of harsh language towards Jonathan (vers. 6, 7). In this double question David denies or doubts that in this unfortunate case information can be given him. The two-fold question, with its negative meaning, corresponds to David's excited state of mind, and makes a full and candid conversation necessary, for which purpose Jonathan invites David to go with him to the field. [Erdmann's translation is hardly satisfactory; the second clause does not suit the question: "who will tell?" The rendering: "who will tell me if perchance thy father," &c., is the smoother, and suits the context better, but it is doubtful whether װ can mean simply "if"—Ta.] Ver. 11. Let us go into the field, namely, out of the city of Gibeah, or the royal residence therein, where this conversation was held. It certainly accords with David's words to suppose that they wished to escape from observation (Then.), in order to speak further undisturbedly of the matter, and to think over ways and means (Berl. Bib.); but at the same time the context suggests as another aim, that Jonathan wished to point out what he thought a fit place wherein to give his friend by a trustworthy sign the desired information, comp. vers. 19-24. This obviously supposes Jonathan's fixed determination, in spite of David's protest, to bring the message himself. That Jonathan went out for the sake of the oath which he afterwards [see ver. 42] renewed with David (Grot.: "they used to swear in the open air") is less probable.

Vers. 12-23 is essentially the full positive answer to David's question, which was meant in a negative sense. Vers. 12, 13. Jonathan's solemn oath that he will inform him of the mind of his father. The solemnity and loftiness of the vow, heightened by the oath, answers to the epoch-making importance and decisive significance of this moment in David's life; for from this moment David's way must coincide with that of Saul, or for ever diverge from it and be for him a way of uninterrupted suffering.—That Jonathan begins his address with a solemn invocation of God, "Jehovah, God of Israel" (De Wette, Keil) [so

* [See "Text. and Gram."—Ta.]

Eng. A. V., see "Text. and Gram."] is untenable, because there is no analogy for such a mode of address, and because of the introduction "Jonathan said to David" (Thenius). Nor can we suppose an interrupted discourse, resumed in ver. 13, for against this is the beginning of ver. 13: "The Lord do so."* As an oath follows, it is simplest to regard this as the formula of an oath by God, not supplying (with Maurer): "may God destroy me," or (Syr., Arab.): "God is my witness," but (with Thenius supplying וְיָ "after Cod. Kenn. 560 and 224 margin," which might easily fall out before דְּיָהוָה reading: "as God lives," unless with Bunsen we take the "Jehovah, God of Israel," as a lively ejaculation in the sense of an oath—"by God."—The protasis begins: "when I sound my father," and goes to the end of ver. 12. וְעַתָּה כִּחְרֹר —"to-morrow about this time," as in 1 Kings xix. 2; xx. 6; 2 Kings vii. 1, 18, and the full phrase in Josh. xi. 6 (Gesen.). The following word "on the third day" is without a conjunction (which with Sept. and Vulg. is to be supplied from the sense) and similarly depends on וְעַתָּה —"the third day about this time." This expression "to-morrow or next day" refers to the statement of time in ver. 5, and supposes that the festival was continued by a meal the day after new moon. And behold, there is good for David, etc.—In circumstantial phrase, which befits the solemn and serious character of the situation, Jonathan distinguishes the two cases, the favorable and the unfavorable, in order to make each the object of a solemn oath. Jonathan swears that in the first case he will send to David to uncover his ear, that is, to reveal to him, inform him that Saul is favorably disposed towards him, comp. xxii. 8.—Ver. 13 the apodosis: "so do the Lord to Jonathan," etc. The same formula in oaths in xiv. 44; 1 Kings xix. 2.—The opposite case is introduced with $\text{וְ$ without adversative particle: "(But) if it please my father to do thee evil," etc.†

* [Yet it is quite possible to read: "Jehovah, God of Israel—when I have sounded, etc.—if there be good and I show it not, so do Jehovah to Jonathan," which is instead of "Jehovah do so to me if there be good and I show it not." The difficulty is only in the post-position of the adjuration.—Ta.]

† Instead of וְיָ read with Böttch. and Then. וְיָ , "which may be construed, as with וְיָ (Ps. lxi. 32), so also with וְיָ (Böttch.). The Accus. particle before the subject וְיָ — "as respects," quoad, "if it please my father in respect of evil." "But this word (וְיָ) can never denote the Nominative; yet often only the general sense of the discourse calls forth the Acc., since the active form of connection everywhere presses in as the most natural" (Ew., § 277 d). So stands the Accus. particle after the opposite of וְיָ , that is, וְיָ , 2 Sam. xi. 25. Bunsen remarks that after "my father" וְיָ "to bring," has probably fallen out. But "it is not necessary, in order to maintain וְיָ as Accus. particle, to insert a supposed וְיָ from the Sept. What the latter renders ἀντί is clearly not וְיָ , but וְיָ .

The apodosis: "I will show it thee and send thee away that thou mayest go in peace," asserts, in distinction from the preceding apodosis, that Jonathan in this case will bring David the information himself without the intervention of a messenger. With this promise, confirmed by an oath, Jonathan connects the wish: "The Lord be with thee as he hath been with my father." This indicates that Jonathan has at least a presentiment of David's high destiny and his future calling, which he is some time to fulfil as King of Israel in Saul's place.—This comes out still more clearly in what follows. For in vers. 14–16 with such a presentiment he begs David in the future to maintain faithfully his mercy and love towards him even in misfortune. On the ground of what is now happening to Saul and David under the divine providence, he foresees how Saul and his house will be hurled from the royal power, and David thereto elevated. In Jonathan's pious soul, which felt and perceived God's righteous working, there lay hid a divinatorial and prophetic element, as here appears. Jonathan, having before expressed his wish for David, here declares what he desires from David as counter-proof of faithful friendship. With reference to the oriental custom of killing the children and relations of the former king on ascending the throne, Jonathan begs David hereafter to show mercy to his house. "The syntactical construction is a somewhat violent one, as accords with the emotion of the speaker" (Bunsen). Of the various explanations of this difficult passage only the two following are worthy of consideration. The one understands a question to the end of ver. 14: "And wilt thou not, if I yet live, wilt thou not show me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not?" Ver. 15 cannot then be a part of the question, but must be taken as the subjoined expression of confident expectation: "And thou wilt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever, not even when," etc. But this sudden, abrupt transition to a question and then again to direct discourse is strange, even if these vacillations and diversities of discourse are referred to Jonathan's excited feeling. The second explanation, which is the preferable one, introduces a wish by a slight change in the pointing of the Hebrew.* Jonathan, having invoked a blessing on David, thus expresses his wish for himself: "And wouldst thou, if I still live, wouldst thou show me the kindness of God, and not, if I die, not cut off thy love from my house for ever?" So Syr., Arab., Maur., Then., Ew., Keil. The correspondence and parallelism of the clauses is thus evident: to "if I yet live" answers "if I die."† itself read as וְיָ (as in 1 Kings xxi. 29; comp. 1 Samuel xvii. 54; xviii. 27), because וְיָ was wanting in its text" (Böttch.).

* In ver. 14, instead of the double וְיָ is read וְיָ , or וְיָ — וְיָ , particle of wish, so in xiv. 20; Isa. lxiii. 19: "O that," utnam, usually with the Impf., Ew. § 329 b, § 358 b.

† For וְיָ , which, put thus absolutely, accords with the feeling of the speaker, we are not with Thenius after Sept. and Vulg. to read וְיָ וְיָ וְיָ , the conditional particle is often wanting, and is here naturally supplied from the preceding "If I still live."

To the "show kindness to me" answers the similar negative request, "cut not off thy kindness from my house,—not even when," &c. "Kindness of the Lord," that is, love, goodness, such as the Lord, as covenant-God, shows His people according to His promise, and, therefore, one member of the people ought to show to another, especially in such a covenant of love made in the presence of the Lord. By this request for the "kindness of the Lord" Jonathan indicates David's duty to show him this love. "Not even when the Lord shall cut off the enemies of David, every one from the face of the earth." The תְּכַרִּית וְלֹא forms an assonance to תְּכַרִּית וְלֹא: "do not cut off . . . even when the Lord shall cut off." Jonathan clearly understands that enmity against David is enmity against the Lord's purpose and act, and that God's destroying judgment must fall on his father's house because of its opposition to the will of the Lord. His request that his house may be excepted from this judgment, as executor of which he regards David, is founded on and justified by his position outside of the circle of "enemies" (since he recognises God's will concerning David, and bends to it as David's friend), so that, though a member of Saul's house, he does not belong to it so far as concerns the judgment of extermination.—See the fulfilment of Jonathan's request, 2 Sam. ix.—Ver. 16 is a remark of the narrator 1) on this covenant between Jonathan and David, and 2) on the actual fulfilment of Jonathan's word respecting the overthrow of David's enemies. "And Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David." After וַיִּכְרֹת supply וַיִּכְרֹת comp. xxii. 8; Josh. vi. 1; Judg. xix. 30; 2 Chr. vii. 18 [1 Kings viii. 9. The examples from Josh. and Judges present omissions of other words.—Tr.]—

The second part of the verse (וַיִּכְרֹת) is by many put into Jonathan's mouth as part of his oath, "and the Lord take vengeance on the enemies of David" (Then., Maur., De Wette, Buns.). But the objection to this is, that then (unless with Then. we adopt the corrupt Sept. and Vulg. text: "and may Jonathan's name not be cut off from the house of David") we must supply "saying" (אָמַר between וְ and וַיִּכְרֹת which is hard, and is not found elsewhere. And Keil rightly remarks that after the insertion between conjunction and verb the Perf. could not have an Optative sense. Finally against this view is the fact that it is psychologically and ethically not quite conceivable how Jonathan should have expressed such a wish, especially as this judgment as a future fact had already been distinctly looked at by him, and was the condition and basis of his wish. "Require at the hand" (וְיִקַּח כְּפֶיךָ) = "take vengeance, punish," with the word "blood," 2 Sam. iv. 11, without it here and Josh. xxii. 23.—Ver. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again. According to the connection this does not refer to what follows from ver. 18 on (Maur.), but concludes naturally the transaction between Jonathan and David,—but not as an oath by which Jonathan assures David anew that he will keep his promise (Then.), according to the incorrect rendering of Sept. and Vulg. "he swore to David" (from which Then. would read "to David," instead of Acc. "David")—rather it is an oath by which Jonathan adjures David to fulfil his last request (vers. 14, 15). The "again" refers to ver. 12. He adjured him "by his love to him," that is, he made his love to David the ground of his request, so that David might in turn show his love. [Or, his love to David made him anxious to maintain friendly relations between their houses; he could not bear to think of his children shut out from the love of this his much-loved friend, whom he loved as himself.—Tr.] The words: "for he loved him as his own soul" confirm and define the preceding "by his love to him," and indicate the cordialness of his friendly love, which is like his love for himself; that is, he loves his friend as himself. The "soul" is the centre of the inner life and of the whole personality. Comp. xviii. 1-3.

Ver. 18 sq. Further conversation on the carrying out of Jonathan's promise.—As to ver. 18 comp. ver. 5.—(The Perf. with Waw consec. has a future signification when preceded not only by an express Fut. but also by any indication of futurity, as here the words: "to-morrow is new moon.") The presupposed situation is resumed as basis for the following agreement.—Ver. 19. And on the third day come down quickly. If we point the Heb. form as a verb = "to do a thing the third day" (וַיֵּשְׁבִי), Ges., Ew., Maur., it is to be taken asyndetically with the following word in an adverbial sense (Ges., § 142, 3, c) = "do it on the third day that thou come down." But this sense of the word occurs nowhere else; Gesenius' reference to the Arab. "to come every fourth day" does not suit here, because nothing is said of coming every fourth day. We might more easily assume the meaning "to do a thing the third time" (1 Kings xviii. 34), and render "a third time come down." The first time of his going down was in xix. 2, our present narrative gives the second time, and ver. 35 would be the third time. But besides the forced character of this explanation, we have against this vocalization of the Heb. text (the Sept. ῥιπτομεν favors it) the Chald., Syr., Arab., and Vulg., which render "And on the third day," and we must therefore read וַיֵּשְׁבִי, which agrees with ver. 5. The words "Come down very" [so literally the Heb.] are also somewhat strange; not on account of the Adv. "down" (Then.), for this is explained by the nature of the ground, the field of meeting being lower than the surrounding highlands (Cler.: "Jonathan seems to wish David to go down into a very deep valley as near as possible to Gibeah, where Jonathan himself would tell him what was to be done"—but on account of the word "very" (וְהָיָה). The Vulg. has "descend quickly." From the difficulty of the reading some substitute "thou wilt be missed" (וְיִפָּסֵד, Chald., Syr., Ar.) for the "come down;" but, apart from the difficulty of explaining how the Heb. text came from this reading, the expression "On the third day thou wilt be much missed" is very strange, and the "very" with "come down" is less surprising if we take it = "quickly," and suppose it necessary to insist on a quick descent to the place of meeting on account of the danger of being observed. Perhaps, however, the text is corrupt, and instead of וְהָיָה ("very") we should read וְהָיָה, "appointed place of meeting," comp. Josh. viii. 14. It would be an Acc. of place as in ver. 11; see the similar expression in verse 35, which refers to this passage. [Eng. A. V. gives a very doubtful translation of the Heb. text; see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.].—And come to the place where thou didst hide on the day of the business. These words are usually rightly referred to the narrative in xix. 2. But what does "the day of the business" mean? Against the reference to the wicked deed of Saul, which forced David to fly (Maur., Ew., De Wette), Thenius rightly says that the word never means "wicked deed" in itself, but only when the connection points to it (Job xxxiii. 17). But in xix. 2. there is mention not of a deed, but only of a purpose of Saul; the explanation "on the day of the purposed evil" (Ew.) adds something not contained in the word. Against the rendering "on the work day" as opposed to "feast-day" (Chald., Sept., Vulg., Ges., Luther) is the fact that, as Then. remarks, to obtain a fitting sense, we must then read: "Thou wilt come from the place where thou (on the work-day) shalt have hidden thyself." Bunsen's explanation "on the day when that happened" (xix. 2, 3) attenuates the meaning of the Heb. word (וְהָיָה), yea, directly contradicts it. [The word means "something done."—Tr.] The rendering "on the day of the business (known to thee)" (Tanchum, Then., Keil) is unsatisfactory, because it is then wholly uncertain what business occurred on that day. Holding fast to the view that that day (xix. 2 sq.) was the one here referred to, the "business," regarded by Jonathan as specially memorable, could only be Jonathan's deed, when near that spot he turned aside his father's murderous thoughts from David, having brought him to the spot where David was hidden and could hear the conversation. This was the business which Jonathan's brief allusion would suggest to David. A reference to this explanation is found as early as Clericus: "rather the allusion seems to be to the day when Jonathan occupied himself with this very business of David's safety."—And remain by the stone

Ezel. (Sept. παρὰ τὸ ἐργάβ ικεῖνο, ἢ τὸν ἀνὴρ, "by that stone-heap." So Then. and Ew., except that the latter reads וְהָיָה, "the lonely waste.") There is, however, no need for change of text; וְהָיָה is a hollow rock as a hiding-place, and Ezel is a proper name.) [On the reading see "Text. and Gram."—Tr.].—Ver. 20. He will shoot three arrows on the side of the stone; the Art. "the three arrows" is explained by supposing that Jonathan, who had no doubt come armed, showed David three arrows by which the latter might from his hiding-place recognise his presence. Jonathan would act as if he were practicing at a mark (Vulg. "as if exercising at a mark"), it being understood that the arrows thus shot were to be gathered up* from the place where they fell, whether in front of or behind the mark. (Böttcher: In וְהָיָה the Raphe, as the accent shows, denotes that וְהָיָה loses its aspiration by reason of the neighboring hard consonants (ש and then ר), or remains as suffix וְהָיָה, not as toneless local וְהָיָה; this וְהָיָה refers to the preceding fem. וְהָיָה, so that וְהָיָה = juxta eam, at its (the stone's) side (so render Vulg., De Wette, and even Luther), expresses a definite mark.)—Ver. 21. The agreement as to the sign, whereby David was to know whether there was danger for him or not. Before "go, find the arrows" the word "saying" has not fallen out, but is to be supplied (with Sept. and Vulg.) from the sense. Comp. xi. 7; Isa. x. 3, 4. The procedure is as follows: The servant, taking position by order on the side of the mark, is first, after the shooting, to go to the mark in order to find the arrows; if then Jonathan calls to him: "The arrows are from thee," that is from the place where thou art "hitherward," bring them,—that is a sign for David that it is well, he is to come; for there is peace to thee, and it is nothing, as the Lord liveth. But if (ver. 22) he says: "The arrows are from thee," that is "yonsides," that is a sign that David is to go away, to flee. For the Lord sendeth thee away, that is, commands thee to go away.—Ver. 23. And the word that we have spoken, that is, not merely the sign agreed on, but (as is indicated by the "we" and the "I and thou") what they had said to one another in the whole affair, and promised one another before the Lord. Behold, the Lord is between me and thee for ever, comp. Gen. xxxi. 49. We need not with Sept. supply the word "witness," since without it the thought is clearly expressed that it is the Lord in whom they have here anew concluded their covenant of friendship, and in whose fear they feel themselves bound to maintain it and fulfil their promises to one another.

Vers. 24–34. The execution of the agreement, and the open exhibition of Saul's deadly hate against David.—Ver. 24. Instead of "sat," the Sept. has "came to the table," but the Heb. text is to be retained as in keeping with the rapid and minute portraiture of the narrative. The text "on"

(above) the food (וְהָיָה, Eng. A. V. omits the prep.) is to be retained against the marginal reading (Qeri) "to;" "he who sits at table is elevated," comp. Prov. xxiii. 30" (Maur.).—"David hid himself—Saul sat at table on new-moon-day,"—this lapidary double remark admirably and vividly introduces the following narration, which is marked precisely by this two-fold fact. Saul sat in his "seat by the wall," as the highest, most honorable place, opposite the door. See Harmar, Beob. über d. Orient, II. 66 sq. "As time on time," that is, as formerly, as usually, comp. iii. 4; Num. xxiv. 1. Vulg. secundum consuetudinem. The word "arose" presents serious difficulties. It is proposed to adopt the Sept. καὶ πρὸ ἐφθασε τὸν Ἰωνάθαν (וְהָיָה for וְהָיָה), and render "Jonathan sat in front" (Then., Ew., Buns.). But this meaning of the Heb. word is not proved, while the rendering of the Sept. "he (Saul) went before Jonathan" would certainly accord with it, since the verb means "to go before." But that would be understood of itself, apart from the fact that the context and the syntax do not allow us to take "Saul" as subject; therefore, too, Clericus'

* [This Verb is supplied conjecturally, being omitted in the German text.—Tr.]

explanation falls to the ground; "Saul alone preceded Jonathan," that is, Jonathan sat down next after him. The rendering of the Sept. clearly springs from the difficulty of the expression "And Jonathan arose." We must try to hold to the text. The Syr. renders: "And Jonathan arose and seated himself and Abner (seated himself) at Saul's side" (connecting אָבְנֵר with אָרָס, and putting before אָרָס). But the insertion of "and" is arbitrary, the "sat" must be connected with "Abner," and the circumstantial introduction of the simple matter-of-course act "sat" by the phrase "arose," which always emphatically indicates a transition from rest to a new act or activity, is somewhat farcical. The explanation "and Jonathan came" (De Wette, Maurer: Jonathan sat down next after Saul) does not agree with the meaning of the Heb. word (אָרָס), which is used instead of "coming" in the elevated, solemn sense = "appearing," but never of simple "coming." If we keep the text and render "and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat" (Vulg.), the only possible explanation is: Jonathan rose from his place when Abner came, whether to show him honor as his uncle, or to give him his proper place at Saul's side, which he had taken perhaps in Abner's absence under the impression that the latter would not come to the meal.—Another rendering, however, naturally suggests itself; pointing the verb (אָרָס) as causative (Hiph. אָרָס, written defectively) as in 2 Chr. x. 2 (Ges. § 69, 3 R. 7), and understanding that Jonathan had already seated himself after Saul, and that David's absence was observed, we translate "he arose, and seated Abner at Saul's side," that is, in the place left vacant by David's absence,* in order that the seat next to Saul might not be empty, he himself having taken the seat on the other side of Saul.—Maurer conjectures that the words "and Jonathan arose" have been inserted here by the mistake of a transcriber from the beginning of ver. 34.—Ver. 26. The first day Saul explained David's absence by supposing that he was ceremonially unclean and unable to take part in the religious festival. See Lev. vii. 20 sq.; xv. 16; Deut. xxiii. 4. [Kitto suggests as the explanation of Saul's expecting David, that he supposed David would infer from the occurrence at Naioth xix. 24, that Saul's mood was changed, and there was no longer danger.—Ta.].—Ver. 27. The statement of time here is with Keil to be literally rendered: "it was on the morrow after the new moon, the second day" (הַיּוֹם הַשֵּׁנִי is Nom. with יוֹם, not Gen. after הַיּוֹם) and David's place was missed," so De Wette: "it came to pass on the following day of the new moon, the second." In reply to Saul's question about him Jonathan gave the answer agreed on in ver. 6, only adding that David was called to Bethlehem by his brother.—Ver. 28. David earnestly asked leave of me to Bethlehem, an elliptical expression, in which "to go" (ver. 6) is to be supplied.—Ver. 29. And he hath commanded me, my brother, and now, etc. Stumbling at the Sing. "brother," the Sept. has "brothers," we are to understand the eldest brother (Ew.) as head of the family, who had the care of the domestic arrangements for the feast. Vulg. wrongly: "one of my brothers." Syr. and Arab. wrongly translate: "and he (David) exhorted me and said to me, my brother, if, etc." Jonathan's quotation of David's words is somewhat loose and incompact, agreeing with the cordial, light tone in which one friend makes such statements to another in confidential intercourse. This is the explanation also of the somewhat rough and jocular phrase "let me get away, take myself off" (אֶפְלֹטָה). Comp. the "run" in ver. 6 (Bunsen).

Ver. 30 sq. Saul's outbreak of wrath in consequence of these words of Jonathan. Against the rendering "thou son of a woman perverse and rebellious" (literally, "perverse one of rebellion," נִעְרָה as Ni. partcp., Maurer: "son of a perverse and contumacious mother—O perverse and obstinate son") is partly the hardness of the phrase "perverse one of rebellion," partly the monstrosity of the insult thus offered to Jonathan's mother, which contradicts the Heb. family-spirit.* The last objection lies also against the rendering of Sept. and Vulg. "thou son of a rebellious woman" (נִעְרָה for נִעְרָה, Then.), or, as Vulg., "thou son of a woman who voluntarily seizes on a man" (obviously reading נִפְרָהָן (Isa. xiv. 6) or נִפְרָהָן for נִפְרָהָן). So Ew., who puts Plu. instead of Sing.: "thou son of wenches who run after (men)." The most tolerable rendering is that of Köster, unjustly made light of by Then., found also in Clericus: "Thou son of perversity of rebellion" (taking נִעְרָה as abstract noun, Ni. partcip. of נִעַר), full of perverse rebellion. Cleric.: "It is much better to say that Jonathan is called a son of perversity of rebellion, a common Hebraism for a man of perverse and refractory nature."† Saul observes that Jonathan is on the side of David, whom he wishes to destroy as an aspirant after the throne and therefore a rebel. And so he looks on Jonathan also as a rebel.—In the words "Do I not know?" Saul intimates that he is well aware of the secret friendship between Jonathan and David, and regards this excuse as confirmatory of his opinion. (נִחַר denotes choice out of love, commonly construed with 3, here only with 7. [On the unnecessary Sept. reading see "Text. and Gram."—Ta.]). To thy shame and to the shame of thy mother's nakedness, who will be ashamed of having borne thee. So we must translate, and not with De Wette, "to the shame and nakedness of thy mother," nor with Bunsen, "to the shame of thy unchaste mother." Such an expression from Saul would be in con-

* [The most grievous insult to an Arab is one directed against his mother, but such a phrase is not probable here; in the general uncertainty and obscurity of the language, Erdmann's explanation seems the least objectionable.—Ta.]

† [Wellhausen reads after Sept. נִעְרָה and renders from Judg. xvi. 12 (וַיִּשְׁלַח אֶת-הַמַּלְאָכִים, comp. Lagarde's Syr. vs.) "runaway slave." On our passage Frankel (Vorstudien zur LXX. 187) says: "The Hagada relates that Jonathan's mother was one of the maidens carried off at Shiloh (Judg. xxi.), and willingly offered herself to Saul (comp. Rashi in loco). This Hagada is expressed in the Greek (LXX.), and still more clearly in the Vulgate. So also in Joseph. Ant. VI. 11, 9, probably from the Sept., as is frequent with Josephus."—Ta.]

* [Similar is Abarbanel's view, and also Rashi's.—Ta.]

tradition to his previous reference to Jonathan's mother according to the translation which we have rejected. In ver. 31 we see clearly why Saul called Jonathan a "son of perverse rebellion." David is making a rebellious attempt on the royal throne, and Jonathan, bound to him in intimate friendship, is therefore a rebel. He calls this rebellion "perversity," because "as long as the son of Jesse lives on the earth, he (Jonathan) and his kingdom will not be established." It is therefore Saul's determined and permanent purpose to slay David as a rebel. And so he says: Now send and fetch him to me, for he is a son of death. These words fully reveal his disposition towards David.—Ver. 32. In spite of this outbreak of rage on his father's part Jonathan tries with mild and quiet words to set forth David's innocence and the injustice of putting him to death, as in xix. 4, 5. At that time Saul's better feeling got the upper hand. Here, completely enslaved by his passion, he is an impotent instrument of his own blind hate.—Ver. 33. As David before, so now Jonathan is the mark of his spear hurled [or, brandished.—Tr.], in blind rage (comp. xviii. 11). Jonathan saw that it was a settled thing with his father to kill David (comp. ver. 9).—Ver. 34. A vivid and psychologically true description of Jonathan's consequent conduct; he rises in fierce anger from the table, eats nothing this second day of the new moon (in contrast with the first, when he took part in the meal), and, what is the reason of his not eating, is grieved for David,* because his father had done him shame [that is, done David, not Jonathan shame.—Tr.]. That there is nothing of this in the text (Then.) cannot be maintained, for the way in which Saul spoke of the relation of Jonathan to David, and his indirect declaration that David was a rebel against him, the king, and therefore deserved death, was shame and insult enough. And that Jonathan thought this insult offered to his friend as a completely innocent man is clear from his question: Why shall he die? What has he done?

Vers. 35–42. [Heb. xxi. 1]. According to the agreement David is informed of Saul's attitude towards him, and, after a sorrowful parting with his friend, betakes himself to flight.

Ver. 35. The following morning Jonathan went to the field to meet David at the appointed place (לִפְנֵי הַמָּקוֹם), not "at the time agreed on," which translation requires too much to be supplied; and with him a small servant "who would not so easily suspect anything; this trifling notice is of great value as testimony to the historical realness of the occurrence"—(Then.).—Ver. 36. The narration is evidently abridged. Jonathan says to the servant: Bring the arrows. This plural answers to the agreement in ver. 20 sq., which seems to be contradicted by the following statement that Jonathan shot only one arrow (יֶזֶן is ancient unshortened Sing. for later יָזַן, as in vera 37, 38; 2 Ki. ix. 24; see Ew., § 186, 2 c). "To send it beyond him," so that the arrow went further than the servant had run.—Ver. 37. To the place (or, the region, Thenius) of the arrow which

Jonathan had shot, according to the agreement with David, which referred to three arrows to be shot, Jonathan calls to the boy: "Is not the arrow beyond thee?" Jonathan uses a question instead of direct discourse (as in vera. 20–22) in order more certainly to make the boy believe that he was merely practicing at a mark. He heaps up words of command "hasten, hurry, stay not," to keep the boy's attention fixed on the arrow, that he might not chance to see David, who was hid near by. "The boy took up the arrow." The text (Sing.) is to be retained against the Qeri (Plu.), since the purpose is to tell of one arrow only. "He came (not as Sept. 'brought') to his master," that is, bringing the arrow. While in vera. 20–22 this procedure is summarily described of three arrows, the account here is of one. The difference is not to be explained by the supposition that Jonathan shortened the affair and shot only once, because there was danger in delay (Then.), for the shooting of three arrows was a principal point in the agreement, and if there had been such need of haste, the following parting-scene could not have taken place. Rather we must suppose that Jonathan did so with each of the three arrows. Either, as Bunsen remarks, Jonathan shot the arrows one right after another, or he thrice repeated it. In the first case we must hold with Keil that the Sing. here "stands in an indefinite general way, the author not thinking it necessary, after what he has before said, to state that Jonathan shot three arrows one after another."

Ver. 40. Jonathan, having given his artillery to the lad—we need not with Sept. read לַיָּד for לַיָּד (Then.)—sent him to the city, that he might be alone with David.—Ver. 41. David rose from the south side of the rock, where he had been concealed, the preceding affair having occurred on the north side, whence the boy returned to the city which lay north of David's hiding-place, so that the latter was completely hid from him. It accords very well with this statement of the points of the compass that David afterward fled southward to Nob.* The affecting description of the sorrowful parting is in keeping with the deep emotion of these two hearts (one loving the other as himself) not merely on account of the separation, which was final, but on account of the great dangers and grievous sufferings which the one saw that the other must inevitably endure from Saul. "David fell on his face to the ground and bowed himself thrice." Clericus: "To do Jonathan honor, that he might implore his help or gratefully acknowledge his kindness." Josephus: "he did obeisance and called him the saviour of his life."—There is no need to render with Vulgate and Syriac (יָזַן for יָזַן): "But David wept still more," that is, than Jonathan. No sense can be extracted from the reading of the Septuagint "unto a great consummation" (εως συντελειας μεγαλης, according to Thenius from substitution of οἶν for πῖν), which provokes from Capell the * [Bib. Comm.: The generosity of Jonathan's character is seen in that he resented the wrong done to his friend, not that done to himself.—Tr.].

* [A point can hardly be made of this. David might just as well have fled in any other direction, and chose the south because he was naturally more familiar with the region where he was brought up.—See "Text and Gram." for the difficulties of the text.—Tr.].

merry remark that, according to this, the two friends are still weeping, and will continue to weep till the last day.* We must render literally: "David did greatly,"—namely, wept violently, aloud. For the construction comp. Joel ii. 20, 21; Ps. cxxvi. 2, 3.—Ver. 42. Jonathan must quickly part from his weeping friend to spare him further danger. From the connection and the circumstances it is not probable that another conversation [of which Jonathan's words are merely the conclusion] had before taken place (Keil). Jonathan's parting word is: 1) a wish for peace or blessing, and 2) conjuring him that the covenant of friendship be forever maintained. The apodosis is not uttered; the aposiopesis accords with Jonathan's deep emotion.—Chap. xx. 1 [in Eng. A. V. xx. 42]. The concluding scene. David goes his way in flight; Jonathan returns in the opposite direction to the city.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David designates the covenant of friendship which Jonathan had made with him (xviii. 1 sq.) as one which he made with him in the Lord (comp. xxiii. 18). It was therefore not a friendship which rested merely on mutual good feeling, but was based on a recognized common union of heart with the living God. Jonathan's heart clung in firm faith and trust to the Lord; this was the root of his heroic courage and his victorious prowess (comp. xiv. 6); this fresh power of faith, which elevated and sanctified his whole being, won him David's regard and love. David's whole life-course showed Jonathan the direct wonderful gracious leading of the Lord, to which he humbly submitted himself. The two hearts were one in looking to and hoping in the living God, in humble obedience to His holy will. This was the foundation of their communion of love and life in the Lord. "God works such unions through and in Himself, so that such souls become wholly one" (Berk. Bib.).

2. On the light of this noble friendship concluded in the Lord falls the shadow of the "lie of necessity" to which David resorts in order to save himself from Saul's murderous designs, and into which Jonathan allows himself to be enticed by David, having given the unconditional promise: "What thy soul says, I will do for thee." Yet the duty of absolute truthfulness could not be known so clearly from the stand-point of the Old Testament as from that of the New; of the same David who expressly said "Keep thy lips from speaking guile" (Ps. xxxiv. 14 [13]) precisely the opposite is here and elsewhere related. But though there is in the narrative no condemnation of the lie, the course of events brings a judgment on it; for Saul sees through it immediately. On Jonathan falls his father's rage (thereby roused), and Saul's anger burns the more violently against David. Instead of having recourse to a lie as a supposed necessary self-help, they ought to have united in unconditional trust in the Lord's help, and have committed their affairs to Him. Compare how the Lord formerly exposed and brought to naught the lies of Abraham and Isaac (Gen.

xii. 11 sq.; xvi. 7 sq.), and punished the lie of Rebecca and Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 6 sq.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1 sqq. SCHLIER: The old saying is right:

Silently suffer, forbear and endure,
Thy troubles to no one lament;
Despair not of God, for His promise is sure,
And daily thy help will be sent.

But it is another thing when we are indeed silent to the world, but tell our troubles and conflicts to a faithful friend, when we communicate to others all that oppresses us, when we do not complain and lament, but do seek counsel and consolation. —STARKE: Even great-hearted men sometimes grow faint-hearted; let us therefore not build too much on ourselves, but on God, whose power is mighty in the weak (2 Cor. xii. 9; Ps. xxx. 8).—[Ver. 2. SCOTT: Pious children will veil the faults of their parents as far as consists with other duties, and speak as favorably of them as truth permits.—TR.]—Ver. 3. STARKE: Even in the midst of life we are in death.* O man, do think of it, and never feel secure (Ps. xxxix. 6).—[Ver. 4. Here friendship goes too far. It is wrong to promise unconditional compliance with the wishes of another. He may err in judgment and ask what is unwise, or may be misled by interest and ask what is wrong. And, besides, every man is solemnly bound to exercise his own judgment and conscience in the direction of his conduct. Jonathan was led by this promise to tell a falsehood, which his father detected, and was thereby the more enraged (vers. 28–33).—Ver. 6. TAYLOR: From brooding morbidly over Saul's treatment of him, to the entire exclusion from his mind of God's constant care over him, David fell into despair, and ran into a course of reckless deceit which brought the most fearful consequences in its train (chaps. xx.—xxii.).—TR.]—Ver. 8. STARKE: So long as one sees before him ordinary ways and means of escaping from danger, he should make use of them, and not look for extraordinary help from God, that he may not tempt God.—Ver. 10. S. SCHMID: A wise man not only proposes to himself to do good, but he looks around him for suitable means of accomplishing his good designs (Prov. xxi. 25–6).—Ver. 11. Conversations between friends united in the Lord upon the highest and holiest matters of the inner or the outer life are to be preserved from the disturbing influences of the unquiet world; the thoughts interchanged in stillness before the Lord and in the Lord unite their hearts in all the closer inward ties for time and eternity.—Ver. 13. All

* [STARKE quotes this saying in substantially the form given it by LUTHER in a metrical version. We have substituted the form familiar to the English-speaking world from the Book of Common Prayer. LUTHER's hymn (KNAPP 2824, SCHAF 446) derives its first stanza, with alterations, from an older German version. The original Latin is found in Daniel, Thesaurus Hymnologicus li. 323, is certainly quite old, and believed by some to have been written by a monk who died A. D. 912. It was once a favorite battle-song. The first line is so famous that it may be well to insert the whole:

*Medita vita in morte sumus:
Quem quaerimus adiutorem nisi te, domine,
Qui pro peccatis nostris iuste trasceris:
Sancte Deus, sancte fortis, sancte et misericors salvator:
Amaro morti ne tradas nos.*—TR.]

* [The phrase συμμελέα is used in New Test. of the end of the world, as in Matt. xiii. 39 et.—TR.]

the highest and most blessed things that souls united in the Lord can wish for each other are included in the one word: The Lord be with thee; for what is greater and more blessed than the Lord's guidance and gracious presence?—Ver. 14. The kindness of the Lord itself exercises and employs the child of God as its instrument for his fellow-children and brethren; children of God love one another with and in the love of God which dwells in their hearts.—Ver. 15. BERLENE. BIBLE: A truly tranquil soul seeks neither honor nor advantage for itself. It is just as joyful when God is glorified in others as in itself. It only asks such a faithful friend, whom with joy it sees preferred before itself, that he will give it any help it may need in the spiritual life.—Ver. 17. DISSELHOFF: Unselfish love bears especially two noble fruits—to rejoice with them that rejoice, and to weep with them that weep. How heart-refreshingly do both of these beckon to us from the history of our two friends. Through David's glorious victory, Jonathan, who had before been highly praised by the people as a conqueror, fell wholly into the shade. He lost through David even his hope of the crown. Yet he looked with joyful eye upon the deeds of David and his growing fame.—[True love delights in receiving and giving repeated and strong assurances. This is very different from the renewed assurance which distrust demands.—Tr.]—Ver. 23. S. SCHMID: What has been once promised and is not opposed to God must be held fast.—SCHLIER: A faithful friend is a gift of God, and God gives such a blessing to him that fears Him. The God-fearing David received from the Lord such a noble blessing of friendship as few others ever enjoyed.

Ver. 30sq. SCHLIER: We take up so easily with anger, and yet how fearful is the power of anger! How blind does anger make a man—how it carries him out of himself, so that he does not even know what he is doing; how it makes a man like a beast, so that he ceases to be himself, and falls under the power of darkness.—Vers. 35–40. STARKE [from HALL]: In vain are those professions of love which are not answered with action (1 John iii. 18).—Ver. 32. BERL. BIBLE: A friend in grace cannot possibly let himself be moved by self-advantage. When he has once let self-seeking go, in order to give himself to God, then nothing disturbs him of all that may be said or done against him. He well knows the essential deep ground of unity, which is in God alone.—Unity with favored souls draws after it also a like condition and like sorrow. So long as David is thy friend, thou must also have part in his cross.—[Ver. 34. SCOTT: Under great provocations the meekest cannot always refrain from anger; but when its emotions are felt, it is our wisdom to withdraw in silence; and it is generous to be more grieved for our insulted friends than for ourselves.—Tr.]—Ver. 41. S. SCHMID: In misfortune the love of true friends must much rather increase than fall off.—OSIANDER: The pious experience such weakness when they stand in fear of death or other trials, in order that they may know, when they have overcome misfortune, that they have done so not by their own strength, but that it is God's gift. Ver. 42. S. SCHMID: When we are separated from our dearest friends in the world, it is our consolation if we are not separated from God, but have Him for a friend (Ps. lxxiii. 25sq.).—BERL. BIBLE: The unions that are made in God are for that reason the strongest of all. Nothing human forms their bond. Presence does not increase them, just as little as absence diminishes them. Thence comes it that such persons separate without pain if God so wills. They desire only one thing, namely, to maintain peace even amid the greatest antagonisms, since this peace is a sure sign that one has not withdrawn from submission to the will of God.

J. DISSELHOFF to chap. xx.: Friendship among the servants of God. Three questions: 1) Wherein is friendship among the servants of God grounded?—It is a covenant in the Lord. 2) What perils threaten even friendship among the servants of God?—That one friend, overlooking another's sin, may do for his sake what is not right in the sight of God. 3) What blessing rests upon friendship among the servants of God?—It teaches unenvying joy with them that rejoice, and faithful mourning and forbearing with them that mourn.

F. W. KRUMMACHER (1 Sam. xx. 16, 17): Sanctified friendship: The love of Jonathan for David is put to a severe test by a three-fold discovery which he makes: he gets a glimpse of the real disposition cherished by his royal father towards his friend, the heroic youth—of the high destiny which God designs for his beloved friend—and of the danger which threatens himself through his connection with David.

[Ver. 3 (end). A good funeral text in case of sudden death, especially when from accident.

Vers. 14, 15. The friend's plea for kindness. 1) Kindness notwithstanding separation and outward antagonism. 2) Kindness not merely on grounds of personal regard, but "kindness of Jehovah." 3) Kindness not only to himself, but also to his posterity.

Ver. 41. Strong men weeping. 1) Great occasion for it here. a) Personal separation. b) Mad injustice of their father (comp. xxiv. 16). c) Prospect of a bitter conflict. 2) Not unbecoming when on sufficient occasion. Compatible a) With manly courage and spirit. David and Jonathan were certainly brave. b) With great self-control (xvii. 29; xviii. 14; xx. 32). c) With living trust in Providence (v. 42).—Tr.]

III. David's flight to Nob to the high-priest Ahimelech and to Gath to king Achish.

CHAP. XXI. 1-15 (2-16).

- 1 THEN came David [And D. came] to Nob to Ahimelech the priest. And Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David [Ahimelech went frightened to meet David]¹ and said unto him, Why art thou alone and no man with thee? And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business and hath said unto me, Let no man know any thing of the business² whereabout I send thee and what [which] I have commanded thee; and I have appointed³ my servants
- 3 [the young men] to such and such⁴ a place. Now, therefore, what is under thy
- 4 hand? give me five loaves of bread in mine hand, or what there is present. And the priest answered David and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed [holy] bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least⁵
- 5 from women. And David answered the priest and said unto him, Of a truth⁶ women have been kept from us about these three days since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy, and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though
- 6 it were sanctified this day in the vessel.⁷ So [And] the priest gave him hallowed [holy] bread, for there was no bread there but the show-bread, that was taken from before the Lord [Jehovah], to put hot bread in the day when it was taken away.
- 7 Now [And] a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day detained before the Lord [Jehovah], and his name was Doeg an [the] Edomite, the chiefest
- 8 of the herdsmen⁸ that belonged to Saul [of Saul]. And David said to Ahimelech, And is there not¹⁰ here under thy hand spear or sword? for I have neither brought

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. לִקְרַאת supposes a verb of "going" before it.—Tx.]

² [Ver. 2. Literally "in respect to the business."—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 2. יָרַעְתִּי Poel of יָדַע "to know"—"taught, instructed." Some take it as error for יָרַעְתִּי (Buxtorf.) not so well. Sept. διαμαρτυρήσαι = יָרַעְתִּי, Poel of יָדַע, which is a better reading. The Syr. supports the Heb. text—other versions not decisive.—Tx.]

⁴ [Ver. 2. Heb. "Peloni almoni." This is translated by Syr. and Chald. "secret and hidden." Sept. (Vat.) has a duplet; it translates by θεοῦ πίστις, "faith of God," and transfers by "Phellani macmoni." On the derivation of the Heb. words see Ges. Lex. s. v. Fürst suggests that peloni may be from palmoni, and in the Annot. to Dan. viii. 13 in the ed. princeps of Codex Chis. the latter is held to be the original form, and is derived from the Egyptian

Ammon (with prefix ל and Egypt. article — pa. l. ammon — palmoni), which is wholly improbable. Buxtorf (after Kimchi) says that the words here after "place" indicate a person: "to the place of such a one."—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 4. Or: "have only kept themselves."—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 5. More exactly "(nay) but women."—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 5. On this sentence see Erdmann's Exposition and a long list of translations in Poole's Synopsis. The principal renderings are as follows: 1) "And though it is a profane (i. e., military) way, yet it is sanctified to-day in the vessel" (i. e., David or Ahimelech or the young men's body). Ewald: "how much more will they (the young men, changing the Numb. of the verb) be holy in the vessel" (i. e., their bodies), since, namely, they were clean at starting, how much more now the third day! 2) "Though it is a profane (i. e., ceremonially illegal) procedure (to take the show-bread), yet it is sanctified by the vessel (David or Ahimelech)"—so Thenius and Erdmann. 3) "If this is our way with profane things (i. e., we have not defiled ourselves on the road), how much more will the bread now given us be kept holy in our vessels" (Philippson); 4) "And though this is the manner of common bread (i. e., to give it to us), yet surely to-day the bread in the vessel (i. e., the fresh show-bread) is holy" (Bib. Comm.). 5) "If (the show-bread) is in a manner profane, even though it were to-day sanctified" (Rashi, Eng. A. V.).—There is no good ground for changing the text, and the word "vessels" cannot be taken (according to O. T. usage) in the N. T. sense (2 Cor. iv. 7). It is a hurried, excited sentence, almost utterly obscure. The second rendering above given (that of Thenius, adopted by Erdmann) seems the least open to objection.—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. Sept.: "the Syrian" (רַעַי for רַעַי).—Tx.]

⁹ [Ver. 7. Sept. "keeper of the mules," רַעַי הַחֲמֹרִים, perhaps by inversion and misreading of the text; comp. the designation of Doeg in xxii. 9.—Tx.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 8. הֲיֵשׁ אֵינִי is somewhat strange. Sept. τί ἐστὶν ἐνθάδε (Wellh.), Chald. "if there is here!" Syr. "is there not (הֲיֵשׁ אֵינִי)?" Vulg. si habes hic. Gesen. supposes that the Interrog. הֲ has fallen out. We may perhaps take אֵינִי as Interrog.—Tx.—Tx.]

- my sword nor my weapons with me, because the king's business required haste.
- 9 And the priest said, The sword of Goliath the Philistine whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold it is here [om. here] wrapped in a cloth [the garment] behind the ephod; if thou wilt take that, take it, for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like that; give it me.¹¹
- 10 And David arose and fled that day for fear of¹² Saul, and went to Achish the king of Gath. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land? did they not sing one to another of him in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands and David his ten thousands? And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish the king of Gath. And he changed¹³ his behaviour [understanding] before them [in their eyes] and feigned himself mad [acted like a madman] in their hands, and scrambled [scrawled]¹⁴ on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard. Then said Achish [And Achish said] unto his servants, Lo, ye see the man is mad; wherefore then [om. then] have ye brought [do ye bring] him to me? Have I need of mad men, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into¹⁵ my house?

¹¹ [Ver. 9. Sept. adds "and he gave it to him" a natural completion of the transaction, but the omission of a self-understood act like that is also natural.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 10. Literally: "from the face of."—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 13. On these words see Erdmann. For the first Wellh. proposes to read הִתְחַלְחַל.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 15. Literally: "unto."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 2-10 [Eng. A. V. 1-9]. David flees to Nob to the high-priest Ahimelech.

Ver. 2 (1). According to 1 Sam. xxii. 11, 19, 32; 2 Sam. xxi. 16; Isa. x. 32; Neh. xi. 32, the name of this refuge of David is Nob. (The Heb. form here and xxii. 9 is with נ local (with short vowel) after a vrb of coming, Ges. § 90, 2.) According to xxii. 19 Nob was at this time a priestly city. Here at this time was the tabernacle, which, as we under David and Solomon find it in Gibeon, was probably carried thither in consequence of the destruction of Nob by Saul (ch. xxii.). The position of Nob is no longer determinable—only from Isa. x. 28-33 we know that it was near Jerusalem on the road northward between Anathoth (Anata) and Jerusalem in the tribe of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 32). According to Jerome (on Isa. l. c.), in whose time nothing remained of the place, Jerusalem was visible from it. Whether it stood on the site of the present village El Isawieh, between Anata and Jerusalem, about two and a half miles from the latter, and as far south-east of Gibeah of Saul (Tuleil el Ful), which Tobler (Topog. von Jerus. II. 719 sq.) describes, as Kiepert (Map to Rob.'s Researches) and Raumer (Paläst. p. 215, 4 ed.) [and Grove] suppose, cannot be decided; the objection is that Jerusalem is not visible from this place.*—See Herz. R.-E. and Winer s. v.—Thither David betook himself, as the nearest place of refuge from Gibeah, where he might for the present find shelter and concealment with the priests. From xxii. 10-14 [15] it appears, though it is not mentioned here, that he wished in this holy place to inquire God's will concerning his further way. He wished besides to provide himself with arms and food for his continued flight. His stay there was therefore intended to be temporary, as his whole conduct shows. We may assume that he stood in intimate relations with the priests there, and especially with their head, from whom therefore he expected not only the announcement of the divine will, but also consolatory and strengthening words.—Ahimelech is the same person with Ahiah (xiv. 3), son of Ahitub (xxii. 9, 20), the elder brother of Ichabod, son of Phinehas, son of Eli, therefore great-grandson of Eli. His son was the high-priest Abiathar (xxx. 7), with whom he is confounded in Mark ii. 26.* The designation "priest" here =high-priest, as in xiv. 3.—He is frightened at David's appearing alone, without retinue or arms; therefore he went to meet him fearfully, supposing such an appearance to be a sign of impending misfortune. We must presume that he knew of Saul's hatred to David, but not of the most recent occurrences. David must have feared that if he told the high-priest of these, the latter, for fear of bringing Saul's wrath on himself, would refuse him refuge. Therefore he has recourse here again to a lie; he pretends that the king has given him a secret commission, of which no one is to know, and represents to the high-priest that he has appointed his men some place at which to meet him. Maurer: "I ordered my servants to go to a certain place." לְמָקוֹם is Po. of לָקַח, "to know"="appoint." "At such and such a place," comp. Ruth iv. 1. Clericus remarks that he really took some faithful followers with him, at least to the Philistine border, and during his stay in Nob assigned them to some place, where he would meet them, and Keil supposes that he left his few attendants (ver. 3 [2]) near by, in order to speak privately with the high-priest; but against this is the fact that in his flight, after his interview without witness with Jonathan (ch. xx.), there is no mention of any attendant, nor afterwards in his flight to Gath. He seeks to quiet Ahimelech's apprehension by the double statement that his commission is secret, and that he has appointed his people a place to stay. Clericus' remark: "all these things are inventions," is to be accepted of everything, not merely of his commission from the king.—[But in Mark ii. 25, 26, it is asserted that there were men with David, and it is in itself natural and probable that a man of his high official position and popularity should find some willing to share his flight. —Tr.]—Ver. 4 (3). Now, what thou hast in hand, the five loaves, give me, a request in keeping with David's hurry and eagerness. (שֵׁנִי-כֶה is not a question, which would require something like אֲכַל (Then.) to follow.) He asks for five loaves with apparent reference to his retinue, but really for his own needs, since his way would lead him into the wilderness, and he must avoid meeting men.—Vers. 5 (4). No common bread—but holy bread have I here, answers Ahimelech. The five loaves which Ahimelech then had were a part of the twelve loaves which were laid up in the tabernacle, as the offering of the Twelve Tribes to the Lord, before his face, and thence called "Bread of presence, show-bread" (Ex. xxv. 30; xxxv. 13; xxxix. 36; xl. 23). They had just been taken away (ver. 7 [6]) to be replaced by fresh ones (Lev. xxiv. 8). The legal precept was that this bread, as something most holy, could be eaten only by the priests in the holy place (Lev. xxiv. 9). Ahimelech's answer to David therefore means that if he is here to make an exception to this rule, he must at least insist on ceremonial purity as a condition.—If the men have only kept themselves from women. See Lev. xv. 18. Thereby the principle of the legal prescription of levitical purity was satisfied, inasmuch as the circumstances—namely, the lack of ordinary bread, the haste which the alleged important commission of the king required, the duty of aiding in its execution as much as possible, and the pious behaviour of David in inquiring the Lord's will at the holy place—seemed to justify a deviation from the rule concerning the eating of the show-bread. But it is inferring too much from this isolated case when Clericus remarks: "It is clear from Ahimelech's demand as to women that the eating of the consecrated bread was not absolutely forbidden to the laity in case of urgent necessity." See Matt. xii. 3, where the Lord uses this example to justify divergence from the letter of the Law when its outward observance would violate the inner spirit of the Law and hinder the fulfilment of sacred duties to one's self and one's neighbor.—Ver. 6 (5). In David's answer the introductory "but" (בְּכֵן) relates to the negative in Ahimelech's last words: "they are not unclean, but," we may therefore render "rather" [Eng. A. V. "of a truth."] David affirms the purity of his men and of himself in this regard: "Women have been kept from us." The following words from "since I came out" to "in the vessel" present many difficulties. The "came out" may be connected with the preceding or the following context. In favor of the former it may be said that it naturally connects itself with the phrase "yesterday and the day before" [= about these three days] as an exacter statement of time; David says: "this abstinence has existed from the day of my departure till now." In fact this connection is necessary in order to establish the assertion that the men had refrained from women since "yesterday and the day before," for from the day of departure it could not be otherwise. S. Schmid: "in the words 'yesterday and the day before' David seems to refer to his three days' hiding in the field or in Bethlehem." Further we have to consider the meaning of the words "vessel" (כֵּל) and "way" (דֶּרֶךְ). As to the former, the reference here to purity of body does not justify us in understanding it figuratively of the body, as σκεῖος in 2 Cor. iv. 7; 1 Thess. iv. 4 (Ewald), for the word never has this sense in Hebrew literature. Bunsen: "that is certainly not Hebrew usage." Keil, expressly departing from the usual meaning "vessels," takes the word (from Deut. xxii. 5) in the sense of "clothing," and with reference to Lev. xv. 18 (on the defilement of "garments" by seminal discharge) makes David say: "The garments of my men were clean." But the word cannot mean "garment" in Deut. xxii. 5 (where it is in the Sing.); it never means garment as such, as we should here have to take it in the supposed reference to defilement by seminal flow. But what would be the bearing of such a remark after David had already affirmed that, in consequence of their removal from women, no such defilement could be found in them?—We must do what we can with the usual meaning of the word "implement, vessel." The "vessels of the men" = apart from their arms, everything that pertained to personal preparation for the journey; see Jer. xli. 19, כֵּל נִלְוָה, "exile-gear," [Eng. A. V. "furnish thyself to go into captivity."] So S. Schmid: "the reference is to packs and sacks for food for the journey." Such leathern and other articles might as well as persons become unclean, according to the Law, Lev. xi. 32 sq.; xiii. 47 sq. Comp. Sommer, bibl. Abhandlung, "Rein und Unrein" [Clean and Unclean], p. 204, 211, 223. The gear or baggage of the men, as well as their persons, might be unclean. But the holy bread, which even exceptionally could be eaten only by levitically clean persons, could not be carried in vessels which were legally unclean. David therefore says that the vessels of his men were holy at starting, in order to assure Ahimelech that there was not the slightest legal objection to their taking the bread, nothing unclean either in their persons or in their baggage. So the Vulg.: "and the vessels (vasa) of the young men were holy." S. Schmid: "David means to say: since we have just left home, whence people usually take clean things, you may readily suppose that no impurity has been contracted; it would be different if we were returning home from a journey, where on the way, especially in war, uncleanness might be contracted by the blood of enemies, or otherwise."—The rendering of the Sept. "all the young men" (לְכָל הַנְּעָרִים), adopted by Thenius as a necessary emendation, is suspicious from its easiness, and must be rejected, since we can derive a good sense from the text.—We have next to examine the meaning of the word "way."* In the first place, no explanation is allowable which does not maintain the reference to the subject in hand, namely, the showbread. We reject therefore those explanations in which this word is made to mean the way in which David was going, and the last word (לְכָל) = "gear." Vulg.: "and this way is unclean, but itself also will be sanctified to-day in the vessels." So the Sept.—Maurer: "I am sure that it (the way) is sanctified to-day," etc. De Wette: "and if the way is unholy, it is to-day sanctified by the vessels." Dathe and Schulz: "though the journey is undertaken on profane business." O. v. Gerlach and Keil: "though it is an unholy way that we go, namely, in performing the king's commission." From the connection one does not at all see how the way, or the undertaking is unholy, profane. To supply: "the way has no religious object" (O. v. Gerl.), "ordinary business, not ecclesiastical" (Ew.), is to insert a new idea into the words. Nor does the connection warrant O. v. Gerl. and Keil (taking לְכָל as Sing. in the sense of "instrument, organ") in making David say: "The way was holy before God, since it was through necessity trodden by him, God's chosen servant, the upholder of God's true kingdom in Israel, the way was sanctified through him as instrument, as ambassador of the Lord's Anointed." Thenius rightly says that the words must contain a remark by which the priest is to be induced to give the bread, and that it is important to keep in mind the Sing. "vessel," which has not always been regarded. Clericus is quite correct in saying: "way is everywhere used for the manner of doing a thing." But he is wrong in taking "way" = "somehow" (aliquo modo), supplying "bread" [as Eng. A. V.], and, with the remark that otherwise there is no sense in the passage, explaining: "This holy bread, removed from the presence of the Lord, had become in some sort (aliquo modo) profane, because other (bread) was to be substituted for it that day, and this was now sanctified in the vessels in which it was to be placed, that it might be carried into the holy place, and set on the table;" this is an arbitrary and violent treatment of the words, and moreover, gives no clear sense—apart from the fact that it is not true that the bread, when taken from the table, thereby becomes profane, since, even when so removed, it remains the consecrated bread, for the eating of which levitical purity is a necessary condition. So the translation of S. Schmid "but itself (the bread) is of the nature of profane (bread), yet it will be holly carried in the vessel," is neither in accordance with the words nor at all intelligible. The word "way" = conduct, mode of procedure, here refers to the procedure demanded by David, by which the high-priest was, contrary to the legal prescription, to give the showbread to persons who were not priests; "though it is an unholy procedure, yet to-day it becomes holy through the instrument." The Heb. word (לְכָל "instrument, organ") is so used of men also, Gen. xlv. 5; Isa. xlii. 5; xxxii. 7; Jer. l. 25; comp. σκεῦος, Acts ix. 15. The instrument is here the sacred person of the priest, Ahimelech himself, as bearer of the high-priestly dignity. So also Thenius. The "to-day" points with emphasis to the special circumstances of that day, which induced Ahimelech to grant David's request. The "yea, verily" (וַיֵּן, so xiv. 30) is in keeping with the excitement with which David speaks, in order to persuade the high-priest.—Ver. 7 (6). The priest yields to David's representation, and gives him the "holy." Lack of other bread is expressly said to be the reason of his compliance, he departed from the legal prescription through sheer necessity only. It seems to be mentioned as an alleviating fact, that the bread had already been taken away from before the Lord, having remained on the table in the holy place seven days according to the Law (Lev. xxiv. 6-9); "to-day" was the "day of removal" that is, when it was exchanged for fresh bread. It is probable that in the "to-day" of ver. 6 (5) there is a reference to this "day of removal."

* [So Hackett in Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. "Nob." Porter (Hand-book II. 37, ed. of 1868) identifies Nob with a conical tell opposite Shafat, where are remains of a small, but apparently ancient town, with cisterns and a tower, whence Mount Zion is visible.—Ta.]

* [On possible explanations of this, see Comms. of Lange and Alexander in loco, and Hackett in Note to Art. "Abiathar" in Smith's Bib. Dict., and on the general chronological difficulties see Comms. on 2 Sam. viii. 17 and 1 Chron. xviii. 16; xxiv. 3, 6, 31.—Ta.]

Ver. 8 (7). Mention of a servant of Saul, Doeg the Edomite, which brings the narrative into pragmatic connection with xxii. 9 sq., and at the same time exhibits the divine providence, by which David's lie, intended to conceal his real position and flight from Saul, proved useless, rather led to the destruction of Nob and its inhabitants. A man of the servants of Saul.—These words stand significantly first, in order to show that, in spite of David's trouble to conceal his way from Saul, the latter received information of his visit to this very place. "Detained, shut in (וַיִּשְׁבֶּה), before the Lord," not continens se, "lingering, remaining" (S. Schmid); that is, detained for some religious or ceremonial purpose, housed at the holy place, whether as a proselyte received by circumcision, or in fulfilment of a vow, or received for a purification-offering, or on account of a temporary Nazarite-vow, or for suspected leprosy (Lev. xiii. 4); in any case, as one "who was committed to the custody of the priests ministering in the tabernacle" (Cler.). Vulg.: "Within the tabernacle." His name was Doeg, the Edomite, "he had probably come over to Saul in his war with Edom." (Ew.).*—His official position was "Ruler over the herdsmen of Saul." Vulgate: "Most powerful of Saul's herdsmen," and so all ancient versions except Sept., which has wrongly νεμυν τὰς ἡνὸβους "tending the mules of Saul." (וְהָיָה אֶת-פָּרְנִי שֶׁ). On account of the importance which still attached in Saul's time to the possession of herds as a family-power, Doeg's position as Overseer of Herds and Herdsmen must have been a prominent one.—Ver. 9 (8). Besides food, David needed arms. That in such pressing danger he fled without arms is to be explained on the ground that he "feared that he would be recognized, or, as an armed man concealing himself, be suspected" (Cler.)—or that he fled in great haste. This last is the reason he gives to Achimelech, carrying out his pretence about the royal commission: "I did not bring my sword and weapons, because the king's business was hasty," literally "pressed" (פָּרַץ), stronger than "pressing." Vulg.: "the king's word was urgent;" Sept.: "in haste" (κατὰ σπουδήν).—"Hast thou not here spear or sword?" a question which, like the demand for bread above, clearly reveals in part David's haste, in part his anxiety to conceal by a light tone the pressing danger of his situation.—Ver. 10 (9). The priest answers by referring to the sword of Goliath, with which David had slain him in the Terebinth-valley (xvii. 2). To preserve it from dust, moisture and rust it was carefully wrapped in a garment or cloth, and kept in the holy place behind the priestly ephod (not hung on a nail (Ew.), but in a safe and visible place). How it came hither, David having carried Goliath's armor to his tent, that is, taken possession of it (xvii. 54), is nowhere said. There is no contradiction of the earlier statement; the apparent difference is removed "by the perfectly natural supposition that David carried home Goliath's armor except his sword, or that this sword was afterwards deposited for safe keeping in the national sanctuary" (Then.) See on xvii. 54. (פָּרַץ for פָּרַץ, here only.)—David here declared the particular value of this sword for him, thinking, undoubtedly, of its importance for his whole life in connection with that deed of heroism. He thus received not merely a weapon, but, by the divine arrangement, "a holy weapon, promising victory" (O. v. Gerl.).

* [Rendered incorrectly in Eng. A. V. (and by others) "in a manner."—Tr.]

* [On rabbinical opinions about Doeg see Philppson in "Die Israel. Bibel" in loco.—Tr.]

Vers. 11-16 [10-15]. Provided with arms and bread David flees to Gath to the Philistine king Achish.—Ver. 11 (10). The that day shows that David stayed in Nob only long enough to consult the oracle and procure arms and food; the same day that he arrived he continued his flight. We do not know whether he had already determined to go to Philistia, or now first suddenly resolved on it, possibly in consequence of Doeg's unexpected appearance. The words he fled before Saul do not mean that this flight began with his departure from Nob (Keil), for in the narrative of his parting from Jonathan (and indeed before that) we see him in flight. The expression "from before Saul" indicates the significance of his further flight in respect to Saul as his king and lord, in that he now entirely abandons actual subjection to him, appearing as a deserter to king Achish and into a foreign country. This expression does not require us to regard this section (vers. 11-16 [10-15]) as coming from another source and here arbitrarily interpolated (Theinuis). Even supposing (as is possible) that the section is from another source than the preceding, in which not the account of Saul's schemes and David's flight from the beginning is given, but only this flight to Philistia, it does not appear that the words "David fled that day from Saul" are an arbitrary interpolation. However, this opinion rests on the view that the flight here is the same as that in chap. xxvii., only in the form of a popular story, and here inappositely inserted, while the correct recension is given in ch. xxvii., where it is suitably put in David's time of extremest need towards the end of his fugitive wandering (Then.). But the difference of the circumstances is an objection to identifying this flight with that in chap. xxvii.—especially that here David goes to the Philistines alone and tries for some time to gain a safe residence by feigning madness, while there [ch. xxvii.] he goes with his family and a numerous retinue, and gains the favor of the Philistine king by numerous military undertakings and expeditions. Nor can it be admitted that the narrative in vers. 11-16 [10-15] is historically improbable, and therefore has no historical value. It is said that David would not in the beginning of his flight have taken the step of going over to the Philistines, which was possible only in extremest necessity; but, we answer, the expression "extremest necessity" is a very indefinite one, and further, as appears from the connection, David's inner excitement, consequent on Saul's enduring murderous hate and present intense rage, from which he could never feel safe in his own land, made his need and danger seem to him so great and pressing, that a flight over the border cannot appear in the least historically untrustworthy. He thought that appearing as a deserter he would be safest with Saul's enemy. That is psychologically easily intelligible. But, as he could not even thus mollify the hatred and suspicion of the Philistines, he was obliged to play the madman; nor does this bring him security, his stay is a very short one,—this is all truly historical, these are traits of real life, which oppose the supposition that we here have an improbable unhistorical narration. As to the objection from Goliath's sword, that, as well-known to the Philistines, it would certainly have betrayed David, Nägelsbach justly remarks (Herz. XIII. 403), that it is said in xxi. 9 only that David took it from Nob, not that he carried it to Gath.* He needed a weapon immediately for the long and possibly dangerous road to the Philistine border; on the way he might provide himself with other arms, so that, if he needed weapons on the other side, he might not betray himself by the sword of Goliath.—In the title to Pa. xxxiv. the Philistine king is called Achimelech, which along with Achish was the standing official name of the Philistine princes of Gath (comp. Gen. xvi. 1).—Ver. 12 [11]. The courtiers soon recognize the fugitive, though some time had elapsed since his victorious combat with Goliath. Let the situation be considered: David must have been an object of astonishment, and his appearance as fugitive and deserter an object of wonder to the Philistines, who knew what he had done for his country by that heroic exploit. Hence first, such talk, as is here narrated, about him (אֵלָיו [Eng. A. V. "unto him"]), which phrase from the connection (their thoughts and talk naturally turning on David) refers to David, not to Achish.†—Is this not David, the king of the land?—This question exhibits the great impression which David's exploit had made on the Philistines in their ideas concerning his position in his nation and country. They call him king of the land

* [To which it may be added that, even if he carried the sword to Gath, he might have kept it concealed during his stay there.—Th.]

† [So Maurer: De eo, but other Comms. and ancient vas., as Eng. A. V.—Th.]

"because David had appeared as such in taking up Goliath's challenge, and had thrown Saul entirely into the shade" (Then.).* This impression was favored by their recollection of the song of triumph, in which David was honored above Saul, and which was still well known to them. Sang they not of him in dances?—See xviii. 7. With this astounding recollection is connected the apprehension that this dangerous enemy of the Philistine people comes with evil intent. The supposition that with these words of ver. 12 (11) the courtiers introduced David into Achish's presence (Thenius) is nowhere supported, is improbable from the form of the words, which rather indicate the immediate impression made on them by David's appearance, and is untenable from David's consequent behaviour, (ver. 13 (12)). Then, for the first time, David lays them to heart and reflects on them, and then fear of Achish comes over him. He sees that he is recognized, and fears that if the courtiers remind the king of the past, they will take vengeance on him and kill him. Therefore, when brought to the king as a dangerous enemy, he suddenly resorts to the device of acting as a madman. This would have been an absurd procedure, if he had already been presented to Achish by the courtiers, and so was already acquainted with them. Rather it must be supposed that, at the moment when David heard those words, the above reflection occurred to him, and he straightway determined on and carried out this simulation, before the servants of Achish could suspect that he was only pretending. He changed his sense [ver. 14 (13)], he perverted his understanding (Luther wrongly, after Sept. and Vulg., "his features"),† feigned madness; the same words are found in the title of Ps. xxxiv. (The apparently superfluous suffix in מְשֻׁמֵּם is either to be taken as reflective, and the following word explicative or objective, "he changed himself, his spiritual being, in respect to his understanding" (Then.), or with Keil we must explain it "from the circumstantial character of common popular speech, as in 2 Sam. xiv. 6, and in the not quite analogous cases Ex. ii. 6; Prov. v. 22; Ezek. x. 3, (comp. Ges. Gr., § 121, 6 Rem. 3").—The following words show that David played the part of an insane person. The view of some older expositors (and recently Schlier) that by God's permission, under the excitement produced by fear and anguish of soul, David really fell into temporary insanity, is in direct contradiction to the words of the narrative. He moved hither and thither like a madman [Heb., "played the madman."—Tr.]. Thenius refers to Jer. xxv. 16; li. 7; Neh. ii. 5, under their hands, they seeking to hold the madman. He smote (drummed on) the gate-doors, so we must read with Sept. and Vulg. instead of "scribbled" (רָחַץ from רָחַץ instead of רָחַץ from רָחַץ), the latter not being the gesture of a madman, and not agreeing with the last word:‡ And he let his spittle fall on his beard. This is to be understood of the foam which comes from the mouth of madmen.—Vera. 15, 16 [14, 15]. By his pretended madness David was safe from the servants of Achish, since in ancient times the persons of madmen were looked on as inviolable, in a certain sense as sacred. Danger from Achish he likewise avoided by so cleverly counterfeiting insanity when brought before the king, that the latter declared he should not come to his court, he had already mad folks enough.* Behold, ye see.—This expression shows the impression that David's gestures made on the king, so that he did not doubt that he had a madman before him. A man who acts insanely, that is, not "who so represents himself," but who objectively exhibits himself as a madman. For the question of reproach: Why do ye bring him to me? the reason is first given in the question, ver. 16 [15]: Have I need, etc. . . to play the madman against me?—The Prep. (וְעַתָּה) = not in my presence (De Wette), but against me. Achish fears personal harm from him. With the third question: Shall this fellow come into my house? he thrusts him away. David's plan, to remain unknown and concealed among the Philistines, did not succeed; but he succeeded in so simulating madness as to escape the dangerous situation into which he had gotten so soon as he was recognized as the victorious enemy of the Philistines. [From this narrative it appears that David and the Philistines understood one another's language, as on other grounds it is probable that the Hebrew and Philistine dialects were nearly identical.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The more the history of David's providential guidance in this troublous time unfolds itself, the more gloriously does his God-devoted, humbly-obedient spirit shine forth out of this gloomiest period of his life. But the prophetic-historical narrative is so little concerned to make prominent this light in David's life, that it contents itself with a simple presentation of facts, and with equal freedom from tendentiousness† and prepossession, brings out sharp and unsoftened the dark spots in David's moral conduct. On the one hand David shows, in this time of hard trial and waiting, passive resignation to God's will and complete abnegation of his own will, and though he is sure of his calling to be king of Israel, he takes no steps at all to realize his calling by his own efforts against Saul. But, on the other hand, we see him falling into great fear in Nob and Gath (as formerly in his interview with Jonathan), his strong faith tottering, himself resorting to lies and pretence, and putting self-help, unbecoming an obedient servant of God, in the place of the Lord's help. In his deviation from truth for a good end he follows the principle often expressed by the Greek poets, e. g., Eurip.: "δρῶ δ' ὀλεσθρον

* [It is noticeable that Goliath's name is not mentioned by the Philistines, perhaps from natural indisposition to recall a grievous calamity, and out of regard for Goliath's family and friends.—Tr.]

† [Luther has geberde = mien, gestures, the Sept. has ephoros and the Vulg. os.—Tr.]

‡ [On this reading see "Text. and Gram." David might have learned the signs of madness from his association with Saul.—Tr.]

* [According to Jewish tradition or fancy the wife and daughter of Achish were insane (Philippson).—Tr.]

† [We have no word in English to express the German tendenz-schrift, "a writing which has a special aim or object" (in politics or religion), and the adjective tendenzios, tendentious, "having a tendency or aim, written in the interest of some idea." Here it would set forth that the Book of Samuel was written for the purpose of glorifying David.—Tr.]

δεινὸν ἢ ἀλῆθει' ἀγχι συγγνωστὸν εἰπεῖν ἐστὶ καὶ τὸ μὴ καλόν ["when truth brings ruin it is pardonable to speak untruth."] Hamann: "The Holy Spirit is become the chronicler of men's foolish, yea, sinful actions. He has narrated the lies of an Abraham, the incest of Lot, the simulation of a man after God's heart. O God, Thy wisdom, by counsel which no reason can sufficiently wonder at and honor, has made the foolishness of men our instructor unto Christ, our glory in Christ."—Grotius: "Something must be forgiven those times, when eternal life was scarcely known."

2. Though the national sanctuary could not be re-established in Nob for the whole people, yet the high-priest and the other priests resided there, the will of God was inquired by Urim and Thummim, the legal prescriptions relating to worship were carried out as far as possible; and though the ark was wanting in the tabernacle, the latter was still regarded as the visible symbol of God's gracious presence. And so, though there were several centres of worship (see on ch. vii. 5), Nob was the most prominent of them, and with its incomplete arrangements was a substitute for the sanctuary for whose legal completeness for the whole people the presence of the ark was necessary. This more general significance for the whole people Nob had not merely by the presence of the ark, but also by the sacred vessels and arrangements connected with it. Among these were the twelve loaves of showbread according to the number of the twelve tribes on the sacred table appointed for them; for these were a covenant-sign to set forth Israel's permanent consecration in obedience and in producing the fruit of good works, which were offered to the Lord as His well-pleasing food.

3. The precepts of the Old Testament law were the outer shell of eternally valid demands of God's holy will on the will of His people. That the bread, consecrated by its holy meaning and use, could be eaten only by clean males of the priestly order in the holy place, was only the clothing of the [real] requirement, which read: only when you keep yourselves pure from the stain of sin and disobedience, and sanctify yourselves to me in heart, life, and walk, are ye in My sight a truly priestly people, and have part in the enjoyment of the gifts and goods of My house, and are members of My kingdom. The outer form and shell, the letter of the legal precept might be broken, if only the content, the essence was maintained; yea, this outer form, inadequate to the eternal ethical spiritual content of the Law, must be broken through, when its external preservation involved the violation or destruction of the essence and inner kernel. The duty of self-preservation justified David in eating the showbread, to which, according to the letter of the law, he was not entitled; neighborly love required Ahimelech to deviate from the outer prescription in order to help the needy fugitive.* Both acted in the higher sense as priests. On this Christ grounded the application of this instance to Himself and His disciples, who broke the sabbath-law by plucking corn (Matt. xii. 3; Mark ii. 26; Luke vi. 3).

* [But the priest did not know that David was a fugitive; he helped him as an official of the king in momentary need. Whether David, as an official person, could not have gotten food elsewhere, does not appear.—T.A.]

"The Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath-day,"—in Him, and by communion with Him, in the power of His Spirit, is the true fulfilment of the eternal will of God hidden in Old Testament precepts, so that redeemed and sanctified man stands no longer under the disciplinary form of the law, but stands above and controls the form of the requirement. Even the Old Testament ritual law itself pointed involuntarily beyond itself to the fulfilment of its hidden truths and ideas by regulations and injunctions which of necessity violated the legal ordination [Matt. xii. 5]. The rabbis themselves well say: "In the sanctuary is no sabbath; sacrifice abolishes the sabbath."

4. The history of David's flight to the Philistines, and his escape thence by simulating madness, is, in the first place, the basis of Ps. xxxiv., which bears the title: "By David, when he changed his understanding before Abimelech, and he drove him away and he departed." This title agrees precisely with the principal points of the narrative in 1 Sam. xxi. 11–16, and is, as it were, a brief compendium of it. The Abimelech of the title is identical with the Achish of the history, for the former name was the nomen dignitatis of all the Philistine kings, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians and Agag among the Amalekites. So Basilus in Euthym. Zigab. in the Introduction to this Ps. Comp. Hengst. Beiträge [Contributions] III., 306 sq., and Introduction to this Ps. That the private name should appear in the history, and the official name in the title of the Ps., is perfectly natural.—The Psalm, however, contains no express reference to the history, but is rather didactic and reflective; it contains: vers. 2–4 (1–3) a vow to praise God continually, and an exhortation to the pious to unite in this praise, vers. 5–11 (4–10), the reason for this vow and exhortation, namely, personal deliverance from great fear and danger, then vers. 12–23 (11–22), the teaching that only through the fear of God is one saved in time of need. This didactic poem, with its reflective, gnomic character and its alphabetic arrangement, cannot have been produced contemporaneously with the events of the history; but we cannot on this account, and from the absence of direct references to the history, reject the Davidic authorship, if we keep in view its genuine Davidic features and the concurrence of some of its thoughts and expressions with undoubtedly Davidic Psalms (see Moll on the Psalter [in Lange's Biblework]). The content is a reflection of that experience of David of divine help (set forth in this history), which sunk so deep into his soul, and an application of it to the instruction, consolation, and edification of the pious. The difference in the Philistine king's name shows indeed that the writer of the title did not have our history before him, and must have had other authority for referring the Ps. to this occurrence; this authority we may with Delitzsch and Moll hold to be the written tradition in the Annals of David, this Psalm, like others (as 2 Sam. xxii. 1 compared with Ps. xviii. shows) being found in the historical account, which is given in the title in the words of that authority.*—To the same dangerous situation of David refers Psalm lvi., the words of the title "when the Philistines took him in Gath" being confirmed by the expression in our history "in their hands" ver. 14 (13). Compare also ver. 9 (8) of the Psalm: "Thou countest my flight," or "hast counted my fugitive life" (Moll). From the recollection of these dangers David colors the portraiture of his dangers from his enemies, but at the same time exhibits throughout the Psalm confidence in God's help and faith in God's support, closing with a vow of thanksgiving for the divine aid, which he with assurance expects, through which he will walk before God in the light of life.—"When David sang these two songs, God's grace had already dried his tears. Their fundamental tone is thanksgiving for favor and deliverance. But he who has an eye therefor will observe that they are still wet with tears, and cannot fail to see in the singer's outpourings of heart the sorrowfullest recollections of former sins and errors" (F. W. Krummacher).

* [As, however, the name Abimelech may be otherwise accounted for (see Smith's Bib.-Dict., s. v. Abimelech), and the opinion of Basil is of doubtful authority,

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. SCHLIER: When David finds no more help in the world, he goes to the Lord and His sanctuary. There he hopes certainly to find counsel and consolation. The Lord's word has counsel and consolation for all the necessities and perplexities of our life—and he who heartily seeks and longs for the Lord's word finds what he wants.—Ver. 2. [From HALL]: God lets us see some blemishes in His holiest servants, that we may neither be too highly conceited of flesh and blood, nor too much dejected when we have been mis-carried into sin.—SCHLIER: How good it would be if we should never indeed imitate David's "lie of necessity," but should always lay to heart the fact that in his need he betook himself to the sanctuary in Nob.—J. DISSELHOFF: It is one thing to show faith when a single wave of trouble rolls in upon us, and another to continue in faith when wave after wave bursts upon us, and the terrified eye sees spreading out before it an endless sea. This latter temptation David did not yet encounter.—Two lies in one breath!—[HENRY: Here David did not behave like himself; he told Ahimelech a gross untruth. What shall we say to this? The Scripture does not conceal it, and we dare not justify it: it was ill done and proved of bad consequence (xxii. 22). It was needless for him thus to dissemble with the priest—for we may suppose that if he had told him the truth, he would have sheltered and relieved him as readily as Samuel did.—Tr.]—Ver. 4 sq. SCHLIER: What right and custom required under the Old Covenant is all well, but love goes beyond this; love is the royal law, to which all other ordinances must yield, and any fulfilling of the law which forgets love commits a wrong.—Love is the royal law—all God's commandments call for nothing else than love. That which is love is worth something; but the apparently best and noblest things have no value if love is not manifested in them.—CRAMER: The love of our neighbor surpasses ceremonies (Mark ii. 27; Matt. xii. 5). [Ver. 6. Our Lord simply justifies this giving and eating the show-bread in a case of necessity as His hearers would do. If He had stopped to explain about David's falsehood, it would have interrupted His argument and thus diminished its force; and no one had a right to imagine that He approved the falsehood. We cannot be always pausing to guard against the possibility of mistake or misrepresentation, or we shall never say any thing with vigor and effect.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. SCHLIER: It is not wrong if in time of need we seek weapons too, if we do not neglect human means and precautions; that too we may and ought to keep in view. But we should never place our confidence therein. Our confidence should be in the Lord alone.—Ver. 9. CRAMER: God has wonderful and manifold means of consoling a troubled man and strengthening him in the faith.—Ver. 10. S. SCHMID: If one must flee, let him so flee as to have recourse to God rather than to men.—WUERTEMBERG BIBLE: Through God's government our enemies are often compelled to do us more good than our friends. Prov. xvi. 7; Matt. ii. 13.—[Vers. 10, 11. TAYLOR: Nothing more salutary could have happened to David than such a reception as that which was given to him at Gath. When a youth is going on a wrong course, the best thing that can befall him is failure and disgrace, and the worst thing that can come to him is what the world calls success. If he succeed, the probability is that he will go farther astray than ever; but if he fail, there is hope that he will return to the right path, and seek alliance with Jehovah.—Tr.]—Vers. 14, 15. STARKE: God always holds His hand over His people to protect them, and rescues them from the power of the ungodly. Ps. xxxiv. 5, 7.

J. DISSELHOFF to chapters xxi., xxii., xxvii. Lies in the mouth of the Anointed one. 1) Whence are lies in such a mouth? (From shaken faith in the living God and the unrest of unbelief, from seeking refuge in one's own wisdom and in the suggestions of his own heart.) 2) What delivers from such lies? (God's great mercy and His holy chastisement in the consequences of lies as being the chastenings of His righteousness, and a return to genuine repentance and to living faith.)—F. W. KRUMMACHER: David's mad wanderings. 1) His behaviour at Nob, 2) His flight to Gath and experiences there.

The opposite ways in which one may seek refuge in want and opposition: 1) The way of humble, believing obedience, in which one takes refuge in the living God, searches to know His will, and unreservedly commits himself to His guidance. 2) The way of little faith and unbelief, in which one takes refuge in flesh and blood, and in which self-will and self-wisdom are to lead to a self-determined aim.

[Chap. XXI. Mingling of good and evil in David's behaviour. 1) Though a brave and devout man, he falls into grievous falsehood and degrading deception, through cowardly fear and lack of trust in God.—A warning to us. Comp. Neh. xiii. 26; 1 Cor. x. 12. 2) Though so weak and erring, he remembers God's help in the past (ver. 9), cries to Him now (Ps. xxxiv. 6), rejoices in Him anew (ib. ver. 1), and resolves henceforth to speak truth and do good (ib. vers. 13, 14; comp. Ps. lvi. 13).—An encouragement to us. Comp. 1 John ii. 1.—Tr.]

and the content of this Ps. agrees as much with the Hohenlied-period as with David, it is to say the least, very doubtful whether David is its author.—Tr.]

IV. David's fugitive life in Judah and Moab. Saul's murder of the priests at Nob.

CHAPTER XXII. 1-28.

- 1 DAVID therefore [And David] departed thence, and escaped to the cave¹ Adul-lam; and when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down
2 thither to him. And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented [embittered in soul] gathered themselves unto him, and he became a [om. a] captain over them; and there were with him
3 about four hundred men. And² David went thence to Mizpeh³ of Moab, and he [om. he] said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee,
4 come forth⁴ and be with you, till I know what God will do for [to] me. And he brought⁵ them before the king of Moab, and they dwelt with him all the while that
5 David was in the hold. And the prophet Gad said unto David, Abide not in the hold, depart and get thee into the land of Judah. Then [And] David departed and came into the forest⁶ of Hareth [Hereth].
6 When [And] Saul heard that David was discovered, and the men that were with him; [om. parenthesis] now [and] Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah [the tamarisk-tree⁷ on the height], having [and] his spear [ins. was] in his
7 hand, and all his servants were standing about him. Then [And] Saul said unto his servants that stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjaminites, will the son of Jesse give every one [all] of you fields and vineyards, and⁸ make you all captains of 8 thousands and captains of hundreds, That all of you have conspired against me, and there is none that sheweth⁹ me that my son hath made a league¹⁰ with the son of Jesse, and there is none of you that is sorry for me, or sheweth unto me that my son hath stirred up [set up] my servant against me to lie in wait [as a waylayer],

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Wellhausen proposes to read מְצֻלָּה, "hold," on the ground of the identity of the locality with the מְצֻלָּה of ver. 4. But, in addition to the uniform support which the VSS. give to the Heb. text, the same locality might be called from one feature of it a "cave," and from another a "mountain-hold."—Tx.]

² [Ver. 3. It has been questioned whether vers. 3, 4, belonged to the original narrative, because they carry David to Moab, and say nothing of his return. But this omission is not against the habit of these ancient narratives. However, supposing this paragraph to be an insertion from another source by the editor, this does not affect the genuineness of the narrative as a whole. That David's parents are mentioned here, and not in ver. 1, or in xx. 23, accords with the circumstances; there is occasion here to mention them, there was none before.—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 3. Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., write this with a in the first syllable, which is perhaps an old pronunciation. Some Greek VSS. render σκωβιαν.—Tx.]

⁴ [Ver. 3. One MS. has מְצֻלָּה, "dwell" (with you), and so Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg.; this is probably the correct reading, the מְצֻלָּה, "go out," not suiting the following preposition "with," and a construct. pregn. being improbable here.—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 4. Sept. takes this from stem מְצֻלָּה, and renders: "he persuaded [or appealed to] the king," which is contrary to the meaning of this verb, and against the other VSS. Wellhausen prefers the pointing מְצֻלָּה (from מְצֻלָּה), "he settled or left them with the king," as better agreeing with the following מְצֻלָּה-מֶלֶךְ, and so read Chald., Syr., Arab., Vulg. This seems the better rendering, though after מְצֻלָּה the usage would lead us to expect either simple מְצֻלָּה, "with," or מְצֻלָּה, "before." Possibly we have here a blending of the two prepositions.—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 5. So the VSS. except Sept., which has πόλις, "city" (פֶּלֶא, instead of פֶּלֶא), and this is approved by Lieut. Conder, of the Palestine Exploration Fund on topographical grounds. As to this we must await further explorations.—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 6. On the various and apparently arbitrary treatment of this word in the VSS. see Ges., Thes. s. v. The מְצֻלָּה of 1 Sam. xxxi. 3 is מְצֻלָּה in 1 Chron. x. 12, and Gesen. suggests that the word may have come to have the general signification "tree." See Stanley's "Sinai and Pal.," App., § 79. There is no ground for doubting the correctness of the Heb. text here.—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. The ל is strange, perhaps an Aramaism after מְצֻלָּה (the Chald. and Syr. have it), perhaps by error for ל, "and."—Tx.]

⁹ [Ver. 8. Literally "that uncovereth my ear."—Tx.]

- 9 as at this day? Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which [who] was set over the servants¹¹ of Saul, and said, I saw the son of Jesse coming [come] to Nob to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. And he inquired of the Lord [Jehovah]¹² for him, and gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine.
- 11 Then [And] the king sent to call Ahimelech the priest the son of Ahitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob; and they came all of them to the king. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub. And he answered
- 13 [said], Here I am, my lord. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me to lie in wait [as a waylayer] as at this day? Then [And] Ahimelech answered the king and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David [And who among all thy servants is as David trusty], which is [om. which is, ins. and] the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding [and hath thy private ear],¹³ and is honorable in thine house? Did I then begin to inquire¹⁴ of God for him? be [Be] it far from me; let not the king impute anything unto his servant, nor¹⁵ to all the house of my father, for thy servant knew nothing of all this, less or more [little or much]. And the king said, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou and all thy father's house. And the king said unto the footmen [runners] that stood about him, Turn and slay the priests of the Lord [Jehovah]; because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when [that] he fled, and did not show it to me. But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the Lord [Jehovah]. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests, and Doeg the Edomite turned, and he fell upon the priests, and
- 19 slew on that day fourscore and five¹⁶ persons that did wear a linen ephod. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen and asses and sheep with the edge of the sword.
- 20 And one of the sons of Ahimelech the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, escaped, and fled after David. And Abiathar showed David that Saul had slain the Lord's
- 22 [Jehovah's] priests. And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it [om. it] that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there that he would surely tell Saul; I have occasioned the death¹⁷ of all the persons of thy father's house. Abide thou with me, fear not; for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life;¹⁸ but [for] with me thou shalt be [art] in safeguard.

¹¹ [Ver. 8. Omission of בְּנֵי as in xx. 16.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 9. Sept. "mules," as in xxi. 8 (7). Or: "was standing with the servants of Saul."—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 10. One Heb. MS. and Grk., Syr., Arab., have "Elohim."—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 14. On this difficult phrase see Erdmann's exposition.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 15. The Kethib has the full form $\text{לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח$, which before Maqqeph the Qeri reduces to the slenderer לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח .—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 15. Heb. simply לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח , "in," before which a ל has probably fallen out.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 18. Heb. 85, Sept. 305. Josephus 385. Thenius suggests that Sept. 300 is for 400 represented in Heb. by ל , which was mistakenly read for ל (80), to which Wellh. objects that the final ל is not 80, but 800.—The Kethib לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח has ' where Qeri לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח has ל , a not unfrequent interchange in Heb. The Syriac usage is according to the Kethib.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 22. Literally: "I am cause as to all the souls." On this use of כִּכְּבֹּד in the sense of "cause, occasion," see Ges., Thes. s. v. But Then. after Sept. $\text{ἀνέστις αἰτίος τῶν ψυχῶν}$, reads לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח , "I am guilty;" this stem לֹא־אֶשְׁכַּח occurs only once in Old Test. in Dan. i. 19 in Piel as causative; it is frequent in later Heb.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 23. On this reading see Erdmann's Expor.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-5. *David a fugitive in Judah and in Moab.—Ver. 1. His flight to the cave of Adullam in Judah. In the uncertainty as to this locality our best plan is to look to the city of the same name. Adullam, an ancient place (Gen. xxxviii. 1), according to Josh. xii. 15 a Canaan-ish royal city, was situated (Josh. xv. 35) near Jarmuth and Socho, now Shuweikeh, under the mountains of Judah (different from the Shuweikeh [Socho] in these mountains. Josh. xv. 48) in the lowland of Judah, about sixteen miles [English] south-west of Jerusalem, and twelve miles south-east of Gath. As the present Jarmuth lies on the eastern border of the Wady Sumt, that is, on the declivity of the Judah-mountain towards Philistia, and as there are many caves in the neighborhood, it is a probable conjecture that one of these caves took the name Adullam from the neighboring city. Perhaps we may regard the great cave Deir Dubban near Jarmuth (Rob., Amer. ed., II, 23, 51-53; Ritter, XVI, 136), as David's retreat (so v. d. Velde, Reise, II., p. 163 sq.). However, there are other caves near in the western declivity of the mountain. Tobler locates Adullam in the present village Bat-Dula, about fifteen miles southwest of Bethlehem. The great caves on the western declivity of the mountain are dry and roomy enough to hold a larger number of men than is here mentioned. Since it is expressly said that the place was in the lowland of Judah, the statement of Euseb. and Jerome that it was ten (twelve) miles east from Eleutheropolis, is decidedly wrong, as the cave would in that case be in the mountains (see Winer, R.-W., s. v.). The supposition (from 2 Sam. xxiii. 13, 14) that it was near Bethlehem (Thenius) is opposed by the fact that David would then have cast himself into Saul's hands unprotected. Similarly the traditional site near the village Khureitun, five miles southeast of Bethlehem, is incompatible with the geographical and historical situation of the narrative (Rob., I, 481, 482). As the combat between David and Goliath occurred in the Terebith-vale (in Wady Sumt) between Socho and Azekah, David, in there seeking a fit refuge from Saul and the Philistines, might see in this experience a pledge of the further protection and deliverance of the Lord's hand.—"Thence,"* not from Nob (Then.), but from Gath, whence the place of refuge was not far.—That David's family must already have had proofs of enmity from Saul is clear from the statement that his brethren and all his father's house went to him in his retreat at Adullam. For Saul looked on them as sharers in David's presumed conspiracy against him, and they had therefore every reason to fear for themselves a repetition of the tragedy of Nob. See the statement in Clericus from Marcell. 23, 6, as to the procedure of oriental princes, according to which "the whole family perished for the fault of one person."—Ver. 2. But along with his family a constantly increasing number of other persons gathered around David. They are described as partly those who were externally in distress, especially through debt, and therefore seeking to escape their creditors, partly those who were internally discontented, embittered in soul. He became their captain, leader, so that they were not a wild and lawless rabble, but a community controlled by and obedient to one will. The number at present was about four hundred, but afterwards rose to six hundred (xxiii. 13).—The comparison of this body with Catiline's followers (Cler., Then.) supposes that David's retinue was of similar character with Catiline's, a riotous, adventure-seeking rabble. But there is nothing in the narrative to support such a supposition, and David's position as to them and to Saul is decidedly against it. He is far from making insurrection against Saul. His past history and his after-life up to Saul's death absolutely excludes such a view. With such a position towards Saul he could not be the "head" or "captain" of a seditious band, and with such a head these people could not be rebels and seditious. Hengstenberg (on Ps. vii. 10) rightly remarks: "David's war with Saul was one not of individuals, but of parties; the wicked espoused Saul's side, the righteous David's; comp. the much-misunderstood passage, 1 Sam. xxii. 2." The "distressed" persons were those who were persecuted by Saul's government on account of their love for David. The debtors were such as, under Saul's arbitrary misrule, were oppressed by their creditors, and received from the government no protection against the violation of the law of loan and interest (Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36; Deut. xxiii. 19). They were "bitter of soul,"* not as "desirous of new things," not as merely "dissatisfied with their present condition" (Cler.), but as those "whose anxiety of soul over the ever-worsening condition of the kingdom under Saul drove them to a leader, from whom for the future they might hope for better things" (Ew.).—Comp. Jephthah's fugitive life and retinue of "poor, empty persons," Judg. xi. 3.

* [Comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 18-17; 1 Chron. xii. 8-19.—Ta.]

Ver. 3. Without further statement concerning David's life here with his family and his band, it is next related that he went "thence" (answering to the "thence" of ver. 1) to Mizpeh of Moab. David betook himself to the king of Moab, and asked him: Let my father and my mother come [out] to thee and abide with thee till I know what God will do to me. It is remarkable, in the first place, that he here mentions only "father and mother;" the reason obviously is that in his present dangerous condition he could not afford these aged, helpless persons secure protection. For in this continuation of the narrative it is clearly supposed that the caves at Adullam had become an uncertain and dangerous residence through Saul's hostile attempts against David's family. His choice of Moab as refuge for his parents was probably based on the relations of his great-grandmother, the Moabitess Ruth, to this country. Whether the "come forth" refers to Bethlehem or Adullam as point of departure is uncertain; in any case the road to Mizpeh of Moab passed through Bethlehem, because this was the shortest way; for this "Mizpeh of Moab," which is to be taken as a proper name, undoubtedly lay not in the Moabitiah territory proper south of the Arnon, but far north of it, "probably a city above the 'araboth of Moab'" (Num. xxii. 1; Deut. xxxiv. 1, 8; Josh. xiii. 32) opposite Jericho, whither by way of Bethlehem and the Dead Sea one might come in little time" (Then.), perhaps on the mount Abarim or Pisgah (Deut. xxxiv. 1). Saul had also to wage war with the Moabites (xiv. 47); at this time, therefore, the latter had possession of the southern portion of the transjordanic territory of the Israelites. From David's taking his parents to the king of Moab, it is probable that there was now no war between the latter and Saul. The pregnant construction of the verb "come forth," followed by the Prep. "with," is not to be rejected as unsuitable, but to be retained as example of the frequent connection of a verb of motion with a predicate of rest. The renderings of the Sept. "let them be with thee," and the Vulg. "let them remain," are explanations, not signs of a different original text.*—Ver. 4. Bunsen, after Jerome, renders: "left them in the presence of the king" (פניו), against which Thenius remarks that "no change in the vocalization to avoid harshness is required," and refers to Ew., § 217, 1.—In regard to the length of his parents' stay with the king of Moab, David says (ver. 3): "till I know what God will do to me," appropriately using to the king the divine name Elohim.† According to this David did not remain with his parents, but went back to his life of motion and danger. Whither? The narrator says afterwards (ver. 4) that the parents remained in Moab "all the while that David was in the mountain-fastness or hold." But this fastness "on which David intrenched himself" (Bunsen) is not a height near the cave of Adullam (Bunsen); still less is it the retreat in the cave (Stähelin, Then.), or elsewhere in the wilderness; but, as David had to carry his parents to Moab for safety, we shall be justified in supposing that he had to find temporary shelter also for himself and his band in Moab. The refuge which he here found was no other than that Mizpeh‡ of Moab; Mizpeh signifies "watch-place, mountain-height;" here David made himself a strong position, which became a mountain-fastness (הַצִּיּוֹן). For this meaning see Job xxxix. 38. Here he would await what the Lord would further do to him. The danger threatening his parents was the Lord's factual hint to him to go where it would be safer not only for them, but also for him. To these humble, trustful words corresponds the further statement that God gave him directions concerning his further way through the prophet Gad. Through this prophet he is commanded (ver. 5) to go into the land of Judah; whence it clearly appears that he was now not in that land, in which, however, Adullam lay, and therefore he could be only in the land of Moab. "The prophet Gad" is undoubtedly the same who is called "David's seer" in 1 Chron. xxi. 9, announces to him God's punishment for his sin in numbering the people, 2 Sam. xxiv. 11 sq., and according to 1 Chron. xxix. 29, wrote down David's acts. How Gad came into connection with David, is never said. Probably David's intimate relation and here pre-supposed acquaintance with him date from the former's close connection with Samuel's prophetic communities. It is not clear whether Gad had gone to him at the cave of Adullam, or now came for the first time to him in Moab. It is equally uncertain whether he remained with him permanently from now on. In short, Gad's sudden entrance on the scene in Moab suggests many unanswerable questions, which Stähelin excellently states: "How came he among such people? Was he always with David? Was he consulted by David as Samuel by Saul, 1 Sam. ix. ? Was Gad connected with Samuel, or not?" We cannot suppose that the expression "and Gad said" refers to a message which he sent to David (Then.). The answer to the question "why David was not to stay in the hold, but go to Judah," is not that "he ought not to have fled anew to a foreign nation, as before to the Philistines, to the displeasure of God" (Brenz., S. Schmid, Keil); for it does not appear that his stay in Philistia was in itself displeasing to God; and if his journey to Moab had been displeasing to God, he might have been restrained therefrom beforehand by divine direction. The reason for this prophetic direction is rather to be found in the circumstances; according to xxiii. 1 the Philistines were now making plundering incursions into the south of Judah, help and protection against them was needed, and this David with his valiant band could give. He was commanded to go into Judah and free it from its enemies, and thus fulfil part of the theocratic calling, in respect to which the distracted, arbitrary rule of Saul was now impotent. Of this new divine direction in David's life Grotius well remarks: "God shows great care for David, instructing him now by prophets, now by Urim and Thummim." Proceeding on the supposition that David goes from the king of Moab to the cave of Adullam, Thenius, in order to account for the prophetic direction to go into the land of Judah, where also the city Adullam was situated, is obliged to say that probably the cave of Adullam was in Benjamin on the border, and, as his retreat might thus, being near Gibeath, easily be betrayed to Saul, Gad advised him to go to Judah. This explanation stands and falls with its unfounded geographical basis, which also O. v. Gerlach adopts.—By this direction to go to Judah for the above end, the prophet Gad gave David, in divine commission, instructions as to his further course; in this interval of suffering and trial between his call to be king and his actual entrance on the duties of the office, he was to be not only passive but also active, serving his people and his God against the enemies of the theocracy.—He went into the forest of Hereth—an unknown region, probably according to xxiii. 1 in the western part of Judah. [Sept. and Josephus have "city of Hereth (Sarik)."] Lieut. Conder, of the Palestine Exploration Fund, says (Dec., 1874) that there are now no trees in this district, and argues from the geological conditions that there never could have been. He is disposed to adopt the Sept. reading "city," and to identify Hereth with a site called Kharas (near Keilah), which name is substantially identical with Hereth.—Tr.]

* [On Adullam see Smith's Bib.-Dict.; Stanley's Lectures, II., 69; Thomson, Land and Book, II., 424-427. The latter decides for Khureitun, and gives a vivid description of its labyrinthine intricacies and its strength.—Tn.]

* ["The same phrase is used of Hannah, I. 10; of David and his companions, 2 Sam. xvii. 8; and of David's followers, 1 Sam. xxx. 6. Hence the phrase here denotes those who are exasperated by Saul's tyranny" (Bib.-Comm.) It is not necessary to suppose in all these men a theocratic feeling or love for David.—Tn.]

Vers. 6-23. Saul's savage vengeance on Nob. While David goes the way shown him by God's prophet the terrible consequences of his self-willed conduct at Nob, which did not accord with the Lord's will, are accomplished.

Vers. 6-10. In a formal council, in which Saul expresses his suspicion in relation to a conspiracy made against him by David and his son, Doeg betrays the proceeding of Ahimelech towards David.—Ver. 6. It is first stated that the abode of David and his men was known at Saul's court, and that Saul received information of his servants'

* [On this reading see "Text and Gramm."—Tr.]

† [As distinguished from Jehovah. Yet that the name Jehovah was not unknown in Moab is made probable by its occurrence on the Inscription of Mesha, dating about one hundred and fifty years after this time.—Tr.]

‡ [Byr. here has Mizpeh. Wordsworth (on ver. 4) strangely derives מִצְפֶּה from מִצֵּה, "rock."—Tr.]

acquaintance with this circumstance. It is this fact, that Saul heard, received information of their knowledge of David's position, that is the ground of his charging them (ver. 7) with complicity in the supposed conspiracy of David and Jonathan. In ver. 6 the words: "And Saul heard . . . with him" belong syntactically and logically to ver. 7, and the rest of ver. 6 forms a parenthesis [so Eng. A. V., but it is better to preserve in the translation the simple, direct form of the Hebrew.—Tr.]. And Saul abode in Gibeah (not, as Sept., "on the hill") under the tamarisk,—the Article indicates that this place was the appointed and usual one for such councils. On the height (not with Luther [and Eng. A. V.] "in Ramah") points out the elevated situation, in keeping with the solemnity of the occasion, as it is hereafter described.—His spear in his hand,—the spear, as well as the sceptre, was the symbol of royal power. All his servants stood about him, it was, therefore, a full assembly of the whole personnel of the Court. Bunsen: "He held a formal court, surrounded by all the magnates (chiefly Benjaminites) of his kingdom."—Ver. 7. The address: Hear, ye Benjaminites, is in keeping with the importance of the solemn scene (so vividly sketched in a few strokes) as a sort of judicial assembly [Bib. Com. Parliament.—Tr.], and at the same time has a particularistic-partisan tone, as Saul was himself of the tribe of Benjamin. Saul's question: Will the son of Jesse give you all fields and vineyards? make you all captains of hundreds and captains of thousands? is noteworthy and characteristically prefixed to the words which express his complaint and suspicion of the courtiers, on which only a question so spiteful and so tinged with venomous savagery could be based. In thus putting things hindmost first and upside down, Saul again exhibits himself as a man, who, through burning hatred to David and blind suspicion, has lost his mental control.—Also to you [Heb. literally: "also to you all will the son of Jesse give?" etc.—Tr.]; the Heb. text is to be maintained against the groundless change proposed by Thenius "in truth will the son," etc. (דַּוִּד אֵלַי) after the merely elucidatory Sept. and Vulg.). This phrase does not mean "to you all also, besides the others to whom he has already given," since it is nowhere said of David that he provided for his adherents, nor was he in condition to do so. According to the rule that the Heb. particle [וְ] expresses reciprocal relation, the thought here is: "will David also by gifts show himself so grateful to you all for your making common cause with him against me?" The word (as here) is toneless [with maqqeph.—Tr.] in questions, to indicate reciprocity.* Saul imagines that his courtiers all secretly hold with David, hence his question: "will he also give you all?"—"will he then give?" etc. In Saul's words there is the latent sense: Will he, of another tribe, reward you, as I have done to you, my fellow-tribesmen? Will he not rather favor his tribesmen, the men of Judah? Will it not be to your interest to stand on my side? Seb. Schmid: "Ye have received the greatest benefits from me, such as ye could not expect from him, and yet ye are more attached to him than to me." These words give us an insight into Saul's partisan and particularistic mode of governing, in which he preferably filled court-offices with persons of his own tribe. From landed possessions (fields and vineyards), Saul goes on to refer to places of honor in the now organized army.

The וְ before the second "all of you" is not to be exchanged for "and" (so Then. [and Eng. A. V.] after Sept. and Vulg., which indeed give the sense correctly), but is to be taken either in the sense of "as regards"—"will he (also) as regards you all make captains?" etc., that is, take account of you all in filling these offices (Ew., § 310 a), or, in the distributive sense, which it sometimes has (Ew., § 217 a, § 277 c)—"will he make all and each of you" (Ewald)? The sense is given correctly by Maurer: "Will he make as many tribunes and centurions as may be necessary in order that each of you may have such an office?"—Ver. 8. In his mental derangement and passionate excitement Saul takes it as certain that they have all conspired against him: because, as he says, they told him nothing of the covenant which his son had made with David against him. These words pre-suppose that he had learned something of the occurrence related in xx. 12-17 [the covenant between David and Jonathan], for they are too definite [made (Heb. cut) a covenant] to refer merely to the friendship of Jonathan and David. He assumes that his court-officials knew of this covenant, and then concludes that they had conspired against him with these two men. The words: "there is none that is sorry for me," express the opinion that they had abandoned him in their hearts. His charge passes to the factually false assertion that his son had set his servant (David) as a liar in wait against him. (Sept. "enemy"—יָדֹאֵב, without ground, Vulg. appropriately insidiantem mihi.) There is herein a two-fold false accusation: 1) as to David, that he was lying in wait to take his throne and life; and 2) as to Jonathan, that he was the cause of this insurrectionary and invidious conduct of David. Saul fancies himself in the meshes of a conspiracy against his person and kingdom organized by his own son, and accuses his courtiers of knowledge thereof and active participation therein. To such a pitch had the darkening and wasting of his inner life grown through hate and suspicion.—As is now evident [=as it is this day], comp. Deut. viii. 18. In proof Saul points to David's concealment and retinue. He was, therefore, not without information concerning this fact. S. Schmid: "as is proved by this day, in which David gathers an army, and from the forest lays snares for me."—Ver. 9. Here we must especially note in the psychological point of view, how Doeg's information about David's visit to Ahimelech and the latter's inquiring of the Lord for him and providing him with food and the sword of Goliath (comp. xxi. 8), turns Saul's dark thoughts away from the

* [This rule (Ew., § 352) hardly applies here; וְ— "together" (Ps. cxxxiii. 1), and can express reciprocity only when the connection affirms something to be true of two or more persons; here it would apply to the courtiers only, excluding David. It is better to take it as qualifying the whole sentence,—"yet" (Ew., § 354 a), or as qualifying "son of Jesse," as it may do, though it stands at the beginning of the sentence.—Tr.]

courtiers, and directs all his energy to the person of the high-priest, so that he now thinks only of taking vengeance on him. Doeg is said to be "set over (or, standing with) Saul's servants;" why the version of the Sept.: "set over the mules" (מִלִּי), should be the "only appropriate one" [Then.], it is hard to see. The rendering of the Heb.: set over the servants of Saul (Chald., Kimchi, Vulg., Syr.)—"highest court-official, court-marshal, minister of the household," does not agree with the description in xxi. 7: "overseer of the herdsmen" (as was natural in this first stage of the development of the kingdom, and in accordance with the position of his family, Saul's possessions consisted chiefly in herds). Rather the words answer to the statement (ver. 7): "all his servants stood by (around) him," and are to be rendered: And (or, also) he stood with the servants of Saul (Arab., De Wette, Buns. [Philippe.]). "As chief overseer of the herds Doeg was in a sort one of the dignitaries of the kingdom" (Bunsen). There is no superfluous statement here; the narrator declares that he was now here present, having in xxi. 8 (7) described him as being in the sanctuary at Nob. From the connection it is clear that Doeg gave his information with evil purpose, in order to turn the king's suspicion from the courtiers to the high-priest. In Saul's frame of mind the mere statement of actual fact, of which he was ear and eye-witness, had all the more powerful effect on him. S. Schmid: "Far better, therefore, did Saul's other servants, who kept silence." Hengstenberg (Introd. to Ps. lii.), absolves Doeg from enmity to David, observing that he merely stated the fact, to which the malicious interpretation was given by Saul alone; but this does not agree with what Saul had just before said against David and his courtiers, nor with Doeg's bloody proceeding against the priests at Nob, nor with what is said in Ps. lii. 3-5 of the tongue like a sharp razor, of the wickedness, falsehood, calumny and deceit of the enemy, all of which applies to Doeg, but not to Saul. Rightly Grotius: "see the description of Doeg in Ps. lii." That Ahimelech inquired of the Lord for David is here by Doeg's assertion added to the account in xxi. 7-10 [6-9], and confirmed by Ahimelech himself, ver. 15.*—Ver. 11. On this treacherous and slanderous statement of Doeg, Saul straightway sends for Ahimelech and all his father's house, that is, all the priests in Nob, "because these all belonged to the one family of Aaron" (Then.). In Nob, therefore, dwelt the whole priestly family with the high-priest.—Ver. 12 sq. The council now becomes a solemn tribunal with pleading and verdict.—Saul assumes that Ahimelech is guilty, adducing the three facts mentioned as in themselves proofs of guilt.—Ver. 14 sq. The high-priest's answer has the stamp of quiet, clearness and a good conscience. First, he affirms that he was justified in unsuspectingly trusting to David. "And who among all thy servants is as David trusted?" (De Wette)? that is object of confidence; in proof of which he refers to three things: David's position at court as the king's son-in-law, as his trusted privy-councillor and as an honored man in his house. The word מִשְׁמָרָא [Eng. A. V. "bidding"]—"audience," so in Isa. xi. 14, as Böttcher has shown, "they are their (Israel's) audience," that is, "they are of those who seek audience of Israel, pay court to Israel, come with homage," not "who obey them" [as in Eng. A. V., and so J. A. Alexander.—Tr.]—The word has the same signification also in 2 Sam. xxiii. 23 and 1 Chron. xi. 25, where it is said: "And David set Benaiah for his audience" [Eng. A. V.: "over his guard"], appointed him privy councillor.—[In 1 Chronicles xi. 25 the Preposition is עַל, "over," in 2 Samuel it is לְ, "to."—Tr.]—וָהוּא—"to withdraw, turn aside," for a definite purpose, for example, to see (Ex. iii. 3; Ruth iv. 1), here "withdrawing to thy audience" [Eng. A. V. "goeth"], as "having interior admission" (Böttch.); so Maurer: "who turns aside (from the other courtiers) that he may hear thee, that is, who has access to the interior of thy palace, and there takes part in thy more weighty counsels." Schultz: "Leaving all else, listening to thee and doing thy will." This explanation is here confirmed by the phrase "among all thy servants" (Böttch.). Thenius takes the word as = "obedience" in the special sense, as meaning the devotedly obedient body-guard (so also Ewald and Bertheau on 1 Chron. xi. 25) and renders "captain over the body-guard" (reading עַל for לְ and, after Sept. and Chald., שָׂר for שָׂר). Against this Böttcher rightly remarks that the traces [of a different reading] in the versions are altogether uncertain, that Thenius' reading is not Heb. (עַל is found with שָׂר, instead of the Gen., only where it is dependent on a verb), that according to 1 Sam. xviii. 5, 13, David had command not of the body-guard, but of other more distant troops, that, as the other designation of David in the verse (even "son-in-law") are moral marks of confidence, the mention of a military position would be strange, and the very question "Who is among thy servants captain over thy body-guard as David?" would sound somewhat queerly.*—Ahimelech says, therefore, that he could have done nothing less than in good conscience trust a man so trusted and honored by the king, "as a faithful subject of the king" (Keil) giving David bread and arms on his assertion that he had a secret commission from the king.—Further, in the question: Did I that day begin to inquire of God for him? he insists on the fact that David had often before received from him in the sanctuary divine direction in important undertakings. [This interpretation is denied by some (so Bib.-Com.), on the ground that nothing is said in ch. xxi. of such an inquiry by Ahimelech for David. The Midrash also says that counsel was given by Urim and Thummim only to the king or his public ambassador (Philippe.); but Rashi agrees with the common interpretation, and Abarbanel gives both that and the direct form "that was the first day that I inquired of God

* [The passage 1 Chr. xi. 25, nevertheless, makes a difficulty and the differences of the vs. suggest a corruption of the text. Here the rendering of Böttcher and Erdmann (and Philippon and Bib. Com.) seems the best, though we can hardly sever this passage from 1 Chr. xi. 25.—Tr.]

* [This is not certain. See on ver. 15.—Tr.]

for him, and I did not know that it was displeasing to thee." Some, taking the phrase הִתְחַלֵּל לִשְׁאוֹל to mean simply "to inquire," find a negative sense in the question: "did I inquire? Nay, I did not." But this weakening of הִתְחַלֵּל is not justified by usage; the idea of "beginning" must be expressed here. This being so, the choice is between the two interpretations above given, the interrogatory and the direct, and of these the former (that of Erdmann) seems more in keeping with Ahimelech's dignity of character. The omission of the fact in chap. xxi. must then be attributed to the curtness of the narrative. Yet this omission is surprising, and, while Ahimelech's somewhat obscure words here scarcely admit of any other satisfactory translation than that given by Erdmann, there is room for doubt as to his meaning.—Tr.—On this statement of facts Ahimelech founds his affirmation: Far be it from me, that is, such a crime as he is accused of, that he was party to a conspiracy against the king.—In respect to this accusation, his defence culminates in the request: Let not the king impute anything to his servant, to the whole house of my father, wherein the absence of the copula ["nor," supplied in Eng. A. V.] is to be referred with Keil to the excitement of the speaker. Finally he adds as reason: For thy servant knows nothing of all this, little or great, that is, nothing at all. The "all this" refers not to what David had told him, as if he intended to say that he knew nothing of David's false assertion, but to what Saul had charged him with.—This answer of the high-priest supposes certainly that he knew nothing of the unhappy condition of things in respect to David, or of his flight with its causes and circumstances.—Ver. 16. Saul's arbitrary, precipitate judgment as contrasted with the innocence of the high-priest and of the whole body of priests.—Ver. 17. The order for its immediate execution is given to the "runners," who were either servants for running on messages, or guards who ran before or beside the king in his public appearance, [Eng. A. V., "footmen"]. Comp. ix. 11; 2 Ki. x. 25. As court-officials they stood also in this solemn assembly by the king. For the expression "stood by or about," see vers. 6, 9 [on ver. 9 see the Exposition.—Tr.]. According to Saul's decision not only the high-priest, but also the whole priesthood should die for alleged participation in David's conspiracy. For their hand also is with David, they make common cause with him against me. This assertion he bases on the unproved fact: they knew that he fled, and did not show it me. (Instead of Kethib "his ear" read with Qeri "my ear," for such a sudden transition to indirect discourse "and (as he said) did not show him," is impossible).—The guards refuse to obey Saul's order, a proof of the disorder which his blind rage produced. This refusal reminds us of the scene in xiv. 45, where Saul's sentence of death against Jonathan is opposed. Saul's servants will not lay their hands on the sacred persons of the priests; this is indicated in the expression "the priests of the Lord." [Wordsworth: Thus they were more faithful to Saul than if they had obeyed his order, which was against the commandment of the Lord. Theodoret (in Wordsw.): The heinousness of Saul's sin is made more conspicuous by his servants' refusal.—Tr.].—Ver. 18. Saul's choice of Doeg as the executor of his order is a proof of the savageness which was combined with wickedness and guile in this Edomite. On the form of his name "Doyeg" (as in ver. 22) see Ew. § 45 d. The pron. "he" ["he fell"] emphasizes Doeg's willingness in contrast with the refusal of the guards. As above by the expression "priests of the Lord," so here the wickedness of this act is brought prominently out by the significant reference to the official dress of the priests, "who wore a linen ephod," the sign of the holiness of their persons. On the wearing of the ephod see ch. ii. 18. Linen; the common priests, therefore, wore a linen over-garment similar in form to the high-priestly cape or ephod (Buns.).—Ver. 19. Nob is here expressly called the "city of the priests." The whole city, as such, with all living things therein, is devoted to destruction by Saul in his fury. It is treated by him as a city under the ban (Cherem), which is polluted by idolatry and therefore devoted to destruction. The wrong alleged to be done to him by the priests is laid on the whole city as an idolatrous wrong against the Lord Himself, which is therefore thus to be avenged. Comp. Deut. xiii. 13 sq. [Saul does not seem to have had the theocratic cherem or ban in mind, but in an access of rage did what was not uncommon among ancient oriental princes.—Tr.].—Ver. 20. Only one son of Ahimelech, Abiathar, escaped the slaughter. How that happened is not said. Perhaps he was not present at this trial, and hastened away from Nob while it was being destroyed. "After David," that is, to the retreat of the fugitive David. This is another proof of the intimate relations between David and the high-priestly family.—Vers. 21-23. Through Abiathar David received information of Saul's bloody vengeance on Nob. David said to Abiathar: "I knew that day (comp. chap. xxi. 7, 8) that, because Doeg the Edomite was there, he would certainly tell Saul." So Vulg. and Then.; not (Keil): "I knew that day that Doeg . . . that he," etc., nor (De Wette): "I knew . . . that Doeg . . . and that." David confesses himself guilty of the blood shed in Nob, because his flight thither and conduct there, while he knew of Doeg's presence, gave occasion to it. Vulg.: "I am guilty of all the souls." This confession of David shows the strictness of his self-judgment. (בָּרָא here = "to be guilty of a thing," see Ges. Lex. s. v. In the Talmud בָּרָא = "cause").—Ver. 23. The consequence of David's invitation to Abiathar to abide with him is that the high-priesthood goes over to David and to the new future kingdom, though David entered into no rebellion against Saul for this end. Fear not,—namely, Saul's snares and power. For he that seeketh my life, etc.—Certainly the converse assertion would be natural here: "He that seeks thy life seeks mine;" but we are not therefore with Then. (after the Sept., whose translation seeks to get rid of this difficulty) to change the text, so that it would read: "for whatever place I seek for myself, that will I (also) seek for thee," but we must explain it from the reference that David therein has to Saul. As against Saul Devid binds the fate of the fugitive high-priest to his own in an indissoluble covenant under the protection of God. The sense is: "The persecution which I suffer, touches thee also. But I stand under God's protection as one that suffers injustice; so art thou, because thy life like mine is threatened, safely kept in company with me." The second "for" [Eng. A. V. "but" 'ו'] is also dependent on the "fear not." This consolatory assurance is based first, on the reference to their common enemy, and on the reference to the protection which Abiathar will enjoy with him, who knew that, as regarded Saul, he was under God's special protection, קִשְׁרָת, "preservation" (Ex. xii. 6; xvi. 33 sq.), abstract for concrete, "a precious deposit or trust" (Ewald).

[During this first period of David's life as outlaw several incidents occurred which are not mentioned in this narrative. We learn from 2 Sam. xxiii. 13 that three of his chief heroes came to him in the cave of Adullam, one of whom was his nephew Abishai, afterwards a famous general. A little after (1 Chr. xi. 15-19) occurred that noble act of loving daring, when the "three mightiest" broke through the Philistine army and brought their leader water from the well of Bethlehem, for which he longed. This was while he was in the "hold;" and at this time apparently came to him the stout band of lion-faced, gazelle-footed Gadites, who swam the Jordan when its banks were overflowed, and scattered all enemies before them (1 Chr. xii. 8-15), and an enthusiastic body of men of Judah and Benjamin, for whose friendship Amasai answered in his passionate speech (1 Chr. xii. 16-18). As to whether David was at Keilah when Abiathar came to him, see Erdmann on 1 Sam. xxiii. 6. For fuller accounts of this period see Chandler (ch. vii.) and Stanley's Lectures, xxii.—Tr.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. Whether Psalm lvi., whose title is: "By David, when he fled from Saul in the cave," refers to the case of Adullam or to Engedi (1 Sam. xxiv.) is uncertain. Certainly, however, the situation here, the condition of his inner life as fugitive, and his experience of divine help, form the basis of the thought of the Psalm, in which first "believing hope (founded on experience) of speedy and sure divine help out of great peril of life from violent men, shows itself in the prayer for a new manifestation of divine grace, whereby God's truth and trustworthiness will be shown by deeds," and then, "after a short description of the snarers, which resulted in the destruction of the enemies themselves, the certain assurance of victory is expressed in the invocation of the author's own soul to praise God in all the world on the ground of His self-revelation in His glory" (Moll).—Psalm li. certainly in its essential content agrees with David's position as indicated by the reference in the title to Doeg's treachery. But, from the general nature of the didactic content of the Psalm, we must also suppose a reference to the hate and persecution of Saul, whose tool Doeg was.

2. David is the representative of the theocratic principle, for which he suffers and endures. The uninterrupted tribulation which he experiences from now till he enters into the theocratic kingly office, he bears for the sake of the Lord, who has chosen him for this office and the calling therewith conjoined for all Israel; it serves to humble and purify him, and its precious fruit is that he yields himself more absolutely into God's hands, and treads solely the path which the divine providence points out; he will know only what God will do for him; he listens only to what God says, and obeys unconditionally God's command announced by the mouth of the prophet. So, in the development of his inner and outer life under the many testing and purifying sufferings sent by God, David becomes more and more a shining type of the humble faith, which bows un murmuringly under the Lord's afflicting hand, accepts unconditionally God's hidden providences, is attentive to the Lord's word, and yields joyful obedience to His commands.—Saul has become the representative of the antitheocratic principle; conscious that the kingdom is justly taken from him for his self-willed apostasy from God, he suffers pain and anguish in the fear of losing the throne through David, and, his look distorted by this inner unrest, sees everywhere only conspiracy and treachery against his throne and life; the more he shuts his eyes to the divine leadings in David's life, and obstinately withstands God's known will concerning David, the more does he harden his heart against God's word and instructions, the deeper does he sink into the abysses of wretched fear of man, and the farther from his heart recedes true fear of God, the more irretardably rushes on his inner life, pursued by the terrors of the angry God, and of a conscience pressed down by the burden of unforgiven sin, which yet leads him not to pure self-knowledge and humble subjection to God's almighty hand, towards the abysses of doubt and the judgment of inner hardening of heart.

3. While apparently under Saul's sharply-sketched despotic and cruel rule (a horrible caricature of the theocratic government) the three pillars of God's kingdom in Israel break down—the theocratic kingdom in David hunted to the death, prophets oppressed and silenced, the priesthood exterminated—yet just here this threefold office appears in most significant facts under the protection of the almighty, faithful God, who will not let His covenant fail, as factual divine promise or prediction: about David, as the Lord's chosen king, is grouped His family as representatives of Israel's hope of salvation, and is gathered the root of the theocratic congregation, in Gad appears prophecy in God's name, and with the light of His word pointing the way out of the gloom, and in Abiathar the high-priesthood is rescued from Saul's purposed destruction into the safe-keeping of the future king.

[4. It is hardly necessary now to discuss the question, whether David was a rebel against Saul. As he never lifted his hand against his king, as he always cherished love for him, as his military enterprises were all against the enemies of Israel, as his efforts were confined to the saving of his life from Saul's attempts, it is clear that he was not a traitor and a rebel. He was an outlaw, but a patriotic, God-fearing, loyal outlaw. See Chandler's elaborate defence of David against Bayle in chs. vii. and viii. of his "Life of David."—Tr.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. S. SCHMID: When God has rescued us from danger, we should make such a use of it as to grow wiser thereby.—OSLANDER: It makes our cross much heavier to see that evil comes upon our dearest friends and kindred for our sake.—Ver. 2. BERL. BIBLE: Though thou findest thyself without refuge, yet thou becomest a refuge for all the distressed.—All who find themselves in distress are even in the midst of their pains filled with joy, when they meet with other men who have to bear the same oppressions. This at once forms a very close union among them.—[Ver. 4. Descendants of Ruth compelled by civil strife to leave Jehovah's country, and seek shelter in Moab.—Tr.]

Vers. 6-10. SCHLIER (Saul): Saul is filled with fear of men, because he lacks true fear of God.—O how much fear and anxiety there is, and so often it has no other ground than in an evil conscience; how much fear of man there is, and the fountain is in sins unforgiven; how much despondency there is, and yet all might be so far otherwise if people would only humble themselves and confess their sins.—Ver. 8. STARKE: That is the way with the ungodly, that with their evil behaviour they yet want to have their rights.—BERL. BIBLE: Perturbation and distrust are constantly the companions of malevolence and sin, while tranquillity stands by the side of persecuted innocence.—[Ver. 9. A ruler who wants informers can always find them.—Tr.]

Vers. 11-15. SCHLIER (Saul): O how unkingly stands King Saul before us, how dignified, how truly kingly stands Ahimelech! So true is it that he that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city!—It is manliness to place the truth above everything, and go security for the truth, and defend the truth, even unto death. Let us learn from this royal manliness of an Ahimelech, who also confessed the truth even unto death.—[Ver. 13. It is so easy for the passionate to cheat themselves with hasty inferences.—Tr.]—Ver. 16 sq. Doeg and Saul were also men like ourselves, both had also a conscience, both were also yielding and receptive, and Saul was once even in good ways, he had learned to fear and love God, and yet both were now so deep-sunken, both were now hardened, and to human eyes irrecoverably lost. The reason is, they trifled with God's word, they were not willing to obey the truth, they wilfully lived on in their sins.—No man is sure that he will not fall into sin, nor is any man sure that he will remain in a good way; it holds good for all that they must always work out their salvation with fear and trembling.—[Ver. 17. The best friends of an angry man are those who refuse to aid him in doing wrong.—Vers. 16-19. HENRY: See the desperate wickedness of Saul, when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him. Nothing so vile but they may be hurried to it, who have provoked God to give them up to their heart's lusts. He that was so compassionate as to spare Agag and the cattle of the Amalekites, in disobedience to the command of God, could now, with unrelenting bowels, see the priests of the Lord murdered, and nothing spared of all that belonged to them. For that sin, God left him to this.—There are many historical cases in which sentimental humanity has become transformed into savage cruelty.—Ver. 18. So often in what calls itself the administration of justice, many innocent men are punished because the one man who did the wrong has escaped.—God makes the wrath of man to praise Him (Ps. lxxvi. 10). The punishment foretold against the house of Eli (ch. ii. 31) is executed through the madness of Saul and the baseness of Doeg.—HALL: It was just in God, which in Doeg was most unjust. Saul's cruelty, and the treachery of Doeg, do not lose one dram of their guilt by the counsel of God, neither doth the holy counsel of God gather any blemish by their wickedness. . . . If Saul and Doeg be instead of a pestilence or fever, who can cavil?—Ver. 19. A madly passionate man in authority (despot, parent, teacher) often seeks to justify his cruel conduct by still greater cruelty.—Tr.]

[Ver. 22. TAYLOR: Behold how impossible it is to arrest the consequences of our evil actions. . . . I have no doubt that when David heard of all this, he would willingly have given all that he had, ay, even his hopes of one day sitting on the throne of Israel, if he could have recalled the evil which he had spoken, and undone its dismal consequences. But it was impossible. The lie had gone forth from him; and having done so, it was no longer under his control, but would go on producing its diabolical fruits. And so it is yet. . . . We may, indeed, repent of our sin; we may even, through the grace of God for Christ's sake, have the assurance that we are forgiven for it; but the sin itself will go on working its deadly results.—Tr.]

[Ch. xxii. David struggling upward, Saul sinking downward. (Comp. Hist. and Theol., No. 2.)

[Ver. 3. Our Future. 1) Our future will be determined by God. Comp. Ps. xxxi. 15. 2) Our future cannot be clearly foreseen by us, and this is well. Comp. Prov. xxvii. 1. 3) We must provide as wisely as we can for our future, and then wait. 4) Whatever God may do to us in the future, we must try to receive it as from Him.

[Ver. 5. Danger and Duty. 1) Where no duty calls, let us keep away from danger. Comp. Gen. xiii. 12, 13; Ex. ii. 15; 1 Sam. xxiii. 13; John iv. 1; xi. 53, 54. 2) But often, to keep away from danger is to be out of the reach of success. If David had remained in Moab, he would never have become king of Israel. "Nothing venture, nothing have." Comp. Matt. xvi. 25; Acts xxi. 13; John xii. 23. 3) How can we tell when duty calls us into danger? Not now by special revelation, but by keeping our minds familiar with the written word, watching the leadings of Providence, seeking counsel from the wise and good, striving to judge calmly even amid perturbations, and praying all the while for the guidance of God's Spirit. Comp. 1 Chron. xxviii. 9; Prov. iii. 6.

[Ver. 17. Three scenes in the life of Saul, xi. 13; xv. 22, 23; xxii. 16-19.

[Vers. 6-23. Pictures of Human Nature. 1) A man in authority, whose misfortunes, though due to his own fault, make him suspicious (ver.

- 8) and cruelly unjust (ver. 16). 2) A basely ambitious man who seeks to build himself up by ruining others (vers. 9, 10, 13, comp. Ps. lii.). 3) An innocent man accused, who defends himself both with forcible argument (ver. 14) and with dignified denial (ver. 15). 4) A good, but erring man who mournfully sees that his sin has brought destruction on his friends (ver. 22).—Ta.]

V. 1. David's expedition against the Philistines for the rescue of Keilah. 2. His abode in the wilderness of Ziph, and the treachery of the Ziphites against him. 3. His deliverance from Saul in the wilderness of Maon.

CHAP. XXIII. [Eng. A. V. XXIII. 1-28].

- 1 THEN [And] they told David, saying, Behold, the Philistines fight against Keilah, and they rob the threshing-floors. Therefore [And] David enquired of the Lord [Jehovah], saying, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto David, Go and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah. And David's men said unto him, Behold, we be [are] afraid here in Judah; how much more, then, if we come' [go] to Keilah against the armies [ranks]¹ of the Philistines? Then [And] David enquired of the Lord [Jehovah] yet again. And the Lord [Jehovah] answered him and said, Arise, go down to Keilah, for I will deliver [give] the Philistines into thine hand. So [And] David, and [with]² his men, went to Keilah and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter; so [and] David saved the inhabitants of Keilah. And it came to pass, when Abiathar the son of Ahimelech fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with an ephod in his hand [an ephod came down in his hand].³
- 7 And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah. And Saul said, God hath delivered⁴ him into mine hand, for he is shut in by⁵ entering into a town [city] that hath gates and bars. And Saul called all the people together [summoned all the people] to war, to go down⁶ to Keilah to besiege David and his men. And David knew that Saul secretly [i.e. secretly] practised⁷ mischief against him, and he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod. Then said David [And David said], O Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that⁸ Saul seeketh to come to Keilah to destroy the city for my sake. Will the men [citizens]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 3. Erdmann: "and we are really to go, etc.?" Syr.: "how shall we go?" Sept.: "how will it be if we go?" all of which give the general sense; Eng. A. V. has the more exact rendering, and so Chald. and Vulg.—Then.: "how much less shall we go?"—Ta.]

² [Ver. 3. Sept. σῶλα "spoils," which Then. prefers, supposing it to represent תְּשֻׁלוֹת "booty," whence the Heb. text מִתְּשֻׁלוֹת might easily come. Against this Wellhausen justly points out the unsuitableness of the resulting thought, and suggests that σῶλα (variants σάλα, κούλας) is another form of Κεῖλα, and that the Greek omits the מִתְּשֻׁלוֹת—as to the improbability of battle-lines in Philistine raiding-parties, they might well exist, or David's men may naturally exaggerate the danger.]

³ [Ver. 4. Heb.: "David and his men," but the following verbs are in the Singular, making David the subject.—Ta.]

⁴ [Ver. 6. Erdmann: "The ephod came down to him," which, however, the Heb. does not mean from the connection. Erdmann suggests the right sense in the Exposition.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 7. כָּרַךְ is rendered by the VSS. "delivered," but Sept. "sold" מָכַר, adopted by Then.; Wellh. says the text seems made up of מָכַר and נָתַן. The word is literally "ignored," and so perhaps = "abandoned."—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 7. Literally. "at entering" (לְכִבּוּל), not "shut in (forced) to enter."—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 8. Sept. in inverse order; "to go down to war," perhaps a mere softening. The Heb. order is better; Saul summons the people generally to war, and then the special purpose is added of going down to Keilah.—Instead of מָלַךְ some MSS. have מָלַךְ.]

⁸ [Ver. 9. פָּרַשׁ = "cut, work on the forge" = "practice." Eng. A. V. gets its "secretly" from Vulg. clam, and this is perhaps from the meaning "to be deaf, dumb," also found in this verb, but not applicable here; so Sept. rendered ἡσυχάζω before which, however, it naturally found itself obliged to insert the negative.—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 10. Thenius reads: "Saul seeks . . . to destroy the city in order that the citizens of Keilah may deliver me into his hand," on which see Erdmann. To this the objections are 1) that it supposes a construction

- 11 of Keilah deliver me up into his hand? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. And
- 12 the Lord [Jehovah] said, He will come down. Then said David [And David said], Will the men [citizens] of Keilah deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul? And the Lord [Jehovah] said, They will deliver thee up.
- 13 Then [And] David and his men, which were about six¹⁰ hundred, arose and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go. And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah; and he forbore to go forth. And David abode in the wilderness in [ins. the] strongholds, and remained [abode] in a [the] mountain in the wilderness of Ziph. And Saul sought him every day, but God delivered him not into his hand.
- 15 And David saw¹¹ that Saul was come out to seek his life. And David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a [the] wood. And Jonathan, Saul's son arose, and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God, And he [om. he] said to him, Fear not, for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee, and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that also Saul my father knoweth [and that knoweth Saul my father also]. And they two made a covenant before the Lord [Jehovah]. And David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.¹²
- 19 Then came up the Ziphites¹³ to Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself with us in [ins. the] strongholds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah,¹⁴ which is on the south of Jeshimon [the desert]? Now, therefore, O king, come down according to all the desire of thy soul to come down, and our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand. And Saul said, Blessed be ye of the Lord [Jehovah],
- 22 for ye have compassion on me. Go, I pray you, prepare yet [be yet heedful],¹⁵ and know and see his place where his haunt [foot] is, and [om. and] who hath seen¹⁶ him there; for it is told me that he dealeth very subtilly. See therefore, [And see], and take knowledge of all the lurking places where he hideth himself, and come ye again to me with the certainty, and I will go with you; and it shall come to pass, if he be in the land, that I will search him out throughout [among] all the thousands of Judah. And they arose and went to Ziph before Saul; but [and] David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the plain on the south of Jeshimon
- 25 [the desert]. Saul also [And Saul] and his men went to seek him.¹⁷ And they told [it was told] David, wherefore [and] he came down into a [to the] rock [cliff] and abode in the wilderness of Maon. And Saul¹⁸ went on the side of the mountain; and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul, for [and] Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them, But [And] there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee and come, for the Philistines have
- 28 invaded the land. Wherefore [And] Saul returned from pursuing after David, and went against [to meet] the Philistines. Therefore they called that place Sela hammahlekoth.¹⁹

[Inf. with suffix followed by Accus.-subject] doubtful in Heb. (Wellh.), and 2) Saul's purpose in destroying the city, namely, that the citizens may deliver David up, seems a strange one. On the other hand the omission of the first clause of ver. 11 (Wellh.) is a violent procedure, like that of Syr., which omits the whole of this verse. The procedure of the vers. shows the difficulty they had with the text, but also seems to vouch for its integrity. It is perhaps better to attribute the repetition to excitement, or to regard the first question as a general one, which is afterwards for the sake of clearness, divided into two.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 13. Sept. four hundred by error from xxii. 2.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 15. Ewald and Wellhausen emend to יִירָא "feared" on the ground that this is required in order to connect with the preceding context and to explain the words of Jonathan in ver. 17. Yet the connection is so general a one that such a change seems unnecessary.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 18. Some MSS. have יָרַח "his way," but the text is best supported.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 19. The Heb. has not the Art., but the connection seems to involve it.—Wellhausen thinks the minute description of place here interpolated from xxvi. 1, because otherwise Saul's minute directions in vers. 22, 23, would be out of place; but the statement of the Ziphites is not so minute as to supersede the necessity of search for the fugitive, who might be in any one of a hundred places "in the wood on the hill."—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 19. Some MSS. have (probably wrongly) Habilah and Havilah.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 21. Instead of הִכֵּינוּ "set your mind," some MSS. have הִבֵּינוּ "understand, learn."—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 22. Theonius reads רָגְלוֹ הַמְּהֵרָה "where his quick or fleet foot is," Sept. ἡ ῥέξ, an ingenious and smooth reading; yet the rugged Heb. text suits the hurry of the command better.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 25. The suffix, omitted in the Heb., is added in the Sept.—Erdmann renders "went down the cliff."—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 26. Sept. "Saul and his men." a natural (and therefore suspicious) supplement.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 28. On the meaning of this name see Erdmann in Exposition.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-14. David's march against the Philistines to rescue Keilah.

Ver. 1. David's recall to Judah by Gad, and the distress of a part of Judah in consequence of a Philistine inroad stood probably in pragmatical connection. In this, his people's time of need, David the fugitive was to do them a service by a successful feat of arms against the hereditary enemy; and this was to be of service to him by gaining for him higher consideration as God's chosen one for the throne and the helper of his people. The Philistines were warring against Keilah, a fortified city (ver. 7) in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 44), according to the Onomasticon eight miles from Eleutheropolis towards Hebron, with an evil-disposed population, who acted ungratefully and treacherously toward David (verse 12), though he had saved them from imminent danger. Inhabitants of this city took part (Neh. iii. 17, 18) in the building of the wall of Jerusalem. According to Kiepert's map (from the Onom. Keilá, Ceila, or Ἐχελά), it lay somewhat south-west of Tarkumieh, and is, according to Tobler (3 Wand. 151), the present Kila, near the Philistine border.*—The Philistine inroad was also a predatory incursion, in which they had an eye to the grain which was threshed and stored in the threshing-floors. Ver. 2. The news of the Philistines' incursion determined David to attack them. It is probable, as we have already intimated, that he was brought to Judah by Gad for this purpose. But here, in David's inquiry of the Lord, the agent is not the prophet Gad (Ew.), of whom it is not said, that he remained with David after ch. xxii. 20, but the high-priest Abiathar† by Urim and Thummim, the expression "to inquire of Jehovah" being never used when the divine will was sought through a prophet, but undoubtedly of the high-priest's inquiry by the sacred lot (as in xxii. 10, 13, 15).—By this inquiry David learns God's will; to attack the Philistines and rescue Keilah is now a divine command with the promise of victory in the order: "Rescue Keilah."—Ver. 3. Against this David's men protest from the point of view of their present situation, which on merely human grounds was certainly not of a nature to inspire them with courage.—We are afraid here in Judah, namely, as persecuted fugitives, who have abandoned a comparatively safe abode for the present more dangerous one, and are now further to rush into this danger by open war against the Philistines; we are always in danger from Saul, and now shall we march against the Philistine ranks at Keilah? Being not safe in Judah,† ought we forsooth to go to Keilah against the Philistines? (פ' מ' comp. Hab. ii. 5; 1

* [Mr. Grove (in Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Keilah) referring to Tobler's identification of Keilah with Kila says "thus another is added to the list of places which, though specified as in the 'lowland' are yet actually found in the mountains: a puzzling fact." In connection with the signification "fortress" given to Keilah by Gesenius and others, Mr. Grove also points to the expression "marvellous kindness in a strong city" in Ps. xxxi. 21 and to ver. 8 and the general tenor of the Psalm.—Ta.]

† [See on ver. 6.—Ta.]
[Bib. Com.: "Implying that Keilah was not in Judah." Yet it may mean simply that the Philistines now had control of the region of Keilah.—Ta.]

Sam. xiv. 30; xxi. 6; Ew., § 354 c [= "yea, is it that?" or: "how much more when?"—Ta.]). —Ver. 4. David holds to his resolution against these objections; to confirm it and to encourage his men he again inquires of the Lord and receives the same affirmative answer with the assurance that the Lord has given his enemies into his hand.—Though treated by the king as an outlaw, he yet maintains true love to his people, which impels him to help them in their need, and to show that, in spite of his undeserved sufferings, he will not sin against them by refusing to perform a deed of deliverance which is well-pleasing to God.—The "go down" indicates that David was still in the mountains of Judah whence he must descend in order to reach Keilah.—Ver. 5. In accordance with the divine declaration the attack on the Philistines was successful; David inflicted a severe defeat on them, and gained large booty, driving off their flocks. Thus he rescued the people of Keilah.—Ver. 6 is a supplementary historical explanation relative to the possibility of the inquiry of the Lord in vers. 2, 3, which was not possible without the high-priestly ephod or ephod to which was attached the Urim and Thummim. The main point is that, when Abiathar fled from Saul to David, he brought with him the high-priestly dress from Nob. But it was before this time that Abiathar came to David; he came as fugitive (xxii. 20) before David went to Keilah, for before this David inquired of the Lord through the high-priestly oracle. Accordingly, the remark: "when Abiathar fled to David to Keilah" is an indefinite statement, in which Keilah is by anticipation put as the first goal of his flight. The Sept. correctly explains: "When Abiathar, the son of Ahitub, fled to David, the ephod was in his hand, and he had gone down with David to Keilah, the ephod in his hand." [Dr. Erdmann here gives not the reading of the Sept., but the Hebrew text as amended by Thenius after the Sept.; the Greek text, however does imply that Abiathar had come to Keilah with David, having fled to him before. Thenius' amended Heb. text would indicate the back reference of this statement in ver. 6; but the present Heb. text naturally means that it was at Keilah that Abiathar first came to David, and so it is understood by Ewald, Stanley and the Bible Commentary. In xxii. 20-23 it is not said where or when the priest reached David, and the statement may be an anticipatory conclusion of the narrative of the massacre, the intermediate fact xxiii. 1-5 being then taken up with its consequent procedures. Ewald also remarks that the account of the inquiry in xxiii. 2, 3 is differently worded from that in vers. 9-12; the former may have been by the prophet Gad, against which, however, as Erdmann remarks, is the use of the phrase "inquire of the Lord," which regularly refers to the sacred oracle.—On the whole, if we retain the Heb. text of ver. 6, we must hold that Abiathar joined David after the rescue of Keilah; but a slight change in the text* (which seems to be corrupt) will permit us to adopt the view of Thenius, Keil, Philippeon, and Erdmann, which is in other respects more satisfactory. This latter is also the view of Wordsworth, while Bp. Patrick adopts the other (referring to the employment of Urim and Thummim by Saul xxviii. 6, on which see Erdmann), but neither of these writers mentions the difficulties of the question.—Tr.]—Ver. 7. On hearing of David's march to Keilah, Saul imagines that God has given him into his hands. He thinks that he will act as an instrument of the Lord against David. His reason therefor is indeed external and superficial enough: "for he is there shut in in a city with gates and bars." (רָצוּ) in pregnant sense = "look at, ignore, Deut. xxxii. 27, despise, reject." Jer. xix. 4); into my hands [Heb. hand], that is, he hath given him, by abandoning and rejecting him. By blinding and self-deception Saul has fallen into the dreadful illusion that it is David, instead of himself, that is rejected by God.—The difficulty of the pregnant expression [God has rejected him into my hands] no doubt occasioned the change in the Sept. to "sold."—For he is shut in in entering.* The fact that David has entered or been drawn into this city with gates and bars, Saul thinks equivalent to his being shut in.—Ver. 8. And Saul caused the whole people to hear, summoned them to war (comp. xv. 4). Such summons to war was a royal right. The reason assigned to the people for the summons was to drive out the Philistines. Saul's real purpose, which he could the more easily conceal under this pretext of war on the Philistines, was: to besiege David and his men, who were already in Keilah, the city with gates and bars.—Ver. 9. David, however, had information of these evil plans, which Saul was forging against him; the Heb. (חָרַשׁ) is literally "to work in metals," and so "vigorously to work evil," as in Prov. iii. 29; xiv. 22; comp. Hos. x. 13. [The "secretly" of Eng. A. V. is to be omitted.—Tr.]. This gives David occasion again to consult the divine oracle. Bring hither the ephod, said he to Abiathar (comp. xiv. 13; xxx. 7). The high-priestly dress had to be brought, because it was the sacred dress for official duties.—Ver. 10. This inquiry of the Lord by the ephod was connected with outspoken prayer, whereby is indicated the innermost kernel and most essential significance of this questioning of the divine oracle. In the invocation of God there is here to be noted 1) the designation of the covenant-God as the God of Israel, and 2) David's avowal that he is the servant of this God, in whose service he knew himself to be. The reason for his questions is given in the words: I, thy servant, have heard that Saul seeks to come, etc.—Ver. 11. The two questions. The first is: Will the citizens of Keilah deliver me into his hand?—"Citizens" (בְּנֵי עִיר) comp. Josh. xxiv. 11, "citizens" of Jericho, 2 Sam. xxi. 12; Judg. ix. 6. That this question stands first is certainly surprising, since logically this position belongs to the second question: Will Saul come down? We cannot regard this as a mere inconcinnity in the narrative. We may see in it the expression of David's excited state of mind. Thenius' proposed reading in order to secure logical arrangement in the two questions, namely: "Saul comes . . . to destroy the city, in order that the citizens of Keilah may deliver me into his hand" (he omits the suffix in בְּנֵי עִיר in ver. 10 and for בְּנֵי עִיר reads הָעָר) is all the more hazardous and untenable, as no version gives any hint for such a reading.—The divine answer, which is affirmative, refers only to the second question. Therefore the first question is repeated in ver. 12, and is then answered in the affirmative. There is thus a sort of chiasm or crossing in the order of the questions and answers. Ver. 13. The certainty that Saul will come with an army, and that the men of Keilah will treacherously deliver him up,* determines David to depart with his band (about six hundred men) before Saul can carry out his plan. They went about whither they went, "whither their way led them" (Maurer), as chance circumstances required, without fixed plan or aim. A mode of warfare by means of scouts and spies now arose between the two men. They have precise information of each other's plans and enterprises. Saul soon learns that David has escaped from Keilah, and accordingly abandons his intended march thither.

* [Read: "When Abiathar, etc. fled to David, the ephod was in his hand, and he came down to Keilah."—Ta.]

Vers. 14. David in the wilderness of Ziph and the treachery of the Ziphites towards him. Ver. 14. David's next place of abode is in general the wilderness, that is, of Judah, and its sheltering heights; but "the mountain in the wilderness of Ziph" is specially mentioned as a more permanent dwelling-place. Ziph (different from the place named in Josh. xv. 24, which lay southwest of Arad), perhaps the present Kuseifeh (Rob. III., 184, 188 [Am. ed., II., 200]) Josh. xv. 55, lay farther north on the highland, about eight miles southeast of Hebron; see Robins., II., 47 [Am. ed., I., 492] who found there a hill, Tell Zif, and near by considerable ruins of old fortifications. [Mr. Grove, who formerly objected to Robinson's conjecture, now accepts it, but puts Zif (= Ziph) three miles south of Hebron. See his Art. in Smith's Bib. Dict., and Dr. Hackett's note in Am. ed.—Tr.] Individual parts of the great wilderness of Judah, which extended from the north of Judah to the Amorite mountain in the south between the mountains of Judah and the Dead Sea, were named from the various cities on the border of the mountains and the wilderness; so, besides the wilderness of Ziph, the wilderness of Maon, whither David afterwards went from Ziph (ver. 25). The mountain in the wilderness of Ziph is probably the mount Hachilah of ver. 19. The general remark is here proleptically made that all Saul's attempts against David were vain. Saul sought him every day, not: throughout his life (Keil), but = continually; but God gave him not into his (Saul's) hands.—David was under the special protection of God. These words form the contrast to Saul's word, ver. 7: "God has rejected [delivered] him into my hand." After the general remark on the failure of Saul's continued attempts follows (ver. 15) the mention of special cases, and the description of David's persecution. Thus connected with the preceding this verse (15)

* אָמַדוּ omodo—comp. אָמַר dicendo, "saying." The Inf. with ל is often used to introduce a subordinate circumstance. Ew. §280 d. Comp. 1 Ki. xvi. 7; Ps. lxxviii. 18; Izai. 5; 1 Chr. xii. 8; Prov. xxvi. 2; Joel ii. 28.

* [They act, perhaps, partly from attachment to Saul, partly from policy.—Tr.]

is not a "useless repetition" (Then.); for, after the statement that Saul pursued David, it is here first declared that David received information of this pursuit, and then David's retreat in the wilderness is more exactly described by the word "wood," or thick wood (חֹרֶשׁ, from חָרַשׁ, with הַ parag.). Here, too, the forest is David's chief means of concealment. Perhaps the word is also a proper name [Horesh], so called from the forests, of which there is now no trace in that region.—Vers. 16-18. Here is related how Jonathan comforted and strengthened David, when the latter, having heard of Saul's attempts against him, greatly needed consolation. There is no ground for regarding this (Then.) as merely the essential content of the traditional narration of Jonathan's secret interview with David in ch. xx. It is another interview of Jonathan with his friend, whose distress and danger led him to hasten to him in order by consoling and encouraging words to give him the most precious proof of his faithful friendship.* The fact is especially emphasized that Jonathan went to David into the wood; there they could be safest from Saul. He strengthened his hand in God; that is, he revived his sunken courage (comp. Neh. xii. 18), by pointing to the divine promises, the divine protection, and the great things that God had in store for him. Not wholly correct and exhaustive is Clericus' remark: "he drew consolation from his innocence and God's promises."—Ver. 17. The words of Jonathan, explaining what was just before said. Fear not, is the key-note of Jonathan's address. As ground of which he points 1) to God's almighty help: Saul's hand will not find thee,—he is firmly convinced that he (David) is under God's protection, and that therefore Saul can gain no advantage over him,—and 2) to the fixed divine decree: Thou wilt be king over Israel; Jonathan was certain through divine illumination that David was called by the Lord to be king of Israel, and could therefore console and encourage him; for Saul could not make void God's counsel and will (comp. xx. 13 sq.). I shall be next to thee,—herein Jonathan shows 1) his absolute willingness to resign all claim to the throne, and 2) his hope that David will confer on him as a subject the place nearest in association to himself. And so also Saul knows, my father is sure that thou wilt be king. Saul must therefore have already learned this through the voice of God and of the people.—Ver. 18. A new covenant is made by the two men, comp. ch. xx. 16 sq., 42. Here, as there, the parting is briefly and vividly described: David remained in the thicket—Jonathan went his way home. [The two friends meet no more in life. How it would have been if Jonathan had lived we cannot tell; but all possible complications were avoided by his death. His life thus presents an untarnished picture of pure, self-denying friendship. This parting is one of the many dramatic situations that occur in this Book.—Tr.]

Vers. 19-24 a. The Ziphites betray to Saul David's abode among them; Saul forms with the betrayers his crafty scheme against David. Ver. 19 is connected with ver. 15, not with ver. 14

* [It is suggested in Bib.-Com. that Jonathan had informed David of his father's designs (ver. 15), but this is nowhere intimated.—Tr.]

(Thenius). "Ziphites," people of Ziph [without the Art.—Tr.] Some Ziphites went up to Saul to Gibeah to betray to him David's abode. The mountain Hachilah, with its wood and its rocks, lay "on the right of the desert," that is, south of the waste region which stretched out on the west of the Dead Sea within the steppe of Judah. The Article indicates the desert to be that well-known desert in this region, the designation being almost a proper name [written as nom. pr. "Jeshimon" in Eng. A. V.—Tr.] So in Num. xxi. 20; xxiii. 28, a desert is called "the desert" [Eng. A. V. Jeshimon]. This is the desert northeastern border of the Dead Sea.—Ver. 20. The lively tone of the address of the Ziphites shows that they were somewhat passionate adherents of Saul, and acquainted with his most secret desires. Two things they say to him: 1) Come down to us, for all thy desire to get David in thy power may now be fulfilled; 2) it is our affair to deliver him up to thee. [Bib.-Com. less well renders: "it is in our power," etc.—Tr.].—Ver. 21. The feeling expressed in Saul's answer agrees with the Ziphites' word as to his keen desire to come down to them. He invokes God's blessing on them for their offer and promise. He remains true to his illusion that David is attempting his throne and life, and so committing a crime against God. He imagines that he is in a dangerous situation, and that the Ziphites had compassion on him or sympathy with him in making him this offer.—Ver. 22. He directs them how to act in order to gain information of every retreat of David in his constant shifting of place. "Fix your mind, observe"

(supply נִבְּחֵם as in Judg. xii. 6; 2 Chr. xxix. 36). The heaping up of synonyms is no argument against this rendering; the conception "see" is not thrice expressed (Then.), but there is a gradation, Saul describing in an animated manner how they are to get information of David's abode: "Keep a good look-out still, that ye may learn, and that ye may see in what place his foot will be," that is, where he fixes himself in his wandering. "Who has seen him" refers to the last: "And see his place," etc. The words, in keeping with Saul's animated manner, are loosely put together, he having in mind the moment when the man who discovers David's abode comes to inform him. Saul affirms the necessity for this espionage in the remark: "for it is told me that he is very subtle." This trait of character in David agrees with what we otherwise know of him in this respect.—Ver. 23. Saul continues his directions, and cannot say enough (to satisfy himself) to exhort them to search in every nook and cranny. "Return to me unto what is certain," that is, when you have gotten certain information. Not till then will he go down with them. He confidently declares that he will then seize him among all the thousands of Judah. The Alaphim, thousands are, according to Num. i. 16; x. 4, the larger divisions of the twelve Tribes.—Ver. 24 a. The Ziphites went back to their region before Saul, who, according to the agreement, was to follow later.

Vers. 24 b-28. David retires to the wilderness of Maon, and is delivered from Saul.—Ver. 24 b. The wilderness of Maon lay farther south. The name still exists, = Main, eight miles southeast of Hebron; the distance from Ziph is therefore only six miles. Main lies on a conical hill, which commands a wide view, so that Rob. (II., 433 [Am. Ed., I., 493-495]) thence saw nine cities of the hill-country of Judah, Maon, Carmel, Ziph, Juttah, Jattir, Socho, Anab, Eshtemoa, and Hebron (Josh. xv. 48-55). On the character of the ground see Van de Velde II. 107 sq. [Mr. Grove in Smith's Bible Dict. thinks that the wilderness of Maon formed part of the larger region called the Arabah, rendered in Eng. A. V. I Sam. xxiii. 24, "the plain."—Tr. J.—David, doubtless in consequence of information received as to the designs of Saul and the Ziphites, betook himself to the wilderness of Maon.

Ver. 25. And Saul . . . went, namely, after he had gotten information from the Ziphites. The "rock," on which it is here presupposed that David was staying, and which was in the wilderness of Maon, is perhaps the conical hill of the present Main, whose summit is surrounded with ruins. He went down not (as Sept.) "into the rock," nor "to the rock" (Buns.), but "descended the rock," in order to conceal himself in the lowland or in the caves at its base. It is the same mountain that is mentioned in ver. 26, on opposite sides of which Saul and David found themselves. Here (ver. 26) David was sore troubled (סָרַח) to escape Saul, while, on his part, Saul attempted to surround and seize him.—Ver. 27. But suddenly, when David is in the greatest danger of being surrounded, Saul receives information of a new Philistine incursion. He must desist from farther pursuit. This was God's plan to save David. The Philistines had seized on the moment when Saul had withdrawn his men to the south in pursuit of David, to invade the upper part of the land.—Ver. 28. The place was called Sela hammahlekoth (סֵלַע הַפְּחִלְקוֹת). There are two explanations of the name: 1) rock of smoothness, that is, of escape, and 2) rock of dividings or divisions. The first (Ges., De Wette, Keil), takes the notion of "escape" from the signification of the verb (פָּחַל) "to be smooth," for which application, however, only Jer. xxxvii. 12, and that very doubtfully, can be adduced. Further the substantive here used never means "escape," but always "distribution" (Josh. xi. 23; xii. 7; xviii. 10; Ezek. xlviii. 29) and "division" (1 Chr. xxvi. 1; xxvii. 1; 2 Chr. xxxi. 17) and it must so be taken here. This explanation is favored also by the word "therefore," which clearly refers to the circumstantially related fact that the armies of Saul and David were separated, divided by the rock. Ewald's explanation: "lot of fate" (= פָּחַל) is unfounded. It accordingly means: "Rock of division." Cler.: "rock of divisions, where Saul and David were separated." The rock divided the two armies, held them asunder. Böttcher conjectures that the rock might originally from its nature have been called "rock of smoothness," and this name might afterwards from historical recollection have been made to refer to the movements of Saul and David, who according to ver. 26 had divided the rock-ground between them. Certainly this explanation of the name "Rock of dividings, partings," would be possible as respects the ground. But, by reason of the "therefore," the reference to Saul and David's relation to one another suits the connection better.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David did not seek, but received from the Lord's hand the opportunity by the march to Keilah to perform a heroic deed, and thus to win further consideration in the eyes of the people as a warrior blessed by God and crowned with glorious success. The king left the city open to the attacks of the Philistines. He neglected his duty as protector of his people against the hereditary foe, thinking only of revenging himself on David. Here also David was under God's protection, to which he humbly resigned himself. After he had at the Lord's command returned from Moab to Judah, he must, in the fact that the Philistines undisturbed besieged Keilah and carried off the grain, while Saul took no steps to oppose them, have recognized God's command to draw the sword for his people, especially as he was the king's general, though he had received no order from the king. But for his conscience and his assurance of faith, as well as for the certainty and success of the whole undertaking, he needed the divine authorization; if he had not the sanction of the theocratic king, he must have that of God Himself, since the question was of a matter important for the people of God and for the affairs of God's kingdom in Israel,—war against Israel's hereditary foe. He received the divine authorization and the promise of success through a twice affirmed divine oracle. By the divine promise he is inwardly certain of success. Even in straits and danger, he now with the Lord's support becomes the saviour of his people out of straits and danger. But in the deed of deliverance itself lies the seed of new suffering. The rescue of Keilah by David occasioned Saul's march to Keilah against David. The inhabitants of Keilah exhibit base ingratitude towards him. By God's word he learns what dangers here threaten him. By God's direction he again takes to flight to save himself from Saul—but the incursion of the Philistines, occasioned by Saul's march to the south, compels him to desist from following David, who thus escapes his persecutor. Thus this section exhibits David anew in the clearest light of divine guidance as the Chosen and Anointed of God: 1) submitting himself unconditionally to God's determining word and guiding will, and 2) guided directly by God's hand and determined in all his affairs by God's will and word.

2. Whatever may have been the form of the inquiry of God through the Urim and Thummim (which was attached to the ephod of the high-priest), yet in this section it is clearly and distinctly indicated that it was an embodied prayer to God for the revelation of His will, and only to such prayer was God's counsel and will thus revealed. One's own natural objection and other men's opposition to God's will must by this repeated questioning of the Lord and decision and confirmation of His will be most completely refuted and set aside. Flesh-and-blood's deliberations concerning what pertains to God's kingdom lead to indecision, doubt, timidity; taking counsel with God in direct access to His grace and truth makes the heart firm and the look clear, and gives true courage and victorious prowess, as is shown by the example of David, who repeatedly inquired of the Lord.

3. The teaching of the Ziphites forms the historical background of Ps. liv., the title of which refers its origin to David's thence resulting sorrowful experiences, 1 Sam. xxiii. 19 sq. In full accordance with his then dangerous situation and with a backward glance at God's wonderful help, he first utters a prayer for deliverance from wicked and ungodly enemies, vers. 3-5 (1-3), and then expresses his assurance of divine help, together with the promise of thanksgiving for deliverance, vers. 6-9 (4-7).

4. Out of these great experiences, in David's sorrowful life, of the grace and power, wisdom and justice, mercy and goodness of God, was developed in him and through him in his people that intelligence of faith and theological knowledge which we see in the Psalms and the prophetic writings.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 2. STARKE: God forsakes not those who seek Him (Ps. ix. 11 [10]). When we wish to begin any thing, we should first ask counsel of God.—Ver. 3. CRAMER: Flesh and blood trembles when at God's command we have to encounter danger. SCHMID: Corrupt human reason always has something which it opposes to the word of God.—Ver. 4. STARKE: When we have God's will on our side, we should not let ourselves be led astray by men (Acts xxi. 13, 14). The shield of the pious is with God, who helps pious hearts (Ps. vii. 11 [10]).—Ver. 5. CRAMER: In trouble God yet sometimes gives a joyous day, and after the troublous storm He shows a glimpse of His grace (Eccl. vii. 14).—Ver. 7. OSIANDER: Hypocrites have God's name in the mouth, but the devil always in the heart. And although they speak of God, yet they have always a bloody mind against God's people (Ps. i. 16, 17).—Vers. 11, 12. God foresees not only what will really happen, but also what would follow if this and that should happen. His omniscience and foreknowledge is a boundless and bottomless sea (Acts xxvii. 24-31).—The greatest benefits are often requited with the greatest ingratitude, and this is a shameful evil among men, which then most betrays itself when they should be thankful.—SCHLIER: True thankfulness which fears God knows well how to find out the right. Let us be thankful in all things! We need not for that reason do wrong when the point is to be thankful, but when true thankfulness fills the heart there open up ways enough to show it.—Ver. 16 sq. OSIANDER: It is a work acceptable to God to comfort the afflicted (Isa. xl. 1; 1 Thess. v. 14).—God is wont always to refresh again His people who are in danger, that they may not utterly sink under the cross (2 Cor. vii. 6).—STARKE: True friendship must be grounded in communion with God. Real love does not diminish, but increases.—SCHLIER: God lets a David be persecuted—lets him be driven about like a hunted animal; but at His own time He also sends him a Jonathan with friendly words. And so God the Lord still always does to all His servants.—F. W. KRUM-

MACHER: The picture of this pair of friends—a picture nobler and more exalting than that of the heathen Dioscuri, beams inextinguishably in the heaven of the church, as a kindling and inspiring ideal of unfeigned manly friendship, sanctified in God.—Vers. 25 sq. STARKE: God never leaves one that loves Him without a cross, and when one cross has ceased, another is at once ready (Ps. lxxiii. 14).—OSIANDER: God often lets His people fall into extreme need, so that they can neither counsel nor help themselves, in order that the divine help may be so much the more recognized and honored (Matt. viii. 25).—CRAMER: God lets nothing so bad happen, but that He knows how to make out of it something good (Gen. l. 20).—WUERT. BIB.: Even enemies must serve our God in reserving His believing children from peril or need (2 Pet. ii. 9).—Ver. 28. OSIANDER: The benefits of God we should with thankful mind keep in lively remembrance (Ps. ciii. 2).—SCHLIER: Why is it that the Lord very often helps only when the need has reached its height! It is in order that we may give the honor to the Lord alone.—F. W. KRUMMACHER: David was delivered "at the last hour," it is true; but this never strikes too late for the Lord still to furnish in it the proof to those that trust in Him, that His word is Yea and Amen when it says, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

J. DISSELHOFF: How trying days should be borne after God's heart: 1) By despairing of all self-help and believingly fleeing to God's heart, there to learn supplication and thanksgiving. 2) By opening heart and hand amid our own need for others' need. 3) By contending with the weapons of gentleness and humility against the supposed or real authors of the trials.

[Vers. 7-13. David at Keilah. 1) Saul eagerly arranges to seize him: a) Rejoicing beforehand in a success taken for granted. "Counting the chickens," etc.; b) Inferring that God was on his side from the mere prospect of a single success; misinterpreting Providence, comp. xxiv. 4. 2) The citizens of Keilah ready to betray him—doubtless remembering Nob; Ingratitude—which always finds itself some excuse. 3) David sees reason to fear them, and seeks divine direction: a) He speaks humbly as God's servant; b) He earnestly implores direction. Prayer. In answer to humble and earnest prayer, God often delivers from ungrateful friends and scheming foes.

[Vers. 16-18. The last meeting of Jonathan and David: 1) David feeble and fearful ("strengthened," "fear not"). Naturally discouraged by cowardly ingratitude, malignant hostility, weary wandering, uncertainty of life. 2) Jonathan encourages him: a) By the mere fact of coming to meet him through difficulties and dangers; b) By piously pointing him to God; c) By confident assurances of preservation and triumph; d) By declaring that his great enemy himself knows this, comp. xxiv. 20; e) By avowing his own willingness to be second to David. 3) They renew their league of friendship before the Lord (comp. xviii. 3; xx. 16, 42). They part to meet no more on earth. Jonathan is next mentioned in David's pathetic lament (2 Sam. i. 17-27).

[Vers. 25-27. David's narrow escape: 1) He is betrayed by men of his own tribe (ver. 19), and skilful plans are laid to apprehend him (vers. 22-3). 2) Hard pressed, fleeing in haste, surrounded (ver. 26). 3) Prays to God for help and deliverance (Psalm liv.). 4) Strangely delivered at the last moment by overruling Providence (ver. 27). —T_h.]

VI. David in the Wilderness of Engedi. He spares Saul in the cave. His conversation with Saul.

CHAP. XXIV. [Eng. A. V. XXIII. 29—XXIV. 22].

- 29 (1) AND David went up from thence and dwelt in [ins. the] strongholds at [of] Engedi.¹ And it came to pass, when Saul was returned from following the Philistines, that it was told him, saying, Behold, David is in the wilderness of Engedi. Then [And] Saul took three thousand chosen men [men chosen] out of all Israel, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats.² And he came to the sheep-cotes by [on] the way, where [and there] was a cave, and Saul went in to cover his feet;³ and David and his men remained [were abiding] in the sides of the cave. And the men of David said unto him, Behold the day of which the Lord [Jehovah] said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, that thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good unto thee. Then [And] David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily. And it came to pass afterward that David's heart smote him because he had cut off Saul's skirt.⁴ And he said unto his men, The Lord [Jehovah] forbid⁵ that I should do this thing unto my master [lord], the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing [for] he is the anointed of the Lord [Jehovah]. So [And] David stayed⁶ his servants [men] with these [om. these] words, and suffered them not to rise against Saul. But [And] Saul rose up out of the cave, and went on his way.
- 8 (9) David also [And David] arose afterward and went out of the cave and cried after Saul, saying, My lord the king. And when [om. when] Saul looked behind him, [ins. and] David stooped with his face to the earth and bowed himself. And David said to Saul, Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt? Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the Lord [Jehovah] had [om. had] delivered thee to-day into my hand in the cave, and some bade⁷ me kill thee; but [and] mine eye spared thee, and I said, I will not put forth my hand against my lord, for he

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ [Ver. 29 (1). See the various VSS. in this verse as an illustration of the uncertainty in proper names.—T_h.]
² [Ver. 2 (3). "On the face of the rocks." Possibly we have here a proper name, the Jeelim or Ibez-rocks.—T_h.]
³ [Ver. 3 (4). Explained in all the VSS. as — τὰς φουκὰς ἐκπίπτει ποιήσασθαι (so Erdmann), except Syr., which has "to sleep."—T_h.]
⁴ [Ver. 5 (6). All ancient VSS., except Chald., read: "the skirt of Saul's robe," and so some MSS. In the present Heb. text we should expect the Art. before רִיבֹן, and, apparently, we should either supply the Art., or adopt the reading of the VSS.—T_h.]
⁵ [Ver. 6 (7). Literally: "a profane thing be it to me from Jehovah."—T_h.]
⁶ [Ver. 7 (8). This word שָׁמַע is variously rendered by the VSS.: συνέλαλεον, παρέλαλεον, ἔπεισαν, ἠπάτησαν, Chald. "quieted" (ܫܡܥܐ), Syr. "caused to repent, turned aside" (so Eng. A. V.), Arab. "threateningly admonished," Vulg. "confregit." Levy suggests שָׁמַע as the reading of the Vat. Sept. (ἔπεισε). The Heb. word contains a strong figure (so Gesen. and Erdmann) "cut up"—"hindered, restrained."—T_h.]
⁷ [Ver. 9 (10). Or: "hearkenest thou to?"—T_h.]
⁸ [Ver. 10 (11). מָה, indefinite as in xxiii. 22 (Maurer), so Syr., Arab., Chald. The phrase, however, presents some difficulties. It is objected (Bib. Com.) that the subject of מָה in the present Heb. text is naturally "Jehovah," so that it would read: "and Jehovah said (commanded) to kill thee;" but this is not necessarily required by the grammar, and is in David's mouth impossible (Bib. Com.). Thenius rejects the sense of "command" here as belonging to later Heb. (but it is found in 2 Sam. I. 18; xvi. 11), and adopts the reading מָה מָה, 7.

- 11 (12) is the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed. Moreover [And] my father,⁹ see, yea see the skirt of thy robe in my hand; for, in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe and killed thee not, know thou and see that there is neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, and I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest¹⁰ my soul to take it. The Lord [Jehovah] judge between me and thee, and the Lord [Jehovah] avenge me of thee; but my hand shall not be upon thee.
- 13 (14) As¹¹ saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked.
- 14 (15) But my hand shall not be upon thee. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a [one]¹² flea.
- 15 (16) The Lord therefore [And Jehovah] be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver [judge]¹³ me out of thine hand.
- 16 (17) And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words
- 17 (18) unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And Saul lifted up his voice and wept. And he said to David, Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded [done]¹⁴ me good, whereas [and] I have rewarded [done] thee evil. And thou hast showed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me,¹⁵ forasmuch as when the Lord [Jehovah] had [om. had] delivered me into thine hand, thou killedst me not. For, if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? wherefore the Lord [Jehovah] reward thee good for that [what] thou hast done unto me this day.¹⁶ And now, behold I know well [om. well] that thou shalt surely be king,¹⁷ and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand. Swear now therefore unto me by the Lord [Jehovah] that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me,
- 22 (23) and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house. And David sware unto Saul. And Saul went home [to his house], but [and] David and his men gat them up into¹⁸ the hold.

"I did not wish," after the Sept. οὐκ ἠθουλήθη, adding that the Heb. text is most readily explained from the Vulg.: "et cogitavi ut occiderem te," whence Heb. וְאִנִּי לֹא חָפְצִי (so Bib. Com.). Both these readings (and י with Impf.)

Wellhausen rejects, and reads after Sept. וְאִנִּי לֹא חָפְצִי (as in 1 Sam. viii. 19), which is more probable from the form (the present Heb. might easily come from it), and gives a good sense. We cannot infer anything as to the text from Josephus' omission of this clause.—T_a.

⁹ [Ver. 11 (12). The mutilation of the Sept. here loses the expression of excitement which is so natural to the occasion.—T_a.]

¹⁰ Ver. 11 (12). Sept. διεσπείρει—"bindest in toils"—"huntest."—T_a.]

¹¹ [Ver. 13 (14). Wellhausen holds this verse to be an interpolation because its last clause is identical with the last clause of the preceding verse; but would not this repetition here be very natural?—T_a.]

¹² [Ver. 14 (15). The rendering "one" for אֶחָד is more lively, yet not linguistically necessary; the numeral is sometimes used as Indef. Art., as in 1 Sam. i. 1.—T_a.]

¹³ [Ver. 15 (16). Of the three words here rendered "judge" the second and third are the same in the Heb. שָׁפַט, indicating the act of a governor-judge) and the first different from these (שָׁפַט—a judicial officer).—T_a.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 17 (18). The sense of retribution is sometimes, but not always found in this word (שָׁפַט).—T_a.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 18 (19). This clause seems awkward. We would expect: "thou hast showed thy willingness to deal well," or simply: "thou hast dealt well," for the "showing" and the "dealing" are identical in content; nor does the Sept. ἀφ' ἧς help. Perhaps we should render: "Thou hast showed this day that thou dealest well," that is, that such is thy purpose and policy.—T_a.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 19 (20). On this text see Erdmann in the Exposition.—T_a.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 20 (22). Here one MS. and Arab. add אִתִּי, "after me," an obvious supplement.—T_a.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 22 (23). Heb. עָלָיו, "upon," but thirty MSS. read לָהּ, "to."—T_a.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-8 [29-7]. David's abode in Engedi and his meeting there with Saul in a cave.—Ver. 1 [29]. Engedi the present Ain Jidy (Jeddi), "Fountain of the kid" ('Eyyadi, 'Eyyadai, Ptol. 5, 16, 8), about the middle of the west shore of the Dead Sea, about thirteen miles north-east of Maon on the border of the wilderness of Judah, in a mountainous region with limestone-soil, with precipitous rocks and deep gorges which run towards the Dead Sea, and with many caves in the limestone-hills. It belonged to the then few very fruitful regions of the wilderness of Judah.—[For a good account of Engedi with its magnificent scenery, its frightful and dangerous rock-passes and its many roomy caverns, see Bib. Com. in loco. Thomson, in "The Land and the Book," speaks of the wild goats still to be found there.—T_a.]—Ver. 2 [1] sq. The obstinacy of Saul's adherence to his bloody plan against David appears in the fact that immediately after his campaign against the Philistines, perhaps even before they were completely overthrown, he again sends out spies against David, and sets out with a large body of warriors (3000) in order to seize him.

He sees in him a rival king, against whom he must march fully equipped, and whom he must destroy by a superior force of disciplined troops. The ibex-rocks, so called by the people perhaps, because from their steepness and wildness the ibexes or wild-goats could subsist there. See Rob. II. 432 [Am. Ed. I. 500]. Mountain-goats still abound there. In the hardly accessible gorges and caves Saul with his men sought David and his followers, rightly supposing that the latter, being few in number, would seek to hide in this region so full of hiding-places. There were and are caves there wherein thousands might hide. —The words: The sheepcotes on the way indicate (like the "ibex-rocks") a well-known locality, which from its fruitfulness in this otherwise waste region served for the abode of flocks. [Thomson saw many sheepfolds at the mouths of caves; they were made by piling stones up in a circle and covering them with thorns.—Tr.]. Saul looks out a cave in the vicinity to over his feet, that is, to obey a call of nature, when the Orientals usually cover their feet (the ancient Vss. [except Syr.], Keil, Then.), not: "to sleep" (Mich., Ew. [Syr.]). David and his men abode within or in the back of the cave [ver. 4 (3)], while Saul was in front not far from the entrance. The description supposes a very large cave, of such as are numerous there. But whether this cave is to be identified (as Van de Velde supposes) with the one near the village Chareitun in the Wady of the same name southwest of the Frank Mountain and north-east of Tekoa (it is a limestone arch with many side-passages and wide dark rear-spaces) is uncertain, inasmuch as the latter on account of its proximity to Tekoa would be reckoned to the wilderness of Tekoa rather than to the wilderness of Engedi, and besides is from fourteen to nineteen miles from Engedi, which does not seem to have been the case with the one here described. [De Sauley (B. Com.) suggests Bir-el-Mauquouchieh near Wady Hasasa as the place.—Tr.].—Ver. 5 [4]. David's men advise him to seize this opportunity, given him, as they think, by God, to rid himself of his deadly foe. See, this is the day of which the Lord said to thee.—The Lord's "saying" can here be understood only in the general sense of the divine ordering of this favorable opportunity. This day, with its fortunate meeting, seemed to them a hint and direction from God. A reference to a definite divine declaration,* given to David through a prophet (Clericus: "There would come a time when, his enemies all conquered and prostrate, he would peacefully govern Israel") is not in the words themselves.—Saul had laid aside his upper garment [robe] for his present purpose [or, remaining on him, it may have been spread out.—Tr.]. The situation was such that David could, without being observed, cut off a corner of the upper garment. David wished to have in hand this sign that Saul had been defenceless in his power, and that he could have killed him, in order to use it with Saul at the proper time. His heart smote him, not with fright at the bold undertaking (Then., Ew.), for the deed was already done, but in the ethical sense: his conscience smote him. From what follows it is clear that David regarded Saul's person as sacred; he reproached himself with having secretly cut off a piece of his garment, and thus failed in reverence for his person. Cler.: "David was afraid that Saul would take this, though a clear sign of (David's) magnanimity, in bad part, and regard it as a violation of his royal majesty."—Ver. 7 [6]. The decisive and solemn rejection of the advice of the warriors to assail Saul. Be it far from me from the Lord, that is, on the Lord's account; it is a religious ground which restrains him from following the advice of his men. For God's sake he will not do it, because Saul is the anointed of the Lord, a person made sacred by the Lord. And therefore also David could not have received command from the Lord to deal with Saul according to his good pleasure.—Ver. 8 [7]. "David cut down his men with words" (עָרַף "to rend, cut to pieces," then figuratively "cut down with words" verbis dilaceravit), Luther "beat back" (abweisen), too weak [so Eng. A. V. "stayed."—Tr.]; Berl. Bib. better: "pulled away" (abreissen). David was obliged to hold back his men with reproving words from taking bloody vengeance on Saul. We must suppose that Saul went alone into the cave at a distance from his people, and did not suspect that such a body of men lay immediately behind his back.

Vers. 9–23 [8–22]. The conversation of David and Saul at a distance.—Ver. 9 [8]. David uses this God-given opportunity to assure his persecutor of his innocence, and to lodge a sting in his conscience. His words are a declaration (wrung out by suffering) from heart to heart, from conscience to conscience. The address: My Lord, O king! indicates the double point of view whence David in what follows declares by deed and by word his relation and attitude to Saul. He recognizes and honors Saul as his lord to whom he feels himself bound to be subject; in calling him his lord he declares himself guiltless of insurrection against him. In the king he sees the anointed of the Lord, the bearer of the holy theocratic office, in which character he was inviolable. In calling him king he affirms that he is far from attacking his person and working him harm. To this address corresponds David's behaviour, his gesture of deepest reverence: he bent his face to the earth and bowed himself.—Ver. 10 [9]. David refers first to the calumnies by which he had been blackened to Saul as his enemy seeking his destruction. Compare the title of Ps. vii., which refers to the present situation; there were calumniating go-betweens, one of whom was the otherwise unknown Benjamite Cush, who stood, therefore, in the same category with the Ziphites and Doeg. Saul hearkened to these slanders and believed them, because his heart was full of mistrust and hate against David.—Ver. 11 [10]. David expressly represents it as a divinely ordered circumstance that Saul was put into his power. He also expressly affirms that the temptation to kill him was presented to him (נִסָּה "one said" as in xxiii. 22), but at the same time declares that he spared him; to the "spared" of the Heb. supply "my eye" [so Eng. A. V.—Tr.], as in Gen. xiv. 20; Deut. vii. 16 (so most expositors) or

* [Some cite 1 Sam. xv. 28; xvi. 1, 12, and also xx. 15; xxiii. 17, but it is not probable that David's men would know these. Of any other promise we have no mention.—Tr.]

"my hand" or "my soul" (Cler.). He further gives the reason which deterred him from laying hand on Saul, his lord: for he is the Lord's anointed.—By the royal anointing, as a divine act, Saul's person was for him sacred, inviolable.—Ver. 12 [11]. And my father; with this address David passes from his relation to Saul as king to the divinely ordered relation which he occupied towards him as father. To this "my father" answers Saul's "my son." David calls Saul father not (as Grotius thinks) because he was his father-in-law, but to indicate the pious* feeling which so fills his heart as he speaks, that he involuntarily breaks out into this address. See ver. 17 [16] and xxvi. 17.—See, yea see.—A lively introduction of the factual proof of what he had just said that Saul had been given into his hand so that he could have done to him what he would. The "yea" (Ω) is here intensive, not merely copulative (Ges. § 155, 2 a). The skirt of the upper garment in David's hand is to be at the same time ocular proof that David is innocent of the wicked accusations brought against him by the calumniators. With his innocence, set forth in heaped up words: "in my hand is no evil nor transgression, and I have not sinned against thee," he next contrasts (with the adversative phrase "and thou" and in curt, incisive words) Saul's criminal conduct towards him: Thou workest after my soul, properly "huntest my soul;" Cler.: "A very suitable phrase concerning a man whom his enemy was pursuing like a beast over mountains and forests;" Sept.: "bindest," with allusion to the nets of the hunter, and so, in accordance with this figure, it is added: to take it, Vulg. ut auferas eam.—Ver. 13 [12] is similarly to be taken from the point of view that he has no evil design against Saul.—The Lord will judge between me and thee, that is, though the Lord gave thee into my hand, I attempted, and shall attempt nothing against thee, because I leave the decision wholly to the Lord. Here speaks submission to God's will, leaving to him the decision concerning right and wrong, innocence and guilt. And the Lord will avenge me of thee,—the expression of David's confidence that for his guilty conduct towards his (David's) innocence Saul will not go unpunished, that against him will be manifested the weight of the divine punitive justice.—But my hand shall not be against thee, as I have hitherto been, so I will continue to be pure from crime against thee; God's hand will punish thy injustice towards me, my hand shall not touch thee.—Ver. 14 [13]. David grounds this declaration of innocence on the reference to its inner foundation and root by means of an "old proverb:" from the evil comes evil, evil doing springs from an evil heart. Cler. well explains: "David means to say that if he had been guilty of conspiracy against the king, he would not have neglected this favorable opportunity to kill him, since men usually indulge their feelings, and from a mind guilty of conspiracy nothing but corresponding deeds could come forth." Compare the Greek proverb: κακὸν κόρακος κακὸν ᾠόν [“from a bad raven a bad egg,” see Matt. vii. 15-20.—Tr.]—Grotius: "Actions usually correspond to the quality of the mind." The repetition of the words: "but my hand shall not be against thee," after the proverb is the declaration of innocence: "I am not wicked and criminal, and, therefore, according to the old proverb, I shall undertake and do nothing evil against thee, wreak no vengeance on thee."—Ver. 15 [14] David points out how foolish, superfluous and unroyal is Saul's persecuting campaign against a mean, undangerous man like him. Grot.: "A very pathetic appeal and a proof of David's very great modesty." Comp. Ps. cxxxi. The king of Israel is with special emphasis made to follow the "after whom?" in contrast with the position and significance of the person persecuted by him. With the king of Israel adorned with honor and power David contrasts himself under the figure of a dead dog: 1) as a despised, lowly, qualitatively insignificant man, comp. xvii. 43; 2 Sam. iii. 8, where the figure of a dog represents a man despicable in the eyes of one who is, or is supposed to be of high standing; 2) as a harmless, or in no wise dangerous man, comp. the figure of the dead dog, 2 Sam. ix. 8; xvi. 9.—The comparison with the flea adds the idea of the quantitatively petty, mean, comp. xxvi. 20. "Wherefore," would David say, "O thou mighty king of Israel, dost thou summon thy army against so little and insignificant a man?" Berl. Bib.: "against a single flea, which is not easily caught, and easily escapes, and if it is caught, is poor game for a royal hunter." No more than a dead dog can harm, and a flea endanger thee, am I, apart from the fact that I have no wish thereto, in position to work thee destruction.—Ver. 16 [15]. Therefore—because Saul persecutes him unjustly as an innocent man, and foolishly as an undangerous man, because he, David, is unjustly slandered and persecuted as a malicious enemy of Saul—he appeals to the Judge who alone is just and gives success to a righteous cause. Two things David here says: 1) he repeats his appeal to the judicial decision of the Lord (ver. 13 [12]), and 2) declares his firm conviction that the Lord will by such decision help him to his rights against Saul: He will conduct my cause, that is, the just God, before whom I am not only consciously, but really innocent, will be my advocate, undertake my cause; and do me justice from thy hand, I shall be delivered out of thy hand, freed from the sufferings which thou preparest me. A zeugmatic construction.—[Rather a pregnant construction: "will judge me (and thus deliver me) from thy hand."—Tr.]*

Ver. 17 [16]. Saul's answer to these words of David shows that they deeply and powerfully

* [Phillipson: "This address of David has so much natural eloquence, so much glow, and such a tone of conviction, that no one who has any sense for the simple beauties of the Bible can read it without being moved. The whole situation, too, is noble: David, standing on the rocky height in the desert, holding on high the trophy of his magnanimity, looking at and addressing the melancholy Saul, whom he loved as a father, honored as king, revered as the Lord's Anointed, who yet without ground hated him and persecuted him with relentless and deadly zeal—using the opportunity with rapid words, which expressed his deepest feelings, to touch the heart of his enemy—he himself full of humility, oppressed by indescribable suffering and weighed down by the feeling of powerlessness, yet inspired by the consciousness of a noble deed."—Tr.]

* [That is the reverence, the pietas of the Romans.—Tr.]

impressed his mind and sharply pricked his conscience. The address: Is that thy voice, my son David? indicates by its soft, mild tone that David's words, issuing from a deeply-moved heart, and in the "my father" and "thou king of Israel, my lord," expressing profound piety and reverence, had struck a chord in Saul's inner life on the side of feeling and disposition, which he could not help letting sound forth in this address counter to the fierceness and hate that otherwise possessed him. The sign of this sudden awakening of nobler feeling is Saul's weeping aloud. There is no hypocrisy or pretence here. Saul, tossed powerless hither and thither by fierce passions without self-control and without harmony of soul-life, is here laid hold of in a hidden corner of his heart, where he was still accessible to the power of truth, and involuntarily yields to this nobler arousing of his soul, though it is not destined to be permanent.—Ver. 18 [17]. On this psychologically so significant address follows the ethically so important confession: Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast done me good, and I have done thee evil.—This proves that his conscience was touched by David's word, which had so sharply contrasted innocence and baseless persecution, righteousness and unrighteousness. Saul must do honor to the truth; the overwhelming force of David's words, founded in truth, forces this confession from him; though a thorough and permanent change for the better is not thereby effected in his heart. Grotius: "The confession is unwillingly extorted, the mind being nothing bettered." But we see from this of how high a degree of good Saul was capable, if he had been willing to deny himself. The mode in which David's word so struck his conscience that he was compelled involuntarily to acknowledge his innocence and the justice of his cause is indicated by his own words; it was his perception of the glaring contrast between his evil, destructive operations against David, and the wholly opposite conduct of the latter, who did only good to the hostile king: The requital of evil with good. Saul thinks of all the good that David had done him by his faithful service. By right moral conduct, absolutely accordant with God's holy will, and simple avowal springing from truth and from the heart, a deep impression for the better may under certain circumstances be made on the corruptest and most hardened nature.—Ver. 19 [18]. In proof of this affirmation Saul adduces David's present behaviour, which is distinguished from the preceding: "thou hast done me good."—And thou hast to-day showed, hast given a proof of what good thou hast done to me, namely therein, that the Lord had delivered me into thy hand; Saul also here recognizes the fact that it was God's hand that had to-day delivered him into David's hand, in contrast with his previous declarations that God had given David into his hand, xxiii. 7.—But thou didst not kill me, thou didst not use the opportunity given thee by God's providence, because thou wishest not to avenge thyself on me, and thinkest only good towards me. All this is a splendid justification of David and confirmation of the assertions that he made to Saul.—Ver. 20 [19]. Thenius, from the Sept., Syr. and Arab., undertakes to restore the supposed original text of this verse as follows: 1) after "his enemy," we are to hold, stood originally "in straits" (מַצְרָה). Thenius thinks this reading "necessary," since one might find his enemy without having opportunity to hurt him; but this opportunity is especially afforded when he finds him in angustia, "in straits." But this is a hair-splitting and far-fetched argument, since the connection does not leave it doubtful what is meant by finding the enemy. "Find" here as in xxiii. 17; Ps. xxi. 9 [8]; Isa. x. 10, means so to come upon as to affect with suffering or punishment,—"get into one's power." 2) After מַצְרָה [Eng. A. V. after "well away."—Ta.] Then. supposes "the Lord will reward him good" to have fallen away, and 3) instead of the last words of the verse, to have originally stood: "the Lord reward thee good for what thou hast to-day done to me." But the authority of the versions is the less decisive here, because their purpose is obvious, to avoid a harshness and produce conformity. They included the whole sentence in the protasis: "if one find his enemy and send him away," and there was no apodosis. To supply this apodosis and correspondingly to express the good which Saul afterwards wishes David, they added: "the Lord will reward him good."—The words, as they stand in the text, give even according to Thenius a "tolerable sense;" yea more, they give a satisfactory sense if we translate: If one find his enemy, will he let him go on a good way (a peaceful, unimperilled way)? that is, it is usual, when one has his enemy in his power, not to let him go in peace untouched. In the lively feeling with which Saul speaks, the omission of the intermediate thought, the expression of which might be expected, namely, "so hast thou not acted towards me," is quite natural. The negative answer to this question is omitted (an omission psychologically easily understood), and immediately follows the wish: The Lord reward thee good for what thou hast this day done to me. (So Maur., De Wette, Buns., Keil.) That Saul at this moment truly and honestly meant these words, is beyond doubt; it is the witness not only of a bright, but also of a good moment in his inner life, though indeed no deep and permanent improvement followed. Under the influence of David's presence and words the evil spirit had for a moment yielded to the good.—Ver. 21 [20] sq. Following the better impulse of his heart Saul sees clearly that the theocratic kingship will pass from him and his house to David, and only through him as its future bearer be permanently established. How did Saul come to this knowledge which he here expresses, and which Jonathan had already affirmed that his father had (xxiii. 17)? Not through direct divine revelation, but by the observation that all his undertakings against David were unsuccessful, and that David in respect to his persecutions was under special divine protection, coupled with the recollection of what Samuel had once said to him in the name of God respecting his rejection for disobedience. The declaration of his conscience: "Thou art rejected by God" was confirmed by the manifest signs of divine guidance and protection in David's life, and by the imposing moral power of David's conduct. Cler.: "From this great magnanimity of David he concluded that a man who was much superior in soul to kings could not but reign." Two things he says: 1) "Thou wilt become king," and 2) "in thy hand the kingdom will be permanently established," not "will be raised up, grow, increase" (Gramb.). So far has the dark cloud of envy and hate passed away from Saul's soul, that he not only recognizes and affirms David's future kingship, but to him as future king prefers a request in the form of an adjuration, that he would show royal kindness and mercy to his house and name. David gave him the promise in an oath that he would not after his death exterminate his posterity, as was often the case in changes of dynasty in the East, and, as Keil well points out, repeatedly occurred also in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. 1 Kings xv. 28 sq.; xvi. 11 sq.; 2 Kings x. Similar request by Jonathan xx. 15. [Bib.-Com.: "The deep genealogical feeling of the Israelites breaks out here as so often elsewhere." Saul's declaration as to David's future kingship is not divine prophecy, but human foresight.—TR.]—Ver. 23 [22]. The description of the interview, so significant for both parties to it, concludes with the statement that Saul went to his residence, while David with his men went up into the strong and secure mountain-heights. The latter did not return home, because he could not expect that Saul would retain this disposition and essentially change his bearing towards him.—Cler.: "He knew Saul's changeable and perfidious nature, and was afraid of his snares." [Nor, apparently, did Saul invite or expect him to go home. His presence at court would have been embarrassing; his training in the fields is to continue yet some time.—TR.]

* [On this verse and its translation see "Text. and Gram."—Ta.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. This incident of David's life in ch. xxiv. (not xxvi.) forms the basis of Ps. vii. (of which he is the author), which is rich in references to this event and whose title: "Shiggaion of David which he sang to the Lord concerning the words of Cush the Benjaminite," giving the slanderous accusations of this man as the occasion of the Psalm, presents a situation identical with that of ver. 10 [9] of ch. xxiv. There were men who, by all sorts of slanders, blackened David with Saul, and inflamed his hate against him. Among these, according to the title, was the Benjaminite Cush. The Benjaminites, on account of the tribal relationship, were pronounced adherents of Saul, and he had bound them to him by all sorts of favors (comp. xxii. 7). Cush is not a symbolical name for a man of black wickedness, namely here for Saul (to whose father's name Kish, Hengstenberg and Kimchi see an allusion), but the proper name of a Benjaminite man, one of those slanderers and go-betweens, whose mention in the title of this Psalm (the situation in which accords throughout with that in ch. xxiv.) is a supplement to the allusion in ver. 10. How the content of the Psalm is based on David's assertion of innocence and confident appeal to God which is given here in ch. xxiv. is clear from the train of thought:

After the singer's introductory cry for help, vers. 2, 3 [1, 2] follows the affirmation of freedom from revenge and of innocence as to the accusations made against him (pointing to xxiv. 5-8, 18, 19 [4-7, 17, 18]), vers. 4-6 [3-5]. On this is based (see xxiv. 13-16 [12-15]) the appeal to the Lord for execution of His judgment, to which he submits in firm confidence and good conscience, vers. 7-10 [6-9]. To this is added (see xxiv. 16 [15]) avowal of trust in the help of the righteous God, and in the self-prepared destruction of the unrighteous, vers. 11-17 [10-16]. In conclusion the vow of thanksgiving [ver. 17].—What Delitzsch excellently says of the character of the Psalm: "It is the most solemn pathos of lofty self-consciousness, that here speaks,—anxious unrest, defiant self-trust, triumphant upsoaring, confident trust, prophetic certainty, all these tones find expression in the irregular strophe-sequence of this Davidic dithyramb," all this is found substantially in David's words to Saul.—Hengstenberg's statement of the didactic content of the Psalm: "There is a twofold didactic element in the Psalm: 1) it is a necessary condition of divine help that one lift up pure hands to God, and 2) this condition being fulfilled, the divine righteousness vouches for the absolute certainty of the deliverance," answers precisely in both points to the two fundamental thoughts of David's address (ch. xxiv.) to Saul: 1) I am innocent, and therefore sure of divine help, and 2) God's justice will bring my innocence to light, and punish my unrighteous persecutors.

2. As fundamental traits in the religious-moral character of David appear in this section the following: magnanimous forbearance towards his enemy providentially given into his hand, decided repulse of the temptation to revenge on him, tenderness of conscience whereby his heart smote him for appropriating a piece of Saul's garment, frank and bold affirmation of his innocence against slanders and persecutions, reverent piety towards the sacred person of the Lord's chosen and the de facto theocratic king, the confidence of a good conscience, and the patient waiting of a mind resigned to God's dispensations in respect to the severe sufferings appointed him, and the expected decision of the divine justice, love of enemies which not only puts far away revenge, but repays evil with good, firm confidence in God's justice (having its root in humility), with which in the consciousness of innocence he appeals to the highest tribunal, clear knowledge of the ways of the divine justice, whose aim is the maintenance of the divinely-appointed holy order of his kingdom (namely, that the unrighteously introduced evil be punished), and hope in the saving help of God founded on faith in God's justice. "That David was magnanimous towards enemies, that, when his foe was through chance in his hands, instead of satiating his vengeance, he sent him reverently away, is wholly in keeping with his nature, and in the song Ps. vii. 5 [4] is referred to by him briefly and incidentally, but clearly enough; that to Saul himself, even when there would have been the most favorable opportunity to inflict grievous injury on him, he could do no bodily harm, follows immediately from the idea itself of the 'Anointed of God' which filled his soul" (Ew., III., 130).

3. The old proverb: "From the evil comes evil" (ver. 14 [13]) expresses the truth that the moral character of the man necessarily determines his conduct; the ethical actus is always the expression of the ethical habitus; the precise nature of the inner life, whether in good or in evil, the ethical character of the personality shows itself in the man's outward doing. It is the same truth which is expressed in the New Test. declaration: "As the tree so the fruit" (Matt. vii. 17).

4. The simple self-presentation and self-witness of moral purity and truth (as here in David in word and deed) has a great missionary power, and often makes a mighty impression on spiritually darkened and morally perverted natures (as Saul's here) in such wise that the divine in them is freed from the binding power of the evil, and the religious-moral element of the conscience, which is concealed deep under religious-moral corruption, breaks freely forth, at least in some bright and good moments, in order to point to the way of salvation and show the possibility of deliverance, provided the man is willing to be saved and renewed.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 3 [2]. S. SCHMID: How much it were to be wished that the pious would apply as much diligence to the practice of good as the ungodly do to the practice of evil (Rom. vi. 19).—Ver. 5 [4]. WUBER. BIB.: It happens quite often that men seek to mislead us by an apparent application of the Word of God; let us therefore prove all things and hold fast that which is good (Matt. iv. 6). [HALL: Those temptations are most powerful which fetch their force from the pretence of a religious obedience.—Tr.]—Vers. 6, 7 [5, 6]. CRAMER: It is a praiseworthy virtue to be able to conquer one's self, and he that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city (Prov. xvi. 32).—SCHLIER: David really gained a greater victory at this moment than formerly in the fight against Goliath.—Let us be master over ourselves, let us fight against our anger and overcome the enemy in our own heart. It is a wonderful, every way instructive and shame-inspiring sight, the fugitive David protecting his deadly foe against the hand of his friends. [CHRYSTOM remarks that David had reason to fear lest his men should rebel and do violence to him if he spared their common enemy; also that they were very cunning in not suggesting revenge—to which they knew David would not incline—but the pious recognition of God's hand.—TAYLOR: No doubt it might be said that God had rejected Saul, and had caused David to be anointed in his room; but that had not given to David the right to deal summarily with Saul; it had only indicated that when, in the course of Providence, Saul should be removed, David would be set upon his throne. For this, therefore, David would wait. He would not take Providence into his own hands. He would bide God's time, and it should not be said for him that he had come into the kingdom by the assassination of his predecessor. Even his cutting off a portion of Saul's robe caused him some misgivings of heart, the rather as perhaps after he had done it, his men, emboldened by his example, might have felt themselves at liberty to go farther, and lay hands on the king himself. If any such disposition was manifested by them, it was immediately repressed by their leader.—Tr.] —HALL: Tender consciences are moved to regret at those actions, which strong hearts pass over with a careless ease.—Ver. 8 [7]. SCHMID: What one cannot himself do with a good conscience, he must also not permit those to do whom he has to command. [This holds good only within certain limits.—Tr.]—STARKE: We must not yield even to our dearest and best friends when they desire from us something wrong.—Ver. 9 [8]. SCHLIER: How instructive is this union of reverence with genuine manly spirit! It is a servant of the Lord who speaks—a servant of the Lord filled with fear of God.—Modesty and respect are becoming to a Christian in all cases. But that does not exclude us from also telling the truth, with all modesty, to be sure, but yet with all candor.—Ver. 10 [9]. OSLANDER: One must not lay his hand on even an ungodly ruler.—Ver. 12 [11]. S. SCHMID: That is the highest love towards God and one's neighbor, when any one restrains himself from revenge in such a manner that he returns his enemy good for the highest wrong (Rom. xii. 21).—BERL. BIB.: As men are, so are their actions. As the tree, so is the fruit. What the heart is full of, the mouth runs over with and the hands work at and accomplish. Ver. 16 [15]. OSLANDER: God is advocate, judge, avenger and protector for those who suffer for righteousness' sake.—Ver. 17 [16]. STARKE: A good word finds a good reception often even with the most corrupt men.—Ver. 18 [17]. BERLENBURG. BIBLE: See how David's patience works upon Saul, and how one may heap coals of fire upon the heads of his enemies (Prov. xxv. 22). Try this means on thy unfriendly and perverse neighbor or relative (Rom. xii. 20).—Ver. 20 [19]. CRAMER: A mighty thing is the truth. Therefore, if thy brother sins against thee, go and rebuke him between thee and him alone (Matt. xviii. 15).—S. SCHMID: The ungodly, too, must at last confess that it is right for God to requite the righteous according to their righteousness.—Vers. 21–23 [20–22]. CRAMER: To be able to constrain and win an enemy with good words, gentleness and modesty, is the noblest victory (Prov. xv. 1).—OSLANDER: Enemies are often overcome much sooner by good deeds than by force.—S. SCHMID: What God has according to His wise counsel designed for His pious and upright servants, must become theirs, although the ungodly with all their powers set themselves against it and begrudge it to them; yes, at last the ungodly must themselves confess that their efforts against it are in vain.—SCHLIER: How often we think, too, as soon as good thoughts and feelings stir in us, that already it is all done; how often we think with a couple of good purposes and resolutions to get to the end! O believe it though: before all things there must be a change towards the living God, before all things must we bow before God, before all things confess our sins to Him; the first thing and the most necessary of all is repentance! That is the only way there can be a real and thorough change. (See above "Hist. and Theolog.")

[Ver. 4. Providential purpose, apparent and real.
1) What was here the apparent purpose of God? To give an injured man opportunity for delivering and avenging himself. He was strongly tempted: a) It was indeed a "special providence" of an extraordinary and very striking kind (comp. v. 10). b) He had been cruelly wronged, by friend (xxiii. 12) and foe, and there seemed no other hope of deliverance from this perpetual persecution. c) His followers insisted on his embracing the tempting opportunity, and might rebel if he refused. 2) How did he know that such could not be the purpose of Providence? Because it would involve his doing what was wrong in itself (vers. 5, 6, 10). An enlightened and tender conscience must check our interpretations of Providence. 3) What was the real Providential purpose? As usual, it was manifold: we can see the following points: a) To make him more conscientious by obeying conscience under sore temptation (vers. 5, 6). b) To present a noble example to his rude followers and the people at large (vers. 6, 10). c) To furnish a most convincing proof that he was wrongly accused (vers. 9-11). d) To give him ground for a confident appeal to Providence in future (ver. 12 sq.; comp. xxvi. 23-4). e) To heighten his reputation for loyalty and magnanimity, and smooth the way to his finally becoming king (comp. ver. 20).

[Vers. 1-15. David's magnanimity. (Group homiletically the materials indicated in "Hist. and Theol.," No. 2.)

[Ver. 13. A Bible proverb before Solomon: 1) Habitual bad conduct proves bad character. 2) Habitual good conduct, notwithstanding tempting occasions for wickedness, proves that the character is not bad. 3) It is well when one can appeal to his actions as supporting his words and proving the purity of his motives.

[Vers. 9-15. A good man defending himself against suspicion and slander: 1) He remonstrates against listening to slanderous accusers (ver. 9). 2) He sets forth his actions as showing that the charges are false (vers. 10, 11, 13). 3) He declares the persecution of him to be utterly unbecoming in a person of high position (ver. 14). 4) He solemnly appeals to God: a) to plead his cause, b) to deliver him, c) to punish his persecutor, which he will not himself do (vers. 12, 15; comp. Psa. vii.).

Vers. 16-22. Temporary amendment in a fallen man: 1) Its occasion—an exhibition of magnanimous kindness touches his better feelings. 2) Its signs. a) Bitter weeping. b) Frank confession (ver. 17). c) Prayer that a man he has been wronging may be blessed of God (ver. 19). d) Acknowledgment that this man is not only better than himself, but has a righteous cause (ver. 20). e) Abandonment of his attempts to wrong the other. 3) Why the amendment proves only temporary: a) It is only matter of feeling, not of principle (ver. 16). b) He is thinking more of his own interests than of justice to another (ver. 21). c) He does not really return to God, but only softens towards a man. d) Sooner or later comes a fresh temptation (xxvi. 1 sq.).—Tr.]

VII. Samuel's death. David's march into the wilderness of Paran. The history of the foolish Nabal and the wise Abigail.

CHAPTER XXV. 1-44.

- 1 AND Samuel died; and all the Israelites [Israel] were gathered together, and lamented him and buried him in his house at Ramah. And David arose and went down¹ to the wilderness of Paran.²
- 2 And there was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel. And the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats; and he
- 3 was shearing³ his sheep in Carmel. Now [And] the name of the man was Nabal, and the name of his wife Abigail; and she was a woman [the woman was] of good

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Some MSS. have simply "went," לָּךְ instead of לָּךְ .—Tr.]

² [Ver. 1. This reading is well defended by Erdmann against the Sept. "Maon" which is preferred by Wellh. and Bib. Comm.—Tr.]

³ [Ver. 2. Eng. A. V. here follows the Vulg., factum est ut tonderetur grex eius. But the exacter rendering seems to be: "and he was, when he was shearing his sheep, in Carmel" (so Cahen, Philippon, and apparently Sept.). On the other hand the Syr. takes לָּךְ in the sense: "and it came to pass," the rest of the clause being the Relative protasis, vers. 3, 4 parenthesis, and ver. 5 the apodosis: "and it came to pass, when he was shearing, etc., (and the name . . . his sheep), that David sent, etc." This construction is adopted by Then., Erdmann, and in part (ver. 3) by Cahen. To this Wellh. properly objects that ver. 2 is closely connected with ver. 3, and ver. 4 with ver. 5, and that the proposed construction would require the suffix לָּךְ to לָּךְ . The Heb. text (simple Inf.) is confirmed by Sept. and Chald. and perhaps by Syr. (Partep. without following Pron.) and it is to be noticed that the Greek has ἐν τῷ (as in ver. 20) and not ἐν τῷ, which is the usual rendering of the pleonastic or anticipatory לָּךְ (as in vers. 37, 38). Statements, more naturally conceived by us as parenthetical, are frequently put in Heb. in the form of continuous narration.—Tr.]

- understanding and of a beautiful countenance; but the man was churlish and evil
 4 in his doings; and he was of the house of Caleb.⁴ And David heard in the wilder-5 ness that Nabal did shear his sheep. And David sent out [om. out] ten young men, and David said unto the young men, Get you up to Carmel and go to Nabal and 6 greet⁵ him in my name. And thus shall ye say to him that liveth⁶ in prosperity [om. that liveth in prosperity], Peace be both [om. both⁷] to thee, and peace be to 7 thy house, and peace be unto all that thou hast. And now I have heard that thou hast shearers.⁸ Now thy shepherds which [om. which] were with us; we hurt⁹ them not, neither was there aught missing unto them all the while they were in Carmel.
 8 Ask thy young men and they will show [tell] thee. Wherefore let the young men find favor in thine eyes, for we come in a good day; give, I pray thee, whatsoever 9 [what] cometh to thine hand unto thy servants¹⁰ and to thy son David. And when [om. when] David's young men¹¹ came they [and] spake to Nabal according to all 10 those words in the name of David, and ceased.¹² And Nabal answered David's servants and said, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse? there be [are] many 11 servants¹³ nowadays that break away every man from his master. Shall I then take my bread and my water and my flesh [meat] that I have killed for my shear-12 ers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be? So [And] David's young men turned [ins. to] their way, and went again [returned] and came and told 13 him [ins. according to¹⁴] all those sayings. And David said unto his men, Gird ye on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword, and David also girded on his sword. And there went up after David about four hundred men, and two hundred abode by the stuff.
 14 But [And] one of the young men told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of [from] the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed¹⁵ 15 on them. But [And] the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt, neither missed we anything, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were 16 in the fields [field]. They were a wall unto us both by night and day all the while 17 we were with them keeping sheep. Now therefore [And now] know and consider what thou wilt do, for evil is determined against our master and against all his household, for he is such a son of Belial [bad man] that a man [one] cannot speak to him.¹⁶
 18 Then [And] Abigail made haste, and took two hundred loaves and two bottles [skins] of wine and five sheep ready dressed and five measures [seahs] of parched

⁴ [Ver. 3. So the Qeri. The Kethib or text is discussed by Erdmann in Expos.—Ta.]

⁵ [Ver. 5. Literally: "ask him as to peace." On the pointing of דָּאָרְכָה see Ges. Gr., § 44, 2 Rem. 2.—Ta.]

⁶ [Ver. 6. חַיִּים. In the impossibility of determining the form and sense of this word it seems better to omit the certainly wrong rendering of Eng. A. V. (though it is adopted by Philipsson), especially as the word, whatever its meaning, cannot affect the general sense of the clause. See Erdm. in Expos.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 6. This "both" is intended as translation of וְשָׁלוֹם, but this letter must be stricken out, or, possibly, attached to preceding word (Bib. Com.)—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 7. So the Heb. and the VSS., except Sept. which reads: "that thy shepherds are now shearing for thee," connecting the following וְהָאֵלֶּיךָ with the Partep., which the connection does not allow. Yet the Heb. phrase sounds curt and strange. We should expect "thou art shearing," or, "they are shearing for thee."—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 7. The Seghol of the וְהָאֵלֶּיךָ is a neighboring form to Chireq, both being degradations (the latter more advanced) of the original Pattach.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 8. Sing. in some MSS. and Edd., "thy servant, namely, thy son, David," perhaps from failure to see the application to David's young men. Sept. omits the word.—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 9. Some MSS. read עֲבָדָי "servants," indicating a certain vacillation in the use of these synonyms.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 9. Erdmann: "sat down." Chald., Vulg., Philipsson, Cahen, Wellhausen as Eng. A. V., Bib. Comm.: "rested." Syr. eludes the difficulty (as it often does) by omitting the word. For various text-words which Sept. (ἀνεψύχως) may have had before it see Schleusner s. v. If we retain the Heb., the rendering of Eng. A. V. is as good as any other; for the impression made on us is that Nabal's answer followed immediately on the delivery of the message (so that there was no occasion to rest), and, if a considerable time (as a night) had intervened between message and answer, it would probably have been mentioned. Yet the passage is not satisfactory; we do not expect to be informed here that David's messengers ceased when they had said their say, or sat down to rest; we should rather look for some intimation of churlish bearing on Nabal's part, which, however, cannot well be found (even by changing our word) in the present form of the Heb. text.—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 10. Wellh. inserts the Art. before וְהָאֵלֶּיךָ, yet Heb. (perhaps the conversational language particularly) allowed latitude in this respect.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 12. So Heb., Chald., Sept. and Erdmann (gleich); the וְ is omitted by Syr., Arab. and Vulg. which last Eng. A. V. probably follows.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 14. Or, "flew on them." See the Exposition. Chald. and Syr. "was disgusted with them" (from וַיִּפְּחַק)—Ta.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 17. The rendering of the Syr. is strange: "he was with the shepherds." Is this a copyist's erroneous repetition of the end of the preceding verse?

- corn and an hundred clusters of raisins and two hundred cakes of figs and laid them 19 on [ins. the] asses, And she [om. she] said unto her servants [young men], Go on before me; behold, I come after you. But [And] she told not her husband Nabal.
 20 And it was so, as she rode [And she was riding] on the ass that she came down by
 [and descending into] the covert of the hill [mountain], and behold, David and his 21 men came down [were coming down] against her, and she met them. Now [And] David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missed¹⁷ of all that pertained unto him, and he hath re-22 quited me evil for good. So and more also do God unto the enemies of [om. the enemies of¹⁸] David if I leave of all that pertain to him by the morning light¹⁹ any that pisseth against the wall [any male].
 23 And when Abigail saw David, she hasted, and lighted off the ass, and fell before 24 David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground,²⁰ And fell at his feet,²¹ and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be [On me, even me, my lord, be the sin], and let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the 25 words of thine handmaid. Let not my lord, I pray thee [om. thee], regard this man of Belial [this bad man], even [om. even] Nabal. For, as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name and folly²² is with him. But I, thine handmaid, saw not the 26 young men of my lord whom thou didst send. Now, therefore [And now], my lord, as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth and as thy soul liveth, seeing [om. seeing] the Lord [Jehovah] hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood [into blood-guiltiness] and from²³ avenging [saving] thyself with thine own hand. [ins. And] now, let 27 thine enemies and they that seek evil to my lord be as Nabal. And now, this blessing which thine handmaid hath brought²⁴ unto my lord, let it even [om. even] be 28 given unto the young men that follow my lord. I pray thee, forgive [Forgive, I pray thee] the trespass of thine handmaid; for the Lord [Jehovah] will certainly make my lord a sure house, because my lord fighteth the battles of the Lord [Je-29 hovah], and evil hath not been [shall not be] found in thee all thy days. Yet [And] a man is risen²⁵ to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul [life]; but [and] the soul [life] of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord [Jehovah] thy God, and the souls [life] of thine enemies, them [it] shall he sling out as out of 30 the middle [sling out in the pan²⁶] of a [the] sling. And it shall come to pass, when the Lord [Jehovah] shall have done [shall do] to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed [shall appoint] 31 thee ruler over Israel, That this shall be no grief²⁷ unto thee nor offence of heart unto my lord, either [om. either²⁸] that thou hast shed blood causeless [causelessly]

¹⁷ [Ver. 21. Sept. ("we prescribed not") and Theodotion ("we demanded not") take this wrongly as 1 plu. Impf. (in the Coislin. it is Sing.), where Symmachus has διαφώνησαν in the sense of "perished" (see Schleusner), Vulg. perit.—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 22. The sense of the common formula requires the omission of this phrase, for the insertion of which there is no good reason here. It is not improbable, as Wellhausen suggests, that it was added by a copyist who saw that in fact David had not carried out his scheme of destruction, and would thus avert the imprecation from his head to that of his enemies. But such an imprecation is always to be considered as resting on two conditions: 1) if it be wrong, it must be withdrawn, and 2) if its occasion be removed, it is null and void.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 22. The word "light" (אור) is omitted in Sept., Syr., Vulg., and in many MSS. and Edd.; it was perhaps introduced by a copyist from ver. 34.—Ta.]

²⁰ [Ver. 23. We should here expect אָרָרָא as one MS. has it.—Ta.]

²¹ [Ver. 24. In this description of Abigail's demeanor (vers. 23, 24) the על "on" before רָגַלָיִים and the two prostrations are somewhat difficult. The difficulty is removed by the Sept. which omits the second "fell" (ver. 24). But here we should probably maintain the harder reading, and it is likely that Abigail's anxiety and trepidation made her movement somewhat elaborate and complicated.—Ta.]

²² [Ver. 25. Aquila: ἀφρόνους (see Ges., Thes. on בָּבִי), on which says Schol. (in Schleusner): 'Ἀφύλας ἡμῶν νεκρὸν ἀφρόνους μετ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ γὰρ λογιζομένου ὑποβριζόντος τε καὶ σβεννυμένου, τὸ τῆς ἀφροσύνης γίνεται πάθος.—Ta.]

²³ [Ver. 25. We here expect the ו to be repeated before the Inf.—Ta.]

²⁴ [Ver. 27. The fem. form (see ver. 35) is found in some MSS. and Edd., and in some is given as Qeri.—Ta.]

²⁵ [Ver. 29. Erdmann: "should a man arise." Sept. has the Fut. The rendering of Eng. A. V. seems to suit the connection better.—Erdmann: "the bundle of the living," which is the same in general meaning with Eng. A. V.—Ta.]

²⁶ [Ver. 29. So the Heb., Sept. and Syr. The general meaning is clear, but the VSS. vary in the rendering. Chald.: "As those who sling stones in a sling." Vulg.: inimicorum tuorum anima rotabitur quasi in impetu et circulo fundæ. The Heb. is difficult, but perhaps for that reason better retained.—Ta.]

²⁷ [Ver. 31. Commonly now rendered "stumbling-block."—Wellh. would regard בָּ as clerical repetition of אָ and אָרָרָא as courtly correction of the latter, and would omit these two words. This would give the simple rendering: "This will not be to thee an offence and a stumbling-block" (Sept. σκάνδαλον), and get rid of the apparently cumbersome "to my lord." Yet here again simplifying corrections are suspicious.—Ta.]

or [and] that my lord hath avenged himself [hath saved himself with his own hand]. But [And] when the Lord [Jehovah] shall have dealt [shall deal] well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid.³²

32 And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, which 33 [who] sent thee this day to meet me; And blessed be thy advice [understanding³³], and blessed be thou, which [who] hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood 34 [into blood-guiltiness] and from avenging [saving] myself with my own hand. For [And] in very deed, as the Lord [Jehovah], God of Israel liveth, which [who] hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst hastened and come to meet me, surely [om. surely] there had not been left unto Nabal by the morning-light any 35 that pisseth against the wall [any male]. So [And] David received of her hand that which she had brought him, and said unto her, Go up in peace to thine house;
see, I have hearkened to thy voice, and have accepted thy person.

36 And Abigail came to Nabal. And behold, he held a feast in his house like the feast of a king; and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for [and] he was very 37 drunken, wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, until the morning light. But
[And] it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal, and [that] his wife had [om. had] told him³⁷ these things, that [and] his heart died 38 within him and he became as a stone. And it came to pass about ten days³⁸ after, 39 that the Lord [Jehovah] smote Nabal that [and] he died. And when [om. when] David heard that Nabal was dead [ins. and] he said, Blessed be the Lord [Jehovah] that hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil, for [and] the Lord [Jehovah] hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head. And David sent and communed with Abigail 40 to take her to him to wife. And when [om. when] the servants of David were come [came] to Abigail to Carmel they [and] spake unto her saying, David sent us unto 41 thee to take thee to him to wife. And she arose and bowed herself on her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let thy handmaid be [thy handmaid is] a servant to 42 wash the feet of the servants of my lord. And Abigail hastened and arose and rode upon an [the] ass with five damsels of hers that³⁹ went after her, and she went after the messengers of David and became his wife.

43 David also [And David] took Ahinoam of Jezreel; and they were also both of 44 them his wives. But Saul had given [And Saul gave] Michal his daughter, David's wife to Phalti the son of Laish, which [who] was of Gallim.

³² [Ver. 31. The "either" is translation of u, which is better stricken out.—The construction seems to require us to supply "his hand" (u) as in vers. 26, 33.—Ta.]

³³ [Ver. 31. The Sept. adds flatly and indelicately "to do good to her."—Ta.]

³⁷ [Ver. 33. Thy "good sense, discretion."—Ta.]

³⁸ [Ver. 37. The Arab. V.S. and some MSS. insert "all" (u).—Ta.]

³⁹ [Ver. 38. Wellh. rejects the Art. as the time is not defined, but the Heb. allows in such cases definiteness of statement.—Ta.]

⁴⁰ [Ver. 42. The Partic. has the Art., and so we render better: "the five, etc., that went." Sept. omits the Art., which may be a repetition from the preceding u; but the Heb. gives a good sense. The Partic. is not necessarily predicate, but may be subject along with "Abigail."—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Brief account of Samuel's death.—And Samuel died.—The narrator supposed Samuel's death to fall in the time of the events here related.—All Israel mourned him, not merely because his career as judge and leader up to the time of the establishment of the kingdom was fresh in the memory of the people, but because his political work as prophet and watcher over the kingdom had remained to the end of profound importance for the whole people, as is clear from his relation to Saul and David on the one hand, and his position as head of the prophetic community, on the other. At his burial the people were no doubt represented by their elders. As to such mourning for the dead see

Gen. i. 10.—And buried him in his house at Ramah.—Not literally: "in his house,"—this "would not have accorded (Lev. xix. 16) with the Jewish purification laws" (Then.),—but in some space, court or garden (Matt. xxvii. 60) belonging to the house. Grot.: "Sepulchres were then usually private, see Gen. xxiii. 9; i. 5." On such interments "in the house," comp. 1 Kings ii. 34; 2 Kings xxi. 18; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20. Tradition puts the burial-place of Samuel on the height of Mizpah, where it is yet shown. The harmonization of this statement with our passage by regarding Ramah as a region (Pressel, s. v. "Ramah" in Herzog) is untrustworthy by reason of the untenableness of this geographical and topographical supposition and the distance of Mizpah from the city Ramah (comp. Nagelsbach in Herz. XIII. 399). In Ramah—"for the prophets seem, though we infer it only from this passage and xxviii. 3, to have shared with the kings the right of burial within the city" (Thenius).*

Ver. 2 sq. David's affair with the rich landholder and herd-owner Nabal of Maon, after he had gone down from his hitherto abode in the highland of Engedi farther south and into the wilderness of Paran. The Sept. (Vat.) has Maon instead of Paran, and this is taken as the original reading by Then., Ew., Bunsen, because the wilderness of Paran would be too far off (at least fifteen geographical miles) from Nabal's residence (Thenius). But this supposition is "certainly unnecessary" (Win. s. v. 193, Rem. 1); for David, descending southward, withdrew into the northernmost part of this somewhat undefined wilderness, "which extended widely between the wilderness of Shur on the west, the present Jebel et-Tih on the south, the Edomite territory on the east, and the land of Canaan on the north" (Winer).† Cler.: "the boundaries of this desert are not clearly defined." Comp. Keil on Num. x. 12. Probably the wilderness of Judah no longer afforded sustenance to David and his large body of six hundred men (Keil). Nabal is called a man of Maon because he dwelt in this city in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55). His business (see Ex. xxiii. 6) on the contrary was in Carmel, where Saul had raised his monument of victory over the Amalekites, whence also came his wife Abigail, "the Carmeliteess" (xxvii. 3). It is the present Kurmul on the elevated plain of the highland of Judah, about a mile north of Maon [and ten miles south-east of Hebron.—Tr.]. It is thence easily understood how Nabal, living in the mountain-city Maon, had his herds on the high plain in Carmel. Thenius understands mount Carmel [in the north], because a mountain is spoken of in vers. 5, 7, 8, 13, 20, 35, and because it is said that Nabal had his possessions, his herds, on Carmel, and the mountain-meadow would be specially wholesome for the sheep and goats. But, as to height, the place Carmel lay on a mountain-plain, which afforded the best pasture for the herds. Moreover, the distance of Mount Carmel from the scene of this history [nearly one hundred miles north-west.—Tr.] would exclude it. Maon, Carmel, Ziph, are named together in Josh. xv. 55. Nabal's claim to the title of "very great," that is, rich man, is proved by the size of his herds ("three thousand sheep and one thousand goats").—Sheep-shearing was usually accompanied by festivities, as now also on great estates. While the rich man was shearing at Carmel, David sent to him; the protasis begins with "and it came to pass, in the shearing" (וַיְהִי בַּחֲמֹשׁ הַיּוֹם, vers. 3, 4, is explanatory parenthesis, and the apodosis begins with ver. 5 (Then.).‡ The statements of the names, Nabal, Abigail, and the descriptions of the persons are arranged chiasmically: The woman good of understanding (sensible, wise) and beautiful of form—the man, on the contrary, hard, churlish of disposition and wicked in conduct. As to the last word of the verse, the Kethib or text (בְּלִבּוֹ) "according to his heart" would mean "following only the desire of his mind" (Maur.), that is, self-willed—which is, however, "linguistically impossible" (Buns.). The Qeri or marginal reading (בְּלֵב), "found also in some manuscripts and printed editions in the text" (Then.), is, with Targum and Vulgate, certainly preferable: "he was of the family of Caleb." The two former statements sufficiently characterize his disposition; a third would be out of keeping with the simplicity of the description. On the other hand, the statement of his origin accords with his importance as a man "great" by his riches, and it is introduced as something new by the words "and he" (וְהוּא), which would not suit the continuation of the moral portraiture. Caleb had received for a possession the region of Hebron, near which Maon and Carmel lay (Josh. xv. 13 sq.). Comp. ch. xxx. 14: the southland of Caleb, a region in the south of Judah. The translation of the Sept., "a doggish, cynical man" (so Arab. and Syr.) and of Josephus leading a cynical life" (from בֶּלֶב a dog") must be rejected. [So Boothroyd: "irritable as a dog" (Phillips).—Tr.].—Ver. 4. As Nabal was a man rich in herds, it was worth while to send an embassy to him from some distance for the purpose indicated in the context. The distance would indeed be great and improbable, if with Thenius we took Carmel to be the mountain of that name. The stately number ten of the messengers shows the importance and solemnity of the embassy; such a solemn sending would not suit the proximity of "Maon," David's abode according to the reading of the Sept. In Carmel Nabal had a house (vers. 35, 36). The Sept. adds to Nabal: "the Carmelite," taking the designation from xxx. 5, where it belongs to Abigail. Ask in my name after his peace, give him friendly greeting. Comp. Ex. xviii. 7.—Ver. 6. Here the content and form of the greeting is exactly prescribed. First, the general wish: וְיָשָׁר (Eng. A. V.: "to him that liveth (in prosperity)").

The translation "to my brothers" (אֶחָיו, Vulg.), is impossible by reason of the following "thou;" it could only be "my brother" = "friend," but it is an arbitrary conjecture. Some take the word (אֶחָיו) as adjective ["living," so Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. Clericus joins it to the preceding "say" and renders: "to the living (say), if ye find him alive," S. Schmid: "and thus shall ye say: to the living (that is, the living God) I commend thee." But the first (Clericus) is superfluous, since in sending the messengers, David assumed that Nabal still lived; the latter (Schmid) is untenable because of the arbitrariness of the reference to God. Böttcher connects it with the "say," and takes the Sing. (אֶחָיו) in the sense of "man" (as one possessing vigorous life), adducing the use of the Plu. (אֲנִי) and the Collective-form (אֲנֵינוּ) in the sense of "people," as in xviii. 18; Num. xxxv. 8; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13. The meaning would then

* [Bib. Com. compares the death and burial of Moses, Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6, 8.—Tr.]

† [So Mr. Hayman in Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. "Paran," who suggests that the skirts of the great wilderness may have passed (without well-fixed dividing lines) under different names, Zin, Maon, etc.—Tr.]

‡ [On this construction see "Text. and Gram." where a different view is taken.—Tr.]

be: "Say to the living one," that is, to the man. But the Sing. is never used in this sense. Against De Wette's earlier rendering: "say to the well-living" [so Philippson and Eng. A. V.—Tr.] is the fact that the simple word will not bear this meaning [the addition of "well" or "in prosperity" is unwarranted.—Tr.]. The Sept. has "for this year" (εἰς ὥρας as in Gen. xviii. 10, 14), that is, mayest thou with thy house be in peace till the return of this happy day—a "tolerably far-fetched idea," impossible as a translation of the text, and a mere makeshift to avoid the difficulty.—It is better (considering the difficulties) to take the word as Subst. = "life." It is objected that only the Plu. is so used; but the Sing. is found not only in the formula of swearing "by the life of thy soul, of Jehovah," but also in Lev. xxv. 36 in the signification "life." The phrase (חַיִּי), however, can then mean neither "for a long time, for many years" (Vulg. according to another reading, and Jos.), nor "for the life, the whole lifetime, forever" (Chald., D. Kimchi, Dathe); the expression does not allow these renderings, which introduce a foreign idea (long), unless we change the following letter (י) into the suffix (ן) and read "for thy life." But, instead of this bold and unsupported conjecture, it is better to take life (De Wette: zum leben "unto life") as = "fortune, prosperity," and to regard the expression as a popular form of congratulation, not found in the literary language; Luther: "succes" (glück auf)! Maurer: "to life, that is, may it turn out well; may thy affairs be fortunate" [so Rashi, and apparently Talmud Bab., Berakoth fol. 55, 2.—Tr.]. We cannot admit such a congratulation is superfluous by reason of what follows (Then.), for the threefold special "peace" on Nabal, his house and his possessions is the unfolding of the general wish, the latter is the prelude, the former the triple chord. It may be freely rendered "thou shalt live" or "live thou long!" [Bib. Com. prefers to attach the following letter (י) as suffix and render: "and ye shall say thus about his life," which seems forced and unsatisfactory, though it accounts for the י, which in its present position is disturbing. Calhen: ainsi pour la vie! "thus for life" which is obscure. Wellhausen sees nothing better than "to my brother." In support of the rendering which Erdmann adopts Gesenius cites the Arabic formula: "may God grant thee life!" The phrase cannot be said to have received a satisfactory explanation.—Tr.]

Ver. 17 sq. After the instruction to greet comes the direction how to present his earnest request to Nabal. Now I have heard that thou hast shearers.—These words correspond precisely to the real life, and can only be rightly understood when we recollect that the regularly recurring sheepshearing was one of the greatest events in the housekeeping of such an establishment. In accordance with the urgency of his request, which is due to his pressing need of sustenance for his men, David's introduction is very circumstantial and is based on a captatio benevolentiae; he reminds Nabal of the peaceful association of his men with Nabal's herdsmen during his stay in the wilderness ("thy herdsmen were with us"), of the forbearance exercised by his warriors towards the unarmed herdsmen ("we did not injure them"—הַכְלִיכֵנִי as in Judg. xviii. 7; on the form see Ges. § 53, 3 Rem. 6), and of the honorable disinterestedness with which his people had refrained from appropriating the property of others ("nothing was missing to them"). The last words may refer, however, to the protection afforded the herdsmen by David's people against the predatory incursions of the neighboring desert-tribes; for such protection against thieving attacks (which came especially from the south) is expressly affirmed in vers. 16, 21. "Thus, even in his outlawry, David showed himself the protector of his people" (Keil). Apart, therefore, from eastern custom, according to which such a request would seem no ways strange, David had a certain right to ask a gift from Nabal's superfluity; he had indirectly no small share in the festal joy of Nabal and his house; "without some part of the superfluity of the inhabitants whom he protected, he could not have maintained himself with his army" (Ewald). And this must modify Stähelin's remark (p. 19), that "this narrative shows that David blackmailed even his own countrymen, regarding himself, like an Arab sheikh, as lord of the desert where he lived." For the rest Robinson remarks II. 429 [Am. ed. I., 498—Tr.] in reference to the permanence of customs in the East: "On such a festive occasion near a town or village, even in our own day an Arab Sheikh of the neighboring desert would hardly fail to put in a word, either in person or by message; and his message, both in form and substance, would be only the transcript of that of David."—In a "good day," that is, a festive, happy day; sheepshearing was conducted like a festival (comp. Gen. xxxviii. 12; 2 Sam. xiii. 23), when feasts were held, strangers entertained, and portions given to the poor. Give what thy hand finds, that is, as much as thou canst, to thy servants and thy son David, an expression of deepest reverence and devotion, and of the piety of the younger man towards the older, in order that he might share in his paternal goodwill.—Ver. 9. The messengers executed their commission, making the request in David's name. And they sat down, so we must translate the Heb. word (יָשָׁבוּ), not "they waited modestly for an answer" (Buns.), not "they were silent" (Vulg. Grot., De Wette). That they sat down is not a superfluous remark, but serves to complete the description, which is true to the reality in the smallest details. Formal sitting down is part of oriental custom in such visits; it is not necessary, therefore, to refer to their need of rest, though, after so long a journey, they need not have been weakly persons (Then.), to require rest. Thenius' change of text so that this shall read "and he arose" (קָם) after Sept. ἀνέστη "he sprang up") is improbable.

Ver. 10 sq. The insulting answer with which Nabal contemptuously rebuffed David's ambassadors. Who is David? Who is the son of Jesse?—He knew him well; all the more insulting is this answer, whose meaning is: what do I care for David? what have I to do with him? There are many servants nowadays that break away every one from his master.—(The Art. stands here with Particp., not with

Subst., וְהָיָה, because the former alone is to be distinctly defined (Maurer).—To his important question Nabal adds a rude insult to David's servants, whom he characterizes as good-for-nothing runaways, and also to David himself, to whose relation to Saul he maliciously alludes.—

Ver. 11. Nabal speaks out his mean, niggardly mind (וְהָיָה, Perf. with 1 consec., here expressing future time, Ges. § 126, 6, Rem. 1). The whole sentence is to be taken as a question: Shall I take? The bread and water represents the necessary sustenance of life. The flesh stands for luxuries beyond mere necessities. Instead of "water" the Sept. has "wine" in accordance with its arbitrary way of getting rid of difficulties. In the excitement of his avaricious soul, Nabal declares that he will give David and his men neither necessities of life nor what he had killed for the feasting of his shearers.—[Bib. Com.: The mention of water indicates a country where water was scarce, Josh. xv. 19. Or, "bread and water" may="meat and drink."—Tr.]—Ver. 12. The report of this contemptuous and insulting rebuff.—Ver. 13. David determines to take bloody revenge for the insult and hostile reception. Nabal's wicked response to his friendly and modest overture excites his anger. The following narrative shows that he herein sinned before God, but also how God's wonderful providence saved him from the factual completion of his sin.

Vers. 14-22. Abigail, Nabal's wife, goes to David.—Vers. 14-17. One of Nabal's servants informs Abigail of what has occurred; he relates Nabal's bearing towards David's greeting (ver. 14), describes the friendly protection they had had from David's people (vers. 15, 16), asks Abigail's counsel and help in respect to the danger that threatened her husband and his whole household, and excuses himself for applying to her by referring to Nabal's bad character and inaccessibility to well-meant representations and requests.

Ver. 14. A lad of the lads.—The word "lad" (וְהָיָה), which is wanting in Sept. and Vulg. [which render, as Eng. A. V., "one of the lads."—Tr.], is indeed a rounding of the phrase, but is not, for this reason, and because these translations have properly declined to transfer the phrase literally, to be regarded as the error of a copyist (Then.). וְהָיָה [lit. "to bless."—Tr.]—"to congratulate, greet," comp. xiii. 10.—And he drove over them, that is, as above described, with insulting, angry words.—[Eng. A. V. "railed on them," better "flew on them."—Tr.] See on xiv. 32, xv. 19.*—Ver. 15 is the confirmation of the words of ver. 8: "ask thy young men, and they will tell thee." The testimony of these youths to the friendly and helpful conduct of David's men agrees exactly with what David told his messengers to say, ver. 7. On the phrase: "all the days of our walking with them"

(וְהָיָה, Eng. A. V.: "conversant with them"), it is to be remarked, that sometimes, as here, substantives of time, place or manner stand in construct relation to a whole sentence (Ew., § 286, 3, 1).—The words: "while we were in the field" (Vulg., Syr., Arab.: "in the wilderness"), are not to be connected with the following (Sept., Syr., Then.), making "they were a wall to us" [ver. 16] the apodosis, because then in the words: "as long as we were with them keeping the flocks," there would be a second indication of time in the same sentence (comp. Zech. ii. 5).—Ver. 16. A wall, that is, a powerful protection against the wild beasts and the attacks of robbers from the Arabian desert.—

Ver. 17. "Is determined" (וְהָיָה), "is a thing settled," as in xx. 9. It is not necessary on account of the "and he" (וְהָיָה), which refers not to David, but to Nabal, to insert with the Sept. "thou" (וְהָיָה) after "consider" (וְהָיָה), as Thenius insists, for such a contrast is not demanded. Nabal is described as a "bad man" [so should Eng. A. V. read instead of "son of Belial."—Tr.], see on i. 16; xxx. 22; 2 Sam. ii. 12; 1 Kings xxi. 10. "So that one cannot speak" (וְהָיָה—"from speaking"), or "he is too wicked for one to be able to speak to him." This is the confidential expression of the estimation in which Nabal was held by his household and servants, comp. ver. 3.

Ver. 18 sq. To avert the impending danger, Abigail, on the representation and at the request of the faithful servant, sets out to go to David without her husband's knowledge, with a rich present of various articles of food. They carried two hundred loaves of bread, two skins, not jars (De Wette), five prepared sheep, of parched corn (וְהָיָה, xvii. 17=by-meat) five seahs—one and two-thirds ephahs (Then.). Sept. has five ephahs instead of five seahs, thinking the latter too little for so many people [the seah about one and a half pecks, ephah=about four and a half pecks.—Tr.]; but it would not be too little as entremets. We need not, therefore, with Ewald read five hundred seahs.—[Abigail's present was intended not to supply David's army, but to show her good-will.—Tr.]; one hundred cakes of dried grapes (וְהָיָה), two hundred cakes of pressed figs (וְהָיָה).—Ver. 19. Her journey is described in the minutest particulars; she sends the servants on before with the present, herself following, riding on an ass, in order the better to superintend the movement.—Ver. 20. Her meeting with David!. In the covert, a hidden place in the mountain. It was "probably a depression between two peaks of a mountain" (Keil), so that David's march, in the main upward, was here downward, and he encountered Abigail's train, which was also moving downward.—[Wellhausen's objection to this explanation as topographically taking too much for granted, seems unfounded, and there is no need for taking the verb (יָרַד) in the general sense of "pursuing one's way."—Tr.]—Vers. 21, 22. A parenthetical explanation of David's feeling and motive in making this movement. אָמַר = "had said."—Only to deception [Eng. A. V. "surely in vain"], that is, only to be deceived in my just expectations, have I kept, etc. (comp. ver. 16), so that nothing was missed, he is indebted to me for the undiminished possession of his herds. David had a right to expect grateful requital from Nabal, instead of which Nabal returned him evil for good.—Ver. 22. Oath of vengeance. In this formula ["God do so to me and more also," etc.], the divine punishment is commonly invoked on the swearer: "God punish me if," etc. (comp. xiv. 44; xx. 13). In some cases it is invoked on the person addressed, as in iii. 17.—[But there it is for failure in the person addressed, and, in general, the curse is invoked on the person failing to do something mentioned.—Tr.]—But here the curse is directed against persons not present; the sense is: God shall punish David's enemies, if I take not this vengeance on them; so surely as God will not let this evil go unpunished, will I, etc. Instead of "enemies" (אֹיְבֵי) Then. reads, after Syr. and

* Instead of וְהָיָה Thenius proposes to read וְהָיָה because several VSS. so render, Sept. ἡδοναὶν αὐτῶν, Sym. ἀντιπαρὸν, Vulg. averatus est eos; but this is unsafe, for 1) to the phrase: "he was disgusted with them," we must then give the sense: "he treated them with contempt" (Then.), which the substituted verb does not permit, and 2) it is tolerably clear that these VSS. read wrongly וְהָיָה from וְהָיָה in the transitive sense: "to turn one's self"—"thrust out of the way," Job xxiv. 4; comp. Am. ii. 7, "lead aside," 2 Sam. iii. 27, "repulse," Psalm xxvii. 2.

Arab.: "his servant" (לְעַבְדִּי); but these versions have evidently substituted this reading to avoid the difficulty of the text.—[In spite of the support of Vulg. and Chald. (and indirectly of Syr. and Arab.), the word "enemies" must be omitted with Sept., being here meaningless and disturbing, and the curse must be considered as invoked on David's own head. Erdmann's defence of the text is far-fetched and unavailing. See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—Mingentem ad parietem, that is, "every male." Bähr on 1 Kings xiv. 10: "The expression may have been taken originally from dogs, and it is certainly not an honorable designation of the male sex, being used everywhere (1 Kings xvi. 11; xxi. 21; 2 Kings ix. 8) of those who are cast out and exterminated."—[See Ges., Thes. s. v. בָּרַךְ, where the authorities are quoted, and decision given for the meaning "male person," and not "mean, insignificant male."—Tr.]—David swears to root out Nabal and all the males of his house in revenge for the insult to his person, which he regards as a sin against the Lord in whose service he is.—[There is not the least evidence that David so regarded, or had a right so to regard Nabal's fault; he acted under a weak, human impulse of unworthy revenge, from which he was estopped by God's mercy.—Tr.]

Vers. 23-31. Abigail's address to David.—Ver. 23 sq. In the most circumstantial manner five things are first mentioned as to Abigail's conduct on meeting David, before the narrative comes to her words, which in their form and content confirm what is said in ver. 3 of her understanding. Her mode of doing reverence to David is based on her conviction that he is the divinely chosen future king of Israel, comp. ver. 30. This conviction had spread not only in the king's house (Saul included), but also among the people.—On me, me, my lord, be the blame (אֵלַי הָאָשָׁם, see Ges., § 121, 3). At the outset she gives the matter such a turn that David has to deal with her only, and is obliged to put Nabal out of sight. At the outset she assuredly opposes to David's vengeance the contradictory statement, that, on the one hand (ver. 25), she did not see David's servants and knew nothing of Nabal's contemptuous behaviour, and, on the other hand, she takes all the blame on herself. "Think not," she says, "of the bad man, Nabal; for he is what his name signifies: foolishness is his companion (עִמּוֹ with him)." Here, as often happens, foolishness appears connected with wickedness and ungodliness. "Consider me alone as the guilty person with whom thou hast to do." She does not, however, ask for pardon and forbearance; this she does not do till ver. 23; till then she urges what may turn David away from his revenge; from there on she points out to him the blessing he will receive from the Lord if he grants her request. Vers. 26, 27. She begins with "and now" each of the three sentences with which she introduces the petition, and seeks to secure David's favor for it. First, indicating the highest point of view in which, as a God-fearing woman, she regards this meeting with the vengeful David, she affirms that God has thus restrained him from committing a grievous sin. (אֲשֶׁר is not here the superfluous br. of indirect discourse, but is (Then.) dependent on the double "וְ") So true as—so true is it—the Lord hath kept thee from coming into blood-guiltiness and saving thyself. David would have brought the crime of blood on himself, and with his own hand against God's will and command have procured help for himself.—Then she says: May all thy enemies be as Nabal, such fools as he; that is, thou standest under God's protection and guidance, so that all who as thine enemies will, like Nabal, do thee evil, shall like him become fools, and fall under God's punishment. Seb. Schmid: "whosoever does good to his enemies, and takes not vengeance on them, him will God Himself avenge, as it is said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay." Thirdly, she says, ver. 27: And now, this present . . . blessing (כֶּרֶם) = gift of blessing, xxx. 26; Gen. xxxiii. 11. It is a delicate feature of her wise and skillful procedure that she offers the present, with which she designs to make good her husband's neglect by dispensing what he ought to have offered, not to David himself, but to his men. On the: in the retinue of my lord comp. Ex. xi. 8; Judg. iv. 10 (Keil).—Ver. 28. Forgive the trespass of thy handmaid.—With this brief word, which rests on that other: "on me be the blame," she now makes her request for forgiveness and sparing. The following words to ver. 31 inclusive contain the promise of the divine blessing which, by fulfilling this request, David will receive instead of the curse that would follow revenge. Her personal affair serves her as occasion to speak to David of the future of his house and his life, and, indeed, she belongs to the prophetic women who, like Hannah, filled with the Spirit of the Lord, share in the theocratic inspiration and in the prophetic outlook into the future development of the theocracy. She says to David that the Lord would not leave the fulfilment of her request unrequited: 1) For the Lord will make my lord a sure house. Since she is sure of David's call to the kingship of Israel, she means by "sure house" permanent kingly rule in his house. Comp. the divine promise, 2 Sam. vii. 3 sq. [Bib.-Com. compares Rahab's faith and foresight, Josh. xi. 9-13, and cites Abigail as an illustration of how faith and reason may concur now in leading men to Christ. "In connecting her prayer for forgiveness with the reference to David's future reign, she is asking for complete pardon to be in force then."—Tr.] 2) For my lord will fight the battles (wars) of the Lord. On the expression "wars of the Lord," comp. xviii. 17. In the celebrated warrior, who has fought and conquered in the name and power of the Lord, she sees the future royal hero, who, in the wars which the covenant-God as King of His people will wage against their enemies, will prove himself God's champion. 3) And no evil will be found in thee all thy days. "Evil" (עוֹלָם) is here misfortune," not "wickedness" (Mich., Dathe). She does not mean to say: "Thy hand will not be stained with wickedness, as would be the case if thou tookest revenge for this insult;" she says that in ver. 31. Here she predicts for him safety and good fortune as the gift of the Lord.—Ver. 29 attaches itself in its content to this third affirmation. The text reads "hath arisen" or "arises" (קָם), instead of which we must, with Then. and Böttch., after Tanchum, read it as Impf. (קָם): And should a man arise . . . Though she knows that Saul is persecuting David, she yet with delicate reserve expresses herself hypothetically. In relation to what precedes the sense is: "Though such a misfortune should come upon thee that some one should rise against thee . . . yet it will not continue." [The text, however, as rendered in Eng. A. V., gives a good sense, and, as the fact was so notorious, the more open reference to Saul's persecution could not be considered as an offence against delicacy. Bib.-Com., interpreting the sense properly, renders: "Though a man is risen . . . yet," etc.—Tr.] What is bound in a bundle is safely kept. The bundle of the living [Eng. A. V. life] with the Lord is thus the figurative expression for those whose life is under the protection of God's love. In contrast with the wicked human power, which might seek after his life, she points him to the safe preservation of his life which is involved in the inclusion of his person in the community of the godly, whose life—that is, their temporal-earthly life, since she is not speaking here of the eternal life beyond, to which Keil finds here an indirect reference*—is preserved inviolable in God's hand. Then the contrast: But the life of thy enemies will he sling out in the pan of the sling—an energetic expression for the divine rejection in contrast with gracious preservation. The "pan" of the sling is the hollow for the reception of the missile. See Gen. xxxii. 26 [hollow of the thigh].—Ver. 30 is the protasis, ver. 31 the apodosis. In the words: And when the Lord shall appoint thee ruler over Israel, Abigail shows that she is acquainted with God's choice and calling of David to be king of Israel. This she had probably learned through personal acquaintance with those prophetic circles, her spiritual affinity with which is shown by her words. Here she looks out beyond the attacks of his enemies to the goal of his divine calling which David has reached. Then (ver. 31) "this will not be a stumbling-block and vexation of heart to thee that thou didst shed blood without cause, and also that my lord with his own hand helped himself." The word "this" (כֵּן) does not refer to the request for forgiveness in ver. 28 (Keil), but to the two following facts, namely, bloodshed and self-help. The sense is: After obtaining the kingdom, thou wilt not have a bad conscience in the recollection of having shed innocent (innocent, that is, in respect to such revenge) blood, and depended on thyself for help. In the words: And when the Lord shall do good to my lord, she briefly includes all her wishes and hopes for David, that to her so deeply-grounded request for forgiveness (ver. 28) she may in conclusion attach the thought of future prosperity. (וְיִשְׁכַּח is to be taken as condition or hypothetical indication of the desired result).

Vers. 32-35. David's answer and conduct to Abigail.—Ver. 32. Thankful acknowledgment that the Lord had sent her to him. So, in his whole life even in errors and faults David knows himself to be under the oversight and guidance of the divine providence.—Ver. 33. Having given due honor to the Lord, he praises Abigail's wisdom and her opposition to his purpose so displeasing to the Lord. He acknowledges that she has restrained him from bloody revenge and ungodly self-help, and confesses his sin and guilt in forming such a plan.—Ver. 34. His discourse advances rapidly to the declaration (which strengthens that thankful acknowledgment) that, but for her interposition, he would have exterminated Nabal's house. "For otherwise"

(וְאִלֵּים), Vulg. alioquin, "otherwise" [Eng. A. V. "in very deed"].—By the life of the Lord, the God of Israel, who, etc., I swear that if thou, etc., that nothing would have remained.—The thought that the Lord had brought her to meet him is here completed by the parenthetic declaration: God the Lord has here Himself interfered with my purpose, and through thee prevented the execution of the wicked deed.*—Ver. 35. David accepts the present, and dismisses Abigail with the assurance that her request is granted. "To accept the person" (וְלָקַח אִתִּי) = "to have regard to," Gen. xix. 21.

Vers. 36-38. Nabal's death.—Ver. 36. Abigail

* כִּהְרַע—Inf. Const. Hiph. from רָעַע. כִּי is dependent on a verb of affirmation which is to be supplied from the connection. The repetition of the כִּי is occasioned by the parenthesis "unless thou." The strange form רָבִיבָאִי, Impf. with termination of Perf., is either a clerical error for רָבִיבָאִי, perhaps arisen from the following word, in which the final בִּי is preceded by מֵ (Then.); comp. Olsh. Gr., pp. 452, 525; or, according to Ew. §191 c, a strengthened form of 2 fem. Impf. as רָבִיבָאִי, Deut. xxxiii. 16 (Keil).

* [So Abarbanel, Targ., Talmud Shab. 152, 2; Chag. 12, 2; Pir. El. 34 (Philippeon).—Tr.]

finds Nabal in the revel of a feast.—Like a king's feast, as rich and luxurious. Compare the description of the rich man, Luke xix. "Merry on account of it," that is, the feast. The reference (in מְלֵךְ) to the feast (Maur., De W., Keil), as in Prov. xxiii. 30, answers better to Nabal's thorough self-abandonment to pleasure than the reference to his person: "within him" [so Eng. A. V.]; and this view is confirmed by the following words: he was very drunken. Ver. 37. Not till next morning, when the wine was gone out of him, that is, not by vomiting, but by the gradual passing off of the debauch, can Abigail tell him what has happened. The choleric man is so affected by it that he has an apoplectic stroke. The cause of this is neither horror at his loss (Then.), for Abigail's gift to David was insignificant, nor at the danger, hitherto unsuspected, which threatened him (Cler., Mich.), for this could not surprise him, he must have contemplated its possibility when he dismissed David's messengers,*—but the violent anger and vexation of the passionate man (always hard and inflexible), because his right had been usurped, his authority as master ignored, and the whole business transacted by his wife against his will with the hated David.—His heart . . . stone; here we must retain the text ["he became a stone"], and not render with the VSS.: "as a stone" (Then.), the strong hyperbole of the text corresponding to the preceding expression: "his heart died," and the reading of these VSS. being obviously an explanatory change [so Eng. A. V.].—Ver. 38. It is expressly said, that Nabal's death, which did not occur till ten days after the stroke, was a dispensation of the Lord. As an execution by God's hand, this death is here, though not expressly in words (as in ver. 39), yet in the connection represented as a punishment for his ungodliness.

Vers. 39–42. Abigail David's wife.—Ver. 39. In Nabal's sudden death David recognizes God's judgment for the insult offered him, over against the revenge which he himself would have taken, from which the Lord estopped him in order Himself to exercise vengeance. This rests on the thought that the insult offered David was also offered to the Lord, since David was the Lord's Anointed, and represented the Lord's cause. The figure is of a case in law, which is settled by the judicial decision. The "law-cause of my reproach," that is, the reproach offered me, on account of which the Lord had to appear against Nabal as Judge and Avenger. Connect the "from the hand" with "pleaded" [רָכַב], not with "my reproach," and render pregnantly [Germ. zeugmatically].—Ta.: "he has conducted my cause to a conclusion out of the hand," that is, he has collected the costs from the condemned person, and has settled the matter by the infliction of the proper punishment.—And the wickedness of Nabal. The connection shows that these are the words of David, not of the narrator (Then.).—Ver. 40. David's formal application for the hand of Abigail.—Ver. 41. With the expression of the deepest devotion in gesture and word, according to oriental custom, she declares herself ready to become David's wife.—Ver. 42. She sets out with a small train, "five damsels," her ordinary retinue (הַחֲלִיטוֹת), to follow David's servants and become his wife.

Vers. 43, 44. Appendix concerning David's matrimonial and domestic relations, occasioned by the account of his marriage with Abigail.—And Ahinoam David had taken from Jezreel, that is, before his marriage with Abigail (Then.); Jezreel is not the city in Issachar (Josh. xix. 18), but in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55, 56), near Maon, Carmel and Ziph. "And these two also," where "also" (וְאֵלֶּה) refers to Michal, xviii. 28.—Ver. 44. Saul "had given" (נָתַן), as the "had taken" above, in Pluperf. sense) Michal to Palti (2 Sam. iii. 18) to wife. Gallim, in Benjamin, between Gibeath of Saul and Jerusalem, Isa. x. 30.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The universal mourning among the whole people at Samuel's death is a sign that they had preserved the deepest impressions and influences of his reformatory work, and honored in him, even after his withdrawal from public labors, the great restorer of the genuine theocracy. Their sorrow at his decease was the deeper, the more heavily the yoke of Saul's misgovernment pressed on them. "It was as if from the noble star, as long as it shone in the heaven of the holy land, though veiled by clouds, there streamed a mild, beneficent light over all Israel. Now this star was extinguished in Israel" (F. W. Krummacher).

2. Self-help by one's own might through revenge is as sinful and ungodly when one knows or supposes that he has suffered insult for the Lord's sake, or in His service, as when one feels his own honor violated. There is always thus a headstrong and impatient anticipating of God's counsel and work in the interest of passion, opposition to the fundamental law, according to which God's justice, not man's revenge, is the guardian of moral order, and every man receives what is his in the right time and way, according to the attitude of his heart to God. By his excitable temperament, which tends to overflow in passion, David is in great danger of setting himself against the supreme tribunal of divine justice, and taking vengeance into his own hands instead of leaving it to God. "For the first time we find him not master of his spirit, overborne by the passion, which is indeed a natural trait of his character.—He purposes to break the peace, to seize the property of others, and to stain his hands with the blood of peaceful, yea, kindred citizens. This time surely he had not prayed, nor inquired of the Lord through the 'Light and Right' [Urim and Thummim]. If he had executed what his wrath suggested—and it was not his doing if it went no farther than suggestion—he would have given the death-blow to his honor and his cause" (F. W. Krummacher).

3. God rules and watches with such paternal special providence and care over those that humbly look to His guidance that, when they are in danger through their own flesh and blood of falling into sin, He raises up persons to guide them by exhortation, warning, and instruction into the right way, He enlightens and strengthens them by His word, so that they see in good time their moral danger and how to avoid it, and go firmly on, and at last praise the Lord for such gracious preservation. "David praised God that He had kept him from sin, and yet saved his honor.—So well does everything at last turn out with those who give heed to God and their own heart. God receives them when they fall, and raises them up when they are cast down; but the ungodly, who listen to nothing and hate instruction, cool their wrath and perish" (Roos).—"That David, like every human being, was not free from desire of revenge, to which he was especially exposed from his liveliness of feeling, is shown in 1 Sam. xxv. But there is needed only a slight rousing of his conscience, and he says to Abigail (vers. 31, 32): 'The Lord be praised who hath sent thee to meet me to-day. And blessed be thy discourse, and blessed be thou,' etc. And what Abigail could do, could not the presence of the Holy One have done, before whom he stood when he sang his Psalm?" (Hengst., Pr. iv., 302.)

* [Not necessarily. It seems not unlikely that fright had something to do with his seizure.—Ta.]

4. Abigail belongs to the prophetic personages of this time, and takes a prominent place among the pious women of the Old Covenant. In contrast with her ungodly, doltish, hard-hearted, thankless, avaricious, purse-proud, rough, and riotous husband, she is deeply pious, clever and intelligent, thankful, generous, humble, of noble disposition and fine tact, intellectual, and gifted with pleasing and winning speech.—Solomon says: "By wise women the house is builded, but a foolish woman destroys it." This word finds a noble confirmation in Abigail as housewife in respect to this perverse man sunk in sordid avarice and gross materialism.—"Where do we find in all the heathen world a woman comparable with Abigail, the daughter of the wilderness? Unfortunate, indeed, she is. Ah, her house, however blessed with earthly goods, is no Bethany-cottage. With deep sorrow she must call her rude, Mammon-serving husband a 'fool.' But she bears with him in patient, hopeful love and faithfulness, and doubtless often lifts holy hands to God for him. So for him she goes to David, like a sacrificial lamb taking her husband's misdeed on herself. She holds up also to David the grievous sin with which he would have laden himself if he had carried out his purpose against the man.—Indeed the truth and sincerity, the dovelike simplicity united to sanctified wisdom, which appears in the childlike-pious address of the noble woman, is worthy of our liveliest admiration. Who can fail to see that here already the Spirit from above was working mightily? Is it not almost as if in her we heard an advanced disciple of the Gospel speak? Has not her word: 'Thou shalt be bound in the bundle of the living of the Lord' been long naturalized in the language of the whole Christian congregation as a favorite expression, and as the designation of the most precious thing that man can desire on earth?" (F. W. Krummacher).—"What wisdom, what humility, what free-heartedness, what order we find in her words! How well she knew how to speak to David's heart! How well her whole discourse was suited to her position as woman! I know no example of eloquence that excels this. Doubtless she had not studied eloquence in the schools, but the Spirit of God alone made her such an orator. God put wisdom into her heart, and it flowed out in wise discourse" (Roos).—Abigail appears as an organ of the Spirit of God, the prophetic spirit breathes through her words, and she speaks to David in the manner of the prophets. She sees clearly and declares to David with vigorous, heart-searching, and conscience-piercing words, that his high-handed, revengeful purpose is against God's law and order; she convinces him of his deep guilt, and brings him to acknowledge that she is God's instrument to save him from a wicked deed which would have cast a dark shadow over his future life; she announces his future royal calling and his lofty mission therein as hero to wage the wars of the Lord against the enemies of God's people, earnestly exhorts him to walk conformably to the glory and holiness of this calling, predicts under this condition the continuance of the royal dignity in his house (comp. 2 Sam. vii.), and promises him the rich blessings of the favor of God. Thus in her is presented the type of the guardian watch-office of prophecy in relation to the royal office. Abigail could so speak only as moved or filled by the prophetic Spirit; and the means thereto was her personal relation to the prophetic circles, whose centre Samuel was till his death and to which all truly God-fearing persons attached themselves. As the prophetic community was at this time of great importance for awakening and cherishing a new religious-moral life in the people, it cannot be surprising if we meet with personages, like Abigail, among the people, filled and illuminated with the prophetic Spirit.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Chap. xxv. J. DIESELHOFF: Let the righteous smite me kindly and reprove me: 1) Even the beloved of the Lord, when he watches not his heart, falls into wrath that deserves reproof; 2) The gracious God sends His beloved ones the deserved reproof through some human mouth; 3) The way in which any one receives reproof shows how far he is a man after God's own heart.

Ver. 1. Remember your teachers, etc. Hob. xiii. 7. [The aged man is laid aside, and sinks out of the popular view; and when at length he dies, people are startled as they recall how great a man he was in his prime, how great a work he did. It is something to live so that one's death will be truly mourned by a whole people. The old, who sadly think themselves forgotten, may find solace not only in reviewing the past, but also in the persuasion that yet once again they will be vividly remembered; while the younger should strive to anticipate the feelings of that coming time, and show respect and affection while it can be fully enjoyed.—TR.]—Ver. 2 sqq. CRAMER: Wealth, consideration, power, and good fortune, are nothing without wisdom (Prov. xvii. 16). Therefore we should prefer wisdom and virtue to all temporal things; for riches and rank do not help against folly.—SCHLIER: What does money help us, when we make Mammon our idol, and know only how to rake and scrape and get rich? How well it would be if we did but once believe that money is not man's fortune, and that with all riches we may yet be unfortunate people.—[HALL: Even the line of faithful Caleb will afford an ill-conditioned Nabal. Virtue is not, like unto lands, inheritable.—TR.]—Ver. 10 sq. BERL. B.: The fountain of his speech is avarice, and the stream is malignity. So the rich of the world are often haughty and unfriendly, and thereby show themselves to be true Nabals or fools, as Christ also named that rich farmer.—SCHLIER: Let us not look at Nabal, we will rather think of ourselves.—There is nothing that releases us from the duty of thankfulness, let the other person be as he will. To whomsoever you owe thanks, to him you should also show your thanks. And such ingratitude is doubly a wrong, when the fault on the other's part, because of which you refuse the thanks, is only an imagined fault, when you have only a wicked grudge against him, as Nabal considered David a seditious person, although he was the most faithful subject of the king.—[SCOTT: When worldly men are determined not to relieve the necessitous, they often excuse themselves by railing; by charging the vices of some poor persons upon all; and by representing almsgiving as an encouragement to idleness, impertinence, and extravagance: nor are the most excellent characters any defence against such undistinguishing invectives.—TR.]—Ver. 13. STARKE: How subject are the best of God's saints to weak passions! Ye who are pious, recognise this fact, and diligently call on God for the government of His Spirit (Jer. x. 23). SCHLIER: If wrong is done us, we will commit vengeance to the Lord, and will be afraid of all self-revenge. He who suffers injuries and commits his revenge to the Lord, is a righteous man; but it is unmanly to give free course to one's revenge, and to do what flesh and blood prompts.—BERL. B.: David here felt something quite human, and fell into sudden heat at the affront offered him, and the contemptuous ingratitude of the rude arch-churl. His passions started up, and most of all because Nabal had treated him shamefully when he had done him no hurt. In such a case it may well be said: "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God" (James i. 20).—[Ver. 13. HENRY: "Is this thy voice, O David?" Can this man after God's own heart speak thus unadvisedly with his lips? . . . Is this he who, but the other day, spared him who sought his life, and yet now will not spare anything that belongs to him who had only put an affront on his messengers? Lord, what is man! What need have we to pray, Lord, "lead us not into temptation!" Ver. 18: HENRY: The passion of fools often makes those breaches in a little time, which the wise, with all their wisdom, have much ado to make up again.—TR.]—Ver. 19. STARKE: Silence has its time, speech has also its time. Well for those who know how to suit themselves thereto (Eccl. iii. 7 sq.).

Ver. 22. BERL. B.B.: David here completely changes into a barbarous man, and forgets himself altogether. If this purpose had been carried into execution, Saul would for the first time have had a just cause for pursuing him as a disturber of the public peace.—Ver. 23 sq. SCHLIER: Men's wrath is a frightful enemy, and works not the righteousness of God, and yet there is a means of making this enemy no longer hurtful, namely, a friendly, loving word.—Let us especially when one falls into wrath observe well whether we cannot perhaps quiet such wrath by a mild, gentle word. A word spoken in season, and with an eye to the Lord, is not in vain.—When we are on a bad way, the Lord comes not in miracles and signs to bring us to good ways, but He interposes through men. He warns us through parents and friends and other connections, and their word is the Lord's word.—Ver. 27. STARKE: Free and rich gifts bring blessing with them; therefore give, and it is given to you (2 Cor. ix. 5, 6).—OSIANDER: Ver. 29. Our life is not in the power of our enemies, except so far as God permits it them (Job ii. 6).—[Ver. 31. HENRY: When we are tempted to sin, we should consider how it will appear in the reflection. Let us never do anything for which our own conscience will afterward have occasion to upbraid us.—TAYLOR: Only a woman could have managed such a negotiation as this so smoothly and successfully; but only a God-fearing woman would have managed it so as to bring David to a sense of the sinfulness of the act which he had been about to commit.—Vers. 32–35. HALL: A good heart is easily stayed from sinning, and is glad when it finds occasion to be crossed in ill purposes.—Wicked vows are ill made, but worse kept. Our tongue cannot tie us to commit sin. Good men think themselves happy, that since they had not the grace to deny sin, yet they had not the opportunity to accomplish it.—TR.]—Vers. 36–38. SCHLIER: So true it is that sin is ruin to the people. What multitudes think that with avarice one can get rich, and yet avarice is a root of all evil; how many think by hard-heartedness and selfishness to get on, and yet thereby every one is only building up his own misfortune; what multitudes think that if they should give themselves up to excesses, they would get pleasure and enjoyment therefrom, and yet all good-living comes only of evil.—[HALL: It was no time to advise Nabal, while his reason was drowned in a deluge of wine. A beast, or a stone, is as capable of good counsel as a drunkard. O that the noblest creature should so far abuse himself as for a little liquor to lose the use of those faculties whereby he is a man!—"O that men should put an enemy in their mouths to steal away their brains!"—TR.]—Ver. 39 sq. SCHLIER: It is a good thing to trust in the Lord and give up everything to Him. All self-revenge in every case comes of evil; but to contain one's self, to suppress one's wrath, to turn over vengeance to the Lord, brings good fortune and blessing.

[Vers. 2–11. Nabal: 1) His advantages: a) Of excellent family (ver. 3, comp. Josh. xiv. 6; xv. 13); b) Very wealthy; c) Having a wife most remarkable not only for personal beauty (ver. 3), but for thoughtfulness, energy, tact and grace. 2) His faults: a) Avaricious and stingy in the extreme; b) Yet ostentations of his wealth (ver. 36); c) A drunken not; d) A fool; e) Rude and insulting habitually (ver. 17). What a son of Caleb! what a husband for Abigail! 3) His ignoble end. Remembered for his faults, and from his connection with the men he insulted.

[Vers. 23–31. A specimen of the soft answer that turneth away wrath: 1) She takes the blame on herself, so as to divert attention from the offender (ver. 24). 2) She extenuates the offence, and makes amends for it, as far as the circumstances admit (vers. 25, 27). 3) She delicately assumes that the wrathful purpose will be abandoned through divine influence (ver. 26). 4) She turns the angry man's mind towards a future of great and sure prosperity, through Jehovah's blessing (vers. 23, 29). 5) She declares that in that happy time he will be glad he did not to-day incur blood-guiltiness (vers. 30, 31). The sum of the whole is that she makes him forget his wrath in thoughts of Jehovah and of the brilliant future which Jehovah has in reserve for him. The result appears in vers. 32, 33.

[Vers. 32, 33. SOUTH: "Prevention of sin is one of the greatest mercies that God can vouchsafe a man in this world." SOUTH a) shows the danger that sin unprevented may never be pardoned, and b) argues that prevention is better than pardon; and in the "Application," urges a) that a higher satisfaction is to be found from a conquered than from a conquering passion; b) that the temper with which we receive providential prevention of sin is a criterion of the gracious or ungracious disposition of our hearts; c) that we ought thankfully to acquiesce in any providential crosses, since these may be the instruments of preventing grace.—TR.]

VIII. David, betrayed again by the Ziphites, spares Saul the second time.

CHAPTER XXVI. 1-25.

- 1 AND the Ziphites came unto Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah¹ which is² before Jeshimon. Then [And] Saul arose and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, having three thousand chosen men of Israel with him, to seek David in the wilderness of Ziph. And Saul pitched in the hill of Hachilah which is before Jeshimon in the way, but [and] David abode in the wilderness. And he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness, David therefore [And David] sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed.³ And David arose and came to the place where Saul had pitched. And David beheld the place where Saul lay, and Abner, the son of Ner, the captain of the host; and Saul lay in the trench [wagon-rampart],⁴ and the people pitched round about him.
- 6 Then answered David [And David answered] and said to Ahimelech the Hittite and to Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, brother to Joab, saying, Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp? And Abishai said, I will go down with thee. So [And] David and Abishai came to the people by night, and behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench [in the wagon-rampart], and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster [head],⁵ but [and] Abner and the people lay round about him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Here, as in xxiii. 19, there is diversity of spelling, Syr. and Arab. having "Havilah," and some MSS. and Edid. "Habilah;" but the Heb. text seems preferable.—TR.]

² [Ver. 1. The Rel. is supplied in ver. 3 and in xxiii. 19, and is involved in the connection. For הַיְשִׁימוֹן Aq. has ῥῆς ἡμετέρας, as if from שָׁמֶם, "the desolated," and Sym. ἡμετέρας, "the desert."—TR.]

³ [Ver. 4. Instead of אֶל-נֶקֶר מְעֵרָה, Ewald would read אֶל-נֶקֶר מְעֵרָה, "into the fissure of a cave," partly after the Sept. Κεῖλα, or, as Theophilus affirms, for the purpose of introducing here a trace of his alleged "original narrative," though the context shows that Saul was not in a cave, but in a wagon-rampart (ver. 5). The text-phrase occurs in xxiii. 23 in the sense "certainly," and is quite intelligible here, though, as Wellhausen remarks, its position is strange, we should expect it after וַיֵּרָא, while after אֶל-נֶקֶר מְעֵרָה we should look for the name of the place to which Saul goes. The Sept. gives not only τροχίον, but also the place from which Saul comes, ἡ Κεῖλα, which throws no light on the sense; Vulg. and Chald. support the Heb., and Syr. and Arab. render "after him," "to him." On the whole there does not seem sufficient reason for altering the text; the VSS. testify that there was something after אֶל-נֶקֶר מְעֵרָה, and nothing better than this offers itself.—TR.]

⁴ [Ver. 5. As in xvii. 20. Here the VSS. vary greatly, some laying hold of the idea of the Heb. verb עָלָה "round" (Aq., Sym., ἀποπερικύβευσε, another reading of Aq. ἐκίχθη), others giving it as chariot (Sept. λαμνίσκος), Sym. (σεντρί) and Vulg. (tentorium) thence passing to the notion of "tent," while, Syr. and Vulg. take the ordinary meaning of the word "way." Bib. Com. proposes (without ground) to read כְּעֵלָה, and thus bring this passage into accordance with xxiv. 5.—TR.]

⁵ [Ver. 7. "The place at his head," see on xix. 13. Derive from מִקְרָאֵשׁ.—TR.]

- 8 Then said Abishai [And Abishai said] to David, God⁶ hath [ins. this day] delivered thine enemy⁷ into thine hand this day [om. this day]; now, therefore [and now,] let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even [om. even] to the earth⁸
- 9 at [om. at] once, and I will not smite him the second time. And David said to Abishai, Destroy⁹ him not; for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's
- 10 [Jehovah's] anointed, and be guiltless? David said furthermore [And David said], As the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, [ins. but] the Lord [Jehovah] shall smite him, or his day shall come to die [and he shall die], or he shall descend into battle
- 11 and perish. The Lord [Jehovah] forbid¹⁰ that I should stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed; but, I pray thee, take thou now [and now, take] the spear that is at his bolster [head] and the cruse of water, and let
- 12 us go. And David took the spear and the cruse of water from Saul's bolster [head],¹¹ and they gat them away, and no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked, for they were all asleep, because [for] a deep sleep¹² from the Lord [Jehovah] was fallen upon them.
- 13 Then David went over to the other side, and stood on the top of an hill [the
- 14 mountain] afar off, a great space being between them, And David cried to the people and to Abner, the son of Ner, saying, Answerest thou not, Abner? Then
- 15 [And] Abner answered and said, Who art thou that criest to the king? And David said to Abner, Art not thou a valiant [om. valiant]¹³ man? and who is like to thee in Israel? wherefore, then, hast thou not kept thy lord the king? for there
- 16 came one of the people in to destroy the king thy lord. This thing is not good that thou hast done. As the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, ye are worthy to die, because ye have not kept [watched over] your master [lord] [ins. over] the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed. And now, see where the king's spear is, and the cruse¹⁴ of water that was at his bolster [head].
- 17 And Saul knew [recognized] David's voice and said, Is this thy voice, my son
- 18 David? And David said, It is my voice, my lord, O king. And he said, Wherefore doth my lord thus [om. thus] pursue after his servant? for what have I done?
- 19 or [and] what evil is in mine hand? Now, therefore [And now], I pray thee, let my lord the king hear the words of his servant. If the Lord [Jehovah] have stirred thee up against me, let him accept an offering; but if they be [it be] the children of men, cursed be they before the Lord [Jehovah], for they have driven me out this day from abiding¹⁵ in the inheritance of the Lord [Jehovah], saying,
- 20 Go, serve other gods. Now, therefore, [And now,] let not my blood fall to the

⁶ [Ver. 8. Sept. κύριος, Jahveh. This variation in the divine names may be error in the Sept., or it may be from variation in manuscripts; there is no decisive internal reason for the use of one name rather than the other.—Ta.]

⁷ [Ver. 8. So the Qeri (Kethib is plural), which is found in the text of several MSS. and Edd.—Ta.]

⁸ [Ver. 8. The Heb. construction: "with the spear and in the ground," is unusual; from xvii. 11; xix. 10, we should expect: "with the spear in him and in the ground" (Wellh.).—Ta.]

⁹ [Ver. 9. Sept.: "humble (שודד) him not;" here inappropriate.—Ta.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 11. Literally: "be it a profane thing to me from Jehovah," Erdmann "on Jehovah's account," or, it may be "by, through Jehovah" (as in Eng. A. V.).—Ta.]

¹¹ [Ver. 12. The form is variously explained (כֶּרֶם שֶׁלֹּא), some taking it for כֶּרֶם, one Mem falling out (so Erdmann), others from a noun רֶמֶס (so Fürst). In any case we have to suppose the presence of the Prep. בְּ.—Ta.]

¹² [Ver. 12. This word (תַּרְדֵּמָה) is used only a few times in the Old Testament, and apparently of a supernatural sleep. In prose it occurs, besides here, only in Gen. ii. 21; xv. 12, in both which places the sleep is supernatural. So in Job, Eliphaz (iv. 13) and Elihu (xxxiii. 16) refer to revelations from God, and in Isa. xxix. 10 the תַּרְדֵּמָה of יְהוָה is a divine judicial infliction. Even in Prov. xix. 16 the "deep sleep," which is the result of slothfulness, is viewed, from the connection, as a part of God's moral government of men. A distinctly supernatural sleep would, therefore, seem to be here intended. This is the general feeling of the Greek renderings of the word (Sept. θάμνος, Aq. καταφορά, Sym. καρπος, Theod. ἕστρασις); Syr., Arab., Vulg., Chald., render "sleep;" Sam. Vers. gives תַּרְדֵּמָה, "sleep," in Gen. xv. 12, and in ii. 21 תַּרְדֵּמָה, compared by Uhlemann with Rabb. הַפְלָהוּ (hyperbole) in sense of "ecstasy," but comp. Talm. פֶּלֶק, "bind," hence, perhaps, "a binding sleep."—Ta.]

¹³ [Ver. 15. The Adj. is understood, though not expressed, in Heb. as in English.—Ta.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 16. On the construction see Erdmann. The וְ might be regarded an emphatic sign introducing the second thing mentioned, which might then be in the Acc.: "and as to the cruse." The Vulg. inserts a second "where?" the Sept. omits it where the Heb. has it—two ways of smoothing over the difficulty of the construction.—Ta.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 19. Literally: "from joining myself to" (Ges.). So Aq. ἀπὸ συνθέσεως, Sym. συνθεσέμεθα, Sept. ἀπὸ συνθέσεως.—Ta.]

earth before the face of the Lord [Jehovah]; for the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea,¹⁶ as when [om. when] one doth hunt a [the] partridge in the mountains.

- 21 Then said Saul [And Saul said],¹⁷ I have sinned; return, my son David; for I will no more do thee harm, because my soul [life] was precious in thine eyes this day; behold, I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly. And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear!¹⁸ and let one of the young men come over and fetch it. [Ins. And] the Lord [Jehovah] render to every man his righteousness and his faithfulness; for the Lord [Jehovah] delivered thee into my¹⁹ hand to-day, but [and] I would not stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's [Jehovah's] anointed. And behold, as thy life was much set by this day in my eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of the Lord [Jehovah], and let him deliver me out of all tribulation. Then [And] Saul said to David, Blessed be thou, my son David; thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt surely prevail. So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.

¹⁶ [Ver. 20. Or, "a single flea," as in xxiv. 15. This repetition is somewhat surprising, and the Sept. reading "my soul" seems better. The repetition of the phrase would enter into the question whether we are to suppose two betrayals by the Ziphites, or only two accounts of the same betrayal.—Ta.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 21. Syr., Arab. and 2 MSS. have "Saul said to David."—Ta.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 22. The Art. with יָדָא] (om. in Qeri) in stat. const. is strange, but not impossible, especially where the defining noun is comparatively insignificant, or the defined is to be brought out more prominently, as here. See Ew., 2 280 d. Philippi, "Stat. Const. in Heb.," p. 36 sq.—Ta.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 23. The insertion of the suffix is supported by many VSS., MSS. and EDD.—Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The comparison of chap. xxvi. with the section xxiii. 19-24, xxiv., shows that the narratives agree in three principal points, in the treachery of the Ziphites towards David, in the persecution of David by Saul, and in the sparing of Saul by David. There is besides much concerning localities, connected circumstances, conversation, wherein an agreement cannot be denied. Ver. 1 = xxiii. 19, the coming of the Ziphites to Saul, and their information as to David's whereabouts. Ver. 2 = xxiv. 3 [2], Saul's march against David with three thousand men. Vers. 8-11 = xxiv. 5-7 [4-6.], David's protest against laying hands on Saul as the anointed of the Lord. Ver. 17 = xxiv. 17 [16], Saul's question about the voice of David. Ver. 18 = xxiv. 10-12 [9-11.], David's affirmation of his innocence. Ver. 20 = xxiv. 15 [14] concerning the flea. Ver. 21 = xxiv. 18 [17.]. Saul's penitent confession of his guilt. Ver. 23 = xxiv. 13-16 [12-15], David's appeal to his innocence and to the divine justice. Ver. 25 = xxiv. 20, 21 [19, 20], Saul's invocation of blessing.

But it does not follow necessarily from these agreements that these narratives are two accounts of the same event, as Ew., Then., De Wette, Bleek (the last, however, "with some probability" only) and others suppose. The wilderness of Ziph, and especially the strong, protected position on the mountain Hachilah, might well seem to David on his return from the wilderness of Paran a suitable abiding-place for himself and his men. That the Ziphites, who held with Saul, consequently again showed him David's abode cannot, however, seem strange. The coincidence as to the three thousand men need not be regarded as showing that there was only one occurrence, since according to xiii. 2 Saul had found a body of "three thousand chosen men out of Israel" (as they are called here also xxvi. 2) as a standing army, with which guard

he might easily under similar circumstances have marched a second time against David. Thenius, indeed, affirms that "Saul must have been a moral monster, which he, however, evidently was not, if he had deliberately and under the persuasion of the same persons made a second attempt on David's life after the latter had so magnanimously spared his life." Against which Nägelsbach (Herz. XII., 402 sq.) rightly says: "That Saul marched a second time against David is psychologically only too easily explained, even though he was no moral monster. His hatred to David was so deeply rooted that it could be only temporarily suppressed by that magnanimous deed, not extinguished." Saul's inner life under the dominion of envy and hate towards David, on the one hand, and of the various influences of the better spirit, on the other hand, had hitherto been full of vacillations and contradictions. Why should it seem strange if, in the better impulses which, through David's presence, words, and noble conduct, got suddenly the upper hand and lasted for awhile, there followed in all the stronger reaction of the evil spirit, especially as the spur to violent procedure against David again came from the same quarter as before? How little David himself relied on the permanence of Saul's good inclinations (expressed in xxiii. 19-24, xxiv.) appears from the fact that he did not leave the wilderness, and foreseeing a repetition of Saul's persecution, determined to go to another land. Thenius' own remark on xxvii. 1 sq., that "David knew how quickly Saul could change his mind, and therefore preferred to leave the country," confirms the clear statement of the preceding history as to Saul's vacillation and moral ungodliness, which makes a new persecution, as narrated in chap. xxvi. psychologically and ethically easily explicable. According to this remark of Thenius, therefore, the account of this second march fits in psychologically between chaps. xxiv. and xxvii., which sections are referred by him to the same author. Thenius affirms that "this narrative [chap. xxvi.] is shown by the dramatic form of the action (Night—Secret entry into the camp—Spear and water-cruce—Ironical address to Abner), by an improbability (ver. 24), individual declarations (vers. 19, 20), and in part also by the language (vers. 6, 11, 12) to be the later, resting on popular tradition; but these particulars pertain to those points of the narrative in which its difference from the former account (xxiii., xxiv.), and therefore its reference to another occurrence may be recognised, as will appear in the explanation of the special points and the comparison with the related passages. See Keil's excellent remarks.

Ver. 1. The information given by the Ziphites concerning David supposes that he had returned from the wilderness of Paran into the wilderness of Judah in consequence of his marriage with Abigail. "In the face of [over against] the desert," for which we have in xxiii. 19 more exactly "on the right;" that is, south of the desert. The agreement with the words of xxiii. 19 is the result of the narrator's desire to conform the account of this second occurrence to that of the first in the points in which there was essential agreement.* Ver. 2. The "three thousand chosen men of Israel" are the permanent guard whose formation is mentioned in xiii. 2.—Ver. 3 sq. Saul's camp was near the mountain Hachilah "on the way," that is, in a well-known highroad passing by. And David abode in the wilderness; that is, he had withdrawn from the hill Hachilah (where the Ziphites reported him as being, and Saul sought first to attack him) farther into the wilderness, and was then on the highland (comp. ver. 6: "who will go down with me?"), while Saul was encamped on the road in the plain. On hearing (מָנָה) = "he learned," not "he saw") that Saul had followed him into the wilderness, he assured himself of the fact by scouts. Certainly [Eng. A. V. "in very deed," Heb. "to certainty"—Ta.], undoubtedly, comp. xxiii. 23. [So in xxiii. 24, 25 David learns (probably by scouts) that Saul is come into the wilderness of Maon, south of the desert.—Ta.].—Ver. 5. David now himself goes by night to examine Saul's camp and position. The Sept. and Vulg. add: "secretly," an explanatory addition which we need not insert in the text (= מְסֵת, Thenius). He found Saul at the wagon-rampart† (see on xvii. 29) with Abner, his general, and the army camped around him. David was accompanied by Ahimelech, the Hittite, who is nowhere else mentioned, and Abishai "the son of Zeruiah," David's sister (1 Chron. ii. 16), and brother of Joab, afterwards one of David's captains (2 Sam. xviii. 2; xx. 6; xxiii. 19).—The difference in particulars between this narrative and that of xxiii. 19 sq. is as follows: There on Saul's approach David proceeds to the wilderness of Maon, where he is surrounded, and only escapes capture by the invasion of the Philistines, which compels Saul to withdraw, xxiii. 25–28. Here, on the contrary, nothing is said of such a Philistine invasion; Saul's camp is on another spot; the endangered person is not David, but Saul, whose camp David enters at night, and whom David might have killed. [However, this incident is parallel to xxiv. 3 [2] sq.—Ta.] There, after Saul's return from the Philistine campaign, the scene of the persecution is Engedi, where David is hidden in a cave into which Saul enters, xxiv. 2–4—completely different circumstances and situations.

Ver. 6 sq. Ahimelech, the Hittite. This Canaanitish people, already settled around Hebron in Abraham's time (Gen. xv. 23), dwelt, after the return of the Israelites from Egypt, in the hill-country of Judah along with the Amorites reaching as far north as toward Bethel (Judg. ii. 26), subdued but not exterminated by the Israelites. A portion of them had maintained a certain independence. Comp. 1 Kings ix. 20; x. 29; 2 Kings vii. 6. In the time of Saul's reign the internal contrast between the Israelites and the remnant of the Canaanites may have greatly diminished, so that a Hittite could occupy so prominent a position with David, and be employed by him in his service. For, according to this narrative, he must have held a preferred position with David, along with Abishai (2 Sam. ii. 18; xvi. 9), who is here named. Uriah also was a Hittite (2 Sam. xi. 3, 6; xxiii. 39).—They find Saul in his camp asleep, his "spear (the sign of royal authority, in place of the sceptre) stuck in the ground at his head."—Ver. 8. Thy enemy—the Sing. [Qeri] is preferable [Keth. has Plu.]. Abishai speaks merely according to the right of retaliation and the usage of war. The sense of his words is: I will pin him to the ground so thoroughly with one blow that it will not need another to kill him. Vulg.: "there will be no need of a second."—Ver. 9. David rejects not the first part of Abishai's word: "God has given thy enemy into thy hand," but the second: "I will transfix him." For certainly God had given Saul into his hand; but "the divine providence thus gives David opportunity not to slay his enemy, but rather to conquer him by a new kindness" (Berl. B.); David's reply to Abishai is a brief, strict prohibition: Destroy him not, and the reason for it, made more earnest and pressing by the interrogative form: Who stretches out his hand against the Lord's anointed and goes unpunished?—(מָנָה) = Exod. xxi. 19; Num. v. 31). By the royal anointing Saul's person was made sacred and inviolable. As anointed he was the Lord's property. Therefore only God's hand could touch his life. And so David says, ver. 10, with an oath: "As God lives, his life is in God's hand only, and far be it from me to touch it." Translate not with De Wette: "No! but Jehovah will smite him, either his day will come, etc.," but with Then. and Keil: "Unless the Lord smite him, etc.", the apodosis being: "far be it from me, etc." [ver. 11]. David mentions three possible cases: 1) sudden death by a stroke (as in xxv. 38); 2) dying a natural death "in his day," the day of death, as Job xiv. 6; xv. 32; 3) falling in battle. "Far be it to me from Jehovah" (כִּי־יְהוָה), that is, as in xxiv. 7, on the part of the Lord, on the Lord's account I will not smite him.—Abishai is ordered to take the spear at his head, and the water pitcher (not basin, Ewald, comp. 1 Kings xvii. 12 sq.); then, says he, we will "go our way" (לָךְ).—Ver. 12. David took, it is said (though David had ordered Abishai to take), having reference to the fact that David was the controlling head.* Their unobserved taking of the spear and cruse and subsequent departure is vividly portrayed in three expressions: No one saw, no one observed, no one woke.—The narrative represents this as a divine arrangement by the words: for a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen on them, that is, God threw them into deep slumber, that David might so act. Comp. xiv. 15, "the terror of God," Ps. lxxvi. 7 (6) "at thy rebuke, God of Jacob, both chariot and horse are cast into a deep sleep."—A comparison of vers. 6-12 with xxiv. 6-8 [Eng. 4-7] shows the great difference between the two narratives in spite of the sameness of the speeches of David's men "God has delivered thy enemy into thy hand." There they say: "Do to him as seemeth thee good," and David cuts off the skirt of Saul's upper garment, whereupon he says, having in mind this deed of his and his thereby disquieted conscience: Far be it from me to lay hands on the Lord's Anointed (xxiv. 5-8 [4-7]). Here Abishai wishes to kill Saul, and David in connection with this wish says similar words. [The Bib. Comm. remarks that "the description in ver. 7 is quite compatible with David and his companion's being hid in the cave." This is true, and so far as this point is concerned we might hold the two narratives to refer to the same event. But the difficulty is the numerous important changes which must then be made in one narrative or both, and, it may be added, the great carelessness which must be ascribed to the editor. At the same time the supposition of a single incident in these two narratives does not impugn the inspiration of the Book, since we should therein have merely the error of an editor, or possibly of a transcriber.—Tr.]

* [We should, however, expect an indication of the repetition of the occurrence by some such phrase as "the Ziphites came again to Saul," and the absence of such indication is one of those delicate features which favor the supposition of a single occurrence, while, on the other hand, the argument for two occurrences, as given by Erdmann and others, cannot be considered a weak one.—Ta.]

† [The proposal of Bib. Com. to read מְסֵת, "garment," and represent Saul as sleeping in his garment, as in xxiv. 6 [4], is an unfounded conjecture, and the assimilation of the two accounts in this way can be effected only by a violent reconstruction of the narratives, the necessity for which is a serious objection to the supposition of one occurrence.—Ta.]

Ver. 13. David went beyond to the top of the mountain, that is, the mountain whence he had previously reconnoitred Saul's camp, and whence he had descended, ver. 6.—The express mention of "the great distance and the wide interval between them" shows that David's conduct was here the reverse of that at the former meeting with Saul, when he followed him out of the cave and called after him (xxiv. 9 [8]). Here the danger seemed to David much greater than there.

—Ver. 14. (לָךְ = towards). David's call concerned Abner especially, because it was his duty to watch over the king's life. Vulg.: "who art thou that criest and disquietest the king?"—Ver. 15. David's ironical speech.—Art thou not a man? that is, a valiant warrior,* who is to answer for the protection and security of his king, (שָׂרָא with לָךְ is unusual; עַל (Then.) is probably the original reading). Then he refers to the peril of life, in which Saul just before really was. Sons of death are ye, ye deserve death for your neglect of duty.—As sign thereof he shows him the spear and the water-cruse. See, where is the king's spear?—That was a clear proof that Saul might have been slain by him who took it away (Cler.). (יָצָא pregnant construction—supply יָצָא, so Maurer, who refers to Judg. vi. 23). And (see after) the water cruse, namely, see where it is (Keil).—Ver. 17. In the darkness and at such a distance Saul could not recognize David's person, but could recognize him from his voice. My voice! answers David to Saul's question. As the Sept. reads simply "thy servant," Thenius combines the two and takes as original text "the voice of thy servant." But the brief "my voice," is perfectly intelligible, and the designation "servant" is involved in the added words: My lord king.—[It may also be said in general that the less courtly form is the more probable.—Tr.]—Ver. 18. Comp. xxiv. 10-13 [9-12]. This question as to the cause of the persecution is the affirmation of his innocence and of the groundlessness of Saul's continued hostility to him. Berl. B.: "The way in which David addresses Saul is so humble, so gentle, and so reverent, that we may sufficiently thence recognize the character of his heart."—Ver. 19. And now, let my lord the king hear the words of his servant; by this adjuration David will indicate to Saul how important he thinks his following words for their relation to one another and to God, and how serious a matter it is for him that Saul should weigh them. He supposes two causes of Saul's hostility as possible. First: If the Lord hath incited thee against me.—Wrongly Clericus: "If Jehovah incited thee, if thou deservedly attemptedst my destruction, acting in accordance with God's will, He would hear thy prayers and take care that thou shouldst never fall into my hands [which has not been the case]." For, according to this the divine causation would be denied, while the human would be in the next clause assumed as the factual one. [Clericus says only that the fact that Saul had been in David's power would show that God was not watching over him, and therefore his persecution was not with God's approval.—Tr.] David's word is based on the conception that God sometimes incites men to evil. Comp. 2 Sam. xvi. 10 sq., where God is said to have commanded Shimei to curse David, and 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, according to which God incited David to number the people. The idea that evil is, from one point of view, to be referred to God as its cause, is not a product of later times, but is early found in connection with the idea of the divine ordering of the world, in which evil must serve God in order to bring about His saving help (Gen. i. 20 comp. with xiv. 7, 8) and reveal His judicial glory (Ex. ix. 16). David therefore supposes the case that Saul's hatred towards him rests on the divine causality,—comp. xviii. 10; xix. 9, where the "evil spirit from the Lord," which has come upon Saul, is said to be the cause of his hate to David. The "divine incitement" to evil consists, according to David's view, in the fact that Saul, sunk deep in sin by his own fault, is further given over by God to evil in that opportunity is given him to develop in deeds the evil of his heart. [Others suppose here, not so well, an immediate reference to the possession of Saul by the evil spirit, which drives him to these persecutions.—Tr.]. The words: Let him accept [literally, smell] an offering, indicate the way by which Saul, seeing whither he is come by this self-occasioned inclination to evil from God, may again come into right relation with God. "Let him smell an offering" (וַיִּחַם; the Hiph. of חָם not = "cause to smell," but = "smell;" Sept. δοξασθῆναι, Vulg., odoretur, Luther, man lasse riechen). The odor of the offering, here to be smelled, comes from the incense which was connected with the meat-offering (of flour and groats) and was burned (Lev. ii. 15, 16; vi. 15) "for a sweet odor, a memorial to the Lord." The smelling of this odor represents God's acceptance of the offering and the offerer (Gen. viii. 21), the offering itself, the Minchah (מִנְחָה), meat-offering, signifying not atonement, but sanctification of life in devotion to the Lord, the effect of which is God's gracious acceptance. The sense is: "Instead of the anger, in which God drives thee to evil, mayest thou gain God's acceptance, by (as the outward offering with its sweet odor signifies) giving him thy heart and life, abstaining from evil and sanctifying thyself to Him." David thereby also indirectly affirms that the divine incitement to evil has its ground in Saul's evil nature and will. Bunsen, in general correctly: "The sense is: pray to God that He take the temptation from thee." Grotius is altogether wrong: "If this anger is just, I do not deprecate that it be appeased by my death as a victim." [Others: Let the evil spirit from God be driven away by an offering to God.—Tr.].—The other case: But if men (have stirred thee up), be they accursed before the Lord.—David here refers, as in xxiv. 10 [9], to the hostile party that calumniated him to Saul, and kindled Saul's hatred against him. He sees no other way of escaping these dangers than flight to a heathen land. For they drive me away now; the emphasis is on the "to-day," "now" (עַתָּה); "they have now brought it about that, to be safe, I must flee the country" (Then.). His present position is such that he must regard himself as one driven out of the country. That I cannot join myself to [Eng. A. V., abide in] the inheritance of the Lord, that is, I am excluded from association with the Lord's inheritance (Bunsen). The Lord's inheritance is the people of God, the covenant-people. Saying, Go, serve other gods, not that his enemies had actually given this order, "but David looked to deeds rather than words" (Calvin); their enmity drove him out as effectually as a command. David's line of thought here is as follows: Only in the people Israel and in the land of promise has the covenant-God His dwelling, for there are all His revelations in respect to Israel; only there therefore, in the consecrated place of His dwelling can there be true worship of the Lord; outside this holy region of God's revelation and dwelling among His people is the domain of strange gods; thither driven he sees everywhere inducement and temptation to "serve other gods."—This is the ground of his wish and prayer in ver. 20: And now, may my blood not fall to the ground far from the presence of the Lord, that is, may I be preserved from such a fate, namely, driven from the place of the Lord's gracious presence and His people, to lose my life by violence afar off in the midst of an idolatrous people. The expression "far from the presence of the Lord," and the preceding words show indeed David's longing after the place of divine worship in the tabernacle, but contain nothing which necessarily points "to a later insertion of this section" (Then.), or, as Ewald affirms, echoes the "bitter lament of many who in the seventh century were banished by unrighteous kings like Manasseh." The words are sufficiently explained by the pain that David felt at his fugitive life, which must now lead him to a foreign land, where he must wander or perhaps die far from association in divine worship with the people of God and from the place of supplication to God. Grotius wrongly: "in the presence of the Lord, God being witness and hereafter Avenger" [so Eng. A. V., and this rendering is grammatically defensible, though here perhaps not so appropriate as the other.—Tr.].—For the king of Israel is come out to seek a single flea, comp. xxiv. 15 [14]. Here too the "flea" sets forth what is insignificant in contrast with the king of Israel. The sense is: Thou pursuest me, who am as weak in respect to thee as a flea in respect to him who kills it. It is herein involved not only that it is not worth Saul's while to pursue him (Then.), but also that it will be only too easy for the powerful king of Israel to conquer him, the powerless, as one crushes a flea. So understood, the words satisfactorily give the reason for the preceding "Let not my blood fall," which Then. wrongly calls in question. There is no reason for substituting for the text ("a flea") the Sept. reading "my soul" (Then.), which, however, expresses the same thought, "Thou seekest to kill me" as the reason for the preceding. As one hunts a partridge in the mountains; an unnecessary difficulty is here made (Then.) by supposing that the comparison (seeking a flea) is itself compared with something else (hunting a partridge), which would certainly be unnatural and unexampled. But there is here rather a second comparison alongside of the first, and with the same meaning: Thou strivest to destroy me, the insignificant and powerless in my isolation and abandonment. Thenius rejects the reading partridge (אֵיָּבִי), on the ground that the bird is found not in the mountains but in the plain, and accepts the Sept. "horn-owl" (הַנְּסִי), and further, regarding the designation of David as an insignificant person as here out of place, proposes to render: "as the owl hunts on the mountains;" but, to say nothing of this untenable supposition and of the unheard-of figure of the owl as a "hunter," we reply simply with Winer in reference to the "partridge on the mountains:" "Partridges are usually not hunted on the mountains, since they stay in the fields. . . . But the text is not so absurd; . . . a single straying partridge on the mountains is not thought worth hunting, since they can be found in flocks in the plain" (Bib. R.-W. II. s. v.). (Also the German "Rebhuhn" [partridge] is derived from "rufen" [to call]. Bunsen.*) But from the connection and the words of David, who has before lamented his enforced separation from association with the people of Israel, the following thought also is expressed in this comparison, as in the other: Me, isolated from God's people, far from all association, a fugitive from thy machinations on the mountain heights, thou seekest at all costs to destroy, as one hunts a single fugitive partridge on the mountains only to kill it at all costs, while otherwise from its insignificance it would not be hunted, since partridges are to be found in the field in flocks.—"This speech of David was thoroughly suited to sharpen Saul's conscience and lead him to give up his enmity, if he still had an ear for the voice of truth" (Keil). While these words are similar to those in xxiv. 10-16 [9-15] (as natural from the similarity of the circumstances), the following essential differences yet exist. There David, in order to prove to Saul how unfounded his illusion is (namely, that David is seeking his life), shows him that his life was in his (David's) hand, that he would not touch the Lord's anointed but spared him; here, on the contrary, he calls Saul to account for his ceaseless persecution, represents to him that he is determined to destroy him who, compared with the mighty king, is insignificant, and presses him to abandon this purpose.

* In כִּי־יָצָא remark 1) the double Plu. הָ and הָ, especially the stat. constr. form הָ, Ges. § 87, 5, Rem. 1; Ewald, § 160 b and Anm. 2, § 211 d; 2) הָ for הָ—one הָ having fallen out.

* [Bib. Com. "This incidental testimony to Abner's eminence as a warrior is borne out by his whole history. At the same time David's bantering tone, coupled with ver. 19, makes it probable that David considered Abner his enemy; the latter's great influence with Saul might have prevented the persecution of David. Abner may have feared David as a rival; his opposition to him is shown by his conduct after Saul's death." But all this may be explained also by Abner's devoted loyalty to his kinsman Saul.—Tr.]

Ver. 21. To these words of David corresponds with precision Saul's answer (ver. 21), which is essentially different from that in xxiv. 18 [17]. With the confession: I have sinned, he joins the request that David would return, and the promise that he would no more do him evil, and adds as reason; because my life was precious in thy eyes this day.—[Keil thinks that Saul is less penitent, more hardened here than in chap. xxiv., and this shows the difference of the events; but Thenius and Bib. Comm. are right in declaring that Saul's expression of sorrow and repentance is as decided here as in the former case. No good argument can be drawn from this for either view.—Tr.].—Ver. 22. David offers to return the spear and cruse, the sign that he had spared Saul's life.—Vers. 23, 24. These words attach themselves immediately to that silently eloquent proof of his guilelessness and pure disposition. He 1) declares himself to be a "man of righteousness and faithfulness," and assigns as proof his sparing Saul's life. (For $\text{לִי$ read with all the ms. לְךָ , the ' might easily fall out on account of the following ')). Thenius holds this self-praise of David as proof that the section xxiv.

18-20 [17-19], where Saul praises and blesses David, is the original. But what is this alleged "self-praise" but the positive affirmation of what David says in xxiv. 12 [11] (regarded by Then. as original): "there is no evil in my hand and no iniquity, and I have not sinned against thee," and in his confident appeal to God's righteous judgment, vers. 13, 16 [12, 15]? All that is the content of the idea "righteousness," which he here, in contrast with Saul's unrighteousness, applies to himself. And no more is it self-praise when he speaks of his faithfulness, but simply the expression of his reverence towards the Lord's Anointed, in spite of Saul's perfidious and injurious conduct.—The words "the Lord gave thee into my hand" include the thought: "Thereby did the Lord put me to the test." This test David had stood, exhibiting "righteousness and faithfulness." And therefore he can now 2) say in good conscience: The Lord will requite the man (namely, me) [Eng. A. V. better, "render to every man." —Tr.]. The explanation of this assertion is given in ver. 24: And behold, as thy life was much set by this day in my eyes, so will my life, etc., that is, the Lord will requite my righteousness and faithfulness towards thee in sparing thy life as the Lord's Anointed, by so valuing my life as to save it from the dangers which thou preparest for it. It is difficult to see why (Thenius) such an expectation of the Lord's protection and help, founded on a good conscience, is not genuinely Davidic, and therefore to be esteemed not original. Yet David here says nothing essentially different from what he declares in xxiv. 13, 16 [12, 15] of the Lord as his judge, who will avenge him on Saul, give success to his cause, and save him from Saul's hand. Stähelin's remark (Leben David's, p. 25), that David liked to praise himself like the Arabian heroes, is thoroughly wrong; for David everywhere gives God the highest praise, even where, as here, he affirms what is true of himself.—"All tribulation" (כָּל-צָרָה), all the straits which Saul would hereafter, as he knew, prepare for him. For Saul confesses indeed that he has done him wrong, and will no more work evil against him; but this, recollecting Saul's instability and that former tearful promise of his [xxiv. 16], he could regard only as the expression of a momentary better feeling; behind this he saw Saul's unbroken heart, more and more hardened, which, when this gust of better feeling had passed over, would exhibit its old wickedness, yea, after the quenching of these better impulses and resolutions, must be all the more hardened.*—Ver. 25. Saul's last word to David: "Blessed be thou, my son David; thou wilt both undertake and also fully perform, does not express a changed disposition, love instead of the old enmity, but the fleeting better feeling which David's noble conduct had induced, and which compelled him to affirm that David would come victorious forth through the

* [The Heb. word for "partridge," qore means "the caller," and so perhaps the Eng. "quail." Picet (Orig. Indoe europ.) thinks that rebhuhn—"speckled bird," and perdix, partridge has perhaps the same meaning.—Tr.]

* [Bib.-Com. remarks that the sentiment here ascribed to David is put into Saul's mouth in xxiv. 17-19 [Heb. 18-20], and that (supposing the same event related in xxiv. and xxvi.) a parallel case is found in Matt. xxi. 41, and Luke xx. 16. However this does not favor the supposition of one event, for as in the Gospels both Jesus and His hearers may have said on the same occasion what is reported, so here Saul may have said at one time what David said at another.—Tr.]

Lord's help out of all the straits of his persecutions.—The content and character of Saul's words in xxiv. 17–23 [Eng. 16–22] are very different from these, though both contain Saul's confession of wrong. But the first time [xxiv.] he makes his confession with tears, with acknowledgment of the fruitlessness of his attempts against David and the unavoidable transition of the kingdom to the latter, whom he adjures them to spare his family. But here his inward emotion is not nearly so strong and deep; he affirms merely that he is sorry for his former conduct, and will not repeat it. Keil is therefore right in saying that "he is evidently here already much more hardened." And David went his way, and Saul returned to his place. Thus they parted forever. Berl.-B.: "Their souls were not at one; therefore they remained asunder." It is worthy of note that it is not said of Saul, as xxiv. 23 [22]: "He returned to his house." This points to the fact that he continued his persecution of David, as also appears from the latter's flight (hinted at in vers. 19, 20) to the Philistines, where we find him in chap. xxvii. [It is not necessary to suppose that Saul continued his pursuit of David. David's apprehension in xxvii. 1 was a general one, and very natural, even though Saul had returned home to his "place" in Gibeah.—TR.]

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The conception "that God incites to sin" in the Old Testament belongs to the same circle of thought as the idea, carried over by Paul into the New Testament, of man's hardening in sin as a divine act. The hardening pertains only to the inner being, to heart and disposition (which becomes insusceptible to the influences of the divine word and Spirit), to the will, which persistently sets itself against God's holy will, to the ethical habit of the whole personality, in which irreceptivity for good has become permanent in such wise that the capacity for free self-determination against the evil for the good has ceased. According to the law of His righteous moral government of the world, which punishes evil with evil, God abandons the man who shuts himself up against the invoking of the divine Spirit to the thereby engendered moral condition of inward hardening, sin becoming a factual necessity for him. The divine incitement to evil, on the other hand, refers to individual acts, as is shown by ver. 19 and the passages above cited, 2 Sam. xvi. 10 sq.; xxiv. 1 sq. The divine causation, however, consists not in God's producing evil, which would be inconsistent with His holiness (comp. James i. 13), but in His occasioning the evil to break forth from the hidden depths of the heart and realize itself in deeds, though this need neither presuppose nor induce hardening, is rather intended to be the mean and avenue to the salvation and bettering of the sinner. Hengstenberg on Ps. li. 6: "Sin pertains, indeed, to man. He may always free himself from it by penitence. But if he does not repent, then the forms in which sin exhibits itself are no longer under his control, but under God's dispensation, who determines them as pleases Him, as accords with the plan of His government of the world, for His own honor, and, so long as He is not absolutely rejected, for the good of the sinner. He puts the sinner in positions in which just this or that temptation specially assails him; He leads the thoughts to definite objects of sinful desire, and causes them there to remain and not pass on to others." This divine incitement to sin presupposes the actual free determination of the will in respect to the sins to which the incitement pertains. In this connection O. v. Gerlach excellently remarks on ver. 19: "That the Lord incites a man to sin . . . must always be the result of a conscious, cherished sin or sinful direction of the will, whence then come sins of deed for punishment, and also for the possible bettering of the man. In order to obviate this terrible punishment of sin by sin, David says Saul must again approach the Lord in an offering which atones for sin and restores the heart to the Lord."

2. The inheritance = possession, property is the people of God in so far as He is their Lord, who has made them His people by choosing them out of the mass of the other nations to be the bearer and organ of His self-revelation, and has made a covenant with them. Comp. Deut. i. 29; iv. 20; ix. 26, 29; Ps. xxviii. 9. The complete fulfilment of this idea of the peculiar people [= property-people] is found in the New Testament covenant-relation and the thence resulting association of men, who by Christ's redemption and reconciliation have become God's property; that is, [it is found] in the community of the kingdom in faith in Christ. The greatest evil David thinks to be exclusion from holy life-association with his God among idolaters. The greatest good for him is to belong to this property of God, and to this kingdom-community in the service of the living God. Therein is typically set forth the highest good which he who has become God's property in Christ, finds in participation in God's kingdom and its blessings.

3. There is a self-accusation which, like Saul's confession of sin (ver. 21), is far from true repentance, because it is based not on the broken heart and the abandoned self-will, but on a transient disposition and superficial emotion, and in the recognition of the impossibility of carrying out one's own will over against the divine will, and there is wanting the earnestness of self-denial. In such a condition of soul, as Saul's example shows, even these better impulses and superficial penitences gradually cease, and the judgment of hardening recedes with irretardable steps from repentance.

4. There is a self-assertion, as David's example shows (vers. 23, 24), which not only, without becoming self-praise and self-glorification, in righteousness and faithfulness sets one in the true light against unjust accusation and enmity, for the sake of the Lord and His honor (in whose service the man knows himself to be), but also serves to affirm the moral worth of one's own personality, and to maintain one's real personal honor, which has its root in God's service. One is not therein concerned with the affirmation of his own merits, but with the earnest, true declaration of the position which his inner life, in accordance with God's demands, and through the power of His Spirit, occupies towards God in true piety. Conscious of such relation of heart to his God, the servant of God (as David knew himself to be over against his unjust persecutor, Saul) in tribulation and sufferings has the right to appeal to God's righteous judgment, and with joyful confidence to look for His help and salvation promised to the righteous and innocent.

5. Among the Psalms of David it is particularly the xvii. and xviii. in which there is such clear expression of earnest, conscious power to affirm righteousness and innocence by reason of personal experience of ungodly enmity and divine deliverance, that we must at least suppose the recollection of Saul's persecutions to be a concurring factor in them. In the title of Psalm xviii.: "By the servant of the Lord, by David, who spake to the Lord the words of this Song in the day when the Lord had saved him from the hand of all his enemies and from the hand of Saul," the reference to Saul accords with essential features in the content of the Psalm according to the points of view above indicated, though the Psalm does not refer exclusively to the time of Saul (see on 2 Sam. xxii.). But it is beyond doubt that the whole content of Psalm xvii. presupposes such a position and such experiences as are described here in chaps. xxiv. and xxvi.; for individual portions set forth the same ideas and thoughts that David here expresses; in vers. 1, 2, 5 is contained a similar appeal, in part to his righteousness and faithfulness, in part to God's righteous judgment, against the unrighteousness of His enemies; through the whole Psalm sounds the same tone of firm confidence in the Lord's help and victorious conduct of the course of the righteous against their enemies. Here, too, the experiences of the Sauline Period show themselves as the fruitful soil of David's psalm-poetry.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. CRAMER: The temporal good fortune of pious men often does not last long; ere one expects it, the cross is again before their door. Therefore boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth. Prov. xxvii. 1.—Vers. 2, 3. HEDINGER (from HALL): Good motions that fall into wicked hearts are like some sparks that fall from the flint and steel into wet tinder, lightsome for the time but soon out. Chap. xxiv. 17.—BERL. B.: Ah Saul, thou deceivedst thyself, God is stronger than thou, and thou wilt only be an occasion for new victories.—Vers. 5 sq. SCHLIER: Saul is in peril of his life; to human eyes he is lost. And who has cast him into such peril? Who else than himself? His hatred, with which he anew persecuted David. From this we should learn how constantly sin is the ruin of men. He who does evil, always does himself the greatest hurt.—[Ver. 8. Our best friend becomes our worst enemy, when he would persuade us to do wrong. Comp. Matt. xvi. 23.—TR.]—Vers. 10, 11. HEDINGER: Love and righteousness in a pious man's heart is invincible. [Vers. 9-11. HENRY: David gives two reasons why he would not destroy Saul, nor permit another to do it. 1. It would be a sinful affront to God's ordinance. Saul was the Lord's anointed king of Israel. . . . No man could resist him and be guiltless; the thing David feared was guilt, and his concern respected his innocence more than his safety. 2. It would be a sinful anticipation of God's providence; God had sufficiently showed him, in Nabal's case, that if he left it to Him to do right He would do it in due time. . . . Thus bravely does he prefer his conscience to his interest, and trust God with the issue.—TR.—Ver. 12 sq. OSIANDER: Even though opportunity for revenge is given us, yet we should not avenge ourselves, but commit vengeance to God.—SCHLIER: God grant that we may all learn to love our enemies, that we may learn to requite evil with good! For this is certain: hatred excites strife; but love helps mightily to peace, and overcomes much evil.—Ver. 14. STARKE: Even in cross and persecution one should rejoice and be of good courage.—Ver. 20. S. SCHMID: The feebler and more powerless the pious are under trouble and persecution, the more they may lean on God's support.—Ver. 21. BERL. B.: Nothing can more soften a hard disposition than humility and gentleness.—There is no sinner so hardened but God sends him now and then a ray of illumination to show him all his error. But ah! when they are awakened by such divine movings, it is only for some moments; and such a movement is scarcely past ere they fall back at once into their former life, and forget again all that they had promised.—STARKE: Although the ungodly sometimes appear as if they wished to turn and become pious, yet they soon fall off again and go on again in their ungodliness.—SCHLIER: Even if we here and there lightly make a confession of our faults, how is it as to a downright confession of sin in the sight of God? Has God's goodness led us to repentance? Has His compassion opened our heart? O let us not turn the long-suffering of God into lasciviousness.—STARKE: Truly penitent sinners must confess their sins, ask forgiveness, and promise amendment, and this not hypocritically but in all sincerity (Matt. xix. 16). ["I have sinned." Spurgeon has a sermon (Am. Ed., Third Series) upon this confession as made by seven different persons in the Bible.—TR.]—Ver. 23. God is righteous; a believing soul recognizes that to its consolation.—Ver. 24. OSIANDER: Just as God punishes one barbarity through another, so He rewards benefits with benefits. SER. SCHMID: No one is greater than he whose soul is much set by in the eyes of God.—Ver. 25. CRAMER: Horrible wickedness, to know one thing and do another, and thus knowingly to kick against the pricks.—The ungodly must often be their own prophets. Prov. x. 24.—SER. SCHMID: When the enemies and persecutors of the pious have long enough raged and striven against the will of God, they must at last against their will yield the victory to God and the pious. [TAYLOR: So far as we know, this was the last meeting between Saul and David; and it is pleasing to think that after all that had occurred, Saul's latest utterance to him was one of benediction; at once a vindication of David's conduct in the past, and a forecast of his glory in the future. Verily, the Psalmist was speaking from his own experience when he said, "commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him; and He shall bring it to pass. And He shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noon-day."—TR.]

[Ver. 15. "Art thou a man?" True men exhorted not to act unworthily of their manhood.—TR.]

[Ver. 21. "I have played the fool." 1) In listening to slanderers against an innocent man (ver. 19, comp. xxiv. 9). 2) In opposing a man who evidently must succeed (ver. 25). 3) In resisting the known designs of Providence (xxiv. 20, comp. xxiii. 17). 4) In renewing a wrong already confessed and temporarily forsaken (xxiv.

16-22). Remark: One may confess his folly and take no step towards becoming wiser. The benefit of such a confession depends upon whether it is made in bitterness or in humility.—Tr.] [Upon this chapter in general, comp. above on chap. xxiv.—Tr.]

IX. David at Ziklag in the land of the Philistines.

CHAPTER XXVII. 1-12.

- 1 AND David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul; there is nothing better¹ for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair² of me to seek me any more in any
- 2 coast of Israel; so shall I escape out of his hand. And David arose and he [om. he] passed over with [he and] the³ six hundred men that were with him unto Achish,⁴ the son of Maach, king of Gath. And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men; every man with his household, even [om. even] David with [and] his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the Carmelitess,⁵ Nabal's wife
- 4 [Nabal's wife, the Carmelitess]. And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath; and he sought no more again for him.
- 5 And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country [in one of the country-cities], that I may dwell there; for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?
- 6 Then [And] Achish gave him Ziklag that day; wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto
- 7 [to] the kings of Judah unto this day. And the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full [om. full] year and four months.
- 8 And David and his men went up and invaded the Geshurites and the Gezrites⁶ and the Amalekites; for⁷ those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as
- 9 thou goest to Shur, even [and] unto the land of Egypt. And David smote the

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. So the Vulg.; Chald. and Syr. have: "there is nothing good for me, but I will escape," which is the rendering adopted by Erdmann. Very near this is the Sept. far μή. It is more literally exact, but Eng. A. V. gives the sense.—It is not necessary to read דָּבָר טוֹב instead of יָצֵא.—Tr.]

² [Ver. 1. Or, "desist from me." The idea of the word is "to give a thing up as impossible or useless."—Tr.]
³ [Ver. 2. The Art. is properly inserted as in Sept.; it is required by the connection and permitted by the Heb.—Tr.]

⁴ [Ver. 2. The origin and meaning of these names are uncertain; conjectures may be found in the lexicons of Gesenius and Fürst. Hitzig's comparison of the Sept. form Ἀχίσις with Ἀχίσις is groundless.—Tr.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. Sept. has "wife of Nabal the Carmelite," and so Arab.; Syr., Vulg., and Chald., are ambiguous. The Greek text is supported by xxx. 5, and 2 Sam. ii. 2, and is probably to be preferred here.—Tr.]

⁶ [Ver. 8. So the Qeri; Kethib is "Girzites," both unknown names. Sept. has merely "Gesrites and Amalekites," whence Wellhausen supposes the Heb. "Geshurites" and "Gezrites" to be a duplet or double reading (by clerical error) of the same name, of which there are many examples in the Sept., but very few in the Heb. As the Sept. might easily have omitted one name accidentally or from not understanding it, and as the other VSS. all give three names (Syr. and Arab. putting "Gedola" for the second) it is better to retain the Heb. text.—Tr.]

⁷ [Ver. 8. On this difficult clause see Erdmann in the Exposition. Instead of "as thou goest to" we may render "unto," "unto Shur and Egypt." On the text (which the VSS. treat variously) it may be remarked 1) that the אֶרֶץ refers to the אֶרֶץ, and Erdmann's translation "the land which they of old inhabited" is so far correct; 2) the sentence requires a name of a place instead of אֶרֶץ, a terminus a quo to correspond to the terminus ad quem, and the parenthetic rendering of Erdmann "and David invaded . . . the Amalekites—for these were the inhabitants of the land, which (they inhabited) of old—as far as Shur and Egypt" is against the connection of the words, while the insertion of "they inhabited" after "which" is violent, and here not permissible.—If we provisionally read אֶרֶץ (as some Grk. MSS. read and the Vat. MS. suggests), we may render: "David invaded . . . the Amalekites, for these inhabited the land which reached from Telem to Shur and to Egypt" (so Thenius and Wellhausen). By omitting אֶרֶץ we get a simple sense: "for these inhabited the land of old, etc." (so Syr. and Vulg., followed by Eng. A. V.); but, as Then. remarks, what is the propriety of referring here to the antiquity of these tribes?—Sept. (Vat.) here has a duplet.—Tr.]

land, and left [saved] neither man nor woman alive, and took away [om. away] the^s sheep and the oxen and the asses and the camels and the apparel, and returned 10 and came to Achish. And Achish said, Whither^s have ye made a road [an inroad] to-day? And David said, Against the south of Judah and against the south of the 11 Jerahmeelites and against the south of the Kenites. And David saved neither man nor woman alive to bring tidings [om. tidings] to Gath, saying, lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be¹⁰ his manner all the while he dwelleth
 12 in the country of the Philistines. And Achish believed [confided in] David, saying, He hath made his people Israel utterly to abhor him, therefore [and] he shall be my servant forever.

* [Ver. 9. The Articles are here proper, because the Heb., though without the Art., supposes that all the animals and clothing were carried off.—Tr.]

* [Ver. 10. Instead of לָמָּח several MSS. of De Rossi read לָמָּח, which is safer (so Eng. A. V.). The MSS. and Ed. in the succeeding words waver between לָמָּח and לָמָּח (as in ver. 8).—Tr.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 11. Syr., Chald., Arab. and some MSS., regard this clause as the word of the narrator, not of the informers, and this is better, since the informers would not express an opinion as to David's future conduct. Put a full stop after David, and render: "And this was his custom all the while he dwelt, etc."—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

V. 1. David flees to Philistia to king Achish of Gath. That this is not the continuation of chap. xxiv. 23 [22], but of xxvi. 25, has already been established, against Thenius. In spite of Saul's renewed assurances that he would desist from his hostility, David, on account of his repeatedly exhibited vacillation in feeling and purpose, could no longer remain in the land of Judah; the event which he hints at in xxvi. 19, which his increased suffering (the explanation of which is given in chap. xxvi.) predicts, now occurs; he is obliged by Saul's renewed machinations (comp. ver. 4) to leave the country, to go to Philistia.* And David said to his heart—"thought, reflected"—thus dramatically is David introduced, taking counsel with himself what he is to do in respect to Saul's continued hostility. The word "now" (הַיּוֹם) refers to his present dangerous position. I shall now be carried off into Saul's hand—not: "by the hand" (Keil, De W., and others). This expression: "into the hand" (שׁוֹלַח יָד) has led the ancient versions to modify the proper meaning of the verb "snatch away" into "I delivered" (Sept.), "fall" (Vulg.). [Cahen and Philippon render "perish by the hand;" Bible Commentary: "fall into the hand." The Niph. is used in the sense of "perish" in 1 Sam. xii. 25 (so Erdmann) and xxvi. 10—and this sense suits here, though the others are also good.—Tr.] There is nothing good for me.—That is, here, or, if I remain here, as the connection suggests. On account of this negation the 'פּ is to be rendered simply "but" (Chald., Syr.), not "yes, I will flee" (Maur., De W.), nor "is it not better that I flee?" (Vulg.), nor (supplying כִּי with Sept.), "there is nothing good for me, unless" (Thenius).—His ground for this determination: Saul will desist from me and I shall escape him is borne out by the result (ver. 4 referring expressly back to these words). [See "Text. and Gram."—Tr.]—Ver. 2. The number six hundred has remained unchanged—xxv. 13; xxiii. 13; xxii. 2.—Achish is identical with the Achish of xxi. 10sq. As a man persecuted by Achish's enemy, Saul, David might confidently hope to be received by him. The Philistine king Achish of 1 Ki. ii. 39 may be the same person—though he would then have reigned about fifty years, and must have been very old. He is the son of Maachah, this Achish the "son of Maach," probably two forms of the same paternal name. Gath had been before conquered by the Israelites, (1 Sam. vii. 14), but appears here and xxi. 10sq. as the residence of an independent king hostile to Saul. See 1 Chr. xviii. 1, which states that David afterwards conquered it. That the event here described is a different one from that in xxi. 10sq. has been already there shown by pointing out the difference in the circumstances. There he is a solitary deserter, feigning madness to procure safety, being recognized as Goliath's conqueror. Here he appears in princely style with all his retinue, and so gains the confidence of Achish. Cler.: "The long enmity that Saul had shown him had made him acceptable to the enemies of the Hebrews and of Saul."—Ver. 3. The formal settling of this emigrant colony. Each of the warriors had a family, as appears from the words: With his house.—The same statement is found in 2 Sam. ii. 3. A little ambulant kingdom.—His two wives.—See xxv. 42-44. [These facts are mentioned to prepare the way for the narrative in chap. xxx. (Bib. Com.).—Tr.]—Ver. 4. See ver. 1. (Read Qeri קָדַם.) David gained his end by this immigration. [In Gath David seems to have studied music—see title of Ps. viii. (Ew.)—and may here have become acquainted with Ittai the Gittite, 2 Sam. xv. 19 (Bible Com.).—Tr.]

Vers. 5-7. Achish gives David Ziklag as a residence.—Ver. 5. If I have found favor with thee.—This is presupposed as a fact in this request. Achish regarded David and his band as allies against Saul, because he sought refuge with him from Saul. He must indeed, as Ewald (III. 137) well remarks, "long since have seen his error as to this strange man, and the more bitterly he regretted it, the more disposed he would now be to receive the distinguished leader of a considerable armed band, who was so often and so sorely persecuted by Saul." Grotius: "David's fame and the expectation excited by him must have been great, that a city . . . should have been granted him for safety." Give me one of the country-cities.—David asked such a city as property; in ver. 6 it is expressly said that Achish gave it him for a possession. David's alleged reason for the request is that it was not suitable for him, Achish's servant and subject to remain in the capital city with his large retinue. The words do not support the explanation (Then.): "it is not fitting that I, who am as thou, a prince, should reside here with thee." The idea "to burden thee" (Buns.) is not contained in the expression "with thee," but is involved in the situation. [David subtly suggests the expensiveness of his presence in Gath; his real motive was to be out of the way of observation, so as to play the part of Saul's enemy without acting against him (Bib. Com.).—Tr.]—Ver. 8. Ziklag pertained first to Judah (Josh. xv. 31), then to Simeon (Josh. xix. 5), was afterwards taken by the Philistines, and perhaps remained uninhabited (Keil); according to xxx. 1 it lay far south near the Amalekite border. Its position in the Negeb (South country) has not yet been determined. According to Ritter (Erdk. XVI. 133) it was perhaps the present Tel el Hasy north-east of Gaza, "whence one enjoys a wide view, westward to the sea, eastward to the mountains of Hebron, northward to the mountains of Ephraim, and southward to the plains of Egypt." Comp. Raumer, § 225. Knobel conjectures that it was south-west of Milh, in Gasluj [Asluj], on the way to Abdeh (Rob. III. 154, 862 [Am. ed. II. 201]). This would put it much farther south. [See "Ziklag" in Smith's Bible Dictionary. Mr. Grove does not favor this identification.—Tr.] The remark that it consequently became the property of the kings of Judah confirms the view that the words and he gave him mean that the city was a present from Achish to David. Though the distinction between Judah and Israel appears already in the time of Saul and David (xi. 8; xvii. 52; xviii. 16; 2 Sam. ii. 9 sq.; iii. 10; v. 1–5; xix. 41 sq.; xx. 24), yet the phrase "kings of Judah" indicates that the narrative supposes the division of Israel into two kingdoms and the existence of the kingdom of Judah [so that this Book was composed between Solomon and the Babylonian exile.—Tr.]—Ver. 7. A year and four months. The first expression (D'P') = "some time, a considerable time," Gen. iv. 40; 1 Sam. xxix. 3, then = "a year," Lev. xxv. 29; Judg. xvii. 10; 1 Sam. i. 8; ii. 19, etc.* This exact statement of time attests the historical value of the narrative (Then., Keil).

* [The reason why David goes to Philistia rather than to friendly Moab is perhaps partly because he would be more secure with this strong military nation (being no longer able with his large band, in which were many women and children, to hide or subsist in mountain-caves), and partly because he wished to be near his country, to help his people, or to take advantage of whatever might happen.—Tr.]

Vers. 8–12. David makes incursions from Ziklag into the territory of the neighboring tribes on the south border of Palestine, returns with rich booty, and has the confidence of king Achish.—Ver. 8. And he went up, not "he went out" (De W., Keil); the tribes dwelt on higher ground than Ziklag, probably on the mountain-plateau of the northern portion of the wilderness of Paran. "Invaded" (שָׁרַץ), literally "spread themselves out;" the word is used especially of a hostile army (1 Chron. xiv. 9, 13), and so means to attack a city or land. (Here with שָׁרַץ, as xxx. 1; Judg. xx. 37, = "to attack towards," with שָׁרַץ = "fall on," as xxiii. 27; Judg. ix. 33, 44.)—The district of the Geshurites (to be distinguished from the little Aramean kingdom of Geshur, 2 Sam. xv. 8; comp. 2 Sam. iii. 3; xiii. 37; xiv. 23, and from the northern Geshurites near Hermon on the border of Bashan (Gilead), Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 6; xiii. 13) lay south of Philistia near the district of the Amalekites, along with which it is here named.—[Comp. Josh. xiii. 2, 3.—Tr.]—The Geszites (Qeri) or Girzites (Kethib), a tribe not elsewhere mentioned, who, since the scene of David's incursions was the south of Philistia and Palestine, must not be identified (Grot., Ew.) with the inhabitants of Gesser (Josh. x. 33) in the west of Ephraim. Nor can we think of the Gerrenis (2 Mac. xiii. 24), inhabitants of the city Gerra between Rhinocoloura and Pelusium (Cler.), since this would carry us beyond the Arabian desert, in which the Geszites at any rate dwelt.—[In Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. "Geszites," Mr. Grove, following Gesenius, Fürst, Stanley, suggests a connection between this people and the tribe which was connected with Mount Gerizim in central Palestine. This is an ingenious, though as yet unestablished conjecture.—Tr.]—Here, after Saul's war of extermination against them (xv. 7), the Amalekites had collected their scattered remnant and established themselves.—The* safest rendering of the following (very difficult) clause seems to be: "David . . . invaded . . . the Amalekites (for these were inhabitants of the land, who inhabited it of old) as far as Shur and Egypt." The second verb "inhabited" is naturally to be supplied from the preceding participle ["inhabitants"]. David carried his incursions as far as Shur and the Egyptian border. That the Amalekites as nomads held this district is involved in xv. 7, where Saul is said to have smitten them "up to Shur, which is on the border of Egypt." Their old seats in the south of Palestine stretched into Arabia Petraea (Ex. xvii. 8 sq.; comp. Num. xiii. 29). The narrator here, in accordance with xv. 7, assumes this in the remark that David extended his incursions to Shur and Egypt. Perhaps he describes them as the original inhabitants of these regions with reference to their opposition to Israel in the Exodus (Ex. xvii. 8 sq.), and to their defeat by Saul (xv. 7), which, however, did not prevent their re-collection and settlement here. "To make military expeditions from Ziklag, at the best mere incursions for booty, was at that time a necessity for David and his men" (Ew.).†

* [In the Germ. this paragraph follows the text-criticism below.—Tr.]

† Text-criticism of latter half of verse 8.—שָׁרַץ is as to its gender (fem.) const. ad sensum, as if קִשְׁמוֹתָיו, gentes, familias, preceded. Expositors have dealt variously with the words שָׁרַץ, etc. (which are attached to שָׁרַץ), on account of the difficulties in them which centre in שָׁרַץ. Thenius regards the שָׁרַץ in the

* [Rashi and others, on the assumed ground that Saul reigned only two years, render "some days" (Philippson).—Tr.]

Ver. 9. As nomads these tribes had large herds. —He left neither man nor woman alive; the reason for this is given in ver. 11. He needed the rich booty partly for the support of himself and his men, partly to retain and increase the king's favor. It was for this latter reason that, after his return from his expeditions, he went to Gath, instead of going immediately to Ziklag, in order to make report of his movements to Achish and deliver him a part of the spoil.—Ver. 10. The verb "said," like the "went up" in ver. 8, here expresses customary, repeated acting. The meaning is: Achish used to say: "Against whom have ye made an incursion this time?"*

present text as inexplicable, since it is without connections, and thinks it strange that no term. a quo accompanies the term. ad quem, as is usual (Gen. x. 19, 30; Num. xiii. 21; xxiv. 8; Judg. xi. 33), and, supposing the error to be in קְטֹלִים , he reads קְטֹלִים after the Sept. $\alpha\tau\omicron\lambda\alpha\mu$, the latter word being taken as miswritten for Τελάμ . This reading would certainly give a simple and natural explanation, as Telam—Telaim (1 Sam. xv. 4) was on the south border of Palestine (Josh. xv. 24; 1 Sam. xv. 4 sq.), not far from the Amalekite territory, which Saul thence invaded. But to read Telam we must suppose a clerical error in the Sept.; and then all the other VSS. presuppose our Hebrew text. Perhaps the Sept. read wrongly קְטֹלִים , and rendered it $\alpha\tau\omicron\lambda\alpha\mu$, though elsewhere, as Thénius rightly objects, this word "Elam" is rendered by them Ἑλὰμ or Αἰλὰμ . For the rest we find קְטֹלִים without term. a quo in Gen. xiii. 10 [where, however, a term. a quo is implied in the "garden of Egypt."—Ta.] Resort has been had to the omission of קְטֹלִים ; so the ancient VSS. [and Eng. A. V.] and Bunsen, who translates: "for these were of old the inhabitants of this land as far as," etc. But it is found in all codices, and its great difficulty makes a clerical error improbable. The example of the ancient VSS. is not authority for omitting it, since they often smooth down or go around difficulties. Seb. Schmid takes קְטֹלִים as parenthesis: "they dwell in the land, which was of old, as thou goest." But there was no need to state the antiquity of the land in itself. Kell takes קְטֹלִים as adverb and קְטֹלִים as Inf., so that the literal rendering would be: "where of old thy coming is to Shur;" that is, where of old one travels to Shur up to Egypt. But קְטֹלִים in such geographical and local statements is always used in the sense of "as far as." Moreover, one does not see the reason for such a local statement here. If it means that of old the road to Shur or Egypt passed through this land, then the term. a quo, namely, Palestine, may easily be supplied from the context; but why this remark, when there was no other road to Egypt? And the suffix does not fit in with the "of old," because it would necessarily refer to present going. It seems safest with Ewald to regard the words from קְטֹלִים to קְטֹלִים as parenthesis—and to take the following as stating how far southward David pushed his incursions. [On this reading see "Text. and Gram."—Ta.]

* Text-criticism.—The קְטֹלִים is difficult. To take it as particle of subjective negation, like אֵין —"ye went not out [said nicht auszugehen] to-day" (Gesenius, Kell), is unsatisfactory, since it cannot be supposed that Achish expected a negative answer (Thén.). [Gesenius and Kell both take it as interrogative.—Ta.] De Wette's rendering: "did ye not make an incursion to-day?"—Aben Ezra's nonne irratisse? requires אֵין or לֹא־יָרַדְתִּי , for which קְטֹלִים is never used. Maurer explains: nihil hodie invasisti? ac nullam in regionem hodie invasisti! referring to xxx. 14, where also the verb is construed first with the Acc., and then with קְטֹלִים . But to connect such an accusative relation with קְטֹלִים is unsafe, and the difficulty from the constant meaning of the latter remains. The

David's answer: Against the south of Judah and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, comp. xxx. 29, the posterity of Jerahmeel, the first-born of Hezron (2 Chron. ii. 9, 25), and so "one of the three great families of Judah descended from Hezron who probably dwelt on the southernmost border of the Tribe of Judah" (Keil), and against the south of the Kenites—who were under the protection of Judah (comp. xv. 5, 6; Judg. i. 16), mentioned along with Amalek in Num. xxiv. 21, where it is said of them: "in rocks thou hast put thy rest," referring to their dwellings in the rocks and caves south of Palestine, to which also their name points.*—All the tribes mentioned here and in ver. 8 dwelt near one another in the district bordering on the Negeb (south country) of Judah, and stretching between the hill country of Judah and the Arabian desert (see Josh. xv. 21). David's expeditions were really against the tribes named in ver. 8, who extended close into the south of Judah. It was his interest, however, to make Achish believe that he had made an expedition against Saul, and consequently against the men of Judah. He therefore says nothing of his incursion against the tribes named in ver. 8, which were on friendly terms with Achish (ver. 11), but declares that he has marched against the south of Judah, that is against the Israelites there and the tribes under their protection. This deception was made possible only by the fact that those tribes dwelt so near together that "that when the march began, no one could tell its destination" (Thén.).—Ver. 11. Confirmation of David's endeavor to deceive Achish as to the object of his attack. He spared neither man nor woman to bring them to Gath, though he was accustomed to carry thither the richest booty. The narrator thus resumes the statement in ver. 9 in order to add the explanation: "he did not, as was the custom in war, carry them to Gath, but slew them, that he might not be betrayed by them to Achish." Contrary to the Masoretic accentuation a stronger punctuation mark is to be put after the words: saying, lest they tell on us, saying. So did David (Sept. Vulg., Maur., Thén., Keil), since the following words: And so was his manner all the while he dwelt in the land of the Philistines, are naturally not a part of the preceding speech, but are the continuation of the narrator. וְכָסֶפֶת = his constant, habitual conduct, as in vers. 8, 9.—Ver. 12 refers back to ver. 10; David's deception succeeded completely with Achish. From David's reports (which he received for pure coin), Achish drew two favorable considerations: 1) To preserve my favor and friendship, he has made himself thoroughly hateful to his people, or better (from the literal mean-reading וְכָסֶפֶת , whither, has therefore been adopted by some (Chald., Syr., Arab., R. Jesh., Rashi, D. Kimchi, Bunsen, et al.). But if a text-error must be assumed, it is better (following the Sept. ἐν τῇ ῥίμᾳ , Vulg. in quem) to suppose that וְכָסֶפֶת has fallen out, and instead of וְכָסֶפֶת to read וְכָסֶפֶת (as in ver. 8), or וְכָסֶפֶת , which latter is preferable because of the וְכָסֶפֶת in David's answer (Thén.)—"וְכָסֶפֶת," "against whom?" So also R. Jonah and R. Levi.

* [The name, of uncertain origin, is surmised by Gesen. to mean "smith."—Ta.] ing of the Heb. "stench,") made himself "a loathing" (comp. xiii. 12), and 2) completely alienated from his people, as their enemy, he will now be my servant forever. The word "forever" (עלמך) refers to the present, when David already stood in the relation of vassal and dependent to Achish, who is now sure that he will always be subject to him.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. David's removal to Philistia, regarded in the light of his previous divine guidance, was a self-willed act, which had its ground in little faith, and produced one sin after another. Though a prophet, David had received the divine command to take up his abode not in a foreign land, but at home, in the land of Judah (xxii. 5). He disobeyed this command under the conviction that there was no escape for him from Saul but in Philistia. Hitherto in important undertakings and difficult positions he had repeatedly sought the divine counsel and will through God's word and through prayer to God. Here he proceeds in his own strength, and nothing is said of his inquiring of the Lord. He was certain of his divine calling as the Anointed of the Lord; he knew the divine promises, which could not lie; he had had most excellent experiences of the divine deliverances (xvii. 37) and the saving power of the Lord; and yet in the difficult position produced by Saul's persistent hate, he becomes timid and faint-hearted; in littleness and weakness of faith he goes his own way.

2. But, along with God's people's experiences of His goodness and faithfulness, there are manifestations of His punitive, chastening righteousness, as a witness against the unbelief and disobedience (and the connected unfaithfulness) which are concealed behind their littleness and weakness of faith. David was to feel painfully removal from association with God's people (xxvi. 19); as "Anointed of the Lord" he was to feel in his conscience the punishment of dependence on a heathen king, which he had himself assumed, and which was only externally somewhat softened by the somewhat freer position which his residence in Ziklag gave him; yet he found himself obliged in order to preserve the king's favor, to take a stand and maintain a conduct towards not only Saul but also his people, whereby he would appear to the heathen to be their enemy. Further, he saw himself forced into paths of untruthfulness and prevarication, and with king Achish to have recourse to trickery and lies.—F. W. Krummacher: "Was not David again guilty of open lying and denial of his people? In the eyes of God—undoubtedly. To himself David may indeed have attempted to justify himself by saying that his ambiguous language was only an allowable stratagem of war, and that it was a heathen to whom he veiled the truth. . . . But he will soon find out that God weighs those who will belong to Him in the scales of the Sanctuary, in which there is, among others, as weight-stone, the indestructible word: Thou shalt not bear false witness."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Ver. 1. HALL: The over-long continuance of a temptation may easily weary the best patience, and may attain that by protraction which it could never do by violence. David himself at last begins to bend under this trial. . . . The greatest saints upon earth are not always upon the same pitch of spiritual strength: he that some time said, "I will not be afraid of ten thousands," now says, "I shall perish one day by the hand of Saul."—TR.] Ver. 1 sq. SCHLIER: We suppose that when one has attained to faith, then everything must go on straight and smooth, that there must always be progress from faith to faith; and if it turns out otherwise, we suppose the whole has been only an appearance. He who so thinks knows neither the human heart nor human life.—STARKE: Even the heroic power of faith in the servants of God alternates with human weaknesses.—HEDINGER [from HALL]: "The best faith is but like the twilight, mixed with some degrees of darkness and infidelity.—Ver. 5 sq. SCHLIER: We suppose that when one comes to be of little faith, and in weakness enters upon wrong ways, now God's judgments would of necessity follow immediately, that now the Lord's chastening hand will take hold and by punishments re-establish the old faith. And it is true that in a case of unbelief things often happen so. But little-faith is not unbelief; the Lord helps the little-faith of His people in other ways. . . . The Lord goes after His children with love alone; and when one becomes weak in faith He first heaps up benefits upon him, and when one loses heart, He lets him find out what a faithful and thoroughly kind God he has.—Ver. 10 sq. HEDINGER [from HALL]: The infirmities of God's children never appear but in their extremities. [HALL: It is hard for the best man to say, how far he will be tempted. If a man will put himself among Philistines, he cannot promise to come forth innocent.—TR.]—BERL. B.: So one sin rises out of another; out of mistrust towards God comes fear of man, dissimulation and lying. [TAYLOR: Mark the prolific progeny that sprang from the one parent sin of unbelief in this dark chapter of David's life; prayerlessness; desertion of the sphere of duty; theft; murder; falsehood. All these have germinated from the one innocent-looking seed, loss of confidence in God.—TR.]

[Ver. 1. A good man in a season of dejection. He forgets past blessings and promises, ignores present mercies, exaggerates coming evils, forms unwise plans without consultation or prayer, and often involves himself in great difficulties, from which only some special providence can deliver.—TR.]

FOURTH SECTION.

Saul's Downfall in War with the Philistines.

CHAPTERS XXVIII.—XXXI.

I. David in the Philistine Expedition against Israel. Saul's Visit to the Witch of Endor.

CHAPTER XXVIII. 1-25.

- 1 AND it came to pass in those days that the Philistines gathered their armies¹ together for warfare,² to fight with Israel. And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly that thou shalt go out with me to battle [in the army],¹ thou and 2 thy men. And David said to Achish, Surely [Therefore] thou³ shalt know what thy servant can [will] do. And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of mine head⁴ for ever.
3 Now [And] Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him and buried him in Ramah, even⁵ in his own city. And Saul had put away those that had familiar
4 spirits⁶ and the wizards⁷ out of the land. And the Philistines gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem; and Saul gathered all Israel together, 5 and they pitched in Gilboa. And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he
6 was afraid and his heart greatly trembled. And when [om. when] Saul inquired of the Lord [Jehovah], [ins. and] the Lord [Jehovah] answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim⁸ nor by prophets.
7 Then said Saul [And Saul said] unto his servants, Seek me a woman⁹ that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her and inquire of her. And his servants said
8 unto him, Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at Endor. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he [om. he] went, and two men with him, and they came to the woman by night; and he said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit,¹⁰ and bring me him [him] up whom I shall 9 name unto thee. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those that have familiar spirits and the wizards out of the land; wherefore, then, layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ [Ver. 1. Literally "camps" (מַחֲנֵי). The same word in the last clause of this verse is rendered "battle [army]," and in ver. 19, "host [camp]."—Tx.]

² [Ver. 1. Syr. adds: "to the ravine" (רֶחֶל), perhaps a repeated misreading of מַחֲנֵי. Sept. has ἐφελθεῖν, apparently taking מַחֲנֵי as Inf. in its original meaning "go forth."—Tx.]

³ [Ver. 2. Sept. "now" (עַתָּה) inst. of הַיּוֹם, which is better.—Tx.]

⁴ [Ver. 2. Sept.: "chief of the body-guard."—Tx.]

⁵ [Ver. 3. The ו is omitted in some MSS. and in Sept., Syr., Vulg.; it may be explained as appositional or epexegetical; but the omission is easier.—Tx.]

⁶ [Ver. 3. Usually now rendered "necromancers." So the Chald. (שִׁבְחֵי); Syr., Vulg. and Aq. have "magicians."—Tx.]

⁷ [Ver. 3. This is a literal rendering of the Heb., which means: "those who know" (Eng. wisard—from the verb wit, "to know"), Erdmann "die klugen leute," so the Greek. Other VSS. render "sorcerers," which is the proper sense.—Tx.]

⁸ [Ver. 6. The VSS. are troubled by this word. Sept. ἐν τοῖς ὁφθαλμοῖς, Aq. ἐν φαντασμαῖς, Sym. καὶ τὰ ὄφθαλμοι, Syr. "by fire," Vulg. per sacerdotes. See the Exposition.—Tx.]

⁹ [Ver. 7. נִשְׁחָזָה is the ordinary form of the construct. of נִשְׁחָזָה. Here the relation expressed (lit. woman of a possessor of Ob) would be simply the appositional. The word may possibly be an absolute form, comp. Deut. xxi 11. Erdmann: "a woman that hath a necromantic spirit."—Tx.]

¹⁰ [Ver. 8. De Wette, Philippon, Erdmann render "by necromancy" (totenbeschwörung); but Ob is the spirit, not the art; Cahen: par l'esprit d' Ob.—Tx.]

- 10 And Saul swore to her by the Lord [Jehovah], saying, As the Lord [Jehovah] 11 liveth, there shall no punishment¹¹ happen¹² to thee for this thing. Then said the woman [And the woman said], Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel.
 12 And when [om. when] the woman saw Samuel, [ins. and] she cried with a loud voice, and the woman spake [said] to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me?
 13 for¹³ thou art Saul. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid; for [om. for]¹⁴ what [ins. then] sawest [seest] thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods 14 [see a god]¹⁵ ascending out of the earth. And he said unto her, What form is he of [is his form]? And she said, An old¹⁶ man cometh up, and he is covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself.
 15 And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? And Saul answered [said], I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams, therefore [and] I have called¹⁷ thee that thou mayest make known 16 unto me what I shall do. Then said Samuel [And Samuel said], Wherefore, then, dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord [Jehovah] is departed from thee, and is be-17 come thine enemy?¹⁸ And the Lord [Jehovah] hath done to him¹⁹ [for himself] as he spake by me, for [and] the Lord [Jehovah] hath rent the kingdom out of 18 thine hand and given it to thy neighbor, even to David. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord [Jehovah], nor executedst his fierce wrath upon Amalek, 19 therefore hath the Lord [Jehovah] done this thing unto thee this day. Moreover [And] the Lord [Jehovah] will also [om. also] deliver Israel [ins. also]²⁰ with thee into the hand of the Philistines, and to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me;
 the Lord [Jehovah] also [om. also] shall [will] deliver the host [camp]²¹ of Israel 20 [ins. also] into the hand of the Philistines. Then [And] Saul fell straightway²² all along [his full length] on the earth, and was sore afraid because of the words of Samuel; and there was no strength in him, for he had eaten no bread all the 21 day nor all the night. And the woman came unto Saul, and saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thine handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and I have put my life in my hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou 22 spakest unto me. Now therefore [And now], I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee, and eat, that thou mayest have strength when thou goest on thy way. But [And] he re-23 fused, and said, I will not eat. But [And] his servants, together with the woman, compelled²³ him [his servants compelled him, and the woman also], and he hear-

¹¹ [Ver. 10. Properly "iniquity" (עָוֹן), then its result, "blame" (Erdm., schuld), "punishment."—T_a.]

¹² [Ver. 10. The Dagh. in the פ, which is merely euphonic, is omitted in very many MSS.—T_a.]

¹³ [Ver. 12. Lit.: "and thou art Saul,"] explanatory—"for." But we may render: why hast thou deceived me, and thou art Saul? Erdmann: du bist ja Saul.—T_a.]

¹⁴ [Ver. 13. The ׀, which is here strange, may be—"but" in rapid excited talk. Sept. "say what thou sawest," where "say" is an obvious insertion. Other VSS. omit the ׀ (Vulg., Syr.).—T_a.]

¹⁵ [Ver. 13. So De Wette, Cahen, Philipsson. Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg. have Plu., as Eng. A. V. Chald.: "the angel of Jehovah." Erdmann has geist. See Exposition.—T_a.]

¹⁶ [Ver. 14. Sept.: ἀσπύς, "upright;" they probably read וְקָם (Schleusner).—T_a.]

¹⁷ [Ver. 15. The short (Waw consec.) form of the verb is found in 2 MSS.—T_a.]

¹⁸ [Ver. 16. On the text-reading see the Exposition. Aq., Theod.: κατά σου, Sym. ἀντιφάσις σου.—T_a.]

¹⁹ [Ver. 17. Vulg.: faciet enim tibi Deus. So Sept. and some MSS.: "to thee." The other VSS. are as the Heb., which is better maintained as the harder reading.—T_a.]

²⁰ [Ver. 19. The ׀ here is difficult, unless we render: "both Israel and thee." Otherwise the ׀ is without explanation, and would seem to be repeated from the third clause. Wellhausen thinks the first and third clauses identical, and omits the first because of the unintelligible ׀. Yet the "camp" in the third clause seems to difference it from the first, and the conjunction may be explained as above or dropped. The Heb. text is supported by the VSS.—T_a.]

²¹ [Ver. 20. Lit.: "hasted and fell," according to a common Heb. idiom, Ges. Gr. § 142. Sym.: ταχύ, Sept.: κατακλίνας. In ver. 21 the Sept. renders by this same word the Heb. נָפַל, "troubled," whence Wellh. would read the latter word, but unnecessarily, for the present text gives a good sense, and Sept. might be right here, and wrong in ver. 21.—T_a.]

²² [Ver. 23. Instead of וַיִּפְּצוּ, some MSS. and EDD. have וַיִּפְּצוּ. The former—"violently pressed on," the latter—"besought." The text, as the stronger and more vigorous, must be maintained.—T_a.]

kened unto their voice; so [and] he arose from the earth and sat upon²³ the bed 24 [bench]. And the woman had a fat [fatted]²⁴ calf in the house; and she hasted and killed it, and took flour, and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread 25 thereof; And she brought it before Saul and before his servants, and they did eat. Then [And] they rose up, and went away that night.

* [Ver. 23. Many MSS. and EDD. read על inst. of לָא, and so the ancient VSS. seem to have read. לָא is difficult here.—Tr.]

* [Ver. 24. Sept. νομός: Sym.: σφιλοστροφία, Others: γαλαθρόν.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. A new war of the Philistines against the Israelites. David is required by Achish to join the Philistine army with his band and take part in this war against his own people.—His indefinite and evasive answer.—In those days, namely, during David's stay in Philistia; giving the chronological connection with the preceding, in order to continue the narrative of chap. xxvii.—The Philistines gathered their army, a general summons throughout Philistia to the extreme north, where a battle was afterwards fought in the region of Jezreel,—“a general war of all the Philistine princes against Israel, in which David, as Philistine vassal-prince, was obliged to take part” (Ewald). “In the army” (וְעַל הַמִּלְחָמָה) not “into the camp” (S. Schmid, de W.), [Eng. A. V. freely “to battle”]. In David's answer the “thou shalt know” answers to Achish's formal “know thou” [same word in Heb.]. Thus is explained the [emphatic] “thou” (אַתָּה), for which there is no need to read with Sept. and Vulg. “now” (הָעַתָּה, Then.). לָךְ is not profecto (Cler.), [so Eng. A. V. “surely”], but = “accordingly, therefore,” “cum ita sit s. ita videbis” (Maur.). David gives not a definite, but an evasive answer, comp. xxix. 8. By Achish's demand, made in good faith, that he should go to battle against his people, David must have been thrown into a struggle of conscience, of which Achish had no suspicion. The latter therefore takes David's ambiguous answer, which seemed to promise the action which he required, as a definite declaration, and accordingly names him confidently “keeper of his head,” captain of his body-guard (Ew.). Here, as above, לָךְ = “under such circumstances, therefore.” The rendering “I would name thee” (Cler., Dathe) is untenable by reason of the context, especially the “for ever.” That David actually went out with the Philistine army appears from xxix. 2 sq. The narrative in xxix. 1 sq. is the continuation of ver. 2. All between from ver. 3 is an episode, which (as appears especially from a comparison of ver. 4 with xxix. 1) is an insertion from a separate source, and therefore is an independent narrative, which is not in necessary connection with the preceding and succeeding context.

Ver. 3. Introductory statement 1) of Samuel's death, not from a second source, but here inserted by the redactor from xxv. 1 to introduce what follows. The verbs are pluperfect in sense. And they had buried him at Ramah, namely or, that is, in his city. The 1 [= and, namely] is explicative, as in 2 Sam. xiii. 20; Am. iii. 11; iv. 10 (Ges. § 155, 1 a). Its omission in Sept., Vulg., Syr., is explained by the difficulty that it occasioned the translators. 2) Of Saul's expulsion of the witches and soothsayers (long before this). Saul had put away, expelled the necromancers (וְהַמְּוִדִים) and the wise men (וְהַיִּדְּוִנִּים) [wizards], the soothsayers. On the various meanings of the word Ob [Eng. A. V. familiar spirit] see Böttcher, de inferis, I., pp. 101–108. Most moderns connect it with ob (אֹב), “leather bag,” which is found in the Plural in Job xxxii. 19. We cannot, however, thence render the word with the Sept. “ventriloquist” (ἐγγαστριμυθός), because, as Diestel (Herz, XVII., 482) remarks, the representation of soothsaying or sorcery as ventriloquism would destroy the appearance of the supernatural, and it cannot be shown that ventriloquists as such were accounted sorcerers. As the word in Isa. viii. 19, xxix. 4 expresses a dull, hollow, groaning sound, “it is best to suppose a stem אֹב, the softened form of the Arab. [أَب] = “to be hollow,” and Ob is then the “hollow thing” (bag), and so “one who speaks hollow” (Diestel ubi sup.). In conjurations of the dead it is the dull, hollow, mysterious tone of the voice, which was personified and represented as a mysterious being, whether as the spirit of the departed speaking from the depth of the earth (Isa. xxix. 9), or as the spirit dwelling in the conjuror, man or woman (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6, 27), and, finally, the necromancers or speaking soothsayers themselves were so called, as here and 2 Kings xxiii. 24. The “wise people” [wizards] (וְהַיִּדְּוִנִּים), always connected with the Oboth or necromancers, are those that deal in necromancy through sorcery and soothsaying; the simple expression in our [German] popular language, “wise woman” [so Eng. wizard—Tr.] rests on the same idea of a knowledge of what is concealed and future by mysterious means. In his passionate zeal for the Law, urged on by an unquiet conscience, Saul had driven the necromancers and soothsayers out of the land (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 27, comp. Deut. xviii. 10 sq.), that he might thus show himself a zealous theocratic king and win God's favor. This statement is appended to that of Samuel's death as a superscription, as it were, to bring out the sharp contrast of the following narrative of Saul's conduct.

Vers. 4–25. Saul and the witch of Endor.

Ver. 4. The camp of the Philistines was in Shunem, Josh. xix. 18, which signifies, according to Ges., “two resting-places” (= שְׁנֵי מְנוּחִים); according to Eusebius it was also called Skulem, which is confirmed by the present name, for it is the same place that is now called Solam or Sulem (Rob.,

III., 402 [Am. ed., ii., 324]), on the western declivity of *little Hermon [Jebel Duhy], the home of Abishag (1 Kings i. 3), and of the woman that often entertained Elisha, whose son he restored to life (2 Kings iv. 8-37; viii. 1, 6). [Bib.-Com.: The Philistines either advanced along the seacoast, and then entered the valley of Jezreel from the west—the same route, only in the opposite direction, as that taken by the Midianites, who, coming to the valley of Jezreel from the Jordan, penetrated as far as Gaza (Judg. vi. 4, 33)—or else they came by the present road right through Samaria, starting from Aphek.—Ta.] Only about four miles thence Saul had gathered the host of Israel, which was encamped on Gilboa, that is, the mountain range in the territory of Issachar, which traverses the south-eastern part of the plain of Jezreel from Zerin to the Jordan-valley, into which it sinks precipitously at Bethsan. There is now there a village called Jelbon (Rob. III. 404 [Am. ed., ii. 318]). The two armies were therefore encamped on the two groups of mountains that enclosed the broad plain of Jezreel toward the east, or, more precisely, the south-east, between which stretched a valley-plain. From an elevation of about twelve hundred feet Saul could see the Philistine camp, which was only four miles distant.†

Ver. 5. The sight fills him with fear and great dread, because he had a bad conscience towards the Lord, and therefore could not be sure of His help, not merely because he saw that the Philistine army was so unexpectedly numerous (Cler.).—Ver. 6. Yet in his anxiety he had recourse to “inquiring of the Lord,” he wished thereby to learn what he was to do, and also the fate of himself and his army. But the Lord answered him not, the reason for which see in xv. 26, comp. xiv. 37.—The threefold Urim [also] puts in one line the three means of inquiry of the Lord (on the repetition of Urim to connect things related or similar, “both . . . and” in pos. sentences, “neither . . . nor” in neg., see Ew., § 359): Dreams, Urim (and Thummim) and Prophets.‡ The phrase “inquire in” (עָנֵן) is commonly used of inquiry by Urim and Thummim, with which the two other modes are here connected. The “dreams,” the first means of the revelation of the divine will, are not dreams by incubations at a holy place (Ew.), “to which nothing here or elsewhere points” (Then.), nor the dreams of those that receive the revelation, but the dreams of mediating persons, through whom the Lord was inquired of; these might be and were sometimes prophets, comp. Num. xii. 6 with Jer. xxiii. 25, 32, and Deut. xiii. 2 sq., where the false prophets with their lying dreams are opposed to the true—but might also be unprophetic persons, as in Joel iii. 1. Here in our passage the persons who have revelations in dreams are distinguished from the “prophets.” In the order of arrangements of these three vehicles of revelation there is a progression from the less to the greater, since in the Old Testament a subordinate position is certainly assigned to the dream as the medium of divine influence on the inner life, which in sleep loses the power of self-manifestation and sinks into a state of the extreme passivity.—Urim is the abbreviation of Urim and Thummim (Ex. xxviii. 30; Num. xxvii. 21), which, as the high-priestly medium of inquiring the divine will, stands between the revealing-dreams and the prophetic testimony. But since the murder of the priests in Nob the external apparatus, the Ephod with the Urim and Thummim had been in David's camp, xxii. 20 sq., xxiii. 6, xxx. 7; and nothing is anywhere said of another high-priest than Abiathar, who had fled to David. Thenius thence concludes that this section contradicts the narrative of chap. xxiii., since Saul could have gotten no answer at all through Urim and Thummim, because these could have been only in one place. But this is not certain; after the catastrophe at Nob Saul may well have had a new Ephod with Choshen [Breastplate] and Urim and Thummim prepared (Keil), and this is the more natural from Saul's independent mode of procedure in matters of religious service, and the probability that in his heated theocratic zeal he did not suffer the public service at the tabernacle to cease after the murder of the priests. (It is possible also that a copy of the Ephod with the Urim and Thummim had been left behind when Abiathar fled.) As to the high-priest, apart from the possibility of inquiring by Urim and Thummim without him (it is done apparently without a priest by Saul, xiv. 37, and David, xxiii. 9-12), it is to be observed that in the first years of David's government the tabernacle is at Gibeon with Zadok, son of Ahitub of the line of Eleazar, as high-priest, which can be explained only by supposing that Saul had removed the tabernacle and the national worship thither from Nob, and that there were two high-priests, who, indeed, are frequently mentioned, 2 Sam. viii. 17; xv. 24, 29, 35; 1 Chron. xv. 11; xviii. 16. We may thence conclude that Saul chose a high-priest from the high-priestly race of the line of Eleazar. It is further to be remarked that in Saul's own words, ver. 15, this inquiry by Urim is not mentioned. In 1 Chron. x. 14 it is said that he was slain by the Lord because he did not inquire of the Lord. The contradiction is only apparent; he gave over the true, right inquiry, in that, his first questioning, which was not with upright, humble heart, having been unanswered, he betook himself to a necromancer, instead of penitently applying to God.—By the prophets. Intercourse between Saul and the prophets had doubtless been broken off since the beginning of Saul's persecution of David (xix.), while it had continued between David and the prophets, as far as circumstances permitted (xxii. 5 sq.). But in his anxiety and despair Saul had now again turned to them for aid. Proof that application was made to prophets not only in great theocratic matters, but also in personal affairs, is found in ix. 6 sq.; 1 Kings xiv. 1 sq.; 2 Kings i. 3.—Saul received from God no answer more, except for judgment.—Ver. 7. Instead of humbling himself before God, he turns with hardened heart and bad conscience to the superstitious means, that the law of God

* [This incorrect name comes from a misunderstanding of Ps. lxxix. 12 (13).—Ta.]

† [According to Stanley (Sin. and Pal., IX., ii. 3) Saul was stationed nearly on the site of Gideon's camp. See Art. “Gilboa” in Smith's Bib.-Dict., and Hackett's note, Amer. Ed.—Ta.]

‡ [Bp. Patrick notes that the same three classes are mentioned in II i. 62.—Ta.]

had forbidden (Lev. xix. 31). Making accomplices of his servants, he gets information through them of a necromancer. (נִחֵם, appositional construct, without Genitive relation, Ges. § 116, 5, see Josh. xxxvii. 22; Jer. xiv. 17.) "A woman mistress of Ob," = "a woman who is in possession of an Ob," that is, of a spirit (comp. Lev. xx. 27) by which the dead are conjured up, in order that they may disclose the present and the future. They inform him of such a one who dwells at Endor. Endor was on the northern declivity of Little Hermon, four and three-fourths Eng. miles south of Tabor, nine and a half miles south-east of Nazareth, about twelve miles north of Gilboa, so that Little Hermon lay between; there is still a place of the same name on the declivity of the mountain, Jebel Duhy. Rob. III. 1, 486 [Am. ed. ii. 360].—[Endor, = "fountain of the dwelling," is still marked by a spring and numerous caves fit for the abode of witches (Thomson). For descriptions of the circumstances of this incident see Stanley's Hist. of the Jewish Church, II. 30 sq., Sinai and Pal. p. 323-334 (Eng. ed.), Porter in Murray's Handbook for Syria and Pal. ii. 355 sq., Thomson's "Land and Book," ii. 161.—Tr.]—Ver. 8. Saul disguised himself, namely, by putting on other clothes so as not to be recognized by his royal dress and insignia, especially as he was treading a path forbidden by himself. At night he went thither, in order to escape the notice of his own people and of the enemy's posts, which were not far off; he was accompanied by two men to show him the way and act as guard. A dreadful journey, a terrible night, both symbols of Saul's condition, lost on the way of inner self-hardening and thorough self-darkening.—Saul's request: Divine for me by necromancy [properly: "by the Ob, the spirit," as in Eng. A. V.—Tr.]. The word "divine" (דָּבַר) commonly occurs in a bad sense of the predictions of false prophets, comp. Deut. xviii. 10, 14; 2 Kings vii. 17; 1 Sam. vi. 2 (in a good sense in Isa. iii. 2; * Prov. xvi. 10 [the subst.]). On its meaning see Hengst., Bileam, p. 9 sq. Anm.† —Ver. 9. The woman does not recognize Saul, as is plain from ver. 12. Her words show that Saul's order for the extirpation of this superstition had been vigorously carried out. (Thenius: נִחֵם may be Sing. Col. (Böttch.), but all the VSS. and twenty-three MSS. supply the Plu. בָּ, which may easily have fallen out through the following בָּ.)—Necromancy was forbidden on pain of death (Ex. xxii. 18; Lev. xix. 31; xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 10, 11). The woman supposes that the stranger is putting her to the test, in order to kill her according to the king's law and command; and this indicates that it was in this way that the law of extermination of witches was carried out. In the earliest period of the monarchy, as fruit of Samuel's labors, we see a worship purified from all idolatry, and an energetic zeal against everything connected with idolatry, including this sort of superstition.—[This statement is too broad; idolatry probably existed all along in Israel. Comp. Judg. xviii. 30, 31; 1 Sam. xix. 13.—Tr.] So much the more despicable is Saul's present action.—Ver. 10 sq. Saul swears to her that no harm shall thereby come to her: "by the Lord;" "an oath which shows how completely hardened Saul was" (Keil). Not till he has given this oath does the woman ask: Whom shall I bring up to thee? which is in two respects significant: 1) in that the witch thereby claims to have sovereignty, as it were, over the whole realm of the dead, and 2) in that these words indicate the business-like routine of the witch in her soothsaying and conjuration, and have precisely the tone of the modern small dealer: "what do you wish? and how can I serve you?"—Thenius supposes that the woman thus obtained from Saul the promise that she should not be punished for what he (already recognized by her as the king) should hear from her; but this view rests on the unfounded assumption that the woman had certainly known beforehand from the servants (who had directed Saul to her) of this visit, and must have recognized the visitor, if not by his attendants, yet by his extraordinary bodily size. From the narrator's account we cannot doubt that his view was that Saul came as an unknown person to the woman. And the woman's whole conduct, ver. 12, permits no other opinion. His height need not have betrayed him to her; it was night, and he was disguised; his anxiety, his age and his disguise all permit us to suppose that he was somewhat bowed and bent.—Saul's demand: Bring me up Samuel (and so the woman's question) supposes (the word "up" involves it) that the dead dwelt not in the grave, in the pit, but (as buried) dwelt under the earth in Sheol, that is, a large, broad space which received and claimed (from נִחֵם, comp. Prov. xxvii. 20; Ps. vi. 6 [5]) all the dead without distinction, godly and ungodly—dwelt in a realm of the dead. The contrast to this realm of the dead beneath the earth is heaven above the earth, where dwells the Lord with the host of angels. The superstition in question consisted in the fact that it was believed that by conjuration the dead were compelled to rise from the depth of Sheol to the surface of the earth, and answer questions put to them. It seems from Ex. xxii. 18; Lev. xx. 27, that women often practiced this necromancy, to which fact Winer conjectures the Fem. Plu. form Oboto to refer (W.-B. II. 628, A. 4). The usual operations or formulas of conjuration, which the woman no doubt employed after the above business-conversation, are not specially mentioned by the narrator, being irrelevant and of purely technical significance, but belong between vers. 11 and 12. Böttcher conjectures, but unnecessarily and without ground, that a verse has here fallen out, which mentioned the necromantic apparatus, and stated that the woman went out into a court

* [Not necessarily here in the good sense, more probably it and "prophet" are intended to describe all classes of predictions.—Tr.]

† קִטְּוּ. Kethib, קִטְּוּ, Qeri, comp. Ex. § 40 b: the O-sound is sometimes so pressed by new endings that it recedes to a foregoing vowelless consonant, and is sometimes repeated with two adjacent consonants, as קִטְּוּ. In such cases we find the half-vowel echo O in the same syllable (commonly found only with gutturals), generally with p, and in a loosely connected syllable as here. Comp. Judg. ix. 8.

or garden. Such a supplement is not at all needed for the understanding of the affair. In support of this view Böttcher adduces the words: "and the woman came" of ver. 21, and the necessity of a large space for the exhibition of a gigantic figure; to which Thenius rightly replies that we need not regard the figure indicated by the "Elohim" [God, ver. 13] as a gigantic one, and that nothing is said in the account of exhibiting it. — Ver. 12. "She saw" (רָאָה), not: "she acted as if she saw" (Then.). Render: When the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice.—According to this the cause of her outcry was the sight of the apparition of Samuel. The following words: And the woman said to Saul, Why hast thou deceived me, for thou art Saul? indicate that the woman at the same time recognized Saul in the Unknown; this discovery naturally reminded her of her danger as violator of the king's prohibition. She thinks herself deceived, tricked and given over to death. There is hardly any doubt, therefore, that this sudden perception of her danger, together with Samuel's apparition, was the cause of the terror which was expressed in her outcry. How she came to recognize the king in the Unknown, is not indicated in the words. Thenius, assuming that she already knew with whom she was dealing, supposes that, as she simulated fear at the alleged apparition, she now pretended that her sudden recognition of Saul came through supernatural influence, through Samuel indeed. But the text gives no support to the assumption on which this explanation rests. Ewald supposes that she burst out into a loud cry on seeing Samuel's shade, because it ascended with such frightfully threatening gestures as it could have used only against its deadly enemy, that is, Saul, and she thence saw that the questioner must be Saul. But the words give no reason at all to suppose that this was the view of the narrator. Keil holds that the woman had fallen into a state of clairvoyance, in which she could recognize persons who, like Saul, were unknown to her by face. Is there not, however, a simpler explanation, partly psychological, partly suggested by the context, both of her seeing Samuel's form and recognizing Saul? As to the former, so much is clear from the connection, that only the woman, not Saul, saw Samuel; this appears from Saul's question, vers. 13, 14: "What seest thou? what is his form?" She then describes the apparition, in order to leave to Saul its identification with Samuel (ver. 14 b). That the woman went out of the room in which she was at first with Saul, into another, is not said, and is not to be inferred from the words: "she came to Saul." Therefore in the same room she sees Samuel's apparition, and Saul does not see it. This can be explained psychologically only as by an inner vision, the occasion for which was given by Saul's request to bring up Samuel, and the psychological foundation of which was her lively recollection of Samuel's form, which was well known to her from his earthly life, and stood before her mind in vividest distinctness. So Tanchum explains it: "She saw Samuel not with the eyes, but with the aid of the imagination, inwardly, in his well-known form." And her recognition of Saul just at this moment would be psychologically explained as the product of her inward perception of Samuel (occasioned by Saul's request), and of her recollection of the relation in which she knew Saul had stood to Samuel and of the prophetic sentence of punishment which Samuel had pronounced against Saul. When now, at this moment, so full of danger for all Israel, she saw before her the mysterious Unknown, who was come through her to question Samuel concerning the impending battle, and who on a nearer view, despite his disguise, made on her by the mysterious character of his personality, the impression of an extraordinary person, she could, by her intensified power of perception, straightway recognize him as Saul, and must needs then be seized with the terror of which the account tells.—Ver. 13. Saul calms her deadly fear.—Fear not, that is, concerning thy life.—The question: What seest thou? supposes 1) that he did not see what she saw; 2) that she was with him in the same room in which the foregoing conversation had occurred, and 3) that on account of the manipulations usual in such conjurations, she was yet necessarily at some distance from him. She answers: I see Elohim ascending out of the earth.—The word "Elohim" signifies here not a plurality of appearances (Gods, Sept., Vulg., Syr., Arab.—or spiritual beings, ghosts, Tremell.—or several devils, one of whom took the form of Samuel, S. Schmid—or angels, Chald., Theod.), but, despite the [Heb.] Plu. predicate (אֲשַׁר, "ascending," by attraction from the Plu. subst.), a single appearance, as is evident from the Sing. pronoun, "his form," a spiritual appearance belonging to the region of the super-terrestrial, the superhuman, a fear- and terror-producing spiritual appearance. The word is here employed in a sense "for which the idea of divinity is too restricted, the general, vague idea of the not-earthly, not-human" (Hengst., Beit. II. 255). But Thenius also rightly connects with it the idea of the terror-inspiring from the fact that the simple

Heb. sounds alah (אָלָה), from which the word is made, are the involuntary sounds of astonishment and fear, referring to Gen. xxxi. 42, where the "fear of Isaac" stands along with the "God of Abraham."*—Ver. 14. Saul's second question: What is his appearance, his form? The woman's answer gives an exacter description of the spiritual appearance which she saw in her visionary state: An old man cometh up, and he is covered with a mantle.—The meil (מֵעַל) is the talar-shaped garment [reaching to the ankles.—Tr.], the prophet's mantle, which Samuel wore in his life-time (xv. 27), and in which the woman and Saul would necessarily remember him. Still we have no hint that Saul saw the appearance that was visible to the woman. It is said of him only that "from this description he recognized the form seen by the woman to be Samuel, and to do him reverence bowed down to the ground."

* [Whatever may be the original meaning of the stem (אָלָה), the reasoning of Thenius, endorsed by Erdmann, is very unsafe. We know too little of primeval onomatopoeia to base etymologies on it. The example of Gen. xxx. 42 cannot be decisive for the original meaning of Elohim, and, if it were, the actual historical meaning is a question of use, not of etymology. Now "Elohim" is elsewhere in the Old Testament used only of "god" and "judges or kings."—Tr.]

Vers. 15-20. Conversation of Samuel and Saul. Ver. 15. And Samuel said, that is, the woman (Tanchum) spoke from the place where she was standing in hollow, dull tones, which Saul supposed to be Samuel's, perhaps in the manner of ventriloquists, the natural result of her excited visionary state, in which she identified herself with Samuel.—Why dost thou disquiet me, disturb me (comp. Isa. xiv. 9), to bring me up? These words prove that the narrator assumes the previous employment of arts of conjuration, and exclude the supposition (left undecided by Keil, adopted by other expositors) that Samuel's ascent is represented as produced by miraculous power of God. They also refute the opinion of these expositors, that Samuel's apparition rose before the woman had employed her art, and that therefore there is no employment of magic means between vers. 11 and 12. Rather the view that there was such magic art in this place (between vers. 11 and 12) is confirmed by these words of Samuel: "why dost thou disquiet me?" namely, by the woman's conjurations. Saul's answer gives his reason for this disturbance of the dead as follows: 1) I am in great straits from the Philistines, who are warring against me; 2) God has left me, and answers me no more; 3) I wish to know what to do, I am at a loss and uncertain about the future. So I have had thee called* to tell me what I shall do.—According to the preceding words: "God has left me and answers me no more," Saul cannot regard the answer which he asks from Samuel as God's revelation and declaration; in fact there is in his words a contrasting, or at least a distinction between the divine revelation no longer granted him and the supernatural magic-gotten answer which he expects from Samuel. And yet Samuel was the prophet of the Lord and His organ. This is the contradiction to which Samuel's answer, ver. 16, refers. The contradiction is not that Saul asks from Samuel a divine announcement, while he yet says there is no longer any such answer for him (Keil).—Ver. 16. Samuel's answer: Why dost thou ask me, since the Lord has left thee and become thy enemy?† That is: if the Lord has left thee, why dost thou apply to me, the Lord's instrument?

Vers. 17-19 contain the confirmation of Saul's previous sentence of rejection and the announcement of his impending fate. Ver. 17. The declaration of the fact that the Lord, according to His counsel and determination (עָשָׂה לִי, "hath done for Himself" [Eng. A. V.: wrongly "to him"]), has taken the kingdom from him and given it to David. The Lord hath done for himself.—Pleonastic Dative, not unmeaning = has done according to His will, or to carry out His purpose, "to show His truth" (Berl. Bib.). The reading "to thee" (לְךָ) in Sept., Vulg. and some MSS. cited by Thénius (Cod. Kenn. 155, 246; De Rossi 305, 679, 716 [orig.]) is suspicious from its allusion to xv. 26, 28, and because it seems to be an attempt to interpret and smoothen the text, though an original לְ [thee] might easily be copied as לְ [him], and the latter so come into the traditional text. As he spake by me.—Comp. xv. 23. It is remarkable that while in that passage Saul's obstinate rebellion, through which he loses the kingdom, is equalled with the gross sin of sorcery, here in the act of committing this superstitious sin (against which he had shown such bloody zeal), the judgment of inward self-hardening being then finished, he again hears the sentence, and learns with terror that the complete realization and definite fulfilment of the divine decree of rejection is now at hand. The whole declaration of ver. 17 is the factual explanation and confirmation of the words of ver. 16: "The Lord is departed from thee and is become thy enemy, thy oppressor."—Ver. 18. The reason is stated, namely, Saul's disobedience (as in xv. 23). "This thing" is this strait or distress. Comp. "I am sore distressed," ver. 15. The Perf. עָשָׂה [hath done] is to be understood, like the preceding Perfects, of what has happened, and is settled. This Philistine distress, with its immediate results, is God's act in complete fulfilment of the judgment against him.—Ver. 19. Announcement of impending misfortune for himself, his house and his people in battle with the Philistines. And the Lord will deliver Israel also with thee, etc.—"Will deliver" (יִפְדֶּה) again indicates the act of God in accord with His holy and righteous will, and is to be taken (with Keil) as voluntative; with the king, on whom the judgment falls by the Philistine, the judgment will reach the people also, on account of the ethical and theocratical construction without it; though, while unexampled, it would not be ungrammatical (Maur.). We should expect לְעָרֶךְ. Does not this then cast suspicion on the whole expression, especially as עָרֶךְ in Psalm cxxxix. 20 is not assured? It is certainly surprising and noteworthy that Sept.: καὶ ἐπὶ τὴν μέραν τοῦ πλησίον σου, and Vulg.: transierit ad cerniculum tuum [in Ps. cxxxix. Sept. μέλαν, Vulg. adversarii—Ta.], render (comp. Syr., Ar.) as if they read עָרֶךְ עִם—"and is with thy neighbor," which Then. thence adopts as the true reading. These translations may indeed be mere conjectural phrases (Keil), or may have had in mind the לְעָרֶךְ of the following verse and the parallel passage, xv. 28 (Maur.). It is hard to decide, the pros and cons being so nearly balanced.

* On the לְ parag. Instead of לְ, for strengthening, see Ew. § 228 c. A. 1.

† עָרֶךְ—"enemy," occurs elsewhere only in Psalm cxxxix. 20, a Psalm which undoubtedly contains some Aramaic words and forms, and in Dan. iv. 16 as a Chaldean word—not in Psalm ix. 7 and Isa. xiv. 21, where the form is to be otherwise explained. We might take the word as Aramaic form of עָרַץ, the interchange of Heb.

עָרַץ and Aram. עָרַץ being not infrequent, like עָרַץ and עָרַץ in Greek (examples in Ges. under letter עָרַץ 3); and though there is no other Aramaic form in this section, and the word עָרַץ (for עָרַץ) appears with this signification mostly in poetry (Job xxxvi. 16; Lam. i. 5, 7, 10), yet the poetical style (as here) is not far removed from the poetical, and עָרַץ might be used here as well as in Num. x. 9, which is not properly poetical; the Aramaic change of עָרַץ into עָרַץ might easily come by error in copying. The use of עָרַץ might be explained as a designed reference to עָרַץ-לִי in ver. 15. But the absence of לִי before עָרַץ makes a difficulty, עָרַץ never occurring in such a solidarity [organic oneness] which exists between him and them; the Lord will subject them to the Philistines. And to-morrow wilt thou and thy sons be with me—dead, with me the dead, in the Underworld; “with me” in the kingdom of the dead, in Sheol. Hence it appears that besides self-consciousness (which indeed was conceived of as sunken into a sleep or dream-like state), that is, besides the continued existence of the personality after death, a union after death in Sheol was believed in; at the same time it hence appears that in the realm of the dead the good and evil were not thought to be separated. Thenius would read with the Sept. “thou and thy sons with thee shall fall,” on the ground that the Heb. text strangely first speaks of the Israelites, then descends to the Underworld, then returns to the camp of the Israelites, while the Sept. text presents a perfectly good order: first the general, the defeat; then the particular, the death of Saul and his sons; and finally the result, the plundering of the camp. But the arrangement is excellent in our text, which says nothing else than what the Sept. periphrastically expresses: “to-morrow thou and thy sons will be dead,” and then the Underworld is by no means put in the same line with the Israelites and their camp, but Israel’s renewed defeat, the death of Saul and his sons, and the complete destruction of the camp of Israel, are mentioned as the three decisive blows in the judgment which should fall on Saul.—Ver. 20. Up to this point Saul had remained in his reverential posture as stated in ver. 14; now under the powerful impression of these words he falls suddenly to the ground, and lies his full length on the earth. The cause is stated to be: 1) his terror at Samuel’s words, and 2) his weakness, resulting from the fact (of course from inward excitement), that he had taken no food the whole (preceding) day and the whole night.

Vers. 21–25. Saul’s entertainment by the woman. The words “and the woman came” do not in themselves justify the opinion (Then., Diestel in Herz. XVII. 482, et al.) that the woman had been in another room, nor is there any hint of this elsewhere in the narrative. The words of the woman (vers. 21, 22) show a talkativeness characteristic of this class of women, and a certain humor, particularly in the contrasting of her obedience to his command and the obedience which she now requires from him for his good, in the introductory words, “and now hearken thou also.” That thou mayest have strength when thou goest on thy way.—These words express neither apprehension, nor the fear that he would die on her hands, and it would then go hard with her, and her prediction would not be fulfilled (Then.); they exhibit merely her natural sympathy with her guest, worn out by excitement and abstinence from food, which prompts her to offer him her hospitality.—Ver. 23 sq. The further minute description of the proceedings of Saul and his servant and the woman is so domestically and psychologically true to life, that the historical trustworthiness of the narrative is put beyond all doubt. Saul refuses to take food because he is full of fear and terror. The servants and the woman force him—he suffers himself to be persuaded. Till now he has lain on the ground; now he gets up and seats himself on the divan (תַּנּוּךְ [Eng. A. V. not so well: “bed”—Tr.], “the cushioned bench, which extends along the wall of the room, still found in the East” (Then.). She kills a fatted calf and bakes unleavened cakes. “She kneaded” where we need not supply “it,” since the words describe the operation of kneading. She baked it as unleavened loaves or cakes, because she was obliged to hurry.

HISTORICAL AND THEOLOGICAL.

1. The theocratic and biblical-theological significance of the history of Saul’s visit to the Witch of Endor is to be judged and determined, first in respect to the representation of the condition of departed souls after death, then as to the religious-moral facts which come under consideration from the Old Testament standpoint of revelation and from the theocratic point of view, and finally as regards Saul’s state of heart in respect to God and the people. In respect to the state of departed souls after death we have the representation not merely of their continuance in personal identity, but also of a self-conscious existence, which is conceived of as a condition of slumber-like rest, from which there may be a rousing and raising; yet such a disturbance is regarded as a disquieting. The abode of the departed, in contrast with heaven as the throne of God and the dwelling of the heavenly powers, is thought to be a wide space deep under the earth (comp. Deut. xxxii. 22; Ps. lxxxvi. 13; lxiii. 10 (9); Ezek. xxvi. 20), not the narrow grave; for Samuel’s grave was at Ramah. The differencing of the realm of the dead from the grave, in which the body is laid, attests the continuance of the soul when separated from the body. Sheol, the Underworld, the Realm of the Dead, receives all the dead without distinction; there is no separation there between Righteous and Unrighteous (ver. 19); the divine law of requital does not reach the Beyond. Comp. Oehler: Vet. test. de rebus post mortem fut. 1846, and the same writer: Die Lehre des Alt-Test. von der Unsterblichkeit (Herz. xxi. 413 sq.); Böttcher: de inferis rebusq. post mortem futuris, 1846. H. A. Hahn: de spe immortalitatis sub V. T. gradatim excoluta, 1846. H. Schultz: Alttestamentliche Theologie I. 396 sq. [See also Oehler: Theologie des Alt. Test., 1873, I., § 77 sq. (and Eng. Transl.). Delitzsch: Bibl. Psychologie (and Eng. Transl.). Himpel: Unsterblichkeits lehre des Alten Test., 1857. Hodge’s Theology III. 716 sq. Smith’s Bib. Dict. Arts. “Dead, Hell, Pit.” Fairbairn’s Bib. Dict. “Hades.” Ewald: Lehre der Bibel von Gott, 1873, III., § 345.—Tr.]

But while now the condition of departed souls is, as a rule, so conceived and represented, that there is no intercourse between them and the Upperworld, and no return from Sheol (Job vii. 9), this narrative of Samuel’s appearance would be the only passage in the Old Testament that teaches the contrary [if it did teach it]. And in fact the narrative means to declare that Samuel really appeared (vers. 16, 20); as Vilmer remarks (“Vom Aberglauben und Zauberei,” in the Pastoral-theolog. Blätter, 1862, p. 201), “unless violence is done to the text, it can be only understood as affirming that the real Samuel ascended from Sheol.” That is the view of the Septuagint also in the addition to 1 Chr. x. 13: "Saul inquired of the ventriloquist [witch], and Samuel the prophet answered him," and of the Son of Sirach xlii. 20 (23) "and after he fell asleep he prophesied and showed the king his end, and out of the ground lifted up his voice in prophecy." In contradiction with this correct opinion is the view of the church-theologians of the 16th and 17th centuries, derived from the patristic writers,* namely, that by divine ordering Saul saw under the form of Samuel a ghost, an illusion produced by demonic, devilish powers. Tertullian (de anima, cap. 57) regards it as a "rivalry of truth by an unclean spirit;" "it was permitted," says he, "the pythonic spirit to represent the soul of Samuel, when Saul (after he had inquired of God) inquired of the dead. Far be it from us to believe that the soul of any saint, much less a prophet, can be drawn forth by a demon. We are taught that Satan transfigures himself into an angel of light, but not into a man of light." So Ephrem Syrus.† In agreement with this Luther says that it was "the devil's ghost," and Calvin that "it was not the real Samuel, but a spectre." So Grotius: "It is more credible that it was a deceptive spirit, and so the woman herself seems plainly to indicate when she says that gods were ascending out of the earth, thus terming those spirits, one of whom had assumed Samuel's form." Comp. S. Schmid (Comm.); A. Pfeiffer, dubia vex. Cent. II. loc. 77; Sal. Deyling, observ. ss. II. obs. 18; Buddæus, hist. eccles., V. I. II. 243 sq.; J. Gerhard, spectrum Endoreum, Jen. 1663 [Bp. Patrick, Comm. in loco]. But the narrative gives not the slightest support to such a view. Neither the original narrator nor the redactor [editor] had in mind (judging from the narrative itself), an illusion produced by demonic or diabolical power. Theodore, rejecting the view (suggested by the words of the narrative and frequent with the Talmudists) that Samuel's spirit was really evoked by the conjurations of the woman—held that, before the woman employed her arts, the appearance of Samuel was produced by God's power, and that God's voice itself was heard in those words against Saul. He says: "It is thence clear that the very God of all beings, having fashioned Samuel's form as He wished, uttered the judgment, the witch not having been able to do this, but God gave the decree even through enemies" [Quest. in Lib. Reg. ad 1 Sam. xxviii.]. Appealing, for proof that God speaks through enemies, to the example of Balaam and to Ezek. xiv. 4, 7 sq. (where it is said of idolators "when they come to the prophet, I will answer them after my manner"), he explicitly affirms that the words ascribed to Samuel were a divine utterance spoken through the mouth of the woman who was acting against God's command. But against this view (which is held also by Justin, Origen, Ambrose, Augustine, and by some Rabbis, as R. Saadiah) it is rightly remarked by D. Kimchi, that we can then see no reason why God should not have answered Saul before by Urim and Thummim, by dreams or by prophets. In fact it is fatal to this view that according to it God is here the answerer, while it is expressly said in ver. 6 that God answered Saul no more, and ver.

7 clearly means that for this reason Saul turned from God to a sorceress. An immediate divine miracle is assumed, which is to be brought into union with the anti-godly attempt of the sorceress and an open act of godlessness or God-forgetfulness on the part of Saul. Support would thus be given to the superstitious opinion that departed spirits may be summoned, while the fundamental view of the Old Testament every where is that a return of the dead to the land of the living is not possible, comp. 2 Sam. xii. 23; Job vii. 9. The necromantic superstition, on which Saul (who, unworthy of a divine answer, is guilty of disobeying the divine command, for which he had displayed so much zeal) and the woman (who practices this superstition as a trade) are united would, according to the narrative, have been the occasion or the medium of a miraculous divine act. Now it may be said indeed that God is accustomed in the wisdom of His providential government so to use man's evil purpose as to compel it to minister immediately to the revelation of His power and glory, as is shown in the history of Balaam and in the declaration of Ezek. xiv. 4, 7 sq. But in such cases express reference is made also to the divine control, comp. Gen. xv. 20; Ex. x. 27. But here there is not the slightest allusion to an immediate interference of God. On the contrary, we plainly read between the lines of this narrative that here a sin is committed; there is no trace of divine action. We cannot therefore accept this view, which is wholly without support, from a religious-ethical as well as from a theocratic-historical standpoint, however thorough and earnest a defence it may have found, as from Dachselt, Bibl. hebr. accentuata, Lips. 1729, p. 430 sq.; Berl. Bib.; O. v. Gerlach; Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychol., 2 ed., p. 428 sq.; Ströbel, Luth. Zeitschr., 1867, p. 781 sq.; V. Rudoff, Die Lehre vom Menschen, 2 ed., 1863, II. 365; Hengstenberg, Abhandl. zu den Psalm. IV., p. 324 sq.; Zeitschrift für Protest. u. Kirche, 1851, p. 138 sq., Abhandl. "Die Geschichte der Zauberin zu Endor." Comp. Oehler in Herzog XXI. 414 sq.; Dachselt, Bibelwerk; Keil, Komm. The last named remarks: "This apparition was externally indeed spiritual, since Samuel was visible only to the woman, not to Saul, but still only an apparition of Samuel's soul in Hades in the investiture of the earthly body and clothing of the prophet in order to become visible." Keil himself remarks that this apparition of Samuel divinely summoned from Hades is a different thing from the appearances of Moses and Elijah at the Transfiguration of Christ (Matt. xvii.; Lu. ix.), because the latter appeared in heavenly refulgence and glory; this phenomenon, therefore, so often cited in support of this view falls away as unanalogous and irrelevant. Still less can we appeal to the angelic appearances in human form in Gen. xviii. and Judg. xiii., because these are superhuman beings. The contradictions in Keil's view are insoluble, namely, that Samuel appeared "in the spiritual form of the dwellers in Hades," and yet at the same time "in the investiture of earthly corporeality and clothing," that Samuel's appearance in spiritual Hades-form is set over against the announcement of these angels "in human form which was visible to the ordinary bodily eye," as if Samuel's apparition was not visible, though it is said that the sorceress saw it and was terrified.

* [But Justin Martyr (Dial. cum Trypho) holds that it was really Samuel.—Ta.]

† [And Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome.—Ta.]

According to this view this would be the only passage in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in which a departed sinful man is called by divine power from the kingdom of the dead to the Upperworld. But this would stand in contradiction with Luke xvi. 17 sq., where Abraham refuses the rich man's request to send Lazarus to his father's house to preach to his living brethren. If it be urged that the prohibition of sorcery and necromancy (Deut. xviii. 1; Isa. viii. 19) does not exclude the possibility of God's permitting Samuel for special reasons to appear, we reply that neither from the connection of the related procedure nor from the words of the relator are there special grounds for supposing such a miracle, which would be sole of its kind. Apart from the fact that Saul had already vainly used all ordained means for learning God's will, and might thence conclude that his obstinate impotence had rendered him unworthy of answer, the appearance and word of Samuel under present circumstances (if God had really been willing to permit it) could no longer have any religious-ethical or theocratic end; no religious-ethical end, because the means for rousing Saul to repentance were exhausted, for this recourse to a necromancer showed a mind thoroughly alienated from God and seeking help elsewhere, a disposition in respect to which even such a miraculous appearance of the prophet would be without effect, as in fact in Samuel's words there is no exhortation to repentance, and there is no trace afterwards of any change for the better in Saul;—no theocratic end, because Saul's rejection as king had already been repeatedly announced, and the sending of Samuel would have been superfluous for the announcement of Saul's impending fall, which, without a miracle, might have reached Saul's ear and made his heart tremble. We must therefore reject both the ancient church-view of an illusory appearance of Samuel produced by the woman's magic art, as the medium of a divine revelation, and also that of an appearance produced immediately by divine power without the woman's aid. Over against these views stands that which regards the whole procedure as a mere deception. Balthasar Becker, te betoverde Wereld [The Magic World] III. 6. Anton van Dale, dissert. de divinationibus idololatriæ sub V. T. in the Treatise de origine et prog. Idololatriæ, p. 620 sq. Schmersahl, Natürl. Erklärung der Gesch. Sauls mit d. Betrügerin zu Endor, Hann., 1751. Köcher, Versuch einer Erklärung der Gesch. Sauls und d. Betrügerin zu Endor, Gera, 1780. Hensler, Erläuter. des 1 B. Sam., p. 88 sq., Ezeget. Handbuch IV. 251 sq. Comp. Böttcher, de inferis, I. 111 sq., Winer II. 627, Thénius, Diestel in Herz. XVII. 482 sq., Rütchi, ibid. s. v. Endor, A. Kuhle, Bibl. Eschatologie, 1870. 1 Abth., p. 65 sq. and others [Clericus in loco]. Thénius' remark that "the deception is everywhere clear in the account" must be admitted except as to the "everywhere," though his reason drawn from ver. 21 [namely, that the woman had been in another room] is not tenable. The woman's conduct and words at Saul's arrival, and at the alleged appearance of Samuel, show that she made necromancy a trade and practiced the deceits usual with such people. The speech of Samuel, a long one under the circumstances, his appearance in the characteristic prophetic dress,

